PROGRESS OF RAILROAD CONSTRUCTION IN DAKOTA.—It might be in place to mention that during the past summer and fall important progress has been made in the extension of railroads in this direction. The Chicago and Northwestern Road has already reached the Town of Dennison in Iowa and soon will be extended to Council Bluffs, where it will connect with and form part of the Great Pacific Railroad. A branch of this road is now projected to extend from St. John's to Sioux City, on our southeastern border, the nearest western point, which I am informed will be immediately put under contract and rapidly prosecuted to completion. It is estimated that this road will be in running order inside of twelve months, thus bringing these improvements within about sixty-five miles of Yankton. We may expect vast and important benefits to accrue to this territory in various ways, by the completion of these roads, especially by the reduction of the time and expense of delivering and forwarding freights, and by increasing the facilities for travel and communication with other parts of the United States. And we may have hopes that at no very distant day the increase of population and business within our borders will justify the extension of this road to our capital, if no farther. Other roads are in contemplation, directly calculated to benefit us when completed, and in the success of which we cannot fail to take a lively interest.

THE NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.—The Northern Pacific Railroad is to be located through the northern part of this territory, opening up by that route a railroad communication with the Pacific States and the gold mining regions of Montana and Idaho. Another route is projected from a point in Minnesota to Yankton by way of Sioux Falls; also one from St. Paul to Sioux City. But owing to the very limited information in my possession regarding these improvements I can furnish no satisfactory statement of their present condition or prospects. I can only say that they may be considered as favorable indications for the future of Dakota and that whatever encouragement can be given here by private or official influence, or through the action of our representative at Washington, should be rendered promptly and without hesitation, so that nothing on our part may be wanting to the complete accomplishment of enterprises bearing so directly upon the future welfare and destiny of this territory.

Agreeably to the duty enjoined upon me by law, I have made the suggestions which have occurred to me as claiming your immediate attention. Subjects of importance have doubtless been omitted, which may readily occur to your own minds and which I may before your adjournment attempt to supply.

Yankton, D. T., December, 1866.

A. J. FAULK.

TERRITORIAL TREASURER'S OFFICE

The territorial treasurer, I. T. Gore, who was a member of the Legislature, made a verbal report of the condition of the territorial treasury, which was ordered to be reduced to writing.

Representative Ash, of Yankton, presented a resolution which provided for a joint committee of six from the House and three from the Council, to investigate the revenue law and the transactions under that law in the County of Yankton. The resolution was passed, and Messrs. Ash, Collamer and Hoyt, of Yankton; Kellogg, of Union; Austin, of Clay, and McCarthy, of Todd, appointed on the part of the House, and Messrs. Fuller and VanOsdel, Yankton, and Stevens of Charles Mix, on the part of the Council. The committee was given power to send for persons and papers. The purpose of this investigation was to ascertain whether any dishonest or illegal practices had been engaged in by the revenue officers of Yankton County in connection with the assessment and collection of taxes of 1865—the first year when any effort was made to collect revenue. The committee did considerable investigating, but found nothing to support the allegation of official dishonesty, but discovered that the methods pursued by the county officials had not been strictly in accordance with law. The outcome of the investigation was the passing of a law authorizing the county commissioners to readjust the tax for 1865. In view of the general commendation and support which had been of recent years given to those who had endeavored to expose fraud and purify the public service of corruption and "graft," this action of the pioneer law-makers of Dakota is mentioned as an instance of the earliest awakening of the official conscience to the importance of probing into the official conduct of public servants charged with fiduciary responsibilities. Dakota, it may be claimed, sounded the earliest alarm.

The efforts put forth by Governor Faulk and the Legislative Assembly secured the regarrisoning of Fort James, referred to in the governor's message, by two companies of infantry. The fort had been abandoned by order of General Sherman, leaving the James River Valley without military protection, and as this valley was the favorite trail of hostile Indian bands from the north and west, they were able to enter the settlements, commit depredations and escape before the Fort Randall authorities could be apprised of the incursion. Fort James, properly garrisoned, was looked upon as the most important strategic point in the southern portion of the territory, the only portion then occupied by white settlers. Notwithstanding its presumed importance, it was abandoned again within a little more than a year, and was totally destroyed by fire on the 20th of October, 1868. The origin of the fire was probably due to the burning of the surrounding prairies, though reports of a different character were at the time freely circulated. There did not seem to be any motive that would induce a white man to destroy the structure, and if it was the work of incendiaries, it is probable that a band of Indians, bent on depredations, believing that if it was left standing it would again be garrisoned by soldiers, an event they very much dreaded, reduced it to an ash heap. It was not rebuilt, and the valley settlers were never more disturbed.

THE COMMON SCHOOLS

The third annual report of the territorial superintendent of public instruction for 1866 furnishes much information regarding the early growth of Dakota's common school system and the condition of educational matters in the territory, and is here given in the belief that it will prove interesting and possibly valuable to the readers of this volume, particularly those engaged in educational work:

Office Board of Education,
Yankton, D. T., December 10, 1866.

To the Honorable, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

Agreeable to your resolution of December 5, I have the honor to submit the third annual report of the superintendent of public instruction for the Territory of Dakota.

The past year has been one of unexampled prosperity to the territory; unexampled not only in the number of thriving industrious settlers who have come to dwell among us, but in the extent of valuable and permanent improvements. These improvements are to be seen not only in the thriving towns springing up on our thoroughfares, with increasing facilities for manufacture and trade, but in the substantial agricultural improvements that dot our beautiful prairies with happy cottage homes, generally surrounded with extensive and well cultivated fields, which, by the blessing of Providence, have this year yielded a bountiful harvest. So rapid has been the influx of immigration the past season that in some sections where there was not a single house in April of this year there are now flourishing settlements with valuable and permanent improvements, with school districts organized, suitable schoolhouses erected, and furnished with all the necessary fixtures for a good common school. We are admonished by our rapidly increasing population, by a lively and growing interest in the subject of schools, and by the earnest appeals of citizens from all sections of the territory for a school district organization, that the time will soon come when the benefits of our public schools will be extended to every neighborhood in this territory.

Within the past year the number of organized school districts in the territory has more than quadrupled, and the number of children of school age has increased in nearly the same proportion. In most of the districts schools have been maintained for a portion of the past year ranging from three to nine months. The schools have mostly been taught by competent instructors, and in some instances paid by moneys received from the county treasurers, the proceeds of the per capita tax, and in other districts by money raised by tax on real estate and personal property in the school districts, and by subscription. It is to be presumed that few if any of the districts are so perfectly organized as to reap the full benefit of our generally acceptable school law. It will require some little time for the machinery of the law to get into operation so that the full amount of money to which the public schools are by law entitled will be faithfully collected and judiciously expended. The following table exhibits the amount of money raised for school purposes, the sources from which it came, and the manner in which it was expended, together with such other information as could be gleaned from the meagre reports of county superintendents:

Bon Homme County has 1 teacher, 25 scholars, and has paid $36 for teaching during the year.

Clay County has 5 organized districts, 5 teachers, 200 scholars; has expended $200 on school buildings, and $380 to pay teachers.

No reports from Todd, Charles Mix, Buffalo, or Gregory counties.

Union County has 10 organized districts, 5 teachers, 336 scholars; has paid $606.19 for teaching, and has $1,000 worth of school property.

Yankton County has 2 districts, 3 teachers, 108 scholars; has paid $495 to teachers, $25 for maps and charts, and owns school property worth $1,700.

It is an admitted fact that in order to become a skillful practitioner in any profession, constant study and practice is required, as well as a mutual interchange of ideas. To this end lawyers, physicians and clergymen have their societies, calculated to aid its members in the practice of their profession. The same is true of farmers and all classes of mechanics. Of all occupations, that of teaching requires a mutual interchange of ideas in order to develop the faculties. To become a successful teacher requires not only a good perceptive faculty and ability to comprehend an idea, but it requires an aptness to teach and to impart to others in a pleasing and interesting manner whatever idea we may wish to convey. This is sometimes a natural gift, but most generally it is an acquired faculty and in no way can be more easily acquired than by attendance on teachers' institutes. Previous to the year 1825 no normal schools or teachers' institutes were organized, but so popular have these institutions become of late that every state boasts of at least one, and some have four, normal schools. In addition to these state institutes, most states establish by law county institutes for the drill of their own teachers, and all teachers of the county are required to be present at these training schools. These county institutes hold sessions varying from two to six weeks. The usual school hours are spent in thoroughly reviewing the studies usually taught in common schools and in the discussion of subjects pertaining to school government, and the evenings are occupied by lectures from competent persons whose addresses are not only pleasing but highly instructive. If we expect to keep pace with the progressive methods of instruction of the present age, our teachers must continually study. Teachers' institutes can be conducted by the county superintendents and the superintendent of public instruction without any extra expense, and would be of incalculable value to our teachers. In order that our teachers may be furnished with a school of training easily accessible and within the reach of every teacher in the territory, I would recommend that the school law be so amended as to require of the superintendent of public instruction, with the assistance of county superintendents, to hold annually, at the county seats of Union, Clay and Yankton counties, alternately, a teachers' institute, to commence on the first Monday of November, and to continue for two weeks, which institute or training school shall be free to all teachers of the territory, and all persons preparing for teachers.

In most counties the per capita tax has been collected, and will be distributed to the several districts in April next. A considerable sum would accrue to the school fund in each county from fines and forfeitures, and other sources, if they were collected. I would recommend that county superintendents be made the guardians of school funds in their respective counties, and that they be authorized to call to their counsel and assistance the county attorney, if they shall deem it necessary, in the collection of such fines and forfeitures as may be due to the school fund. It was the intention of the board of education and superintendent of public instruction to hold a convocation of schools in each county at the county seat thereof, early last spring, but circumstances over which the school officers had no control, prevented. I would here renew the suggestion to hold in each county, in the early part of the summer, a convocation of all the schools in said county. If county superintendents will act in conjunction with the territorial superintendent in this matter, I doubt not that much good can be accomplished.

There is now no way of appeal from the decision of the district board except to a legal tribunal. I would suggest the propriety of providing a law of appeal, so that when a person feels himself aggrieved by the action of the district board, an appeal may be taken within a specified time to the county superintendent, and from his decision to that of the proper officer.

It is unfortunate for the educational interests of the territory that the larger schools cannot be supplied with permanent teachers. Transient teachers have not half the incentive to study and improve that permanent teachers have. The standard of qualification for teachers is low enough at best, and every facility should be extended to teachers that will aid them in acquiring a more perfect knowledge of the art of teaching. I would suggest to teachers to subscribe for and peruse carefully some educational journal. Teachers should be exemplary in life; always kind and courteous to pupils as well as to "children of a larger growth." It is a responsible position to occupy, that of a teacher of youth, and he who esteems it lightly, or has no love for the work, is not worthy of the name of teacher.

It is with pleasure that we witness an increasing interest in the subject of schools. We are called upon by every interest dear to us to support good and sufficient schools for the education of our children, in every district. It is far cheaper and better to maintain a good school in our own district than to send our children to a distant school to be educated by strangers. Let us remember that every dollar invested in schools pays a better interest than a dollar invested in any other way except for bread, and that it is as much the duty of every parent to look after the education of their children, intellectually, morally and physically, as it is to provide them with food to eat or clothes to wear. Governor Berkeley, of Virginia, once said: "I thank God there are no free schools or printing offices in Virginia, and I hope we shall not have these hundred years." I rejoice that we hear no such sentiments uttered now. I prefer that other sentiment spoken by a later governor of the Old Dominion: "Give your children a good common school education, and the faithful instructions of the Sabbath school, and if after that you are compelled to send them out into the world to shift for themselves you need not have any fears concerning them." A good common school education is the motive power, and well developed moral faculties the compass, that will guide their possessors to honorable stations in society, which many a wealthy but uneducated man might well covet.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

JAMES S. FOSTER,
Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Councilman Fuller presented a bill to incorporate the City of Yankton. It passed the Council, but was defeated in the House. An act was passed authorizing the assessment and collection of a tax for the purpose of completing the schoolhouse in District No. 1, Yankton. This was the first Yankton schoolhouse located on what has since been taken as the site for the postoffice, and had been built by private subscription, but needed a number of improvements, and had been taken over by School District No. 1. Laws were also passed defining the boundaries and authorizing the organization of the County of Pembina, on Red River; and also the County of Laramie (now the State of Wyoming), which in 1866 and later was a part of Dakota.

A bill to provide for the organization of county agricultural societies became a law; also an act to incorporate the Dakota & Northwestern Railroad Company, and the Minnesota & Missouri River Railroad Company. A township government law for Union County alone was enacted; and a law for the removal of county seats by vote of the people. General Todd, speaker of the House and founder of Yankton, introduced a bill to remove the capital from Yankton to Vermillion, and succeeded in getting it through the House on the thirty-seventh day. When it appeared in the Council it was discovered that it had no enacting clause, and the committee to whom it was referred reported that the author of the measure was actuated by other motives than a desire to secure its passage, which report was sustained by the unanimous vote of the Council, save one of the Vermillion members, Mr. Weeks. The bill was rejected. There were more memorials to Congress and other authorities passed than at any previous sessions. They covered the whole ground of territorial roads, including a capitol building, the geological survey, the opening of the Black Hills, the construction of wagon roads and bridges, the new mail routes and increase of mail facilities on routes already established, the regarrisoning of Fort James near Rockport, and praying for military protection from the Indians who were hostile in many quarters and who had recently committed an atrocious massacre at Fort Fetterman. A number of amendments were made to existing laws, but there was less general legislation than had been expected, and this was ascribed to the fact that a large percentage of the House were new members, new to the business, inclined to be suspicious of new laws and very cautious about voting affirmatively. The act to incorporate Yankton City, and the justices' code, prepared with great care, were both defeated in the House, after passing the Council, because a majority of the members were apprehensive that the bills carried provisions of an obnoxious character that would blast their political aspirations, should they favor them.

The Legislature adjourned without day on Friday, January 12, 1867.

AMENDING THE ORGANIC ACT

The organic acts of the several territories including Dakota, 1866-67, prohibiting the territories from denying the elective franchise to any person on account of race or color. It was known as the "negro suffrage bill," and is here given:

An Act to Regulate the Elective Franchise in the Territories of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That from and after the passage of this act there shall be no denial of the elective franchise in any of the territories of the United States, now, or hereafter to be organized, to any citizen thereof, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and all acts or parts of acts, either of Congress or the legislative assemblies of said territories, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby declared null and void.

SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

LAFAYETTE FOSTER,

President of the Senate pro tempore.

The foregoing act was not approved by President Johnson, but was retained by him until after the ten days allowed by the Constitution had expired, and so became a law without his approval, January 24, 1867.

To prohibit the pernicious legislation which had characterized the enactments of some of the territorial Legislatures, Congress, in 1866, amended the organic law of all the territories, prohibiting the enactment of special laws conferring corporate powers, but authorized the enactment of a general law for that purpose. It also prohibited the Legislatures from granting divorces, leaving that authority with the courts of the territories. The Legislature of Dakota had granted a large number of special charters, and had also dissolved matrimonial ties in a very few instances during the two sessions succeeding the organization of the territory. During Governor Edmunds' term he had uniformly vetoed all divorce bills.

In January, 1867, Congress passed an act setting aside the net proceeds of internal revenue in the Territory of Dakota for the years 1866, 1867 and 1868 to an amount not exceeding forty thousand dollars for the purpose of erecting a penitentiary in the territory at such place as the Legislative Assembly might designate. The Legislative Assembly had already located the penitentiary at Bon Homme. Four years later Governor Burbank referred to this in his message to the Legislature, and stated that the treasury department had reported to him that the net proceeds appropriated had proved of no value, the expense of collecting the revenue in Dakota having exceeded the collections.

WAR MATERIAL

About ninety boxes of military goods, arms and ammunition sent by the Federal Government for mounted troops, including small arms, were received at the territorial capital in May, 1867, for the use of the Dakota militia. They were a part of the cargo of the steamboat Antelope (this boat was owned by Payo), and were delivered to Adj. Gen. James L. Kelley. In April previous, anticipating the arrival of these guns, acting Governor Spink had issued the following proclamation authorizing the organization of militia cavalry companies in order to make a general distribution of the equipments when they should be received, and also that the settlers might have wherewith to defend their homes in case of Indian invasion which was a matter of current expectation:

TO THE CITIZENS OF DAKOTA TERRITORY

You have already been informed that 1,000 breech loading carbines, 100,000 rounds of ammunition, and 400 cavalry equipments, forwarded from Washington, will soon arrive in the territory. I do not wish to cause any unnecessary alarm, and there is probably very little danger of an Indian invasion, but it is the part of wise men to be prepared for any emergency. You are earnestly requested to meet in your respective counties at an early day and organize cavalry companies under the militia law of 1862. These companies will elect their officers, who will be commissioned by the governor and receive their arms and equipments. It is hoped at least one company will be formed in Yankton, one in Clay, and one in Union County. This is the only way that the citizens can get possession of these arms.

S. L. SPINK,

Secretary and Acting Governor.

Under this proclamation, seven cavalry companies were organized and the officers commissioned, to-wit: Bon Homme County, W. A. Burleigh, captain; Nathan McDaniels, first lieutenant; Geo. W. Owens, second lieutenant. Clay County, Company B, Nelson Miner, captain; Franklin Denison, first lieutenant; John L. Jolley, second lieutenant. Yankton County, Company C, G. A. McLeod, captain; A. M. English, first lieutenant; Charles B. Wing, second lieutenant. Company D, C. W. Batchelder, captain; H. H. Smith, first lieutenant; L. H. Brunet, second lieutenant. Todd County, Company E, J. A. Lewis, captain; Fred W. Edgar, first lieutenant; John C. Collins, second lieutenant. Yankton County, Company F, W. W. Benedict, captain; Columbus G. Irish, first lieutenant; William Leaning, second lieutenant. Union County, Company G, Harvey Fairchild, captain; N. J. Wallace, first lieutenant; C. M. Brooks, second lieutenant. At the same time the governor commissioned James L. Kelley as adjutant general; David M. Mills, of Union County, quartermaster general; John L. Jolley, of Clay, paymaster general, and John Lawrence, of Yankton aide-de-camp to commander-in-chief, with the rank of colonel.

DISSOLUTION OF PARTNERSHIP BETWEEN DEMOCRATS AND REPUBLICANS

In the political field the sentiment in favor of supporting the Congressional plan of reconstruction had been strengthened in the territory. No delegate to Congress was elected in 1867 but a new legislative body throughout and county officers were chosen, which made the election of much greater local importance than a territorial election. The Yankton County conventions indicate that the partnership between republicans and democrats had terminated and the voters had generally returned to their former party organizations, and this was also the situation throughout the territory.

The democrats of Yankton County met at the schoolhouse September 28th, and elected Austin Cole, chairman and Duane B. Cooley, secretary. This was called a "citizens' convention," and all citizens, regardless of party preferences were invited to participate. Messrs. D. T. Bramble, Franklin Wixson, A. G. Fuller and Washington Reed were nominated for the Legislative Council and C. G. Irish, L. W. Case, Henry Arend, W. N. Collamer and Louis Volin, for the House.

For county commissioners, William Miner, Richard Haggin and James V. Bunker; judge of probate, A. M. English; coroner, Richard Dawson; justices, Thomas Frick, George Pike; constables, Augustus High, Ferdinand Frick. The convention did not adopt a platform.

The republican county committee composed of M. U. Hoyt, chairman, Jacob Brauch and Wm. Neuman called a convention to be held September 21, inviting all who supported the republican plan of reconstruction to participate. G. C. Moody was chairman of this convention and James S. Foster, secretary. On assembling, Mr. Rossteuscher presented a resolution, of which the following is a copy:

Resolved, That we believe the time has now arrived in this county, when all men professing republican principles should act together, and we hereby announce it as our sincere purpose to cultivate friendly feelings among all who are disposed to act heartily with us in fostering the principles which we sustain.

The resolution was adopted.

A Committee on Resolutions was then appointed consisting of F. Bronson, T. W. Brisline, J. Brauch, C. F. Rossteuscher and G. W. Kingsbury.

The following legislative and county ticket was then nominated:

For the Legislative Council, W. W. Brookings, Chas. H. McIntyre, Chas. F. Rossteuscher, W. W. Benedict. For the House, Torger Nelson, G. C. Moody, M. U. Hoyt, Jacob Brauch, Franklin Bronson. Judge of Probate, Michael Fisher; county attorney, W. W. Brookings; county commissioners, Warren Osborne, to fill vacancy of W. E. Root; Bucklin Wood to fill vacancy of B. M. Smith; James V. Bunker to fill vacancy of Felix LeBlanc. Warren Osborne was also nominated for the full term. (The old board had all resigned.) For sheriff, George W. Black; justices of the peace, A. W. Jameson and Chris Brured. County central committee, W. W. Brookings, Geo. H. Hand, and Newton Edmunds. The Committee on Resolutions reported the following, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That this convention heartily subscribes to and endorses the reconstruction policy of our national Congress, believing that it is the only true policy by which the present national difficulties can be permanently settled and harmony and fraternal feeling restored among all sections of our country.

Resolved, That we believe the true interests of our country and the republican party will be best subserved by the adoption of the policy of rotation in office; and we hereby declare our purpose to conduct our elections in accordance therewith.

The convention then adjourned.

At the election which was held on Tuesday, October 9th, the republican or congressional party elected a majority of the Legislature. In Union County, the "union" ticket as opposed to the republican ticket, was successful. Clay and Yankton counties were carried by the congressional party. In Bon Homme, Charles Mix, Todd and Gregory there was but one ticket in the field which was divided about equally between the two parties. Red River polled a light vote and elected a non-partisan ticket. Laramie County, now Wyoming, elected two members of the lower House though no apportionment had been made to that section, it having been settled or occupied during the past year by a numerous population, attracted by the building of the Union Pacific Railroad; J. R. Whitehead and C. D. Turner from different sections of the country had received certificates of election to the Legislature.

The secretary of the territory had received a letter from W. L. Kuykendall, who had been appointed one of the county commissioners of Laramie County under the organization authorized by the Legislature of 1866-67, stating that at a recent charter election held at Cheyenne City 350 votes were polled. The writer stated further that at a general election to be held in October, the vote of the county would be from one thousand five hundred to two thousand. This county embraced a large portion of the future Territory of Wyoming, a bill for the organization of which was then pending before Congress, which had, when the Territory of Montana was cut off from Dakota, been attached to this territory. The building of the Union Pacific Railway through that region, which was then in progress, had given employment to a thousand men, and emigration had been flowing that way for months, until its male population of voting age exceeded the entire vote of Dakota in the Missouri and Red River valleys.

The year 1868 would be a presidential election year, and it was very well understood in 1867 that Gen. Ulysses S. Grant would be the candidate of the republican party. General Grant had achieved great fame as the successful commander who had brought the war of the Rebellion to a close and had compelled General Lee, the chieftain of the Confederate armies, to surrender at Appomattox, and it was manifest that the people of the country were determined to choose him for President to succeed President Johnson. The Dakota republicans unanimously shared in this sentiment and a territorial Grant Club was organized in December, 1867, with headquarters at the capital. W. W. Brookings was elected president of the club; C. H. McIntyre, Yankton County; Thomas C. Watson, Union County; H. J. Austin, Clay County; John W. Owens, Bon Homme County; J. R. Hanson, Charles Mix County; J. A. Potter, Todd County; Benjamin Hill, Lincoln County and John Nelson, Minnehaha, vice president; John L. Jolley, Clay County, secretary; Wm. Blair, Union County, first assistant secretary; Jas. S. Foster, Yankton, second assistant secretary; Newton Edmunds, treasurer. The vice presidents were authorized to organize county clubs in their respective counties. Minnehaha and Lincoln counties were not organized until 1868.

FIRST TEACHERS' INSTITUTE

The first Territorial Teachers' Institute to be held in Dakota Territory was held in Elk Point, Union County, on Friday, November 10, 1867, under the immediate supervision of Hon. James S. Foster, territorial superintendent of public instruction, and continued all the week. The superintendent was very well satisfied with the affair. Three of the organized counties were represented, Union, Clay and Yankton; Bon Homme and Charles Mix did not respond. The teachers present (there were five) had never before attended a school of instruction of the kind but were pleased with its methods and heartily approved of it. Since that day the Teachers' Institute has been recognized as indispensable and is now provided for and maintained by law. This institute was called by Darwin Phillips, superintendent of schools, Union County; M. S. Burr, superintendent of Clay County; and A. G. Fuller, superintendent of Yankton County. Miss Annette Bronson and Miss Lulu Waldron were present from Yankton County as teachers; and Mrs. Jennie Wood and Miss Maulin from Union County; and Miss Annie Brewyer from Clay. Addresses were made by S. L. Spink, W. W. Brookings, E. C. Collins and Rev. Thomas Stewart and James S. Foster; but the proceedings were not published.

Its projectors seemed to feel that they had not made a sufficient show of numerical strength to justify making their doings public. This spirit prevailed quite generally, not only in educational affairs, but in church and political matters, where a half dozen or thereabouts would be the maximum of attendance, and though a convention would be held and an organization of some kind projected and possibly effected, that grew in numbers later, the small or meagre attendance was viewed as an element of weakness that would retard rather than promote the purpose of the gathering, hence no publicity was given to it. Professor Foster, who was superintendent of public instruction was an experienced educator from Central New York who came in to Dakota as the leader of the New York Colony, in 1864, and he was not discouraged by the paucity of numbers who attended this first session. He knew that the institute would grow in interest and value and continued it during his control of the common schools. It was thereafter made a permanent feature of educational work in the territory.

FIRST TREASURER'S REPORT

The first report made by a treasurer of Dakota Territory was that of M. K. Armstrong, who had been elected to the office in 1866. The report was made about the 15th of June, 1867, Mr. Armstrong being about to depart upon his Red River surveying expedition and he desired to place the condition of the office before the people in case he should from any cause fail to return and assume his official duties. There was no law authorizing him to appoint a deputy and he therefore deposited the territorial funds with Mr. Spink, the territorial secretary. Mr. Armstrong reported that since January 1, 1867, the date of his assuming the office, the receipts and disbursements had been as follows:

Received from I. T. Gore, territorial treasurer, January 1.....	$ 60.00
Received from A. G. Fuller, treasurer Yankton County, June 7.....	154.00
Received from Wm. Searl, treasurer Union County, February 1.....	92.50
Received from Ole Bottolfson, treasurer Clay County, January 5.....	40.82
Total receipts	$356.32
Disbursements to parties holding territorial warrants, ten in number.....
Balance

Which balance was deposited with the territorial secretary who was requested to pay warrants and receive funds.

Mr. I. T. Gore, of Union County, preceded Mr. Armstrong as treasurer but made no written report. He was elected to the Legislature of 1866-7, and during the session made a verbal statement of the condition of the treasurer's office. Prior to Mr. Gore's term, 1865-6, the territorial treasurer had neither received or disbursed any funds. It will be observed that the financial machinery of county government was in operation in only three counties in 1867. Bon Homme, Charles Mix and Todd counties were the only other organized counties that contained settlements, but their officers had taken no steps to assess property or collect taxes.

COURTS AND PERSONALS

Alaska—Alaska was purchased by the United States Government from Russia, in 1867; the treaty was ratified in April. The price paid was $7,000,000. Next to the Louisiana Purchase it was the most important addition to its area that the United States Government had ever made.

At the United States District Court held at Vermillion in October, 1867, there were eight criminal cases on the docket of parties charged with cutting timber on government land. This was a serious offense in the eye of the federal law, but a very general and commendable practice as viewed by the frontier settlers who were obliged to have log cabins to shelter their families in. The cases came up for trial and although the testimony was considered ample to convict, the uniform verdict of the jury was "not guilty." After one-half the cases were thus disposed of, the United States attorney, Hon. Geo. H. Hand moved the court to continue the remainder of the cases, trusting that at the next term of the court he would be able to secure a jury that had not had "some of the pork themselves." This, however, he was never able to do, and no convictions were had in any of the districts unless it was proven that the accused had wantonly cut the timber and notoriously made merchandise of it, in which case a verdict of guilty followed and a good round fine was usually imposed. The farmer settlers who came in after 1866 as a rule went wherever there was timber that no one claimed and helped themselves to house logs and firewood, and were seldom disturbed. It was necessary that they should have this material and "necessity knows no law."

Hon. Enos Stutsman, one of the earliest and most prominent of the Southern Dakota pioneers, received an appointment in February, 1866, as special treasury agent for Dakota and Montana. His principal duties were to prevent and detect smuggling from the British possessions into the United States, an illicit traffic that according to reports had grown to be quite extensive and profitable along the Dakota border. This was the beginning of the end of Mr. Stutsman's residence in the southern part of the territory. He was one of the pioneers of 1858, the first lawyer, and had taken an active part in every enterprise that promised to promote the welfare of the people. It might be claimed with fairness that he was the most influential of the class known as private citizens, then in the territory. He had been a member of the Upper House of the Legislature from the beginning, and was required to resign his seat when he accepted the special agency. It is probable that he could have had the best elective office in the territory had he been disposed to seek it.

Mr. Thornton W. Brisbine, accompanied by his son Harvey, reached Yankton on the 1st of May, 1867, and began business a few weeks later by opening a clothing store in the log structure on Broadway, next door north of Parmer's dry goods house, which was on the northeast corner of Third Street and Broadway. The building occupied by Mr. Brisbine had been formerly used by Thomas Powers as a general store, the same Thomas Powers who was elected one of the United States senators from the State of Montana in 1880. Mr. Brisbine and his son had both been in the federal army during the Rebellion. During the year the elder Brisbine took a homestead out on the Bon Homme Road, about two miles from town and built a fine farm house and substantial out-buildings. In July, 1868, his family joined him and settled on the homestead. While Mr. Brisbine was subsequently honored by his fellow citizens with frequent evidences of their favor in the way of public office, his distinguishing credit mark is derived from his being the parent of the most numerous family that had emigrated to the territory up to that time. His family consisted of his wife, Mrs. Mary A. Brisbine and nine children, the eldest of them being Harvey J., who was about twenty-five years of age. Then followed John Milton; William Albert; Sarah A.; Thomas Moore; Frank Raymond; Hiram E.; and Ada B. Harvey married a Wisconsin lady, Miss Drummmond, in 1868 and removed to Yankton, living for a time at the homestead, making a family of twelve under that patriarchal roof. Mr. Brisbane's daughter became the wife of Benjamin Ash, in later years, and now resides in Western South Dakota.

Hon. Franklin Taylor, of Clay County, was appointed by William Shriver, collector, the deputy collector for Dakota Territory of Internal Revenue, in November, 1866.

CHAPTER XLI

THE SEVENTH SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE

LEGISLATURE OF 1867-68—PARTY HONORS QUITE EQUALLY DIVIDED—MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR—AGRICULTURE THE MOST IMPORTANT OF INDUSTRIES—RAILROADS NEEDED, LAND GRANTS WILL NOT BE DENIED—LARAMIE COUNTY AND THE UNION PACIFIC—WESTERN DAKOTA AND THE INDIAN POLICY—REPORT OF SUPERINTENDENT OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION—COUNTY SCHOOL AND INDIAN SCHOOL REPORTS—TEACHERS' INSTITUTES—GYMNASTICS, SCHOOL BUILDINGS, AND COUNTY SUPERINTENDENTS—FOUNDING CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH AND THE CATHOLIC ORGANIZATION—ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S REPORT—AUDITOR AND TREASURER'S REPORT—LARAMIE COUNTY—LINCOLN COUNTY ORGANIZED—MINNEHAHA COUNTY REORGANIZED—CARTER COUNTY (NOW WYOMING) ORGANIZED.

The seventh session of the Legislative Assembly of Dakota Territory convened at the capitol building in Yankton, on Monday, December 2, 1867, and organized without delay. It was the first that had ever convened where there were no contests to delay or disturb the organization.

The members of the Council were: Union County, R. R. Green, G. W. Kellogg, David M. Mills; Clay County, H. J. Austin, Aaron Carpenter, A. H. Hampton; Yankton County, Wilmot W. Brookings, Charles F. Rossteuscher, Charles H. McIntyre, W. W. Benedict; Bon Homme County, Hugh Fraley; Charles Mix County, Dr. R. I. Thomas; Todd County, Jonathan A. Lewis; Pembina County, not represented.

After the customary ceremony of taking the oath of office by the members, calling the roll of members-elect, and a prayer for divine guidance, the following officers were elected: President, Horace J. Austin, Clay County; secretary, George I. Foster, Yankton County; assistant secretary, Lucien O'Brien, Clay County; sergeant-at-arms, T. M. Bryan, Union County; messenger, W. E. Root, Yankton County; fireman, Antoine Bruniche, Clay County; chaplain, Rev. C. W. Batchelder, Yankton County.

Dr. Thomas then escorted the president-elect to the platform, and before taking the chair, Mr. Austin said:

Gentlemen of the Council:—The confiding kindness and partiality you have been pleased to manifest in my behalf on this occasion is accepted with mingled feelings of gratitude and anxiety. I am not unmindful of the many arduous and responsible duties which appertain to the position I am called to occupy, but having full confidence in your kindness and cooperation, I shall enter upon the discharge of the responsible duties you have conferred upon me with a determination to act with impartiality towards all, hoping that all we may do here will redound to the present and permanent prosperity of our territory. Again permit me to thank you for your kindness.

The House was called to order by Franklin Wixson, chief clerk of the sixth session, who called the roll of members-elect, as follows:

First District, Union County, I. T. Gore, Thomas C. Watson, Caleb Cummings, William Blair, Michael Curry, Michael Ryan, Martin V. Ferris; Second

District, Clay County, John L. Jolley, Calvin B. Shaw, Anson Hanson, J. D. Tucker, William Brady and Hans Gunderson; Third District, Yankton County, Gideon C. Moody, Melancthon U. Hoyt, Jacob Brauch, Torger Nelson and Franklin Bronson; Fourth District, Bon Homme County, Jonathan Brown and James Keegan; Fifth District, Charles Mix County, Franklin J. Dewitt and Felicia Fallas; Sixth District, Buffalo County, John J. Thompson; Todd County, J. Shaw Gregory; Pembina County, Enos Stutsman; Laramie County, not represented in the organization.

Prayer was then offered by Rev. M. S. Woodruff, of Yankton. Chief Justice Bartlett then administered the oath of office and the House then proceeded to a permanent organization.

Mr. Moody nominated John L. Jolley, of Clay County, for speaker, and Mr. Dewitt nominated Enos Stutsman, of Pembina. The vote being taken resulted: Twelve for Stutsman, and ten for Jolley, as follows. For Mr. Stutsman: Messrs. Blair, Brown, Cummings, Curry, Dewitt, Fallas, Ferris, Gore, Keegan, Ryan, Thomas and Watson. For Mr. Jolley: Messrs. Brady, Bronson, Brauch, Gunderson, Hanson, Hoyt, Moody, Nelson, Shaw and Tucker.

The speaker-elect was then escorted to the chair, and spoke as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:—In selecting me to preside over your deliberations, you have conferred upon me an honor as unmerited as it has been unsolicited, and I accept the responsible trust with many misgivings, feeling as I do that there are gentlemen on this floor who possess a fitness for the position which I can only strive to emulate. But as you have seen fit to place me in the chair, I will endeavor to discharge the duties thereby imposed to the very best of my ability, and as patiently and as impartially as it is possible for one of my impulsive temperament. This I can promise, and nothing more, and in conclusion I beg you to accept my thanks for this unexpected manifestation of your generous confidence.

The oath of office was then administered to the speaker by Chief Justice Bartlett and the following persons were then duly elected to the subordinate offices of the House of Representatives: Chief clerk, Pack H. Halnan, Bon Homme County; assistant clerk, Silas W. Kidder, Clay County; sergeant-at-arms, R. A. Wall, Charles Mix County; messenger, Joseph Reandeau, Union County; fireman, Israel Bruette, Union County; chaplain, Rev. M. S. Woodruff, Yankton County.

The joint convention for the purpose of receiving the governor's message was held in the hall of the House at 2 o'clock P. M. on the second day of the session.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE

On this occasion the governor appeared, accompanied by the secretary of the territory and the justices of the Supreme Court, and delivered his annual message, as follows:

Gentlemen of the Council and House of Representatives:—After the lapse of a year you have again met to discharge the duties imposed upon you by the organic act. Our first duty should be to give expression to our feelings of gratitude to the Giver of all good for the favorable circumstances which surround us. The blessings of health to a degree almost unknown in other parts have been vouchsafed to us during the whole of the past year, while the season of crops has been more than usually favorable. Immigration has added largely to our numbers, and the most favorable evidences of prosperity and increase are springing up everywhere within our borders. I have heretofore expressed unbounded confidence in our natural advantages; in the salubrity of the climate, and the inexhaustible fertility of the soil of Dakota. And others from abroad also are beginning more clearly to realize and appreciate these important truths. Within the past twelve months it has been estimated that the population of the territory has been more than doubled by immigration. A sober, intelligent and industrious people are coming among us, whose influence and capital are being felt in every department of trade and enterprise, adapted to our present condition and wants. From all these auspicious omens we may justly congratulate ourselves; and taking fresh courage from past success, renew and continue the efforts so well and effectually made by past executives, legislatures and people for the general prosperity and rapid growth of the territory.

During my unavoidable absence from the territory, embracing about one third of the past year, the duties of the executive office devolved upon and were discharged by the honorable secretary of the territory, and, I am pleased to say, with that promptness and ability for which his well known legal and practical training so highly qualify him.

While it should be our aim to foster and encourage all branches of industry, yet agriculture may be considered the real basis of our future hopes and prosperity. In this department of labor probably rests our best hope of the future, in the pursuit of which we will in time build up a thrifty population, the bone and sinew of our future commonwealth. Millions of acres of the richest grasses and most prolific soil here await the industrious immigrant, almost "without money and without price." Here labor is dignified, and we look with pride upon those of our neighbors who make to themselves homes and fortunes by honest and ennobling toil. Here, on these broad, lovely, and fertile prairies, there is a vast field for industrial development, while there is ample room and work for all, and a bountiful reward for all who do not despise the day of small things, but who, with the cheerful faith, courage and patience of the true pioneer, beginning low down at the bottom of the ladder, ascend its rounds by slow and sure degrees.

It would be well to consider whether there is any way by which you may, by your deliberations, create an increased interest in this branch of industry. Societies might be encouraged, local and territorial, through which agricultural science might be advanced. These would soon become the receptacles of practical knowledge, well calculated to stimulate enterprise in the importation and improvement of stock, cereals, plants, fruits and everything pertaining to agriculture in all its important ramifications.

The past year has been one of peace with the Indians so far as concerns the settled portions of Eastern and Southern Dakota. In the west, owing chiefly to the hostility of certain Indians to the Powder River wagon road, which to the white race has become a convenient if not indispensable thoroughfare to and from the mining regions of Montana, war has until recently existed, accompanied with its attendant horrors. But the travel and rapidly growing trade on the Missouri River has scarcely met with any opposition whatever in the past year from this cause, while on the contrary the tribes having their homes in the neighborhood of this stream manifest an increasing anxiety to abandon their nomadic habits and obtain their future subsistence under the guardianship of the Government by means of pastoral or agricultural pursuits.

Congress, a few years since, appropriated $2,500 to purchase a territorial library for Dakota, in common with other territories. These books are, of course, the exclusive property of the territory, and as such under control of the Legislature. I would recommend that an appropriation be made out of the territorial treasury for the purpose of paying some competent person to catalogue these books and for the purpose of printing such catalogue.

ARMS AND ARMORY.—In my last message I called your attention to the importance of providing for the reception and safe keeping of certain Government arms due this territory, and to the propriety of collecting and preserving those already entrusted to our charge, with the view to be thoroughly prepared for our own defense against any apprehended attacks of hostile Indians. Nothing, however, was done by the Legislature to meet the emergency. Since then 1,000 stands of arms, with the necessary fixed ammunition, together with equipments sufficient for 400 cavalry, were received by the adjutant general from the secretary of war on my requisition, a portion of which he has issued out to military companies, which, with a most laudable and patriotic zeal on the part of the citizens of the territory, were promptly organized and officered under the militia law of 1862. The cost of transportation was charged to the public treasury, and but little expense to the territorial treasury was incurred in connection with their delivery. Still a large proportion of the arms and ammunition yet remain on hand, without any suitable provision for their storage or safe keeping. It would be well for you to consider whether, since the Government has dealt toward us with such a liberal hand, you cannot devise some appropriate means by which the remainder can be securely kept for future use, and whether some amendments to the militia law above referred to may not be required to make it more efficient and useful. For further information on this subject I respectfully refer you to the report of the adjutant general. I also refer you to the reports of the territorial auditor, treasurer and superintendent of public instruction for much useful and gratifying information connected with the finances of the territory and with the condition and progress of the public schools.

EDUCATION.—Considering the obstacles to be overcome in a new and sparsely settled country like this—the straitened means of an infant territory—the schools already seem to be in a flourishing condition. The progress made, the good accomplished and in prospect, amply vindicate the wisdom and forecast of the men who, at the session of the first Legislature convened in the spring of 1862, laid the foundation of this system of education. Its beneficent results, to be realized in future years, in a moral, social and political aspect, can scarcely be foretold or even appreciated. Its impartial effusion of knowledge gives it the preeminence over all older systems, and I apprehend we must adhere to it so long as we base the preservation of our constitutional liberty and free institutions on the intelligence of the masses or sincerely believe in man's capacity for self government.

provision made by Congress, and approved March 2, 1861, for the future education of the people of this territory is most ample, and will produce a school fund of infinite value when we have thrown off our present condition and assumed the proud position of a state in the Union. The liberal grant seems to have been inspired by the great example set by our illustrious forefathers in the Congress of 1787, when, on the 20th of May, speaking in reference to the munificent land grants for the Northwestern Territory, they declared: "That religion, morality and knowledge, being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall be forever encouraged."

RAILROADS.—At the last session of the Legislature acts were passed incorporating the Dakota and Northwestern and the Minnesota and Missouri River Railroad companies, the corporators of which have since met and fully organized according to the provisions of the acts named. Interest in regard to these important projected improvements has been considerably awakened during the course of the last year and it may be presumed that Congress will be applied to, at the coming session, for grants of land to aid and encourage the said companies in their construction. Whether or not the Legislature should memorialize Congress in behalf of these grants is a matter for you to decide. It is presumed that we have, in the vast bounds of Dakota, rich and valuable lands enough to fully indemnify capitalists for the investment of their money in these enterprises; and if we sufficiently consider the effect when made upon the future of this territory we will not withhold an expression of sympathy in behalf of such a donation. Congress has given liberally, as well of the public money as the public lands to aid in constructing the great Pacific Railroad across the continent, including its branches. It is, therefore, not to be presumed that land grants will be denied to these roads, which are almost national improvements in point of importance, if the subject is properly brought to their attention. Two important railroads will soon be completed to Sioux City, Iowa; one a branch of the Pacific road to which I referred in my last annual message, and the other the Dubuque & Sioux City, which has been leased for twenty years to the Illinois Central. The benefits of these improvements will be rapidly felt beyond their western terminal by the stimulus thus given to immigration, agriculture and all branches of industry in Southern Dakota, and thus will daily add to the already increasing demand for a similar road from Sioux City up the valley of the Missouri to Yankton, a distance of sixty-five miles. As our population increases and business expands, cheaper and speedier communication between the West and the East will be demanded; therefore, in pressing this subject upon the attention of the Government and of capitalists we are only anticipating the wants and wishes of the people who are soon to inhabit this territory.

I have spoken of our contemplated roads as being almost national improvements in point of value. The time is coming when such language will be viewed as timid to a fault, and when the military and commercial wants of the country, east and west, will demand a railroad through the valley of the Missouri, and by way of the Black Hills to Montana and Idaho, and thence to the Pacific states and territories. And capitalists cannot, if they would, ignore the advantages of the route or its influence in developing the rich resources of the country through which it will be located. And the Government cannot, if it would, ignore the fact of its great national advantage in establishing a military road by this route, and by cementing, by ties of mutual interest, the Pacific and Atlantic states.

LARAMIE COUNTY.—Your attention is invited to that large part of Dakota known in our statutes as Laramie County, lying west of the 104th meridian. The extension of the Union Pacific Railroad through the southern portion of this country has given a strong impetus to immigration in this direction and it would be well to consider whether we have it in our power, by legislative enactment, to afford them the benefits of civil protection. Experience demonstrates that our courts, as at present organized and located, at such a remote distance from their settlements, can be of but little service to them in the administration of justice. The civil cases which will continually arise must be attended to, and crime, which now goes unwhipped of justice, must be punished. We may render aid to the extent of the authority given us under the organic law, but if this is not sufficient in their opinion I know of no good reason why they may not be clothed with all the blessings and protection of a separate organization. The lines embracing the limits of a new territory would most likely be identical with those which now embrace this new county, and I know of no policy of our own counterbalancing the benefits of such an organization to them for opposing such a measure. It is certainly important that the arm of the law should be sufficiently convenient and sufficiently powerful for the protection of life and property, and that the unrestrained and unpunished criminals of that neighborhood may not give rise to an apparent necessity for the citizens in their own names, and without the authority of law, to undertake the administration of justice. Where the territorial courts are located a feeling of security exists. The law is wisely interpreted and promptly applied by an upright, able and faithful judiciary, and we are in duty bound to aid in the extension of these indispensable benefits and blessings to the remotest corners of our territory. Besides, as regards the friendly Indians in that country, until courts are brought within their immediate reach the trade and intercourse laws of Congress will be a dead letter. Unprincipled white men will with impunity introduce among them spirituous liquors and other unlawful traffic, always demoralizing to the Indian, and dangerous to the peace and safety of the inhabitants.

Your attention is also invited to the propriety of passing a general incorporation act to meet the growing demands of the territory. By an act of the Thirty-ninth Congress, approved March 2, 1867, it is provided as follows:

"That the legislative assemblies of the several territories of the United States shall not, after the passage of this act, grant private charters or special privileges, but they may, by general incorporation acts, permit persons to associate themselves together, as bodies corporate, for mining, manufacturing and other industrial pursuits."

Acts granting private charters or special privileges, except for municipal purposes, or in cases where, in the judgment of the Legislature, the objects of the incorporation cannot be obtained under general laws, have, in some of the states, been prohibited by constitutional provision.

WESTERN DAKOTA AND THE INDIAN POLICY.—At the last meeting of the Legislature I suggested the propriety of making an effort to secure military protection to immigrants who might wish to locate around the Black Hills of Dakota. To this the Legislature promptly responded in the form of a memorial to Congress setting forth in a lucid and satisfactory manner, the great natural resources of that country and its vast importance to the future growth and prosperity of this territory; but I regret to say without being gratified with that success which was hoped for, and which seemed of such vital importance to us as a people. From present indications, the past policy of the Government is undergoing a change in relation to this region; and unless public opinion can be brought to bear on the action of Congress during the coming session, by the action of the Legislature and people of this territory, and if need be by the voice of the whole people of the Missouri Valley, whose business interests are involved, our brightest hopes and expectations heretofore indulged in, must fail. I refer to the bill passed and approved at the adjourned session of Congress in July last, appointing a peace commission, whose duty it is, if possible, to establish peace with certain hostile tribes of Indians in the West. Among other duties enjoined on these peace commissioners they are required to examine and select a district of country, having an area sufficient to receive all the tribes east of the Rocky Mountains, not now residing on reservations and at peace with the Government, to which the Government has the right of occupation, or to which the commissioners can obtain the right of occupation; and in which district there shall be sufficient tillable and grazing land to enable the tribes to support themselves by pastoral or agricultural pursuits. Possibly it would be more correct to say that two such districts are in contemplation, one of which is to be in the Northwest and the other in the Southwest. It has been generally understood that the one which concerns us is to be located within the present boundaries of Dakota, having the Missouri as its boundary line on the east, the Yellowstone on the north, and the Niobrara on the south. The bare statement of the boundaries as above given will be sufficient to satisfy you, I trust, that the proposition, if carried out, must be fatal to our territorial interests. The lignite coal beds of the Bad Lands, the immense forests of pine timber of the Black Hills, together with the precious metals and beds of gypsum, are all west of the Missouri and enclosed within these limits. Tribes of Indians, inured to savage and relentless warfare against the white race since the outbreak in Minnesota in 1862, and until recently engaged in deadly conflict to recover possession of the Powder River road, and along the Platte, will under treaties of peace be brought and located alongside of our present promising settlements; and the progress of these settlements westward will thenceforward be limited by the boundary of the Missouri River. All access to the reservation is to be cut off except to the officers and other employees of the Government, at least, without permission of the tribes interested. And it is not probable, in my opinion, even were all other objections removed, that the white inhabitants located on the east side of the river would be able peaceably to trade and barter with these ignorant Indians, the products of our soil or our manufactories, for the timber and other desirable articles of that region. It would doubtless remain for many years, at least, locked up from the white race and diverted from the manifest uses designated by Providence. Thus this unfortunate barrier to our progress would discourage enterprise, turn the tide of immigration away from us, and effectually check the further growth and prosperity of the territory, now so encouraging. The valuable building material, never used or cared for by Indians, would be placed beyond our reach, while, as at present, no other could be had at reasonable rates. Thus by act of Congress, a stupendous wrong would be inflicted on the people who are destined to inhabit this territory, as the effect would be to establish an oppressive monopoly in favor of the lumber markets of the Mississippi and the lakes.

I do not wish to discourage, by any act of mine, the past policy of the Government, which was to recognize the original right of the Indian to his hunting ground. He has a possessory right or title which in justice we must respect. His weakness and our strength furnish no justification for an invasion of his rights without compensation. We must show our superiority over him in acts of justice and magnanimity, as well as mere military prowess; in our efforts to ameliorate and improve his condition, as well as to outstrip him in industry, civilization and progress. All experience shows that the Indian cannot sustain himself by the chase alone, after the white man once invades and occupies his country. The buffalo and other game will disappear before the railroads and other highways and settlements, and the Indian must as a consequence fade away and disappear also, unless, under the fostering hand of the Government, his nomadic habits are abandoned and he is taught the arts and advantages of civilization. The Indian should, therefore, not have a district of country so large that he can roam forever in a wild and uncivilized state; but he should be placed on reservations where, aided liberally by the Government, he could be taught the superior advantages of a pastoral and agricultural life, over his present wandering and aimless existence; and where the benign influences of religious instruction, the arts of peaceful industry, and the schools of learning, shall finally qualify him for the higher position of an American citizen.

The Government in our case, as in the case of California, Utah, Colorado and other territories, extended its civil jurisdiction over this country by organizing a territorial government, without waiting for the extinguishment of the Indian title, except in the southeast portion, purchased under the Yankton Treaty. From this circumstance the Government has incurred a double obligation, which, in justice to the Indian and the citizens, should be faithfully discharged to both. First, as to the Indians: Treaties should at once be made with a view to purchasing their title to the Black Hills country and the Bad Lands, west of the Missouri, including the Big Cheyenne; and the right of way, by means of railroads and other improvements, to and from those regions, and to and from the mining regions of Montana and Idaho; at the same time securing them reservations on the bottom lands of the Missouri, or elsewhere, of suitable size and quality for farming purposes, with ample guarantees for their future protection and support during good behavior. So much, at least in my judgment, is due to the Indian.

As respects the white citizen, I contend that the extension of civil jurisdiction over this territory carries with it a guarantee of protection. It was an invitation to occupy and possess the land by the introduction of agriculture, trade and commerce. It was a pledge of protection to life, liberty and property, to all who would cast their lots within our borders. It was an implied contract with the citizen that the Indian title should in due time be extinguished, and that the fuel, building material and mineral deposits, including all the materials which enter into the composition of industrial life, should be his at Government price. It was an invitation to organize communities in which the temple of God and the schoolhouse should be erected, under the aegis of the Government, and where the arts and sciences of civilized life should be permitted to flourish without fear of savage molestation. It is right, therefore, that the Government, instead of dooming this country forever to savage control, should at once secure to us, under the operation of the homestead, pre-emption and mining laws, by purchase of the Indian title, the valuable resources referred to, which are essential to the prosperity and happiness of the citizen, but which possess no value in the eyes of the Indian, and would remain buried out of sight for ages to come if left to his disposition, skill or industry to develop.

It is due to justice and truth in this connection to say that whatever may be the result of this important movement, in its bearing upon us, I have the utmost confidence in the ability, patriotism, impartiality and good judgment of the gentlemen who compose the peace commission. If great legislative experience, long and distinguished public services, and extensive acquaintance with the intricate subject of Indian affairs, are qualifications, then they are eminently fitted for the discharge of the duties entrusted to them. And if they fail to remove all just causes of complaint on the part of the Indian, or to establish peace and security on a basis of future prosperity for the citizen, I am confident that no particle of blame should be attached to them for such failure. But notwithstanding this, it would be right and proper, in my opinion, for the Legislature to respectfully memorialize Congress, to whom the final disposition of this subject belongs, so far as their action may injuriously affect our well known territorial interests. We should protest against the mutilation of our boundary lines as contemplated; we should remonstrate against giving up the public highways already established by authority of the Government, such as the Sioux City and Big Cheyenne wagon road, and that of the Niobrara route; we should remonstrate against any congressional action which would tend to deprive the white citizen of the full benefit of the Black Hills resources, and we should press our objections to an act establishing this great Indian district or reservation alongside of the settlements of Southern Dakota.

It would be well to suggest to Congress that we have space enough north of the Big Cheyenne to accommodate on reservations, ample in size and quality, all the tribes on the plains east of the Rocky Mountains and north of the Platte, and in the midst of the best buffalo hunting grounds on the continent. This would be safe for us and an actual benefit to the Indians, while with proper regulations it would be a protection rather than an injury to the interests of the Northern Pacific Railroad. It would be well to suggest that a reservation which should embrace the Black Hills country could not in view of the past history of the country be a permanent one, and for that reason would not answer the design of the Government. The rich mineral deposits and the vast forests of pine of that region, are destined to allure thousands of adventurers to that locality, who will eventually break over these temporary barriers, involve the Government in new conflicts with the Indian tribes, and thus compel new treaties and a new order of things more in harmony with the progress and spirit of the times. I do not speak of this aggressive spirit, peculiar to our race, with a view to extol or even to justify it; but as a fact worth taking into account by those whose duty it is to legislate on the subject referred to, I mean by it to point out what experience teaches, that reservations unwisely chosen, because of the manifest obstructions offered to the white race, can only at best be temporary homes for the Indian tribes, and rendering their condition worse than it was before.

The remaining duties appertaining to this and other subjects to which I have invited attention, now rest with you. Wherein I have omitted subjects of importance, dwelt on in my annual message of last year, I respectfully refer you to that document for my opinions and recommendations. But, as heretofore, you will have my cordial cooperation in whatever concerns the true interest or welfare of this territory; and in all your deliberations I invoke the direction of Infinite Wisdom.

A. J. FAULK.

INDIAN SCHOOLS AND COUNTY SCHOOLS

The progress made in the establishment of a common school system for the territory, and the hindrances encountered, is most clearly and reliably related in the official report of the superintendent of public instruction, which is given herewith as it was submitted to the Legislature in December, 1867:

Three years ago the superintendent of public instruction presented his first annual report to the Legislature of Dakota. At that time no public, and but few private, schools existed in the territory. The country was so thinly settled that schools could not be supported, and doubtless many families that would have been valuable settlers and zealous supporters of the cause of education turned their course back toward the homes they had left, when they contemplated the lapse of years that would, in all probability, sweep past them before this beautiful valley could be provided with schools and other social advantages which they had enjoyed in their more eastern homes. But we are thankful that the prosperity and rapid growth of our territory has materially shortened the length of time which we then thought we must reasonably expect to wait for public schools to become thoroughly established along the Missouri Slope. We have today a free school system in practical operation in this territory, with all its various machinery of district, county, and territorial officers, and although some of our hastily constructed schoolhouses may suffer some by comparison with the superb school buildings of older and wealthier states, still they are serviceable to us, and will in due time, we trust, give place to more suitable schoolhouses. We have no reason for discouragement. Our brightest anticipations are in a fair way to be realized. A good school has been established and schools opened in every hamlet, and he who shall, three years hence, present to the Legislature of Dakota the annual school report, will number the pupils of our schools by thousands, and the teachers by hundreds. Within the last year many school districts have been organized and a free school supported for one term or more. For the educational statistics of the year, your attention is called to the following extracts from the reports of the several county superintendents:

BON HOMME COUNTY

Number of organized districts, 1; number of private schools, 1; number of children in the county between 5 and 21, 40; number of children attending private schools, 10; number of children not attending any school, 30; number of male teachers, 1; amount of money raised by tax, $50; amount of money raised by subscription, $450; total amount raised for schools, $500; amount expended for teachers' wages, $500.

Owing to the sparseness of our population it has been difficult to collect a sufficient number of children at one point to support a public school; but the prospects are that we shall have a school this fall and winter. Several pupils from this county have attended the schools of Yankton County.

D. P. BRADFORD,

County Superintendent.

BUFFALO COUNTY

Number of children in county between ages of 5 and 21, 25; number of children not attending school, 25; value of schoolhouse belonging to United States, $2,000.

These twenty-five children do not extend to children having no visible sires and living wandering lives like Indians. Of this latter class there may be one hundred who make this agency their headquarters, whose existence here is a perpetual reminder of the success of the "brave volunteers in conquering a rebellious people." There are two Government schoolhouses here, not used for such purposes, valued at $2,000. There are no schools of any kind in this county. I would furnish a building free to a competent school teacher.

J. R. HANSON, Agent.

CHARLES MIX COUNTY

Number of children in county between the ages of 5 and 21, 20; number of children not attending school, 20.

There are no public schools in the county.

WILLIAM CON.

CLAY COUNTY

Number of organized districts, 7; number unorganized, 4; number of children between ages 5 and 21, 201; number of children attending public schools, 96; number of children not attending schools, 105; number of male teachers, 1; number of female teachers, 3; number of official visits made by county superintendent, 3; amount of public money, $255.32; amount raised by tax, $29.94; amount raised by subscription, $57.78; total amount raised for schools, $608.04; amount expended for teachers' wages, $346; amount expended for new buildings,; value of school property in the county, $300.

The reports of district clerks are very imperfect. A considerable amount of the public fund remains in the hands of the treasurer. Districts Nos. 2 and 3 have each levied a tax for a new schoolhouse. District No. 9 is a fractional district, annexed to District No. 12 in Union County, and has built a new log schoolhouse. District No. 10 has just organized. District No. 11 will organize in a few days. The reports of district clerks I have not thought proper to transmit.

M. S. BURR,

County Superintendent.

LARAMIE COUNTY

Number of children in the county between the ages of 5 and 21, 200; number of children not attending school, 200.

To the Territorial Superintendent—I will show Mr. Gildersleeve, county superintendent-elect, your letter as soon as he is qualified, and urge him to act without delay. We have no schools, either public or private, as yet, in this county, but hope to show a good beginning this winter. We have labored under many disadvantages, but are getting in position to make our county organization effective, which is the foundation for success with public schools. I will place the number of children in this county, between the ages of 5 and 21, at 200. You can rest assured that I will use my best exertions toward effecting school organizations in this county.

W. L. KOKENDALL,

County Judge

MINNEHAHA COUNTY

Number of children in the county between ages of 5 and 21, 15; number of children not attending public school, 15.

You see by the foregoing report that we have no schools in this county, which is not to be wondered at, as two-thirds of the children came here less than two months ago. I can assure you that as soon as they provide homes for themselves for winter, the education of their children will be their next care. We are all united, therefore we expect success to crown our efforts. You may expect a better report next year.

JOHN THOMPSON.

(The reader is reminded that Minnehaha County had been without settlers and practically disorganized since 1862, owing to Indian troubles, and remained unsettled until the fall of 1867.—Ed.)

PEMBINA COUNTY

Number of children between the ages of 5 and 21, 563; number of private schools, 2; number of pupils: males 73, females 41, total 114; number of teachers: males 2, females 1; amount expended yearly in support of private schools, $600; value of school property, $1,200.

As the above county was organized only on the 12th of August, last, there has been no tax assessed and collected for the erection of new school buildings, and for the support of common schools, neither has the superintendent for that county had time to prepare and send in reports required by law, and reorganize the old schools and establish new ones where needed.

(This report was unsigned and probably made by the sitting member of the Legislature who was familiar with Pembina school affairs.)

TODD COUNTY

No report.

Number of children reported last year, 25; number of Indian children residing on Ponca Indian Agency, 150; amount of school property belonging to the United States, $17,500.

No school has been started in this county; $17,500 has been expended in erecting a school building, which is not completed. This building is for a manual labor school for the children of Ponca Indians, provided for them by the Government under treaty stipulations, and a school will no doubt soon be started in accordance with their treaty.

J. A. POTTER, U. S. Indian Agent.

UNION COUNTY

Number of organized districts, 16; number of unorganized districts, 1; number of children between the ages of five and twenty-one, 724; number of children attending public schools, 296; number of children not attending school, 428; number of male teachers, 6; number of female teachers, 5; number of official visits of county superintendent, 5; amount of public money, $285; amount raised by tax, $579.28; amount raised by subscription, $187.50; total amount raised for school purposes, $1,051.78; amount paid for teachers' wages, $608.93; amount paid for new buildings, $138; total amount paid for all purposes, $1,199.50; value of school district property in the county, $949.00.

Our schools are getting in running order as fast as the condition of the country will admit. Most of the districts that are provided with suitable buildings are intending to support schools this winter, and probably every organized district will be able to keep up schools after the coming winter. The several district clerks' reports show you the exact condition of the schools in each district.

D. P. PHILLIPS, Superintendent

YANKTON COUNTY

Number of organized districts, 5; number of private schools, 1; number of children in county between five and twenty-one, 225; number of children attending public schools, 29; number of children attending private schools, 100; number of children not attending school, 96; number of male teachers, 1; number of female teachers, 3; number of official visits of county superintendent, 3; amount of public money, $120; amount raised by subscription, $1,600; total amount raised from all sources, $1,735; amount paid for teachers' wages, $435; amount paid for new buildings, $1,300; total amount raised for school purposes, $1,735; value of school property in county, $3,000.

No public school has been kept in any district in this county except number 2. Number 1 is nearly ready with its house, and will probably start a school some time during next month. The other districts are building houses and will commence schools soon. This accounts for only one licensed teacher; the others, teaching private schools, needed no license.

A. G. FULLER, Superintendent.

STATISTICAL AGGREGATE FOR 1867

Number of organized districts, 29; number of unorganized districts, 5; number of private schools, 2; number of children between the ages of five and twenty-one, 1,550; number of children attending public schools, 421; number of children attending private schools, 100; number of children not attending school, 970; number of male teachers, 10; number of female teachers, 13; number of schools visited by territorial superintendent, 5; amount of money raised for school purposes, $5,000; paid for teachers' wages, $2,388; paid for new buildings, ———; amount of money expended for school purposes, $2,612; value of school property in territory, $5,500; total value of school property in territory, including Indian schools, $24,240.

INDIAN SCHOOLS

There are now no Indian schools of importance in this territory except the one at the Yankton Agency, and yet it is our firm belief that much could be done towards bettering the condition of the Indian tribes if their young people could be brought under the influence of schools. In fact, the few experiments that have been tried with them, in teaching them to read and write, have been very successful. The general Government has expended large sums of money in erecting schoolhouses and supporting teachers among them, while but very few Indian schools have been taught, notwithstanding the salaries of teachers have generally been drawn by some attaché of the agency, or other persons who cared but very little for, and did still less toward, instructing the Indian children. Would it not be proper for the Territorial Legislature to ask the general Government to place the Indian schools in this territory under the charge of the school department of the territory? At most of the agencies there are erected valuable school buildings, which with proper care would accommodate a large number of pupils. The sums of money appropriated by Congress to the several, from time to time, for educational purposes, if judiciously expended, would, with a system of wholesome supervision and thorough inspection, be sufficient to pay the wages of a corps of faithful and energetic teachers, whose influence in educating and civilizing these frontier tribes could not fail of producing good results. In proof of the statement that the Government has now the necessary school buildings at our agencies for flourishing Indian schools, we need only to call your attention to extracts from letters received from Hon. J. R. Hanson and Dr. Joel A. Potter, United States Indian agents, which are embodied in this report. The following extracts from a letter received from Hon. P. H. Conger, Yankton Indian agent, show conclusively that Indian children are willing to learn if they have an opportunity:

"Yankton Agency, Dakota Territory, July 31, 1867.

"Dear Sir: I take pleasure in complying with your request to furnish you such information as I can in regard to the educational interest of the Yankton Indians and the half-breeds belonging to this tribe who reside upon the reservation. In the first place, I will premise by saying that since I have been the agent for the Yankton Indians the Government has not placed any funds in my hands applicable for schools for these Indians. But notwithstanding this my wife taught a small class for three months last season, and this spring I fitted up a room and she has had a very interesting school numbering from twenty to twenty five daily attendants, ten of which scholars are males and fifteen females, and I am happy to say that they are all making rapid progress, both in acquiring our language and in their studies. They manifest an eagerness to learn that is truly gratifying and wonderful, furnishing conclusive evidence that their race is capable of advancement and civilization. I have not filled up the blanks you sent me, preferring to give you a few facts, which you are at liberty to use as you see proper. Of course the branches taught here are elementary only, reading, spelling and writing, and I believe also a small class in geography. I extend to you a cordial invitation to visit the school, could you make it convenient, when doubtless you would be prepared much better to report upon the same than you can be from these meager facts. Assuring you that I take pleasure in promoting in any way the cause for which you are laboring, I have the honor to be,

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"P. H. CONGER."

IMPORTANCE OF GOOD COMMON SCHOOLS

Our common schools are called "people's colleges," because the great mass of the people obtain their education in them. But few who receive their education in our western states and territories ever are favored with a collegiate or even an academic education, hence the importance of making our common schools worthy of the patronage of all. A higher grade of scholarship should be aimed at, and such a course of study pursued as will in a measure prepare our young men and young women, educated at our schools, for the real duties of future life. Much might be said here upon the importance of commodious schoolhouses, increased salaries for school teachers, and of ample school apparatus; but we must first do what we can and not what we would like to do. We are far out on the frontier, and far from the old organized districts to which we formerly belonged. We have not a munificent school fund, like the older states, nor have we even a thickly settled farming community upon whom to saddle a heavy tax to erect our schoolhouses with and support our schools. But we find a fertile soil, a healthy climate, and an excellent opening to build up a home. The pioneer selects a promising location, erects his cottage, fences his fields, breaks the ground and puts in the seed, plants forests and fruit trees around his new home, and presently another and another settler commences his improvements until enough are congregated in that locality to organize a school. Then the log schoolhouse is built and a teacher employed. Thus the great work of settling up the West goes on quietly but surely, and so rapidly is the work of settling done that it is not infrequently that where in the spring not a furrow was broken or a house foundation laid, before Christmas comes a good settlement is formed, with public schools in operation, well organized and supported, the whole neighborhood presenting the appearance of having been long settled. But generally it requires time to open a farm on the prairie, and it is no wonder that two, and perhaps three, years should roll by before a school district can be organized and a school put in working order. The first great duty of settlers in a new territory is to provide a home, and after that, as soon as possible, a place to educate their children.

It is not really as much trouble to organize districts as some of our people may think. The law is very clear on this subject and all you have to do is to apply to your county superintendent or to the territorial superintendent for a copy. The people of this territory know well enough that it is best to organize a district as soon as a sufficient number of families can be gathered in one neighborhood, for this fact alone is a great inducement for others to come and settle near them so as to have the benefit of school immediately. It is far better to organize districts and support schools, even though your schoolhouse is made of logs and your school furniture of slabs, than to let our children grow up in ignorance because we cannot erect an elegant schoolhouse with patent school furniture.

One of the greatest hindrances to organizing school districts is the sparseness of our population. Not unfrequently large tracts of country are included in the same district, and a schoolhouse built by tax or subscription, in which burden all who are residents of the district bear a part. In a few years the country becomes more thickly settled, and the people, tired of the long walks of their children to school, conclude it is better to have a new district, and a call is made for a subdivision of the district. The schoolhouse at first built in the center of the district now falls near the outer edge of the new districts, and hence accommodates neither; or if it falls near enough in the center of one to answer for a while a question comes up as to whom it now belongs, and not unfrequently much difficulty arises in settling these perplexing matters. It would be well so to modify our school law as to authorize the levying of a tax, by the district retaining the schoolhouse, to refund to the newly organized district a sum of money equal to their equitable interest in the school property of the former district, and to avoid as much as possible the recurrence of such cases in the future, I would recommend that the county superintendents of the several counties, as soon as practicable, proceed to district their entire county into such sized districts as will likely within a few years be required, and having in view the future wants of the district. In the older states it has been for some years a source of great evil that the school districts are too small, and great efforts have been made to consolidate districts until pupils enough shall be gathered together to form a school. Let us take warning from these facts and keep our districts sufficiently large to enable us to support a good school, even if pupils have to walk a little farther to get to school. Not unfrequently in some districts in the eastern states the schoolhouses are closed a great portion of the year for want of pupils to make up a school, and the consequence is that those who wish to attend school must go to the adjoining district, frequently two or three miles distant. It is better far to keep the districts sufficiently large so that there will be a likelihood of having pupils enough for a school and taxable property enough within the district to support it.

PUNCTUALITY OF ATTENDANCE.—It is a fact that will not be controverted that punctuality of attendance in pupils is essential to the prosperity of a school. It is a singular fact, too, that parents knowing that their children are habitually tardy in the morning tolerate this pernicious practice when they must know that it is destructive of much of the good that ought to be accomplished by their children attending school. It is a fact noticeable by all that those pupils who attend school regularly and are prompt in the morning generally succeed well in their studies and have an attachment for the schoolroom; while on the other hand those who do not attend regularly are generally backward in their studies and more generally apt to be dissatisfied with the school. Besides the loss of knowledge which might have been gained, a bad habit of carelessness is acquired by habitually tardy pupils which will be likely to last through a lifetime. There is still another class of citizens who will not avail themselves of the benefits of schools after they are provided for them by their generous neighbors. The time may come in our republican government when the question will be agitated whether it would not be just to compel the attendance of pupils for a certain length of time in the public schools. It is said to be good republican theory that intelligent citizens are the wealth and power of the state. If this be true, ought not every reasonable means to be used to bring all children everywhere under the influence of common schools in their earlier years, keeping them constantly in the common schools until they graduate honorably from them, with a good practical common school education, with which, if a habit of reading has been inculcated, all pupils may become well educated; thus increasing the wealth and power of the nation? It is also claimed, in republican governments, to be true, that the intelligence of the people is the best safeguard or security to life and property. If this be true, ought not then the property of the country be used to educate the children of that country? In any government, good and wholesome laws, in time of peace, give the best security to life and property, and just and equitable laws cannot be expected to be enacted by any people not intelligent and well informed, and among whom the benefits of education have not been diffused. And since general intelligence and popular education cannot obtain without the aid of the common schools, therefore we conclude that all persons, rich and poor, are interested in the spread of universal education and ought to contribute to its support since upon the intelligence of a community rests the security of life and property. We frequently find persons who object to paying a school tax and who seldom object to paying a county tax, a large portion of which is made up of fees of officers of the criminal courts, which, according to the criminal statistics of the country, would not probably have been created had good sound moral and intellectual instruction been given to these law breakers in their youthful days. According to the statistics in this country it is far better for a man to pay a school tax of two mills on the dollar for the support of common schools, where all the children of both rich and poor can be educated, than to pay a much larger tax for the payment of officers' and magistrates' fees in the criminal courts, and for the support of prisons and almshouses. It is a notorious fact that the majority of the inmates of prisons and poorhouses have not had the advantages of an education. If, as has been stated, property is taxed for school purposes under the supposition that the intelligence of the people affords greater security for property, have not property holders and tax payers an undoubted right to demand that they shall receive the benefit of their taxation in this greater security of life and property which can only be secured by a general diffusion of intelligence? And how can this intelligence be spread among those who never attend the common schools or other institutes of learning? In short, if people who have children will claim, as they do, and rightfully claim it, too, that those citizens who have no children but have property should help to educate their children, then have not the tax payers a right to demand in return that all children of school age shall attend some portion of the year at these schools which they are supporting?

COMPULSORY EDUCATION AND REGULAR ATTENDANCE.—It is not probably best now, if ever, to enact a law compelling attendance on some school, either public or private, by all children, although such enactments are in force, not only in the old world, but in our own country in some of the New England states. It is well, however, to contemplate the mischief that is wrought in our public schools from this unnecessary source. It is curious and even profitable for us to contemplate how closely the interests of the people of a republican government are connected and interwoven with each other. One man cannot improve his farm without in some measure increasing the value of the farms of all his neighbors. A man cannot engage in any worthy private enterprise without benefiting in some way nearly every citizen in his community. Every important act of our whole lives operates in some way upon our fellows, and affects them for good or for evil in a greater or less degree. So every private wrong, if we may be allowed the expression, for we much doubt if there be such a thing as a private wrong, operates upon the public and prejudices the minds of some people to some extent against the inhabitants of the place where the wrong was committed. Now this intimacy of relation exists nowhere to greater extent than in our public schools. No patron can withdraw from the school a pupil for any length of time without injuring the interests of his classmates and associates, especially if the pupil is to be returned again to the same school within a few days or during the term, and these temporary withdrawals from school are more injurious when they are the most frequent. Too much cannot be said upon this subject. It is all important to the success of our schools that patrons act in concert with school officers and teachers in securing prompt and punctual attendance at the public schools.

THOROUGHNESS IN TEACHING.—"Not how much, but how well," has been a favorite motto of ours in the school room for several years. The want of thoroughness in studying on the part of the pupil and of illustration and examination on the part of the teacher is a serious evil in our schools. To insure thoroughness on the part of the pupil in all his studies will require the united effort of pupil, teacher and patron. It is almost useless for the teacher to try to secure a perfect understanding in the mind of the pupil, of all his studies, especially in mathematics, if his efforts are not heartily seconded by the patron. If parents will allow pupils to remain at home upon a frivolous excuse whenever they choose to do so, they will frequently avail themselves of this privilege and most generally when the class is passing over some difficult subject that requires extra labor and which the pupil is apprehensive he cannot master to his liking. If he stays away from school until the class has passed over that subject, he can join the class in the next rule, and so he manages to "keep up with the class," and finally gets through the book as soon as any of the class.

THE WORK OF EDUCATION IS PROGRESSIVE.—It consists of a succession of processes, the latter process generally depending upon the former, and hence, if the former lesson was not thoroughly learned, it is almost impossible to comprehend the latter one. It is of the utmost importance that each step should be well and thoroughly learned before passing to the next. A pupil cannot wait until the close of the term and then go back and learn the few lessons he skipped entirely, or passed over lightly, but he must commit them as he goes, for each succeeding step may be, and probably is, the foundation for the next. We have frequently observed the methods of classification practiced, and have found them to vary considerably. Some teachers arrange their classes according to the size of their pupils, others to accommodate the different kinds of text books in use without regard to the former training or advancement of their pupils. We have been amused frequently to see pupils who have been out of school for two whole terms demand that they should be placed in classes with those who were their superiors in study when they were formerly pupils together, and who have not lost a single school day for a year, simply because they were classmates in a former term. And our amusement has culminated in a hearty laugh, when the parents of such pupils second the demands of their children. Such a course would be most certain of injuring a school and destroying the reputation of a teacher, if permitted. A judicious classification is necessary to a system of thorough teaching, and indispensable, not only in arithmetic and grammar and the higher English branches, but in the fundamental branches of an education—reading and spelling. Thoroughness in teaching also depends upon the punctual and constant attendance of all the pupils of a school. Teachers are not as responsible for the advancement of those pupils who are not punctual, as they are for those who are in constant attendance during the whole term.

Some parents are in the habit of requesting of the teacher permission for their children to come home as soon as they are done reciting. This is another fruitful source of annoyance in school. It disturbs the other pupils in his leaving, and creates a discontentedness in the minds of those remaining, while it takes the pupil who is excused from his proper studies, and the consequence is, he does not study as many hours as his schoolmates, and must therefore have less perfect lessons. If parents and patrons of schools would secure the greatest amount of good to their children, they will insist in being prompt in attendance every day of the school if possible, and will not relax their energies there, but watch faithfully the progress their children make each day in their studies.

But one will say, "I have enough to do without watching my children. We hire the teacher to do that work." Now this may be true, but cannot the patrons of our schools do much to strengthen the power and influence the teacher may have over their children for good if they will manifest an interest in the studies of their children, inquire about their progress and proficiency, encourage them to be diligent in their studies and insist upon their children being at school in time, and upon their not remaining at home a single day unless it is absolutely necessary? If such a course is taken by patrons, but little trouble is experienced by competent teachers in getting up an interest in the school, and of making rapid progress in most of the branches taught. While on the other hand, if parents manifest an indifference either by countenancing tardiness and absence from school, or by expressing their disapprobation of the teacher before their children, they weaken, if they do not destroy, the usefulness of the school.

GYMNASTICS.—It is a common thing for pupils in a warm school room to get drowsy and tired, and consequently they wish to walk out into the fresh air and brighten up, preparatory to resuming their task at their desk. But teachers cannot be annoyed with too frequent requests for a "recess," neither can they allow their pupils much time to play at recess, hence the necessity of some exercises in the school room in which all can join, and which will not only relieve the mind from its constant application to study, but will also relieve the body by affording physical exercise. Most teachers in the larger eastern schools introduce quite successfully a series of physical exercises, exercise of the muscles of the whole system as much as possible, during which exercises the room is well ventilated. These exercises may be introduced once or twice a day at the discretion of the teacher. But we do not wish to be understood as advocating those violent gymnastics practiced by some teachers. Gymnastics in school are good in their proper time and places, but generally in winter time our children who in coming to and going from school have to face the cold storms that sweep across our prairies practice all the gymnastics essential to their physical development. But in summertime when the younger pupils are apt to grow dull in school, some simple exercises requiring the pupils to exercise their hands and feet without their leaving their seats, will, no doubt, prove beneficial.

SCHOOL BUILDINGS.—It is thought by some that any building will answer for a schoolhouse, but with such persons we do not agree. We have before stated in this report, and we repeat the sentiment again, that neighborhoods should not wait until they are able to raise a tax without burden to erect a commodious schoolhouse before they organize and start a school. But this does not imply that we advise using old rotten cabins or some old cast-off dilapidated building, as is sometimes done, for a schoolhouse. Such buildings are altogether unfit for school purposes. An earnest advocate of good school buildings, with pleasant surroundings, says: "It is barely possible that an intellect disciplined and developed in one of our miserable rickety, uncouth school cabins may put on as fair and symmetrical proportions, with habits, tastes and aspirations as exact, critical and lofty as one raised amid healthful, inviting and inspiring surroundings of a model school building, but the probabilities are strongly in favor of dwarfing the intellect, distorting the disposition, and blunting the sensibilities." In these sentiments we heartily concur. The school sites should be suitably selected and pleasantly located, and even if the schoolhouse is to be made of logs, let it be well put up, having proper proportions and finished up in good style; not with costly, fancy trimmings which would make it nearly as expensive as a frame or brick building, but made of logs of even size and length, with a suitable roof and planed seats, with shade trees and a well dug, if possible, giving to the school grounds an air of comfort. Such a schoolhouse will not cost much but labor, and will answer well its designed purpose until a better one can be obtained.

COUNTY SUPERINTENDENTS

Perhaps there is not another person who can and ought to exercise so much influence over the schools of his county, as the person holding the responsible position of county superintendent. His good judgment is called into exercise in districting his county into proper districts, suitable in size and shape; his discretion in recommending and licensing proper persons to teach; his faithfulness by the number of times he visits and the length of time he attends at a school, and his patience when he comes to make his annual report. County superintendents should be "wise as serpents and harmless as doves," in order to accomplish the greatest possible good in visiting their schools. A county superintendent of schools, residing in one of the older states, complains that he cannot do any good by visiting the districts, and states that he saw one of the pupils on a seat without a book; he asked the lad if his father chewed tobacco and received the simple honest answer that he did. Whereupon the superintendent told the lad to tell his father for him to stop chewing for a month, or to chew less and save money enough to purchase him a book. The boy told his father as directed, and the father was justly offended at the superintendent's remark, and yet the superintendent complains that he cannot do good in his visits because people will not heed his advice. Now, in this case, the superintendent was at fault. It was his duty to say or do nothing calculated to give offense, but to encourage teachers, pupils and patrons in the good work, by kind words, if he saw anything to encourage, and to correct their errors by kind and gentlemanly remonstrance if he saw aught that was wrong.

NORMAL SCHOOL

In most of the states normal schools are established by law and supported from the public fund. Their object is the educating of a class of persons for the express purpose of teaching. The utility of these schools is conceded by all, and they are considered as indispensable to the progress of common schools. If these normal schools are so essential in the states where colleges, universities and academies are so numerous, how much more are they needed here at the West in new territories, where few such institutions exist. In New York and other large states, each county has a branch of the normal school, where teachers can receive gratis that peculiar instruction calculated to prepare them especially for the great work of teaching.

It is not so here. We must take teachers as they come from our common schools, and entrust to them the education of our children. How much better would it be for us who reside in the territories, for future generations to come and for the nation at large, if each territory was provided with a normal school for the training of its teachers. Who could calculate the untold benefits that would result from such an institution? The general government, often liberal in expenditures for the benefit of the territories, has made a wide distinction between the states and territories in granting donations of public lands for school purposes. Large tracts of lands have been donated to every state that would accept them upon the conditions named by Congress, while the territories have been excluded from such benefits.

It would seem proper that the general government should appropriate a quantity of land in each territory for the purpose of supporting a normal school. If, as it is generally admitted, intelligent citizens increase the wealth and power of a nation, is it not the duty of Congress to assist in providing some suitable school for the education of teachers in the territories? As Congress will probably pass a law providing for a national bureau of education, it would doubtless be well to memorialize Congress on the subject, and ask that the territories may be included in its provisions, and also asking that a grant of land be made within each territory for the support of a normal school in each territory.

CONCLUSION

The language of the present school law is so indefinite that it does not appear distinctly whether county superintendents are to be elected for one or two years. Some of the counties have elected superintendents annually, while others contend the election is for two years. I would recommend the law be amended so as to require county superintendents of schools to be elected once in two years and at the same time and in the same manner as other county officers.

The per diem of the superintendent of public instruction is inadequate to furnish any reasonable compensation for the labor performed, as it requires a sum equal to his per diem to pay his traveling expenses. It is not to be presumed that officers will take any extra pains to perform well any duties required of them for which they receive no compensation. If the system of supervision and visiting is not to be abandoned, as of course it ought not to be, I would recommend that the law be changed so as to allow the superintendent of public instruction, in addition to his per diem, traveling expenses not to exceed two dollars per day for the time actually engaged in visiting schools.

I am happy to be able to say that there are gratifying evidences in our communities of an increased and growing interest in our common schools, and the time is near at hand when our public schools will be, if properly sustained, what they ought to be—the pride of our citizens. We are pleased to see an interest manifested by all classes in supporting good schools in every neighborhood. It is a mistaken notion that some business men seem to have that our schools are philanthropic institutions which should be given over into the charge of those who habitually labor for the good of the public. This feeling, I am glad to say, does not exist in our territory to any extent, but all classes are alike in earnest in support of our schools. If this sympathy for the cause of education shall continue, it will not be long before the character of our schools will be elevated to their proper sphere and become entitled to the respect and admiration of our people.

Allow me in concluding this report to express a hope that the coming year will be one of prosperity to our schools and that we may be more successful in obtaining a thorough and complete statistical report.

Respectfully submitted,

JAMES S. FOSTER,
Superintendent of Public Instruction.

FOUNDING A CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

Rev. E. W. Cook, of Ripon, Wisconsin, a clergyman of the Congregational Church, came to Yankton in March, 1868, and took charge of the affairs of that denomination, organizing a church association. His first sermon was delivered at the Episcopal Church building, which had not yet been dedicated, on Sunday, March 29th. Mr. Cook was an elderly gentleman of prepossessing appearance and manners, and an earnest worker, but owing to his advanced years he was not fitted for the arduous task imposed upon the pioneer clergyman. In the fall Mr. Cook, who had resigned, returned East, and his place was filled by a young man, Rev. Joseph Ward, of Providence, Rhode Island, who reached Yankton November 17, 1868. This young minister, as will be learned from his subsequent career in Dakota and Yankton, proved to be the right man for the place.

The first practical and organized effort toward erecting a Congregational Church building in Yankton was the forming of the "Ladies' Sociable" on January 13, 1869, at the home of Mrs. A. G. Fuller, when that lady was elected president of the society; Mrs. Joseph Ward and Miss Etta Faulk, vice presidents; Mrs. James S. Foster, secretary, and Mrs. I. N. Higbee, treasurer. The society was to hold weekly meetings, furnish refreshments and musical entertainment; and also hold festivals and fairs, for the purpose of raising a church building fund. Preceding this organization the ladies of this denomination had held a concert and festival at the hall in Fuller's block, December 18, 1868, during the session of the Legislature, from which was realized the sum of $190 net. Encouraged by this success, the society was soon formed, and on the evening of December 21, 1869, the society gave a fair and festival at the St. Charles Hotel, from which they realized the sum of $300. These moneys were also applied to the building fund.

It may be well here to state that prior to anything above related, and some time before the organization of the Ladies' Aid Society or "Ladies' Sociable," it was claimed that Mrs. C. N. Wheeler, a sister of W. W. Brookings, and a lady missionary in Turkey at that time, wrote to her brother, Mr. Brookings, in Yankton, urging the formation of a church society here and the building of a church edifice. Mr. Brookings then wrote to the church dignitaries of New York, and the result was that Reverend Mr. Cook was sent out to gather the Congregational children into one fold, they having strayed into the Episcopal fold in large numbers. Mr. Cook organized a church society at once and led it on until November, when he relinquished it to the Rev. Joseph Ward, of Andover.

The new Congregational Church, with Rev. Joseph Ward, pastor, though not fully completed, was sufficiently advanced to permit its occupation for divine service on Sunday, January 9, 1870. Some statements were made at this first service showing the efforts that had been required to secure the funds to erect this first Congregational Church edifice, among the most important, that the ladies of the Congregational Society had, by three entertainments, called "fairs," or "festivals," raised over $1,000 and paid it over to the building committee during the year 1869. The pastor, who had worked zealously to secure the erection of the structure, stated that all the credit for success was due to the "noble band of ladies." On the 12th of January this noble band of ladies held their annual meeting at the residence of Mrs. M. M. Mathiesen, and elected the following officers: Mrs. A. G. Fuller, president; Mrs. Ephraim Miner and Mrs. J. B. S. Todd, vice presidents; Mrs. James S. Foster, secretary; Mrs. M. M. Mathiesen, treasurer, and Mrs. Joseph Ward, Mrs. William Tripp, Mrs. G. P. Waldron, Mrs. F. J. DeWitt, Miss Etta Faulk, Mrs. C. H. McIntyre and Mrs. I. N. Higbee, directors.

The church building was finally completed early in July, 1870, and the ceremony of dedication occurred on Sunday, July 17th. As a token of respect to the Congregational people and Reverend Mr. Ward, the other denominations refrained from holding morning services on this occasion, and the church-going people all flocked to the new structure, not only filling it full and running over, but providing an overflow congregation outside more numerous than those who were crowded into the interior. At the conclusion of the imposing services Mr. Ward stated that the church had an indebtedness on the building unpaid amounting to $1,321. This amount was subscribed then and there; and in addition Joel A. Potter and Enos Stutsman gave $225 for the purchase of a bell.

THE CATHOLIC ORGANIZATION

Steps were taken in June, 1875, by the Catholic congregation of Yankton, represented by James Crowe, Robert O'Neil, William Gemmill, M. Goodin and James J. Griffin, for the procuring of lots and the erection of a church edifice at Yankton. Rev. Ferdinand Lechleitner was placed in charge of the Catholic Church organization at Yankton in 1870, and became the first settled pastor of that denomination in the territory. A site for a church edifice was selected in November, and other steps taken to construct the building. The site was two lots on Capital Street, northwest corner of Fifth Street. The Right Reverend Doctor O'Gorman (no connection of the present bishop of South Dakota), bishop of Nebraska, who had been dedicating a new Catholic church in St.

Helena, Nebraska, visited Yankton in August, 1870, to investigate the spiritual needs of the Catholics of Yankton County.

The first edifice erected in Dakota by the Catholics in which to conduct divine service was a chalkstone structure built on the corner of Capital and Eighth streets in Yankton, in 1871. It was not designed for a church edifice, but was built for the purpose of a residence for the priest, Rev. E. Sommereisen, and also to accommodate church services until a church building could be constructed, which it was then intended should join the residence building on the north.

A new Catholic mission was established at Grand River Indian agency, in April, 1871, under the supervision of Reverend Father Lechtenheimer, of Yankton, who had made a winter tour to various frontier posts and agencies in the upper river country, for the purpose of selecting the most advantageous place for the establishment of a central missionary station.

DAKOTA'S WAR EQUIPMENT

First Report of the Adjutant General

To His Excellency, A. J. Faulk, Governor.

Sir: I have the honor to submit to your excellency this, my first annual report of all matters coming within this department for the year 1867, as required by law, showing the various organizations furnished by the territory since the commencement of my term of office, and exhibiting the transactions as much in detail as may be necessary for public information.

In response to an unexpected appointment, I entered on the duties of this office on the 14th day of March last. On the 11th day of the same month, your excellency made a requisition upon the secretary of war for 1,000 stand of Smith's carbines and 100,000 rounds of carbine ammunition for the use of this territory, under the law of Congress, approved April 7, 1866, and chargeable to the territory on account of its quota now due or to become due, under the act of Congress approved April 23, 1868, for arming and equipping the militia. On the 15th of the same month, a requisition was made by your honor for 400 cavalry saddles, 400 curb bridles, 100 army revolvers, and 10,000 rounds of revolver and carbine ammunition, under the law of Congress approved April 23, 1868, and were duly received by me on the 14th and 21st days of May last.

The arms and other stores so furnished to the territory amount to $38,625, from which being deducted $11,083.91 now credited to the territory under the law of 1868, it is now in excess of its quota to the amount of $27,541.09, to be charged against the quota of the territory to become due under the law of Congress approved April 23, 1868.

In response to your suggestions to the sixth annual session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, and to the proclamation of the 13th day of April, 1867, by Hon. S. L. Spink, as acting governor, calling upon the people to organize into companies for home protection against a threatened invasion of the hostile Indians, the following companies were organized, as follows:

COMPANY A, BON HOMME COUNTY

RANK	OFFICERS	COMMISSIONED	STRENGTH
Captain.....	W. A. Burleigh.....	June 15th	52
First lieutenant.....	Nathan W. Daniels.....	June 15th

COMPANY H, UNION COUNTY

RANK	OFFICERS	COMMISSIONED	STRENGTH
Captain.....	Thomas C. Watson.....	July 20th	80
First lieutenant.....	W. H. H. Fate.....	July 20th
Second lieutenant.....	H. J. Corkendall.....	July 20th

These companies comprise in the aggregate 538 men, all of whom, with the exception of Company E, have received the necessary amount of arms, ammunition and equipment, according to the strength of each company. The following officers were also appointed, who, with the governor, comprise the present roster of the Dakota Militia: Governor and commander-in-chief, A. J. Faulk; adjutant general, James L. Kelley; quartermaster general, B. M. Mills, brigadier general; paymaster general, John L. Jolley, colonel; aide-de-camp to the governor, John Lawrence, colonel.

Inventory of arms, ammunition and horse equipments on hand May 21, 1867, the number issued to organized companies, and the number remaining on hand December 1, 1867:

Smith's carbines—On hand May 21st, 1,000; number issued, 525; on hand December 1st, 475. Revolvers—On hand May 21st, 100; issued, 95; remaining December 1st, 5. Carbine ammunition—Number of rounds on hand May 21, 1867, 100,000; number issued, 39,000; remaining on hand December 1st, 61,000. Revolver ammunition—On hand May 21st, 10,000; issued, 8,000; remaining, 2,000. Horse equipments—Cavalry saddles, on hand May 21st, 400; issued, 395; remaining, 5. Curb bridles—On hand May 21st, 400; issued, 395; on hand, 5.

The arms and ammunition remaining on hand are without a suitable building for their safekeeping, and I most respectfully recommend to your excellency the propriety of the Legislature appropriating a small annual amount sufficient to defray the expense of storing the same, or to erect a building for that purpose.

The arms and ammunition (twenty-nine tons, including two six-pounder brass field pieces) that were shipped from the St. Louis arsenal by the Government to this territory, and were received and receipted for by Governor Jayne, in the month of November, 1862, a portion of which are still in the hands of the disbanded militia throughout the territory, and can be collected by order at any time.

In the month of December, 1862, a large portion of this '62 shipment was in store at Yankton and Vermillion, including fifteen boxes of shot and shell, 120 Prussian muskets and 60,000 rounds of musket ammunition, since which time all the ammunition and the greater portion of the arms have been lost or destroyed for want of some suitable place to store them. The two brass field pieces, one at Yankton and one at Vermillion, are standing out exposed to the weather, and unless something is done by which they can be collected together and stored in some suitable place, they will in a short time be unserviceable.

Since the organization of Company B, John L. Jolley, who was elected second lieutenant of said company, has been appointed and commissioned by your excellency paymaster general with the rank of colonel.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

J. L. KELLY, Adjutant General, Dakota

HISTORY OF DAKOTA TERRITORY

TERRITORIAL AUDITOR'S REPORT

Territorial Auditor's Office,

Yankton, Dakota Territory, December 4, 1867.

To the Honorable Members of the Council and House of Representatives:

Gentlemen: I have the honor to present this, my first annual report as territorial auditor, showing the amount of claims presented to and audited by this office against the territory since the 1st of January, 1867, giving also the date, amount and number of each warrant, to whom issued, for what issued, amount audited. In submitting this report, I respectfully beg leave to recommend to the Legislature the propriety of changing the time for receiving the annual reports of territorial auditor and treasurer from the third day of each session, as now provided by law, until the last week in December, by which time the reports of these officers would be able to show to the Legislature the condition of the territorial finances at the close of the year, after all the organized counties shall have reported to the auditor and treasurer.

The following is an exhibit of the proceedings of this office from January 1, 1867, up to the present time, December 4, 1867:

Number of warrants issued, 22:

Kelly, cash advanced in handling arms and ammunition for the territory, $29.25; John Thompson, transportation on books for territorial library, $2.35; I. T. Gore, salary as auditor, July 1 to September 30, 1867, $12.50; M. K. Armstrong, salary as treasurer, April 1st to July 1st, $12.50; M. K. Armstrong, salary as treasurer from July 1st to September 30th, $12.50.

Total amount of claims presented, $374.60. Amount audited and warrants issued, $372.60.

Respectfully submitted,

I. T. GORE, Territorial Auditor.

TERRITORIAL TREASURER'S REPORT

Territorial Treasurer's Office,

Yankton, Dakota Territory, December 3, 1867.

To the Honorable Members of the House of Representatives:

Gentlemen: I have the honor to present herewith my first annual report as territorial treasurer, showing the receipts and disbursements of this office and the present condition of the finances of the territory. By the provisions of the revenue law of the territory it is made the duty of the county treasurer of each organized county to make report to this office and pay into the territorial treasury the proportion of territorial tax collected and due the territory from each respective county, on or before the 1st day of January in each year. The full extent of time allowed not having yet expired, the counties of Todd, Pembina and Laramie do not appear in this report, no return having been received from these counties. The counties of Pembina and Laramie, organized by the last Legislature, being so new and remote could hardly be expected to complete the assessment and collection of taxes during the present year. The act of last session creating the County of Pembina not providing for any officer than one to administer oaths to the county officers appointed in pursuance with said act, and the only person in said county authorized to administer oaths being absent, the county was not fully organized until August, and therefore too late for an assessment and collection of taxes to be reported to this office during the present session of the Legislature. The County of Todd has been notified by me and is expected to report by the 1st of January. The present report of this office does not include warrants issued prior to the year 1865, all of which by an act passed in that year were debarred from payment until such time as the condition of the treasury would warrant the liquidation of the same by special act of the Legislature. The amount of said suspended outstanding warrants does not exceed in the aggregate five hundred dollars, and it remains for the present Legislature to take such action in the matter as to them may seem best.

The following is an exhibit of the territorial finances since my assuming the duties of this office on the 1st of January, 1867:

RECEIPTS

Yankton County
January 28, 1867, of A. G. Fuller, county treasurer.....	$ 60.00
February 25th	50.00
June 7th	44.00
	$154.00
Union County
January 1, of L. T. Gore, former treasurer.....	$ 60.00
February 1, of Wm. Searles, treasurer of county.....	92.50
	$152.50
Clay County
January 5th, of Olle Bottolfsen, county treasurer.....	$ 49.82
Charles Mix County
December 3d, of treasurer.....	$ 20.17
Bon Homme County
December 3d, of Benton Fraley, treasurer.....	$ 10.00
Total receipts	$386.49
Todd, Pembina and Laramie counties not reporting.
The treasurer's table of disbursements corresponds precisely with the auditor's statement of warrants issued.
Total receipts since January 1, 1867.....	$386.49
Total disbursements	357.75
Balance in treasury	$ 28.74
Outstanding warrants Nos. 18 and 21.....	14.85
	$ 43.59
Balance in treasury above all outstanding indebtedness.....
Respectfully submitted,
M. K. ARMSTRONG, Territorial Treasurer.

One of the earliest measures introduced at this session was a bill by G. C. Moody, providing for striking the word "white" from the election law of Dakota Territory. It passed both houses without a dissenting voice, was signed by the governor, and the negro was enfranchised if he had a home on Dakota soil.

LARAMIE COUNTY

The question of representation for Laramie County, Dakota (now Wyoming), and a more important one of providing legal tribunals for that section of Dakota, was possibly the most important and pressing question before this Legislative Assembly. The building of the Union Pacific Railway had induced a very large immigration thither, and the employes on the railroad numbered many thousand, while numerous populous towns had sprung up along the line, that of Cheyenne having a population of from three thousand to four thousand. The last Legislature of 1866-67 had passed a bill to establish the County of Laramie, but it appears that no steps had been taken to organize the county in the meantime. A provisional government had been organized by the people at Cheyenne for the purpose of holding in check the lawless elements, and courts were established by general consent, having jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases. The police court of Cheyenne had jurisdiction when the amount in controversy did not exceed two thousand dollars; and a superior court was established with appellate powers and had jurisdiction in matters of law and equity above two thousand dollars. The courts were entirely without legal authority, but managed to keep order and were busy adjudicating lawsuits. In the latter part of October, 1867, a "people's election" was held to elect a full set of county officers, and 2,200 votes were polled. The election was without authority of law, but the persons elected assumed their official stations and discharged the duties thereto appertaining.

A member of the House of Representatives of the Territory of Dakota was also chosen at this election, Mr. J. R. Whitehead, who presented his credentials to the House on the thirty-fourth day of the session and within six days of the end of the session. His seat, however, was contested by A. G. Turner, of South Pass City, whose credentials had been presented before. These Turner credentials consisted of the proceedings of a meeting held at South Pass City, Dakota, and set forth that at a meeting of the citizens of South Pass City, held November 13, 1867, J. S. Lowry was made president and W. M. Pembleton, secretary, and that A. G. Turner was duly elected as representative to the Territorial Legislature for the session of 1867-68 from the County of Carter. Mr. Turner had been present at the Legislature since its opening, awaiting the arrival of Mr. Whitehead, whose name had been placed on the roll of members. Mr. Whitehead's credentials were as follows:

Whereas, At an election holden in the County of Laramie, in the Territory of Dakota, on the 8th day of October, A. D. 1867, duly called by general notice given by the undersigned, appointed for that purpose at a mass meeting of the citizens of said county, James R. Whitehead, being a candidate for the office of representative in the Territorial Legislature of Dakota, received 1,320 votes, M. S. Hurd for same office received 709 votes and M. L. Hall received 91 votes;

Therefore, This is to certify that James R. Whitehead, having received a large majority of the votes polled at said election, was duly elected to the office of representative as aforesaid.

Witness our hands and seals this 28th day of October, 1867.

W. S. KUYKENDALL,
THOS. J. STREET,
LUCIEN L. BEDELL,
Commissioners of Election.

The credentials of Mr. Whitehead were referred to a committee of one from each county. On the thirty-sixth day a majority of the committee reported in favor of admitting Mr. Whitehead. Mr. Moody, from the minority, reported adversely to Whitehead and favorably to Turner. Both reports held that neither party could legally claim the seat, as the law governing elections had not been complied with in either case; but because of the important interests involved affecting so large a number of Dakota's citizens, it was conceded that the community should be represented. Moody contended that Turner had the best record; that he presented himself at the opening of the session and had patiently waited for the coming of Mr. Whitehead and the action of the House. Moody contended that Mr. Whitehead's large vote was cast by persons only temporarily in Dakota engaged in building the Union Pacific Railroad, and were not bona fide residents of the territory; further, a petition had been presented to the House signed by a large number of the business men of Laramie County, requesting that Whitehead be not given the seat. The result was that the House decided in favor of the minority report, and Mr. Turner was admitted and took the oath and his seat.

During the session Mr. Turner had been an industrious lobby member and had secured some needed legislation for his constituents.

A new county, called Carter, was established, and Laramie and Carter counties were constituted a part of the Second Judicial District and provided with a term of court; also an act to legalize the acts of the city clerk at Laramie City, and the acts of the register of deeds of Laramie county, and a number of memorials.

Congress at this session, 1866-67, passed an act organizing the Territory of Wyoming, which embraced the counties of Carter and Laramie, but the act was not to become operative until the officers of the territory were appointed and confirmed as required by law. This provision occasioned over a year's delay in organizing the territory, as the Senate would decline to confirm President Johnson's appointments, and Johnson's term would not expire until March 4, 1869. In the meantime Laramie and Carter counties were organized and conducted their affairs under the laws of Dakota.

The Legislature closed its labors on the 11th of January, 1868. The session had been characterized by an earnest attention to duty and a friendly disposition was manifested among the members.

The committee appointed early in the session to report on the agricultural and mineral resources of the territory submitted an exhaustive report at the close of the session, covering every section of the territory that had been at all explored or surveyed and including the Black Hills. It was designed for the information of the eastern people who were considering removing to the newer sections of the West, and the entire territory was in some sort represented in the document from the international boundary to the Missouri.

At this session of the Legislature, among the laws enacted and memorials passed were the following. It will be noted that the Red River region was an applicant for many governmental favors, and that Mr. Stutsman represented that county. The people up there were preparing for an era of growth and prosperity:

An act to organize the County of Lincoln; to divide Union County into townships; to organize Minnehaha County; conferring citizenship on certain Red River half-breeds; to regulate the sale of spirituous liquors; a memorial urging the creation and organization of the Territory of Wyoming out of the southwestern portion of the Territory of Dakota; a memorial asking the creation and organization of the Territory of Lincoln out of the northern half of Dakota Territory; an act to strike the word "white" out of the election and school laws of the Territory of Dakota; to incorporate the City of Cheyenne; to create and organize the County of Carter; to provide for the incorporation of towns; to provide a common school law; a general incorporation law; important amendments were made to the codes; an act constituting Carter and Laramie counties a part of the Second Judicial District and providing for holding term of court therein; to enforce mechanics' liens; to create the Ninth Representative District; to provide that exemption laws shall apply only to residents.

A memorial to Congress for a United States land office at Pembina; a memorial for a mail route from Fort Totten to St. Joseph; a memorial to Congress relative to surveying land on the Red River of the North; a memorial to the President for the removal of the Chippewa Indians from the Red River; a memorial to Congress for the construction of a wagon road from Fort Abercrombie down the Red River; a memorial to Congress asking for the construction of a military post on the Pembina River.

LINCOLN COUNTY

The County of Lincoln, on the Big Sioux River, was established and its boundaries defined by the Legislature of March, 1862—the first session—but no attempt at organization appears to have been made until 1868, Indian troubles being the main cause of hindering its occupation by white people. Its original boundaries, defined by the act of April 5, 1862, were thus set forth:

Beginning at the southeast corner of township 04, north of range 48 west; thence west to the southwest corner of township 04, north of range 50 west; thence north to the southwest corner of township 06, north of range 50 west; thence west to the southwest corner of township 06, north of range 53 west; thence north to the northwest corner of township 100, north of range 53 west; thence due east to the Big Sioux River; thence south along said river to the place of beginning.

Under these boundaries Lincoln County occupied the northern tier of townships now in Union County, then called Cole, and extended west, taking in the two eastern tiers of townships afterwards included in the present County of Turner. No organization was had, however, under these boundaries, but the Legislature of 1867-68 passed a new act, giving the county new boundaries and appointing its officers as follows:

All that portion of the Territory of Dakota embraced within the following described boundaries shall be known as the County of Lincoln, to wit: Commencing at a point on the Big Sioux River at the northeast corner of Union County, it being the northeast corner of township 95 north; thence west to the southwest corner of township 96, north of range 53 west; thence north to the northwest corner of township 100, north of range 53 west; thence east to the Big Sioux River; thence down and along the course of said river to the place of beginning. The county seat of said county to be at Canton, on the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 14, township 98, north of range 40 west. And that until the next ensuing general election the following named persons be appointed officers of said county, to wit:

County commissioners, Augustus J. Linderman, H. P. Hyde and Benjamin Hill; sheriff, C. H. Smith or South; probate judge and county treasurer, J. Q. Fitzgerald; register of deeds, William Hill; justices of the peace, W. Hyde and W. S. Smith; constable, James Weekly; coroner, Joseph Weekly.

And that the said officers be empowered to discharge all the duties pertaining to their several offices; Provided, that the said County of Lincoln shall remain, as now, attached to Union County for representative and judicial purposes.

This act was approved December 30, 1867.

Concerning the pioneers, a settlement had been made on the future site of Canton as early as 1864, by H. P. Hyde and his son Henry, who built a cabin but did not remain, probably leaving their exposed situation during the Little Crow Indian hostilities of 1862. During the intervening four or five years, during which the Big Sioux Valley appears to have been avoided by immigration, there was considerable travel through the county, particularly after the establishment of Fort Dakota at Sioux Falls; but the first permanent settlements are claimed to have been made in 1866, by A. B. Wheelock and others near the point later known as Eden, and by T. M. and John Sargent, A. J. Linderman and others, between what was called the Big Timber and Canton. Following these came a large number of German and Norwegian farmers. At Canton (then called Lincoln) and vicinity the first settlers came in 1867, J. Q. Fitzgerald, William Hyde, Josiah Weekly and W. S. Smith, with their wives and children, being the first. William M. Cuppett also came during the same year. These parties all took claims, and the following spring were joined by George T. Rea, John A. Hewitt and others. A number of the claims taken at this time covered a portion of the future townsite of Canton. There was no small contention over the precise locality where the county seat should be located, and while all were agreed that it should be at Canton, the question, as the matter first to be settled, was as to the townsite. This was finally arranged by a compromise of the claim holders directly interested, who joined together and entered a tract of 160 acres as a townsite under the federal townsite law. These parties were William M. Cuppett, Thomas Sargent, Fred Reidle, W. S. Smith, John N. Hewitt and George T. Rea.

Strolling bands of professedly friendly Indians annoyed these early settlers, more by their presence in the vicinity than by any depredations committed.

The Indians had never entirely abandoned that portion of the Sioux Valley or that to the north, and as no whites had settled in the country during the Indian troubles of 1862 and later, the red men had been unnoticed and pursued their fishing and trapping unmolested. As the whites came in the Indians were required to withdraw and remain on their reservations. The apprehension of danger from this source was, however, sufficiently deep-seated to lead the first mercantile firm of Canton—Cuppett, Rea & Hewitt—to erect their store building, in 1868, in the form of a fort, sufficiently large to accommodate their business and provide accommodations for thirty or forty people then in the county. No Indians troubled them, though the store-fort undoubtedly assisted in keeping the peace. The Indians of that day had great respect for a fort of any kind, and seldom molested one. The fact that there was a military post at Sioux Falls was, as is usually the case, an encouragement for Indians to domicile in the neighborhood, if disposed to be friendly, as they usually were under such circumstances. Frontier post authorities usually treated strolling Indians generously in times of comparative peace, and they were partially subsisted by occasional donations of hardtack and bacon from the forts' abundant store whenever they applied.

It was claimed that there was hardly an acre of land in Lincoln County that could not be cultivated with profit. The first postoffice was opened at Canton in July, and Benjamin Hill was the postmaster. A clergyman from Beloit, Iowa, the town on the east bank of the Sioux, opposite Canton, performed the first marriage ceremony in the county on the 13th of October, 1868, when Jon Hanson and Miss Siren Louise Bille were married. An infant son of Mr. Jacob Sorter died in October, which was the first death in the county. Benjamin Hill opened a hotel in Canton in the summer of 1868, which was the first. In the early part of 1868 about twenty families of Scandinavians came in from Iowa and took up land, and built a church the same year costing about eight hundred dollars. A. B. Wheelock, Daniel McLaren and William Craig settled south of Canton, near Eden.

Minnehaha and Lincoln counties, with Brookings and Deuel counties, constituted the Ninth Representative District by the apportionment act of 1867-68, and a convention was held at the Town of Canton, in Lincoln County, September 12, 1868, for the purpose of nominating a candidate for this office. It was a republican convention and was held at the store of William M. Cuppett & Co. The convention was called to order by J. Q. Fitzgerald, of Lincoln. John Nelson, of Minnehaha, was elected president, and William M. Cuppett, secretary of the convention. J. Q. Fitzgerald, of Lincoln, was nominated for representative, when the dual county convention adjourned and the delegates from Lincoln met and nominated the following candidates for county offices: Register of deeds, William M. Cuppett; sheriff, Charles A. South; probate judge, S. C. Lashley; attorney, F. Qua; coroner, Isaac Newton; superintendent of schools, George T. Rea; county commissioners, C. Sogn, Thomas M. Sargent, William Peters; surveyor, B. F. Hill; justices of the peace, T. Brindleson, B. F. McVay; constables, Jacob Holter, Henry Hyde. At the election held in October following, there were sixteen votes polled in Lincoln County, and fourteen in Minnehaha. Fitzgerald was elected representative, and the ticket for county officers of Lincoln County, named above, was unanimously chosen.

The principal streams in the county are Beaver Creek and its two branches, the South Branch and the Little Beaver, while the parent stream, entering the county near the northwest corner and coursing entirely across it, finds an outlet in the Big Sioux a few miles below Canton. Saddle Creek is also an excellent stream which rises near the eastern border and joins with Long Creek in the western part of the county. Pattee and Lincoln creeks are also two considerable streams. It is claimed that there is barely an acre of land in the county that cannot be successfully cultivated, but this statement may be confidently made concerning more than nine-tenths of the territory, with the exception of the limited mountainous and valuable mineral portions.

The first newspaper to be established in the county was the Sioux Valley News, by R. H. Miller, with material furnished from the Union and Dakotian office in Yankton. Mr. Miller was soon succeeded by Mr. Arthur Linn, of Yankton, who had been publishing the Union and Dakotian at Yankton prior to its consolidation with the Yankton Press.

The Town of Canton had become a business village in 1871. Goetz & Thorson, W. E. Givens and Lashley & Russell were merchants; Mr. Crane, lumberman; Carpenter & Nelson, grist mill; Mr. Gutekunst, boot and shoe dealer; John H. Holsey, department store; Mr. Garrettsen, merchant; William M. Cuppett, postmaster; John Falde, real estate dealer; Simon Myers, blacksmith; Frank A. Van Vleet, North Star Hotel, and L. N. Martin, Martin House Physician, Dr. J. C. Reynolds, and school teacher, O. E. Rea.

PINNEY KILLS EX-GOVERNOR BEALL IN MONTANA—ORIGIN OF DECORATION DAY—A REMARKABLE STORM IN MAY.

The year 1868 brought with it one of the most important and exciting political campaigns the country had ever experienced. The question of the reconstruction of the rebellious states that had passed ordinances of secession and cast their lot with the Southern Confederacy, was the great issue. President Johnson's policy was sustained by the democratic party and included the leading ex-confederates, though the political disabilities of the latter class had not as yet been restored to them and hence they were not voters, and the great majority of the white population of the South also adhered to Johnson.

The congressional policy, which was now openly supported by the republican party, was very popular all through the northern states. The difference in these two policies was one that men might be expected to differ upon, though the result of the war had forever, and negatively, settled the question of secession. It had been held by the Federal Government all through the war that a state had no power to secede—that such an act was not only clearly unconstitutional, but if acquiesced in by the Federal Government would destroy the Union—in short, that the Union was already dissolved if these states had a lawful and constitutional right to secede. Johnson's policy took the ground that the seceding states had not been out of the Union. That their people had appealed to the arbitrament of arms and had been defeated and had surrendered, and were again citizens of the United States and citizens of their several states, or could be made so by a proclamation of amnesty—that they might be punished for treason in levying war against the United States; but the number of the offenders was so vast that to pass upon their offenses by the courts was out of the question, nor was it demanded by the loyal people of the country except in the case of some of the leaders and fomenters of the secession movement; for it was well understood that secession had not been heartily supported by the people of the South before the war. Those who had held civil positions under the Confederate Government and those who had voluntarily borne arms in its behalf, were disfranchised, or rather had forfeited their citizenship, and required the restorative effect of an amnesty law or proclamation of the president to restore them to citizenship. President Johnson had favored this amnesty on the ground that these white people of the South were better qualified at that time for citizenship than the millions of colored men who had just been emancipated from slavery. It was claimed that the president was carrying out the policy which Lincoln had decided upon, and what gave important support to this claim was the fact that Secretary of State Seward, who was Lincoln's closest advisor, remained at the head of Johnson's cabinet and was a supporter of his restoration policy. Mr. Johnson's plan was to reclothe the white people of the South, save a number who had held high and influential positions in the Confederacy, with citizenship, and have them, with the blacks, go at it and restore the state governments, which at this time were under martial law and governed by army officers. The Johnson plan was to "restore"—the congressional plan to "reconstruct."

The congressional policy assumed that the acts of secession and the war had deprived the secessionists of all their civil rights under the Federal Constitution, and had destroyed the constitutions and civil governments of the seceding states, but that the soil of the states—the territory, had not been affected by the treason of the people and had all along been within the Union and under the jurisdiction of the United States Government. Congress proposed that all who had voluntarily borne arms against the United States and all officers of the Confederate civil service should be excluded from the franchise in the initial work of reconstruction.

The millions of emancipated slaves, who constituted a large proportion of the people of the South, and whose transformation from the condition of chattel slavery to that of freemen and citizens, had introduced a new and most momentous problem into this question of reconstruction or restoration. The slaves had been friendly to the Federal Government all through the war. A number of negro regiments had been enlisted in the Union army, composed largely of escaped slaves, who rendered good service. The negroes recognized that the war meant everything to them, though nothing definite looking to their emancipation had been considered by the Federal Government for more than two years after the war broke out. The first decisive step in this direction was taken by Benjamin F. Butler, major general, who declared that escaped slaves coming into the Union lines were "contraband of war," and were confiscated; but as the United States couldn't hold them as slaves they became freemen.

Mr. Johnson's policy, it was claimed, would have surrendered to the forces of the Rebellion the power to practically re-enslave the great body of negroes through state legislation. Congress had resolved to protect them and as a first step gave them the ballot, and also by authority of the loyal states, amended the National Constitution prohibiting any state from denying the elective franchise to any person on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude. The Constitution was further amended prohibiting any state from assuming or paying any portion of the debts contracted by the Confederacy or any state for carrying on the war. Both houses of Congress being republican by more than two-thirds, that body had no difficulty in enacting any law demanded, as the president's veto was easily disposed of by the two-thirds majority. Military governors were appointed in the seceded states by the Federal Government, who were required and authorized to organize the machinery of state governments. They proceeded in this work somewhat on the plan pursued by the first governor of Dakota Territory, by issuing proclamations, calling elections for the election of members of the Legislature, state and county officers, designating those who were entitled to vote and hold office. These Legislatures, when assembled, were required to ratify the constitutional amendments. In some of the states conventions were called for the purpose of framing new constitutions that would conform to the changed conditions, while in many cases the old constitutions were reframed; and these constitutions were submitted to Congress and the state formally admitted into the Union just as is the case with new states. Congress also passed what was called amnesty acts, relieving the whites from their political disabilities. First the amnestied class applied to the subordinate employees of the Confederate Government and the private soldiers; then a little later followed an act relieving a class of commissioned officers below a certain grade, and still later, when the great mass of whites had thus been relieved, an act was passed that provided for the relief of the leading civil officers, including congressmen, foreign ministers, and army officers, including the rank of colonel and above, upon their making petition to be reinstated in their political privileges and taking the oath of allegiance. Thus all who had been connected with the Rebellion in any capacity, to overthrow and disrupt the Federal Union, were finally restored to citizenship, except a very few, including Jefferson Davis, the president of the Confederacy. It was expected that he would be tried for treason. He was indicted and arraigned before the United States Court for the Northern District of Virginia, but through the influence of leading republicans and old-time abolitionists who had been his inveterate enemies for a lifetime, he was admitted to bail in the sum of $100,000, Horace Greeley, the renowned anti-slave leader, and founder of the New York Tribune, being one of his bondsmen. This ended the matter. The case was never called for trial.

The presidential campaign was contested by the champions of these two methods of reconstruction. It was evident long before the time for holding the national conventions that the republicans would nominate for President General Grant the foremost military character of the Civil war. This sentiment was universal among republicans and was sustained by thousands of democrats who had served in the Union armies. Before the war Generals Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Logan and Thomas, and Secretary of War Stanton, were leaders in the democratic party, so far as they took any part in politics; and it was claimed, and was probably true, that nearly or quite one-half of the soldiers of the Union army had been supporters of the democratic party.

In the Territory of Dakota the political sentiment was similar to that which prevailed throughout the North. All the republicans and many old-time democrats favored Grant for President, but there was a serious division in the territorial republican party in regard to the nominee for delegate to Congress, which officer was to be elected this year to succeed Dr. W. A. Burleigh, who had been triumphantly elected in 1866, as a Johnson republican, but who was now a candidate for the nomination at the hands of the straight, or congressional, republicans, the democrats having taken over all there was of Johnson republicanism. In addition to Burleigh, Hon. S. L. Spink, secretary of the territory, was the foremost republican candidate, and Judge J. P. Kidder was also in the field as a republican, but before the campaign ended these were running, with the addition of General Todd, and Toohey, of Wyoming.

The democrats had not early in the year become united on any candidate for President, and not until their national convention met did they decide upon nominating Horatio Seymour, of New York. Many of them supported Johnson, but there was entirely lacking the enthusiasm that foreboded success under the President's leadership.

In our territory the sentiment of the democrats was generally favorable to J. B. S. Todd as their candidate for delegate.

POLITICAL CONVENTIONS, 1868

The following official call for a national republican convention was issued in December, 1867:

The undersigned, constituting the national republican committee, designated by the convention held at Baltimore on the 7th of June, 1864, do appoint that a national convention of the union republican party be held at the City of Chicago, Illinois, on Wednesday, the 20th day of May, 1868, at 12 o'clock M., for the purpose of nominating candidates for the offices of President and vice president of the United States. Each state in the United States is authorized to be represented in the convention by the number of delegates equal to twice the number of senators and representatives to which such state is entitled in the National Congress. We invite the cooperation of all citizens who rejoice that our great Civil war has happily terminated in the discomfiture of rebellion, who would hold fast the unity and integrity of the republic, and maintain its paramount right to defend to the utmost its own existence, whether imperiled by secret conspiracy or armed force; of all friends of an economical administration of the public expenditure; of the complete extirpation of the principles and policy of slavery; of the speedy reorganization of those states whose governments were destroyed by the Rebellion, and their permanent restoration to their proper practical relations with the United States in accordance with the true principles of republican government.

Signed by Marcus L. Ward, of New Jersey, chairman; John D. Jeffrees, of Indiana, secretary; John R. Clark, New Hampshire; Samuel T. Hussey, Maine; A. B. Gardue, Vermont; Wm. Claflin, Massachusetts; Samuel A. Purviance, Pennsylvania; J. S. Fowler, Tennessee; B. C. Cook, Illinois; Marsh Giddings, Michigan; D. B. Stubbs, Iowa; A. W. Campbell, West Virginia; H. W. Hoffman, Maryland; N. B. Smithers, Delaware; W. J. Corning, Virginia; S. H. Boyd, Missouri; C. L. Robinson, Florida; S. Judd, Wisconsin; Horace Greeley, New York; H. A. Starkweather, Connecticut; R. B. Cowen, Ohio; Thomas Simpson, Minnesota; Newton Edmunds, Dakota; D. S. Goodloe, North Carolina; Thomas G. Turner, Rhode Island; Samuel N. Crawford, Kansas; S. J. Bowen, District of Columbia, and J. P. Chaffee, of Colorado.

IMPEACHMENT OF PRESIDENT JOHNSON

The national events of the year 1868 were the presidential election and the impeachment of President Johnson, and because both events had an important bearing on the interests of Dakota, a brief sketch of the impeachment is here inserted. The differences between the President and Congress, growing out of the restoration of the southern states, had grown so acute and exasperating that Congress had by various enactments curtailed the power of the President whenever it became necessary to promote the reconstruction policy pursued by that body, at the same time keeping within constitutional limits. The office of secretary of war had been the most important of all the cabinet positions from the outbreak of the Rebellion, and was so considered at this time, especially by the President, when the questions and problems arising from reconstruction were in course of adjustment, as Congress was using the army to further its plans, and so far as possible check the unfriendly interference of the President. The various enactments of Congress pertaining to reconstruction, as a rule, met with President Johnson's veto, but the two-thirds majority of Congress easily overcame this impediment and enabled that body to pass such measures as were necessary to the furtherance of their policy of reconstruction.

Among the special acts found necessary was an act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices, which provided that the members of Mr. Johnson's cabinet should not be removed from office until their successors had been appointed and confirmed by the Senate. The position of secretary of war had been held by Hon. Edwin M. Stanton, of Pennsylvania, for a number of years, and although originally a democrat, Stanton had become a republican at the breaking out of the war, was Lincoln's "Great War Secretary," and favored the congressional plan of reconstruction. He was Mr. Lincoln's right-hand during the war. He was an able lawyer and a statesman, and very thorough and fearless in the discharge of his official duties. Mr. Johnson found him a thorn in his side and was determined to get him out of his cabinet, but the tenure of office act stood in the way. If he appointed a successor the Senate would refuse to confirm, and Mr. Stanton would be left in authority. The President finally hit upon an expedient that promised to relieve him of his obnoxious minister, and at the same time keep within the tenure of office law. He formally removed Mr. Stanton and assigned Adj. Gen. Lorenzo Thomas to be secretary of war ad interim, and directed General Thomas to take charge of the War Department. The President sent a communication to the Senate notifying that body of his action, and General Thomas called at the office of Secretary of War Stanton, presented his commission to the secretary, and retired. The Senate considered the communication of the President in executive session and answered it by adopting the following resolution:

Resolved, That under the Constitution and laws of the United States, the President has no power to remove the secretary of war and designate any other officer to perform the duties of that office.

A copy of this resolution was sent to Secretary Stanton, and the result was that he not only refused to vacate the office, but he proceeded to barricade and lock certain entrances and himself remained at the war office all night, it being expected that General Thomas would attempt to gain possession by force, and possession was regarded as "nine points of the law." The result was that Stanton held the fort, and the feeling against the President had become so embittered that the House of Representatives preferred articles of impeachment against President Johnson, charging high crimes and misdemeanors. There were twelve of these articles, something like the counts of an indictment. Eight of them were found for violation of the tenure of a certain civil office act; two for violating the "act to define and punish certain conspiracies"; one for violating an act making appropriations for the army, and one for endeavoring to prevent the execution of an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel states.

The first article of impeachment recited:

That said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, on the 21st of February, in the year of our Lord, 1868, at Washington in the District of Columbia, unmindful of the high duties of his office, of his oath of office, and of the requirements of the Constitution that he should take care that the laws be faithfully executed, did unlawfully and in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, issue an order in writing for the removal of Edwin M. Stanton from the office of secretary for the department of war, said Edwin M. Stanton having been theretofore duly appointed and commissioned, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, as such secretary; and said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, on the 12th day of August, in the year of our Lord, 1867, and during the recess of said Senate, having suspended by his order Edwin M. Stanton from said office and within twenty days after the first day of the next meeting of said Senate on the 12th day of December in the year last aforesaid, having reported to said Senate such suspension with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case, and the name of the person designated to perform the duties of such office temporarily until the next meeting of the Senate, and said Senate thereafterward on the 13th day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1868, having duly considered the evidence and reasons reported by said Andrew Johnson for such suspension, did refuse to concur in said suspension, whereby and by force of the provisions of an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, said Edwin M. Stanton, by reason of the premises, on the said 21st day of February, was lawfully entitled to hold said office of secretary for the department of war, which said order for the removal of said Edwin M. Stanton, is in substance as follows, that is to say:

Executive Mansion, Washington, D. C., February 21, 1868.

Sir: By virtue of the power and authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States, you are hereby removed from office as secretary for the department of war, and your functions as such will terminate on receipt of this communication. You will transfer to Maj. Gen. Lorenzo Thomas, adjutant general of the army, who has this day been authorized and empowered to act as secretary of war, ad interim, all records, books, papers and other public property now in your custody and charge.

Respectfully yours,

ANDREW JOHNSON.

To Hon. Edwin M. Stanton,
Washington, D. C.

Which order was unlawfully issued with intent then and there to violate an act entitled "An act regulating the tenure of certain civil offices," passed March 2, 1867, and contrary to the provisions of said act and in violation thereof, and contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, and without the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, the Senate then and there being in session, to remove said Edwin M. Stanton from the office of secretary for the department of war, whereby said Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, did then and there commit, and was guilty of, a high misdemeanor in office.

Following this were nine other articles, charging violations of the tenure of office act in the removal of Mr. Stanton; two charging conspiracy with General Thomas to obtain possession of the war office and Government property; one article charging that the President had "declared to and instructed Major General Emory, in command of the department of Washington, that the second section of the act making appropriations for the support of the army, which provided that "all orders or instructions relating to military operations issued by the President to the secretary of war should be issued through the general of the army," was "unconstitutional and in contravention of the commission of said Emory, and therefore not binding upon him as an officer of the United States." The twelfth article charged that the President, on the 18th day of August, 1866, at the City of Washington, "by public speech, did declare and affirm, in substance, that the Thirty-ninth Congress of the United States was not a Congress of the United States authorized by the Constitution to exercise legislative power under the same, but on the contrary was only a Congress of part of the states, thereby denying and intending to deny that the legislation of said Congress was valid or obligatory upon him, the said Andrew Johnson, except so far as he saw fit to approve the same; and also thereby denying and intending thereby to deny the power of the said Thirty-ninth Congress to propose amendments to the Constitution of the United States."

The trial took place before the United States Senate, beginning Monday, March 30, 1868, and continued six weeks, the arguments being concluded on Friday, May 15th, and a vote on the various articles was then taken. There were fifty-four senators, and it required a two-thirds vote to convict. Forty-two senators were republicans and twelve democrats. All the democrats voted for acquittal, as also did Senators Fessenden, of Maine; Grimes, of Iowa; Trumbull, of Illinois; Ross, of Kansas; Fowler, of Tennessee; Van Winkle, of West Virginia, and Henderson, of Missouri, making nineteen negative votes, which was the exact number required to acquit the President. One vote changed to the affirmative side would have cost President Johnson his office, and made Hon. Benjamin Wade, of Ohio, then president of the Senate, President for the remainder of the term of Mr. Johnson, which would expire in less than a year.

The states not represented that were awaiting admission into the Union under the reconstruction acts of Congress, were Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, Texas and Virginia.

It was remarkable that the republican senators who voted for acquittal were consigned by the popular sentiment of their party to a political oblivion from which they never emerged, not one of them, though few believed that their action was controlled by other than conscientious motives and for the good and quiet of the country. Mr. Johnson's term would expire within a few months, and it was claimed that these senators felt that the people "had better bear the ills they had than fly to others that they knew not of." There was very little friction between Congress and the President after the impeachment trial, and the people became interested in the presidential election then pending, the contest being between the republicans and democrats, with Ulysses S. Grant, of Illinois, and Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, as the republican candidates, and Horatio Seymour, of New York, and Francis P. Blair, of Missouri, the democratic candidates.

THE DELEGATE FIGHT

About the 15th of February, 1868, a call was issued by the Republican Central Committee of Dakota, signed by Jacob Brauch, chairman; A. H. Hampton, John Owens, Franklin Bronson and Nelson W. Cusick, calling a territorial delegate convention to meet at Miner's Hotel, Vermillion, on Thursday, March 5, 1868, for the purpose of electing two delegates to the national convention to be held at Chicago, May 20th, to nominate candidates for President and vice president of the United States, the ratio of representation to be the same as the number of councilmen and representatives in the Legislature.

The territorial republican convention met at Vermillion, March 5th, when G. C. Moody was elected president, and R. C. Green, of Union County; Nelson Miner, of Clay, and C. H. McIntyre, of Yankton, vice presidents; G. P. Bennett, of Union, and William Shriner, of Clay, secretaries. C. B. Valentine, of Union, Doctor Hodgkin, of Clay, and T. W. Brisbane, of Yankton, were appointed a Committee on Resolutions.

(There were but three counties represented in this convention. The date of holding it was so early, and the sentiment for Grant so universal, that the republicans of Bon Homme, Charles Mix and Todd counties did not send delegates. The proceedings were not given out for publication, as no Committee on Credentials was appointed.)

The Resolutions Committee reported as follows:

Resolved, by the republican convention of the Territory of Dakota now assembled, That our first choice for President of the United States is the soldier, patriot and statesman, Ulysses S. Grant, of Illinois, and that our delegates to the national convention are instructed to put forth their best efforts to secure his nomination.

Resolved, That the republicans of Dakota, through their delegates, do most heartily endorse the reconstruction policy of the Thirty-ninth and Fortieth Congress.

The resolutions were adopted by a unanimous vote.

The following resolution, presented by Mr. Brookings, was then adopted:

Resolved, That the republicans of Dakota, through their delegates in convention assembled, do fully endorse the prompt action taken by the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress in the impeachment of Acting President Andrew Johnson for his flagrant and willful violation of the Constitution and laws, and that such action meets with the warm approval of every loyal citizen of Dakota.

The convention then proceeded to the election of delegates to the national convention, by ballot. For C. B. Valentine there were twenty-one votes; for G. C. Moody, seventeen; for John L. Jolley, sixteen. Valentine and Moody were declared elected. John L. Jolley and Joseph R. Hanson were elected alternates. A few brief addresses were then made, when the territorial convention adjourned.

The national convention was held in the City of Chicago on the 20th of May. Dakota was represented by a double delegation, though it was not known that such was the case until the meeting of the national convention, as no second convention had been held in Dakota. Dr. R. I. Thomas and John Lawrence were there claiming seats from Dakota, and represented that they had been elected by a conservative republican convention, but when their credentials were examined it was found that they were signed by a person who claimed to be president of a Grant Club. Dr. W. A. Burleigh was also there as a promoter of Thomas and Lawrence, and though it does not appear that these gentlemen had the slightest claim to seats in the convention, the republicans of Dakota had been so divided and in such a wrangle for years that the convention was not willing to entirely reject Burleigh's men, for Burleigh, owing to his wide acquaintance and political experience, was something of a power in national conventions, so it was decided to give Thomas and Lawrence seats on the floor of the convention without a vote. Moody and Valentine, elected at Vermillion, were recognized as full delegates and placed on the roll call, and Hanson and Jolley given seats as alternates. A delegate-elect from Laramie County was present, and was given a seat with the regular Dakota delegation, it being expected that the new Territory of Wyoming would be created by the Congress then in session, which would include both Laramie and Carter counties. Newton Edmunds, of Yankton, was named national committeman from Dakota. The national convention nominated Ulysses S. Grant for President, and Schuyler Colfax for vice president.

SECOND REPUBLICAN CONVENTION IN 1868

The Republican Territorial Committee issued a call for the meeting of the republican territorial convention for the nomination of a delegate to Congress and territorial officers, to meet at Elk Point, July 8, 1868. The convention assembled at the time indicated. Jacob Brauch, chairman of the territorial committee, called the convention to order, when Col. B. F. Campbell, of Clay, was elected temporary chairman, and G. B. Bennett, of Union, secretary. A Committee on Credentials was appointed, which reported the following named as entitled to seats in the convention:

Union County, J. P. Welber, Duncan Ross, Jr., Gilbert P. Bennett, S. L. Parker, N. J. Wallace, H. Fairchild, James Curtis, T. C. Watson, J. E. Schooler and W. J. Walters; Clay County, H. Gunderson, James Eves, A. F. Shaw, J. D. Tucker, R. E. Blades, B. F. Campbell, A. Vermason, E. D. Barker and William Crane, Yankton County, W. W. Brookings, C. H. McIntyre, Ole Sampson, Forger Nelson, Iver Bagstad, A. N. Babcock, William Stier, Rudolph Von Ins and G. W. Batchelder; Bon Homme County, John W. Owen and E. W. Wall; Charles Mix County, Hiram Conger, Bucklin N. Wood and Joseph Emerson (George H. Hand proxy for Wood and Conger); Laramie County, Capt. N. J. O'Brien, W. W. Corlett, M. C. Brown, S. M. Freshaw, T. E. McClelland, A. T. Drake; Carter County, John Clifford, 4 votes (Col. G. C. Moody and G. W. Kingsbury held proxies and cast the vote of Carter County).

The report of the Credentials Committee was adopted.

A permanent organization was then effected by electing W. W. Brookings, president; R. E. Blade, Clay; G. P. Bennett, Union; Ole Sampson, Yankton; J. W. Owens, Bon Homme, and Joseph Emerson, Charles Mix, vice presidents; and N. J. Wallace, Union; James Eves, Clay, and George H. Hand, Yankton, secretaries.

The platform of principles was then adopted. It endorsed the national platform and the nominees of the national convention, Grant & Colfax; the position of Congress on reconstruction; favored a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from Sioux City to the Cheyenne River via Elk Point, Vermillion, Yankton and Bon Homme, and favored keeping the public lands out of market, and permitting their sale only to homesteaders and pre-emptors.

Nominations being in order Hon. S. L. Spink, of Yankton, was nominated for delegate to Congress on the first ballot receiving thirty-eight votes, the full vote of the convention. For territorial auditor, W. W. Corlett, of Laramie County; for territorial treasurer, T. K. Hovey, of Clay County; for superintendent of public instruction, T. McKendrie Stewart, Union County.

A central committee for the territory was appointed, composed of G. P. Bennett, Union County; A. F. Shaw, Clay; G. C. Moody, Yankton; H. M. Kennedy, Bon Homme; Hiram Conger, Chas. Mix; N. W. Cusick, Todd; Isaac S. Haskell, Carter; M. C. Brown, Laramie; John Nelson, Minnehaha; Richard Fitzgerald, Lincoln; Peter Cavilier, Penbina. Colonel Moody was made chairman of the committee. Mr. Spink, the nominee for delegate, addressed the convention at some length, and brief speeches were made by Messrs. Moody, Batchelder, Brookings, Hand and Campbell.

The convention then adjourned.

THE PEOPLE'S CONVENTION

Following the republican convention, there appeared a call for a "people's convention," in words following:

All citizens of Dakota Territory desiring the common good of the country and the advancement of the real interests of Dakota, are requested to meet at the county seats of their respective counties, or at such other places as may be designated, on the 15th day of August, A. D. 1868, for the purpose of selecting delegates to attend a people's territorial convention, to be held at Vermillion, August 22, 1868, at 2 o'clock P. M., and there to nominate a suitable person to represent the people of Dakota as delegate in Congress; also to put in nomination suitable persons for territorial auditor, treasurer and superintendent of public schools, and to transact such other business as may properly come before the convention. The respective counties will be entitled to delegates as follows: Union County, 10; Clay County, 9; Yankton, 9; Bon Homme, 3; Todd, 3; Charles Mix and Buffalo, 3; Lincoln, 1; Penbina, 1.

By Order of Committee.

The people's territorial convention assembled at Vermillion at the public schoolhouse, August 22, 1868. Hon. W. A. Burleigh was elected temporary chairman and Wm. Miner, of Yankton, secretary. A Committee on Credentials, composed of Dr. O. F. Stevens and E. B. Wixson, of Union County, and J.

A. Lewis of Todd County, was appointed, who reported the following names as entitled to seats in the convention as delegates:

Union County—John Reams, Shephard Young, H. W. McNiell, E. B. Wixson, C. P. Heath, S. Reandeau, O. F. Stevens, G. W. Kellogg and William Benton. Clay County—Capt. N. Miner, G. W. Platte, Frank Taylor, A. Hanson, Ole Bottolfson, M. McCue, Victor Cordin, N. V. Rose, M. Snyder. Yankton County—William Miner, L. Congleton, A. M. English, Louis Volin, Washington Reed, W. N. Collamer, T. G. Maxwell, Thomas Frick, J. V. Bunker. Bon Homme County—W. A. Burleigh, R. M. Johnson, Hugh Fraley. Todd County—J. A. Lewis, Henry Brooks, John Thompson. Charles Mix County—J. S. Collins, F. J. Dewitt, R. I. Thomas. Lincoln County—M. Fitzgerald.

The report was adopted.

The convention then proceeded to a permanent organization when L. Congleton, of Yankton County was elected president; William Miner and C. P. Heath, secretaries. Vice presidents were also elected as follows: Chas. Hamilton, Charles Mix; Hugh Fraley, Bon Homme; Washington Reed, Yankton; Louis Volin, Ole Bottolfson, Clay; M. Snider, G. W. Kellogg, A. Gore, S. Reandeau, Union; M. Fitzgerald, Lincoln; J. A. Lewis, Todd County.

A Committee on Resolutions was appointed, as follows: W. A. Burleigh, chairman; Almon Gore, Union; Nelson Miner, Clay; J. V. Bunker, Yankton; Henry Brooks, Todd; J. S. Collins, Charles Mix; M. Fitzgerald, Lincoln.

The resolutions were seven in number. The first favored immigration, protection to the lives and property of the people, and easing the burdens of taxation. The second resolution favored the extension of railroads into the territory and promised to endeavor to secure aid from the Federal Government, for that purpose. The third favored liberal appropriations by the general government for the purpose of conducting the government of the territory; the fourth favored the extinguishment of the Indian title to all the lands in the territory. The fifth opposed the bringing of the public lands of Dakota into market; the sixth pledged every effort to reward the veteran soldiers and sailors of the territory by shortening the time for securing their homesteads to one year. The seventh invited the cooperation of all citizens who desired to promote the best interests of the territory. The platform was silent in regard to national politics and presidential candidates.

The convention then proceeded to the nomination of candidates for the various offices. Doctor Burleigh nominated J. P. Kidder, of Clay County, for the office of delegate in Congress and the convention with an unanimous vote ratified the nomination. M. K. Armstrong, of Yankton, was nominated for territorial auditor; Eli B. Wixson, of Union, for territorial treasurer; and Almon Gore, of Union, for territorial superintendent of public instruction.

The following campaign committee was then appointed: For Union County—Messrs. Cummings, Rich, Mohan, A. Gore, Webster, Doctor Stevens, D. Chaussee, D. M. Mills, M. Kiplinger. Clay County—Messrs. Ross, Snider, Bottolfson and Hanson. Yankton County—Messrs. Louis Volin, A. Van Osdel, A. M. English, Stephen Flick and A. B. Stevens. Bon Homme County—Hugh Fraley and R. M. Johnson. Todd County—Joel A. Potter and Henry Brooks. Charles Mix County—F. J. Dewitt and Felicia Fallas. Lincoln County—M. Fitzgerald. A resolution was adopted endorsing Doctor Burleigh's course in Congress. Addresses were made by Dr. R. I. Thomas, Judge Ford, of Wyoming, or rather Laramie County; W. A. Burleigh and Judge Kidder, the nominee; after which the convention adjourned.

FIRST DISTINCTLY DEMOCRATIC ORGANIZATION IN DAKOTA

The reader who is interested in the political history of the territory may have observed that up to the present time, 1868, nothing has been said regarding a democratic party as an organization in the territory, and in explaining the reason why, it is only necessary to state that there had been no such organization since the establishment of the territory. The democrats had not been sailing under that flag. They had adopted various titles but had not organized as democrats until 1868. After the first election in 1861, when General Todd was elected to Congress without the formality of either convention or a nomination, the democratic leaders had felt that their party had no chance of winning unless they could secure a large number of republican votes from the insurgent element, and to do this they were obliged to adopt a temporary title such as "union," "people's," "citizens," etc., or throw their support to one of the republican factions which party was famous for its "double headers."

The first move for an organization was made by the democrats of Yankton County who held a mass convention at Yankton, on Saturday, May 9, 1868, and took the initial steps. As was stated in the convention, there had been up to that time no distinct democratic organization in the territory, which had been due altogether to the political differences growing out of the War of the Rebellion, followed by the disagreements between President Johnson and Congress. At this initial convention the only business transacted was the election of officers and the consideration of plans for securing the cooperation of democrats throughout the territory. The officers chosen were for this purpose of organization, W. P. Lyman, president; D. T. Bramble, vice president; J. Shaw Gregory, treasurer; and Dr. Franklin Wixson, secretary. The movement was heartily seconded in the other counties and county organizations followed. The outcome of the movement resulted in the calling of a territorial democratic convention to meet at Yankton June 20, 1868, for the purpose of electing two delegates to the National Democratic Convention. The call was signed by D. T. Bramble, L. W. Case, A. M. English, J. S. Presho and D. B. Cooley, and in accordance therewith the territorial convention assembled at Yankton on Saturday, the 20th of June. The proceedings do not show who the officers were, and the names of but few delegates were given. Union County was not represented. Mr. Sherman represented Clay; Hon. Hugh Fraley, Bon Homme; Felix Le Blanc and Felicia Fallas, Charles Mix; and D. T. Bramble, W. P. Lyman, A. G. Fuller, C. G. Irish, M. M. Parmer, J. S. Presho, D. B. Cooley and John Stange, Yankton County. Gen. J. B. S. Todd and Hon. D. T. Bramble were elected delegates to the national convention and Capt. A. G. Fuller, one of the alternates. The National Democratic Convention was called to meet in the City of New York, July 4, 1868. At the national convention so held in New York, Horatio Seymour, of New York, was nominated for president and Francis P. Blair, of Missouri, for vice president. The Dakota delegates attended. There was held at Yankton after the nomination of Seymour and Blair a grand democratic ratification meeting on July 14th, at which speeches were made by General Todd, Gen. Wm. Tripp, Maj. E. H. Brackett and Dr. J. B. VanVelsor.

A call was then issued for a Democratic Territorial Convention to meet at Vermillion on the 8th of September, to nominate a delegate to Congress and territorial officers. The convention met pursuant to call and nominated the following ticket:

For delegate to Congress, J. B. S. Todd; for territorial auditor, John W. Turner, of Clay; for territorial treasurer, Michael Ryan, of Union; for superintendent of public instruction, James Keegan, of Bon Homme. The platform endorsed the democratic nominees for President and vice president; favored the reconstruction policy of President Johnson; denounced the usurpation of the executive powers by Congress; favored keeping the public lands subject to homesteads and pre-emptions, and favored liberal pensions to Union soldiers and sailors. The convention adjourned after the adoption of the platform.

DR. W. A. BURLEIGH BECOMES A CANDIDATE

On the 23d of September, Hon. Walter A. Burleigh, who had gone to Laramie County on a political mission, presumably in the interest of Judge Kidder, published a card in the Cheyenne Argus from which the following is copied:

To My Fellow Citizens, I shall have been your representative in Congress for two terms with the termination of the fortieth session. So far as I know I have performed faithfully all the duties an honorable agent or attorney could perform. At the request of citizens in various parts of our territory I advocated, worked for and finally obtained the passage of the organic act of Wyoming. I did this with the assistance of General Casement, who drew up the bill, aided by Doctor Latham, of Cheyenne, who was in Washington at the request of the people, whilst General Casement was compelled to remain at home to prove to the world that the Rocky Mountains could be crossed by the iron horse of civilization. With this premise I wish to state that I am now an independent candidate for reelection, at the urgent request of many of my friends, and against my own inclinations. If reelected, I shall certainly advocate appropriations for the necessary surveys that will make known the richest mining country in the world, and be the means of its development. I am, ever have been, and will continue to be, in favor of a double track of the Union Pacific Railroad, because I believe that while it binds together, with strong iron bands that none can sever, a great nation and a continent, it also changes and will perfect the national channel of commerce between our own and distant lands. In regard to Indians, if they do not immediately return to their reservations and live up to their treaties between the Government and themselves, I am in favor of war. I would ask Congress to arm and equip my fellow citizens of the great West and permit them to prosecute the war, as being best acquainted with the haunts and habits of the savage foe. I shall also point out the advantages to the Government and the people of Wyoming of having our own citizens appointed to the federal offices within the territory, for the reason that they best know her wants and ought to be rewarded for their exertions in developing her resources. I will do all I can for Dakota and Wyoming, and ask your votes on the ground only that I will try to do what I think I have heretofore done, act for you as I believe you desire, and in accordance with your best interests. Vote as you think best and I will be satisfied; but I would like every citizen to vote so that the whole may be represented through a deliberate choice.

Respectfully, your servant,

W. A. BURLEIGH.

GEN. DENNIS TOOHEY ENTERS THE LIST

Within a week of the election which occurred on Tuesday, the 13th of October, a fifth candidate in the person of Gen. Dennis Toohey, of Wyoming, sprang suddenly into the arena and went energetically to work among the voters of Laramie and Carter counties, now Wyoming. He was a democrat; a man of ability and quite popular in that section, where they claimed to have over two thousand legal voters.

LIST OF CANDIDATES COMPLETE

With the announcement of Mr. Toohey, the list of candidates was completed there being Spink for the republicans; Kidder, people's; Todd, democrat; Burleigh, independent; and Toohey, independent democrat. The political campaign in Dakota, which had been in progress all summer was stimulated to a much higher temperature by the unexpected announcements of Burleigh and Toohey. The campaign was to be the most strenuous "free for all" political struggle that had yet engaged the attention of Dakotans. While the Johnson republicans were generally supporting Grant and Colfax, and while there had not been any organized opposition among republicans to Mr. Spink, Kidder had a large republican following, and there were influential and experienced republican politicians openly supporting him on the people's ticket. This course, they knew, would not affect their standing in Washington with the President or with Congress, for political affairs in the territory were known to be largely a matter of personalities, and the territories having no vote for President or in Congress, their influence amounted to little and the personal relations of a delegate were of more value than his political connections at home. Burleigh was Kidder's strongest ally at the opening of the campaign and his defection may have cost the judge a victory. The new Territory of Wyoming bill passed at the late session of Congress, but it contained a provision that it should not go into effect until its federal officials should be appointed and confirmed by the Senate which plainly meant that President Johnson would not be permitted to make the appointments of governor, judges and others. This left that section still in Dakota for another winter at least, and its two thousand votes or more in the counties of Laramie and Carter, if united, would control the territorial election. It was this condition and the large vote of those western counties that gave the political leaders a problem to study, and an opportunity for scheming and manipulation. There is a saying among politicians, when an exciting and doubtful campaign is nearing its close, that politics are "red hot." This term expresses, as well as any words could the condition of the political atmosphere everywhere in the territory as soon as it became known that Burleigh and Toohey had entered the field in Laramie County. Public meetings at every hamlet and town were of daily and nightly occurrence, and politics certainly engrossed the attention of people generally. The Red River vote of one hundred and fifty to three hundred and the Wyoming vote of 2,000 were uncertain factors to those who were thought to have more than the ordinary insight into the outcome of a political campaign. The election in the territory was held on Tuesday, October 13th, and resulted in the choice of Mr. Spink for delegate, and the remainder of the republican nominees, and also in the election of a republican House of Representatives for the territory. The councilmen held over from 1867. The popular vote for delegate gave Spink 1,443; Toohey, 952; Todd, 828; Kidder, 553; Burleigh, 814. Total vote, 4,579, of which total the Wyoming country cast about 2,325. Spink carried Union, Clay, Yankton, Lincoln, Minnehaha, Bon Homme, Laramie, Carter and Pembina counties. Todd carried Charles Mix County. Todd County gave Burleigh eight and Kidder eight and the Crow Creek Indian Agency gave Kidder thirty-one and Todd one.

THE NATIONAL AND TERRITORIAL ELECTION

The presidential election was held on the 3d of November, and resulted in the election of the republican candidate, Grant and Colfax, by a large majority—the electoral vote standing 219 for Grant and Colfax, and eighty-five for Seymour and Blair. The states of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Iowa, California, Kansas, Nevada, Missouri, Minnesota, Tennessee, Arkansas, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina went republican. New York, New Jersey, Georgia, Maryland, Kentucky, Alabama and Louisiana went democratic. Virginia, Mississippi and Texas did not vote, not having at this time accomplished their work of reconstruction.

At this territorial election votes were cast in the following counties and precincts, showing the extent of the Territory of Dakota at that date, 1868:

THE TERRITORIAL OFFICIAL CANVASS

The territorial board of canvassers met on the 4th of December, 1868, and canvassed the vote for delegate to Congress and territorial officers. Under the law the board was composed of the governor, chief justice and secretary of the territory; but Mr. Spink having been a candidate was disqualified; Chief Justice Bartlett was absent holding court in Cheyenne so that Governor Faulk, the only other member, canvassed the vote alone, there being no contest with the following result: S. L. Spink, for delegate, 1,379 votes; J. P. Kidder, for delegate, 581 votes; J. B. S. Todd, for delegate, 644 votes; W. A. Burleigh, for delegate, 658 votes; D. J. Toohey, for delegate, 603 votes; Jeff. Davis had two votes; U. S. Grant, one, and Geo. M. McCarthy, two.

A large number of the votes cast in Carter County were not canvassed by the board, having been cast in unauthorized precincts. This will account for the discrepancy between the county returns and the official canvass, but disregarding this unauthorized vote made no difference with the general result. For territorial auditor, John Morris received 1,573 votes; E. B. Wixson, 557; M. Ryan, 384. For territorial treasurer, T. K. Hovey, 1,443 votes; M. K. Armstrong, 600; J. W. Turner, 374; and P. S. Wilson, 114. For superintendent of public instruction, T. McKendrie Stewart received 1,498 votes; A. Gore, 552; and James Keegan, 879.

Proclamation was made by the governor of the election of the successful candidates, and the election incident of 1868 was finally closed.

THE BUFFALO DIMINISHING

Mr. George Brown, of Yankton, has over forty years to his credit as a Dakotan, having settled here and engaged in business in the early '70s, though prior to that he had been employed on the steamboats traversing the upper river for a number of years. His parents were natives of France and Germany—Alsace and Lorraine—his father from the French province and his mother from the German. They came to America in 1847, and the following year George was born in Boone County, Kentucky, where the family had settled. His father shortly after removed to Covington, Kentucky, where George grew to be a lad fifteen years of age, when his parents removed again just across the Ohio River to the famous old City of Cincinnati, and there Mrs. Brown, his mother, is yet living, surrounded by at least a score of children and grand-children.

George began his industrial life in the kitchen of one of the Ohio River steamboats during the Civil war, and was so employed on the steamer Tycoon in 1863, at the time of the great battles of Pittsburgh Landing and Shiloh, where Grant, after a two days' battle won national fame for the final victory. The Tycoon was the first boat to get to Pittsburgh Landing before the battle was over, and took aboard a large number of the Union wounded, which she carried to the hospitals at Cincinnati.

In the spring of 1868 Mr. Brown engaged as steward on the Nellie Peck, a steamboat owned by Durfee and Peck, who at that time bought all the fur trading posts on the Missouri. The boat made one trip to Benton and returned to Sioux City, took on a cargo for a post or Indian agency at Grand River, and though the season was late, made the run and delivered the freight, then started down stream. The weather turned suddenly cold, and at Pocahtontas Island, about seventy-five miles above Fort Randall, the Nellie Peck was frozen fast in the ice and the passengers, officers and crew were obliged to walk to Fort Randall before they could secure conveyances to take them to their destination. The boat was placed in charge of Mr. Brown; he engaged to stay with her during the winter. His only companion was a young negro boy. The boat was moored to the island some distance from either shore, and right in the vicinity of large bands of Santee Indians, who had a reservation at Crow Creek, some distance above. Brown and his assistant fixed themselves as comfortably as they knew how, and patiently waited the advent of spring. The Santees furnished the only social entertainment during the winter, when occasionally a limited number were permitted to come aboard. The winter passed without exciting event, and in the spring a crew came up and assisted in releasing the boat without damage when the break up came.

Mr. Brown tells of an appalling destruction of buffalo from drowning in the spring. He believes there must have been hundreds of thousands of the animals lost from this cause. A vast herd attempted to cross to the south side of the river on the soft ice in early spring, some distance above Fort Buford, when the ice broke, and there was the most fearful and thrilling scrambling and bellowing, leaping and plunging that ever awoke the echoes of the Upper Missouri. The plains north and east of the Missouri had been covered with the animals during the winter, and when the herd started to cross in the spring, which was an annual occurrence with those that had wintered north of the stream, the column kept moving as buffalo invariably do when on the march, crowding those in front into the death-trap of broken ice until nearly the whole herd was destroyed; and the river for a long distance below was literally covered with their dead bodies. For weeks along the shores, for the distance of a hundred miles, the bodies of the drowned were washed up and piled in heaps where they decayed. Brown believes that it was one of the largest herds then in existence, and the diminution of the animal in such overwhelming numbers was remarked from that year. It will be recalled by the Dakotans of that day that the bison herds dwindled away abruptly and unexpectedly, which was attributed to Indians largely and to the white emigrants who were then pouring into the Idaho and Montana gold fields. No doubt there were large numbers killed by those parties, but the sudden and permanent disappearance of such a vast herd of old and young can not be accounted for by attributing it to emigrants or to Indians. The number thus taken would hardly have been observed at the time had not this catastrophe swept off such a multitude. This wholesale slaughter caused the breeding of myriads of mosquitoes, which for some years prior had been quite an annoyance to travel, no doubt due to a similar cause on a less extensive scale. The atmosphere was literally filled with them, and their buzzing was almost deafening. It was customary to station one or two attendants in the pilot house, who protected the person of the pilot, while he was engaged in his duty of guiding the vessel. Crew, passengers and officers all wore a guard over their persons when awake to protect them from the poisonous bite of the insect. Without such protection and vigilant defense, human life would have been endangered. The insects would have covered a body in such numbers, and poisoned it with their bites, that fatal injury would probably have resulted.

It was customary for these vast herds to cross the Missouri in the spring and fall. Several days might be occupied in their getting over at their usual leisurely pace. Steamboats occasionally ran into a herd thus engaged, and would be an entire day slowly picking its way through the swimming struggling mass. On such occasions the crew would be engaged in roping the calves within reach, and they would be hoisted aboard with a derrick and stabled. Mr. Brown relates one occasion when from twenty to twenty-five calves were thus secured which were taken down to Leavenworth and sold, and kept by the Kansas purchasers for breeding purposes.

It was in the years 1870-71 that men conversant with the matter gave out an apprehension that the bison or buffalo herds of the western plains were not increasing, but appeared to be diminishing. The animal as a rule herded in immense numbers on the most fertile portions of the plains. Dakota was a favorite pasture ground, extending south through Nebraska, Kansas and Texas. Buffalo were migratory, traversing the western plains from south to north and from north to south again, feeding as they journeyed. They did not appear to have been always governed by the season in their migrations for they were known to be traveling south in the spring and fall, and in other years traveling north during the same seasons. They may have been governed by an instinct in selecting the region which would afford the best pasturage. They were usually found in herds of many thousands, and occasionally in smaller numbers escorted by a patriarch bull of invincible courage. The location of the large herds was well known to scouts and Indian hunters, but inexperienced white men, even after diligent search, would fail to find their feeding ground.

In 1859, during the first rush to the newly discovered Colorado gold fields, Horace Greeley, the founder of the New York Tribune, visited Colorado and Pike's Peak which at that time, by the way, were a part of the Territory of Kansas. He went out by way of the Kansas River to Fort Riley and Junction City, where he took the overland coach for Denver, following a new route on the divide between the Smoky Hill and Republican rivers. The second day out the coach bearing the distinguished traveler found itself confronted by a vast herd of buffalo, slowly wending its way north. As far as the eye could see, above and below, the sluggish moving animals filled the prairie so completely that it appeared dangerous to attempt to drive through them. The driver waited patiently for twenty-four hours, and Mr. Greeley's impatience was more intense than the man in charge. Finally it was resolved to attempt to pass through the herd, which showed no diminution in numbers though constantly moving north; and amid great danger from being crushed, which would have followed had the herd stampeded, the coach was driven through in six hours—at an estimated average of one mile an hour, for frequent stops were made. The herd was therefore estimated to be six miles in breadth, without any data for measuring how far it extended either north or south; but an estimate of from twelve to fifteen miles was subsequently made by a party of hunters who had encountered the same herd.

Military officers stationed at many of the frontier forts severely criticised the wanton slaughter of the animals by emigrants who in large numbers were crossing the plains to Utah, Montana, Idaho, and Colorado, who it was claimed shot them just for sport, or for their tongues only. The danger element was very slight in hunting buffalo. The bulls would frequently turn on the hunters and show fight, but as a rule the animals were not inclined to combat. Experienced hunters claimed that there was no more danger encountered in riding into a herd of buffalo and shooting them, than would be met with in a like herd of domestic cattle, particularly Texas cattle.

The buffalo and catfish furnished subsistence to many thousands of Indians for many generations in the land of the Dakotas, while trappers, traders, emigrants and the parties composing Government expeditions in exploring the country in early days drew upon these sources of supply almost altogether while prosecuting their employment. They were an important, almost an all important, factor in the early settlement of the great West.

A CLOUDBURST

A very severe storm visited the settled portions of Dakota on the night of May 30, 1868. It was accompanied by a heavy rain, with what the settlers called cloudbursts, in spots, with some hail and a gale of wind that did a vast amount of damage. The storm covered the settled portion of Dakota from Fort Randall to Sioux City, and visited all the settlements along the Missouri Valley, continuing about seventeen hours. A number of buildings in Yankton were injured and the frame barn of the International Hotel, in which were a dozen horses was blown down but the animals escaped without injury. The gale lifted a heavy log from Colonel Moody's stable and drove it completely through the wall of his dwelling into the family sleeping room, but no one was injured. The dwelling was a frame building and the walls were filled in with chalk rock; was situated in the valley in the extreme northwest part of town. McIntyre and Allison lost 40,000 brick which had not been removed from their kilns. McIntyre also lost 35,000 feet of saw logs which had been rafted down the Missouri and were left over night in the river. The most remarkable result of the storm occurred on Choteau Creek, the western border of Bon Homme County.

A party of emigrants and freighters, having nine canvas-covered wagons, were encamped on the bank of the creek, asleep. One of the men was awakened by a loud roaring noise. He lifted the canvas and was amazed to behold a great wall of water coming down the creek, which he estimated was fifteen feet in height. The frequent flashes of lightning revealed this to him, and arousing his companions, they all fled to the near-by highland, but were overtaken by about three feet of water before they reached a secure retreat. Their wagons were all swept away and washed into the Missouri River, some three miles distant. Two trunks, containing each $1,000 in greenbacks, were taken with the wagons, but one trunk was recovered near the mouth of the creek, having been thrown ashore. This phenomenal storm deluge of water was probably the effect of a cloudburst, and it must have extended and covered over a wide area for seven miles away, east, was the valley of Emanuel Creek on the bank of which Mr. McDaniels, a pioneer settler, had recently built a substantial log dwelling and was occupying it with his family. A loud roaring sound, similar to that which awakened the party on Choteau Creek, and at the same hour, awakened the McDaniels family. One of the boys ran to the door, and by the lightning flashes, which were almost incessant, saw a great wall of water plunging down the creek valley. He instantly ran out, after arousing the family, closed the door, climbed to the roof of the cabin, the water having already crossed the cabin threshold and was rising "a foot a minute." He then climbed to the roof of the cabin, through which he tore an opening large enough to permit the members of the family to escape to the roof. The cabin was half filled with water before all had been rescued. There were three sons, two daughters, and Mr. and Mrs. McDaniels on the roof, and there they remained, pelted by the storm, until daylight, when the gale and rain diminished, but they were unable to get back into their dwelling until near evening. Their sufferings were indescribable, for they were cold, thinly clad, drenched with rain, hungry almost to famishing, and the mother and daughters nearly perished. Their nearest neighbor was miles away, and nearly everything in the house had been soaked with water. Fortunately the family had some experience in pioneering. A peculiar and novel feature of the storm in that locality was the discovery of a large number of dead pickerel along the banks of the creeks, a species of fish that had never been found in these waters, nor in any of the streams of the neighboring counties. From this circumstance and from the immense volume of water that poured down the creeks and deluged a large area of land it was conjectured that they had been visited by a water spout, an unusual storm upon the land, that had taken these fish from rivers or lakes farther east and deposited them on the Dakota frontiers.

A PROSPEROUS YEAR

Immigration to Dakota improved in 1868 and Union, Lincoln, Minnehaha, Clay and Yankton counties received a large number of new settlers who took up land. Bon Homme's rural population was also augmented—in fact Bon Homme had nothing but rural population, but being on the border of the Yankton Indian reserve, that had a tendency to deter the immigration of families. The estimates carefully made placed the population of the territory at 10,000, and it was claimed that the population had doubled during the preceding year of 1867 and 1868. Quite a large number of the discharged soldiers from the Union army came in. Lincoln and Minnehaha counties had also been attracting settlers, and when the census of 1870 was taken it was conceded that the estimate above referred to was made on a sound basis. Wyoming, or that portion of the territory then included in Laramie and Carter counties, was not included in the estimates of Dakota population, it being well understood that Wyoming's organization as a territory, which Congress had already provided for, would be completed in 1869.

The settlements north, east and west of Elk Point had grown rapidly for more than a year which added largely to the trade of the business center. At Fort Dakota (Sioux Falls), Charles K. Howard was supplying a growing population that was covering the vacant lands outside of the military reservation. At Canton, Wm. M. Cuppett & Company had built up a thriving trade in a few brief months. In Vermillion, McHenry and Compton were the leading merchants, and employed a large number of clerks and teamsters; they hauled large quantities of supplies from Sioux City which was the railway terminus, and shipped out the surplus grain of the farmers, which already amounted to thousands of bushels.

The business of Bramble & Miner, at Yankton, had grown remarkably and already amounted to hundreds of thousands annually. Moneyed men in the eastern states had begun to send their money to Dakota for investment, and the real estate market had more demands than it could readily supply. Town property brought as high, if not higher prices, at this time than a similar property could be bought for twenty years later.

CHAPTER XLIII LAST ANNUAL SESSION OF THE LEGISLATURE

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF 1868-69—INDIANS IN THE BIG SIOUX VALLEY—MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR—CONTESTED SEATS—FUTURE SESSIONS TO BE BIENNIAL—THE TERRITORY OF WYOMING—OPENING OF THE BLACK HILLS AGITATED—WOMAN SUFFRAGE DEFEATED—TO ABOLISH THE TERRITORY OF DAKOTA—DECREASE OF BUFFALO HAS APPALLING RESULTS; INDIANS SUFFER FOR FOOD—FRIGHTFUL MORTALITY CAUSED BY PRAIRIE FIRE—PRESIDENT JOHNSON'S AMNESTY PROCLAMATION—DELEGATE BURLEIGH'S FAREWELL SPEECH IN CONGRESS, ASKS JUSTICE FOR THE INDIAN—INDIANS SUFFER FROM PRAIRIE FIRE.

The eighth session of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota met at Yankton at the capitol building on the 7th day of December, A. D. 1868, at 12 o'clock M. The members of the House of Representatives met in their hall and proceeded to a temporary organization by the election of John L. Jolley, of Clay County, speaker, and George I. Foster, of Yankton County, chief clerk. The roll of members was then called as follows:

First District—Union County—G. P. Bennett, Calvin M. Brooks, John Clementson, J. T. Hewlett, Hiram Keith, R. T. Vinson. Second District—Clay County—N. G. Curtis, J. M. Eves, John L. Jolley, Lewis Larson, Joseph Moulin, Charles Ricker. Third District—Yankton County—Jacob Brauch, O. F. Haggin, A. W. Jamieson, Knud Larson, G. C. Moody. Fourth District—Bon Homme County—Alfred Abbott and James Keegan. Fifth District—Charles Mix County—Joseph LaRoche and M. H. Somers. Sixth District—Todd County—J. Shaw Gregory. Seventh District—Pembina County—Enos Stutsman. Eighth District—Laramie County—Charles D. Bradley.

The oath of office was administered by George H. Hand, United States attorney, whereupon the session was opened with prayer by Rev. Mr. Damon, of Union County, as follows:

Almighty God, thou hast created all things by the word of thy power, and in thy hand are the destinies of all created beings. We therefore approach thee and humbly ask thy blessings to rest upon this Assembly, which has met for the purpose of legislating for the good of our territory. Endue them with wisdom, that in all their deliberations they may have the glory of God and the good and prosperity of our country continually in view. May peace and harmony prevail and may we at last all be gathered to a home in Heaven, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The House then permanently organized by the election of G. C. Moody, of Yankton, speaker; Geo. I. Foster, of Yankton, chief clerk; Ed D. Barker, of Clay, assistant clerk; Edwin Gilham, of Union, enrolling clerk; Geo. W. Owens, Bon Homme, sergeant-at-arms; Andrew Erickson, of Clay, messenger; C. B. Larson, of Clay, fireman; Rev. J. C. Damon, Union, chaplain.

The usual committees to notify the Council and governor of the organization of the House were appointed, and the House then adjourned until 10 o'clock Tuesday morning, the 8th.

The members of the Council assembled in the Council chamber of the capitol building at the hour of 12 o'clock M., December 7, 1868, when the roll of members was called by George I. Foster, former secretary, as follows: Union County

R. R. Green, Geo. W. Kellogg, N. J. Wallace, Clay County—H. J. Austin, Aaron Carpenter, A. H. Hampton, Yankton County—W. W. Brookings, W. W. Benedict, Chas. H. McIntyre and Chas. F. Rosstenschier, Bon Homme County—Hugh Fraley, Charles Mix County—Absent, Todd County—J. A. Lewis.

The members of the Council, except N. J. Wallace, of Union, and the member from Charles Mix, had been elected in 1867, for two years, and had taken the oath of office at the session of 1867. Chief Justice Bartlett administered the oath of office to Mr. Wallace. Council then organized by electing the following officers: President, W. W. Brookings, Yankton; secretary, Amos F. Shaw, Minnehaha; assistant secretary, S. W. Smith, Clay; enrolling clerk, Adolph Maussch, Yankton; sergeant-at-arms, Iver Bagstad, Yankton; fireman, T. C. Edwards, Union; messenger, P. M. Huxington, Bon Homme; chaplain, Rev. M. Hoyt, Yankton.

The resignation of R. I. Thomas, of Charles Mix County, was presented by Mr. Austin, with the credentials of C. T. Campbell, who claimed to succeed him.

Mr. Benedict presented the credentials of Bligh E. Wood, also claiming to be the successor of Mr. Thomas. These credentials were all referred to the Committee on Elections which was then appointed by the president, consisting of Messrs. Hampton, Kellogg and Rosstenschier.

The customary committees were appointed by the president to notify the governor and House of the organization of the Council; when the Council adjourned until the 8th, at 10 o'clock A. M.

On the second day of the session, the two houses met in joint convention at 11 o'clock A. M. when Governor Faulk delivered his third annual message, as follows:

EXTRACTS FROM THE GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE

The governor, in his annual message to the Legislature, congratulates that body and the people because of the prosperous and peaceful year the territory has enjoyed, and then touches briefly upon the organization of the Territory of Wyoming as a measure of justice, and greatly advantageous to the people of Dakota as well as Wyoming. Then follows an interesting chapter on our Indian relations and the new Indian reserve policy, which the governor is not inclined to favor, as will be gathered from the following:

The condition of the Indian tribes in Dakota has remained the same, in relation to the white citizens, as during the previous year. They are still friendly and show marked signs of progress in point of education and civilization. The Ponca and Yankton Indians deserve especial commendation for their faithful adherence to treaty stipulations, and for their industry and energy in the efforts put forth to obtain their subsistence by the cultivation of the soil instead of by the chase. The trade of the Missouri River has met with but little interruption during the past year from those less civilized and less friendly Indians who roam through the northwestern portion of the territory.

Since your last meeting I have received two lengthy petitions from citizens of Union County asking that steps may be taken for the removal of certain Indians who occasionally encamp in the valley of the Big Sioux or its tributaries, for hunting or trapping purposes or in the course of their periodical travels across the territory. The complaint is chiefly, as I am informed, against the Santees, or Mississippi Sioux, whose temporary reservation is below the mouth of the Niobrara, in Nebraska, and whose past history in Minnesota is of such a character as naturally to inspire a feeling of alarm and insecurity among the settlers. So long as we have ample assurance that these Indians are friendly, and are confining themselves strictly to a harmless effort to obtain a subsistence by hunting, fishing or trapping on the unoccupied public lands, it seems to me that good policy as well as the principles of justice, require that they be treated leniently at least, if not with friendship. It is not the policy of the Government to pen the Indians, friendly ones, on the reservations, where at certain periods of the year they are in danger of starvation; but rather, in consideration of their poverty, and their uncivilized and unenlightened condition, to encourage them to make a peaceable effort to glean from the uninhabited prairies such subsistence as supply their temporary and simple wants. Yet the complaint of the inhabitants named is entitled to serious and respectful consideration not only from the executive and Legislature, but from the national Government as well. From the first settlement of these Minnesota Indians on our borders, we were led to believe that they were only placed there for a temporary purpose, and that they would soon be placed on a more permanent reservation, in some locality less dangerous and objectionable to the citizens, and more beneficial, because more settled and secure, for themselves. Up to the present time, however, nothing of importance has been done toward accomplishing so desirable an object. But now that the action and recommendations of the late Indian Peace Commission appear to have become the adopted policy of the Government, it is presumed that it would not be difficult, if an effort in that direction were properly made, to have these Indians removed to the new Indian district north of the Niobrara, and placed under the immediate supervision and control of General Harney, who, in the capacity of peace commissioner, is now engaged, and it is believed successfully, in endeavoring to inaugurate and put in practical force the policy indicated. Such an effort, if successful, would most likely relieve the inhabitants of this source of irritation and alarm, but which, if too long neglected, might involve us again in Indian conflicts, so disastrous and calamitous in its effects upon the newly formed settlements of this territory.

As intimated in my former message, that portion of Dakota lying west of the Missouri River, and between the Yellowstone on the north and the Niobrara on the south, has been set apart for the exclusive use and occupation of the various tribes of Indians who have heretofore occupied the Platte and Powder River countries, and for other tribes who may accept the terms proposed by the late Indian Peace Commission. In that message I stated my objections on behalf of the citizens of Dakota against the policy foreshadowed by the act of Congress of July, 1867, appointing this commission, which was supported by a suitable memorial from the Legislature; but, as it seems, without having received the favorable consideration from those who have in their hands, in a great measure, the control of our territorial destinies.

While it becomes our duty to acquiesce in the final decision of the federal authority, I see no reason to change the views I then expressed, as to the vast importance of the Black Hills country to the citizens who are destined to occupy this territory, or as to the fact that an Indian district which should embrace the minerals and pine timber of that region could not, in view of the past Indian history of this country, be a permanent one. Nevertheless, the decision is against us, and whatever chagrin or disappointment may be felt in consequence, we have but the alternative to submit and render a loyal obedience to those in authority over us. We should be willing to give the experiment a fair and impartial trial, and though it destroys for the present the brightest hopes yet entertained for the future of Dakota, it may not be altogether without its compensating benefits. If we lose the pine timber so much in demand on the Missouri slope, and the rich beds of mineral, the development of which, in our view, would have peopled that country with an industrious and enterprising population, we will gain additional markets for our merchandise, our stock and our grain by the location and feeding of additional bands of Indians in the valley of the Missouri. It will stimulate the raising of stock and the production of cereals required by this new demand upon our industry and our enterprise. It will be, of itself, no small inducement to immigration to all such as design to live by agricultural labor, and will no doubt encourage those who have already opened up farms to increase the amount of land now under cultivation. And again—the removal of the heretofore hostile Indians by treaty from the new Pacific Railroad to the district named, where they are to be guaranteed absolute freedom from molestation and the withdrawal of the military posts from the Powder River valley, would seem to assure the citizens of Dakota that prospect of quietude and exemption from Indian troubles which our first settlers did not possess, but which are so essential to our rapid growth in population and to our permanent prosperity as a people. Our first and most manifest necessity is peace, and probably we now need nothing more clearly than such perfect assurance of security from Indian wars and Indian alarms as these latest arrangements would seem to promise. Let this confidence once take possession of the public mind, and the tide of immigration thitherward will be increased ten fold over what it has been even through the year that is passed. Such considerations furnish us our present and prospective compensation for the loss of the most promising and most valuable portion of this territory. In the meantime we may indulge in the faith that a more favorable day will yet dawn upon us, and at no remote period, when, with the consent of the Government and the Indian tribes, and without war, we may, like the Israelites of old, "go in and possess the land."

Since your last meeting no further important steps have been taken to secure the building of the railroads for which charters have already been granted, except to lay the subject before Congress and ask for land grants to aid in their construction. Congress, it is believed, looks upon these improvements with favor, and we may therefore hope to obtain the aid required at no distant day. Their construction would bring us within easy communication with the markets of the East, so essential to the proper encouragement of agricultural development, and would be the means of bringing to our vicinity, at moderate prices, the pine lumber of Minnesota. In the advocacy and advancement to completion of these great territorial enterprises we should act as a unit, and no local jealousies or conflict of individual interests should be allowed to stand in the way of their perfect success. Their commencement and completion are only a question of time. And that we are on the line of a continuous road soon to be built across the continent by way of the valley of the Missouri, more highly favored by natural advantages than the Union Pacific, and of scarcely less national or local importance when completed, is a fact which has impressed itself on the minds of some of the most intelligent and practical men of the East. One great incentive to the construction of such a work is the hazardous nature of the navigation of the Missouri. The heavy losses to the Government and to individuals annually occurring from this cause, and which are annually on the increase in proportion to the increase of trade, are even now bringing sagacious capitalists and statesmen to reflect upon the comparative speed, safety and economy of railroad transportation up the valley of the Missouri.

In conclusion, I most humbly invoke upon your deliberations the aid of that Divine Power which controls human governments, to the end that your legislative acts may conduce to the honor and welfare of the territory.

A. J. FAULK.

Yankton, December, 1868.

Mr. Bradley, of Laramie, introduced the first bill in the House; an act to provide for the organization of Laramie City.

The first bill introduced in the Council was by Mr. Rossteuscher; an act to define the qualifications for holding office in the Territory of Dakota; and No. 2, by the same councilman, to authorize the commissioners of Yankton County to raise money for the construction of the jail.

Mr. Brookings gave notice of a joint resolution relating to an appropriation for the survey of a canal from Yankton to the Big Sioux River, thence up the Rock River to the northern boundary of the State of Iowa, thence east to the Mississippi River.

On the fifth day the Committee on Elections in the Council made their report on the contest between Campbell and Wood. A majority of the committee, Messrs. Rossteuscher and Hampton reported that neither of the claimants was entitled to the seat, but made no recommendations. Mr. Kellogg, the minority reported that neither of said claimants was entitled to the seat, as no vacancy existed at the time of the election, and that B. E. Wood, one of the claimants resided on an Indian reservation, and was therefore ineligible. Mr. Kellogg desired that the seat be declared vacant. The Council refused to adopt Mr. Kellogg's report, whereupon Mr. Brookings moved to admit Mr. B. E. Wood on the ground that C. T. Campbell was a federal office holder, and disqualified thereby from holding a seat in the Legislature. Mr. Brookings' motion was adopted, and Mr. Wood was sworn in.

On the eighth day Mr. Brookings tendered his resignation as president of the Council, on the ground that he believed he could accomplish more for his constituents by occupying a seat on the floor; that he could not feel free to enter into the debates while presiding, and felt that he had already trespassed too much in that respect. His resignation was accepted and N. J. Wallace, of Union County, was elected president.

The bill to incorporate Laramie City, also to create the counties of Albany and Carbon, also in the Wyoming country were the first laws enacted.

Mr. Stutsman, who now represented Pembina County in the House, introduced a bill conferring the right of suffrage upon women over eighteen years of age.

The seat of A. J. Abbott, a House member from Bon Homme County, was contested by Mr. Robinson. The Committee on Elections, after investigation, reported in favor of Abbott, he having received one vote more than Robinson. The report was adopted, and Mr. Abbott retained the seat.

The reports of the territorial auditor, treasurer and superintendent of public instruction were made to the Legislature. There was remarkable harmony prevalent among the members of this Legislature. There seemed to be general agreement regarding all the measures introduced, with two or three exceptions, and the differences on the woman's suffrage bill and the prohibition bill were discussed good naturedly, leaving the inference that they were not considered measures of prime importance at the time, though the women professed to be disappointed at the unfavorable action of the Council on their suffrage bill, after they had succeeded in getting it through the House.

This Legislature adjourned, sine die, on Friday, the 15th of January, 1869. The next session would not meet until December, 1870, Congress having enacted a biennial session law for all the territories. The new Territory of Wyoming would take away from Dakota in the meantime the counties of Laramie, Carter, Albany and Carbon leaving the Territory of Dakota without a Union Pacific Railroad, or a railroad of any name or kind. A partial list of the measures passed at this eighth session follows:

An act fixing the time of holding the Supreme Court; to grant permits to establish ferries on the Red River of the North outside the limits of organized counties; to provide for opening, vacating and change of highways; authorizing the commissioners of Clay County to build a bridge across the Vermillion River, and levy a tax therefor; concerning territorial roads; to provide schools for the Territory of Dakota; to encourage the planting and growing of timber; to provide for the partition of lands; to prevent the firing of woods, marshes and prairies; an act concerning revenue; to establish a code of criminal procedure; for the relief of the poor; to attach certain parts of Dakota Territory to the Second Judicial District; to protect the citizens of Dakota and elevate the medical profession; to provide for the payment of certain territorial warrants; defining the action of mandamus and prescribing the practice; authorizing the levy of a tax in each county for bridges; to amend the fence law; to provide for the service of process in counties where no courts are held; fixing the time for the territorial auditor and treasurer to make their annual reports; to incorporate the City of Yankton.

MEMORIALS

To establish a United States land office in the Red River Valley; for a grant of land to the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad from Sioux City up the Missouri Valley; protesting against the transfer of Indian bureau to the war department; to U. S. Grant, asking that W. W. Brookings be appointed governor of Dakota; for an additional land district on the Missouri River in Dakota; praying for the removal of Fort Dakota at Sionx Falls; to construct a wagon road down the Red River of the North from Fort Abercrombie; to the President relative to the Pembina Indians; for a grant of land to the Yankton and Columbus (Neb.) Railroad; asking relief for certain destitute Indians; for a grant of land to the Minnesota and Missouri River Railroad Company; for a survey of the vacated portion of the Fort Randall military reserve.

A bill was passed repealing the charter of the Dakota and Northwestern Railway; but was vetoed by the governor.

The bill introduced by Mr. Stutsman, conferring the right of suffrage upon Dakota women was passed by the House, but defeated in the Council—7 to 6. A bill introduced in the House by Mr. Brooks to prohibit the sale of spirituous liquors in the territory passed that body but was defeated in the Council.

TERRITORIAL FINANCES

The territorial treasurer submitted a report on December 31, 1868, to the Legislature, as also did I. T. Gore, territorial auditor. Among other matters discussed by Mr. M. K. Armstrong, who was the treasurer, was the Indian war debt of 1862. He said:

I desire to call the attention of the Legislature to the Indian war warrants of 1862 amounting to $10,320.05. It is believed that if the Legislature would memorialize Congress on this matter, an appropriation could be secured from the Federal Government to reimburse the territory for that necessary and timely supply of men, material and subsistence in defending this frontier against the devastations of the hostile Sioux. [Two years later Armstrong was elected delegate to Congress and succeeded in getting the appropriation he mentions for a larger amount.—Ed.]

Receipts by territorial treasurer for 1868:

Yankton County, of Michael Fisher, county treasurer.....	$168.98
Union County, of Wm. Searls, county treasurer.....	184.25
Clay County, of Ole Bottolfsen, county treasurer.....	100.39
Bon Homme County, no report.....
Charles Mix County, of county treasurer.....	20.17
Balance in treasury.....	$ 5.25
Estimates for 1869:
Yankton County	$ 491.59
Union County	202.72
Clay County	138.33
Bon Homme County	47.18
Amount warrants outstanding	$139.75
Estimated expenditures, 1869	600.00
Territorial tax levied.....	949.94
Estimated balance over expenditures	210.59

TO ABOLISH THE TERRITORY OF DAKOTA

An effort to abolish the territories of Dakota and Utah, by repealing their organic acts was made by Congressman Ashley, of Ohio, in January, 1869. His bill proposed to segregate Dakota, and attach the northern half to Minnesota and the southern portion to Nebraska. It was thought at the time that Ashley's move was not based upon any patriotic motive but was rather the result of personal animosity toward some of the leading men in Dakota. It is not even probable that the author of the bill had any hope of passing it, or that there were a dozen congressmen who could have been brought to favor it so far as Dakota was interested, but with Utah and the prevailing antagonism to polygamy, the sentiment was undoubtedly different. Still the audacity of the proposition and the disaster that it foreboded to the settlers of Dakota, created an uneasiness in the minds of our people. Mr. Ashley's alleged reasons for desiring the destruction of political Dakota were based on the general worthlessness of the territory as an agricultural region, incapable of supporting an agricultural population, arid, a grass-hopper land; and must for a century at least be the habitation of our Indian tribes. Mr. Ashley was a prominent member of Congress at the time, with considerable influence which occasioned quite an apprehension in the minds of many Dakotans that he might press the measure through the House, and thus, by implication, convey to the people of the country a suspicion that Dakota was a worthless region and its independence as a territory and future state seriously threatened. This might have alarmed the emigrant and turned him into other western sections; it would also have kept away eastern capital which was very much needed. This may have been the extent of Ashley's purpose at the time, for there was not the slightest probability that his nefarious measure could be passed through the Senate, or that the President would sign it. Public meetings were held at Vermillion, Yankton, Bon Homme, Elk Point and Canton that were called "indignation meetings," and Mr. Ashley as well as his bill was denounced in the most vigorous pioneer language. It would have been imprudent, at least, for Ashley to have shown himself in Dakota at that time. At these various meetings, resolutions were adopted setting forth what had been accomplished in Dakotan development; in securing immigration; the physical features of the territory that would be a barrier to the proposed change and other objections enumerated. These were sent to Washington and Mr. Burleigh, the delegate who presented them, made an excellent speech in opposition to the bill. Congress adjourned on the 4th of March and the Ashley bill was not even reported by the committee and no further effort was even made to revive the ignoble and unpatriotic measure.

In connection with this bill for the abolition of Dakota Territory, the following remarks on the subject of the integrity of territorial governments, Dakota in particular, were submitted to the House on the 22d of February, 1860, by Hon. Walter A. Burleigh, who was the delegate from Dakota Territory at that time:

Mr. Speaker: In presenting the memorials and remonstrances of the citizens of Dakota against the passage of the bill reported to this House by the chairman of the Committee on Territories, which provides for the immediate destruction of Dakota and contemplates the annihilation of Utah at an early day, I will say that, in my judgment, it is one of the most unjust and impolitic measures that has ever been reported by a committee for the consideration of Congress. Unwise in its inception, as it will be found cruel and oppressive in its operation towards the people of the territories, I think this House cannot fail to see what I know to be true—that its inevitable tendency will be the destruction of all confidence in the future action of Congress, by rendering insecure the rights and privileges of our citizens after having been guaranteed by organic laws. None of the rights and immunities which Congress guaranteed to the people of Dakota when it gave to them a territorial organization; none of the privileges which they acquired under their organic law, or which have been conferred upon them by local legislation had in conformity to that law, are by this bill respected in the slightest degree; on the contrary, they are utterly ignored, while the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories, for himself and his colleagues, in the blindest and most deliberate manner, proposes to reduce to a state of vassalage the whole population of a great territory, in extent four times as large as the State of Ohio, by this most extraordinary and despotic act. Has it really come to this, that Congress will allow any one man to arrogate to himself and exercise the high prerogative of devising schemes for changing the boundaries of sovereign states and annihilating the great territorial organizations of the country at his own imperious will and pleasure? When before in the history of our national legislation has anything of this character been undertaken or thought of even? Never. So far from it, the boast of the American citizen has ever been that the safeguards of liberty are the common inheritance of all, the weak as well as the strong, the poor as well as the rich.

In 1861 the Territory of Dakota was organized by a solemn act of Congress. Emigration was invited there by that act. From almost every state in the Union people flocked to that new territory, settled upon its fertile lands, established their homes, and became law-abiding citizens. The Government guaranteed them protection; they in return rendered to the Government a loyal obedience. Owing to the distracted condition of the country and to the almost continuous Indian wars which raged within our borders, our growth was slow, but steady and permanent. Our Legislature met, and in strict conformity with the organic law which Congress gave us, we established our courts of justice, located our capital, and erected our public buildings by private enterprise, for Congress refused to build them for us as had been done for other territories, we believing that the plighted faith of this Government was a reality and not a mere myth. But, sir, how great is our disappointment! We are met here today, after having removed to these territories with our families and property, after having spent years of toil there, and suffered privation and want, and are stunned by the heartless proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, which proposes nothing less than the utter annihilation of our territorial organizations, the bankruptcy of our most enterprising citizens, and blasting of all our bright hopes of the future. These will be the inevitable consequences of the passage of this bill so far as Dakota is concerned.

By the organic act of March 2, 1861, creating the territorial government of Dakota, Congress provided for a republican form of government, having all the guarantees of the Federal Constitution and of said organic act. The Legislative Assembly had power under the twelfth section of said act "to locate and establish the seat of government for said territory," and it was located and established at Yankton in the spring of 1861—a point most eligible for such purpose. The government for the territory thus authorized became fully organized in the year 1861, and the citizens of other states emigrated to the new territory in large numbers upon the faith of the organic act. Then they purchased lands and erected buildings, imported flocks and herds, put up large and valuable improvements at Yankton, the capital, for the use of the federal officers and the Legislative Assembly. The people who came into the territory established their homes and made improvements with especial reference to the location of the capital, the establishment of the territorial roads and highways, and the location of a railroad from Yankton to Sioux City, connecting with all the lines north of the Ohio River leading to the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans. The population of Dakota has now reached more than twenty thousand souls, and the value of their improvements and property of all kinds amounts to many millions of dollars. The value of the buildings and much of the real estate depends upon the continuance and preservation of the territorial government under its organic act until the people shall apply to become a state, and all the improvements in the territory were made upon the faith of the express declaration and promise on the part of the Federal Government that the people should be guaranteed a republican form of government, with a fixed capital, established roads, highways schools, and other advantages arising from a government of the people under said organic act and the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Whether it be considered by this House good law or not, I accept as good common sense the principle that this organic act, connected with the settlement of a considerable portion of the territory and the full organization of the government under it, creates a solemn compact between the United States and the people of Dakota that they shall be protected in the peaceful enjoyment of that government so established until Dakota becomes a state of this Union. To destroy that government and annihilate Dakota by attaching a portion of its lands and people to Nebraska, and another portion of its lands and people to Minnesota, would be as great a political outrage as the partition of Poland. Pass this bill, and at one blow 50 per cent in value of all their improvements would be lost, and the people would be subjected to state taxation by two states for debts which they had no voice in contracting. To what end had these pioneers on the outposts of civilization fought the savages, the wild beasts, and endured all the hardships of such a life, if the plighted faith of the Government is to be broken, as this bill proposes, and they are to be transferred as vassals and serfs to other state governments without their consent?

When Congress passed that organic act and opened up Dakota's broad prairies to settlement, it extended a free and general invitation to the people of all the states and territories "to go in and possess the land." With that invitation the Federal Government guaranteed full and ample protection of life, liberty and property to every law-abiding citizen who should go there. There was an implied and an express contract entered into on the part of the United States with the citizens of Dakota that they should be protected in the enjoyment of every privilege, in the free exercise of every civil and political right, among the chief of which was the form of government created by the organic law. The people of Dakota have performed and fulfilled all the duties and conditions imposed upon them by this organic act; their rights have become vested and perfected under the common assent of all departments of the Government, and ever since the creation of the Federal Constitution there is not to be found a single instance of the destruction of an organized territorial government by act of Congress. From these territorial governments all of our states, except the original thirteen, have sprung, and the assent of all administrations for eighty-five years past, and of every Congress since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, in this uniform process of creating territorial governments that afterward became states, is conclusive against the nefarious object and design of this bill, to inaugurate a plan for the destruction of governments without the consent of the people, who are the only true source of political power. What necessity is there for this assault upon the people of Dakota? Who asks for it? No one except the Committee on Territories in this house. No one is to be benefited by it. Why, then, is the national faith to be broken, this Congress to be dishonored, and the people of that territory to be beggared, as will be the case if this bill becomes a law? The people of the territories which this bill seeks to destroy do not ask for this unprecedented legislation, nor do the states to which the dismembered and mutilated fragments are to be attached ask for it. It comes in here upon the sole motion of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories, who insists that the sins of the inhabitants of Utah, like the blood of murdered Abel, "cryeth unto him from the ground" for vengeance, and that Utah must be wiped out from the map of the nation on account of the sinful practices of its people and the anti-republican teachings of its prophets. But, sir, the destruction of Utah is not a sufficient sacrifice; it is too small a sin offering for the cause and the occasion. The close of the gentleman's term of most valuable and meritorious service in this House is too important an event to be allowed to pass unnoticed and unchronicled. With Utah, Dakota also is marked for destruction, for annihilation. This great territory of more than one hundred and seventy thousand square miles is to be blotted from the map of the nation. Not, however, for sins committed or sins conceived, not for anti-republican teachings or anti-republican tendencies, but for the all-important and vital purpose of making a prettier national map, just to please the scholars, and perhaps for the further purpose of turning over to Nebraska that portion of the territory lying south of the Missouri River which has recently been set apart for the use of the Sioux Indians, whose presence will require large supplies and heavy disbursements of money. It is not to be suspected that the remote prospect of a seat in the United States Senate from an adjacent territory has had anything to do with this plan to destroy Dakota and enlarge the boundaries of Montana and Wyoming. But wherein is the beauty of the national map improved even? Look at it and you will find its boundary lines extended, with all the angles, triangles and distortions that the science of geometry can devise. The sutures of a monkey's cranium are symmetrical when compared with them, while its improvement is as difficult to comprehend as is the wisdom or justice of the measure here proposed. What a luminous ideal. How pregnant with every principle of profound statesmanship is his wonderful conception of territorial reform. Does any person regard the necessity of a pretty map with beautiful lines and multitudinous angles as paramount to the maintenance of national faith in standing by the guarantees of protection to life, liberty, and property which this Government has pledged to the citizens, or for a moment suppose that by congressional action vice can be eradicated from the nation, or from a state, or from a territory even? As well might you attempt to legislate the sun from the heavens or banish from the hearts of men by legislative power their natural fondness for the fair sex—a slight excess of which appears to be the sole cause of Utah's present discomfiture. There must be some other cause for this extraordinary proceeding, although I am compelled to admit that I have failed to discover it. It cannot be supposed that political combinations are being made by which new capitals are to supersede old ones regardless of the interests and without a word of consultation with the parties for whom Congress has already conceded this right.

But, sir, if the reasons which have been urged by the gentleman for the dismemberment of Dakota are valid and worthy the consideration of this Congress, why, I ask, have they been allowed to slumber so long? Why were they not urged at the time of its territorial organization? If they really exist now with our rapidly increasing population, accumulated wealth and multitudinous interests, how much more did they exist then? With how much more force and propriety might they have been pressed before the Congress of the nation breathed into its organization the breath of political life? Why this strange and unparalleled neglect in the discharge of this great public duty by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Territories? Has it not been his special province for many years past, rather, to care for the feeble, uphold the weak, and wait upon the great mother of territories and states, to sit by her bedside during the tedious hours of travail and administer to her his own favorite "maternal relief" as she brought forth these children of promise, two of whom the venerable accoucheur now desires Congress to slaughter, cut up, and throw their mutilated remains to two older and two younger members of the same family.

Is there any good reason for the extraordinary action here proposed? Is there anything unnatural? Is there any deformity in the case of these two offsprings of one common parent, both of whom have grown up under the scrutinizing eye and nursing care of the gentleman from Ohio? Does their vigorous youth in any way threaten the safety of our national family, its prosperity, or the extension of its power? Nothing of the kind is pretended, and I entreat him to exercise those parental virtues, patience, forbearance and nursing care which will do much toward removing the evils complained of, to abandon his rash design, to stay his "uplifted hand and outstretched arm," and not strike the murderous blow which he has so deliberately aimed at these two children of the great mother of states.

But, sir, if the inhabitants of Utah have sinned by adopting the patriarchal custom of polygamy, which is in opposition to the civilized and Christian system of monogamy, and if this alleged sin can only be expiated by depriving that territory of political life, I must solemnly protest, in the name of the loyal and free people of Dakota, in the name of my country, whose honor it seeks to destroy, against the right of this Congress or any other power beneath God's shining sun, to impute to them the crimes of the polygamists of which they are not guilty, or to punish them for transgressions which they have never committed. A more loyal, patriotic and law-abiding people than my constituents of Dakota cannot be found in the Union. During the late war they gave as large a proportion of their male population to the Union cause as any other territory. They organized their own troops to protect the inhabitants of Dakota and the frontiers of Iowa, Nebraska and Minnesota, from Indian depredations. They pursued a policy so wise and conciliatory toward the Indian tribes as to enable them to organize and equip a considerable Indian force that has always proved faithful and efficient in defense of the inhabitants of that territory against the hostile Indian tribes surrounding it. They challenge the scrutiny of the Committee on Territories in regard to the faithful manner in which the territorial government of Dakota has been administered. For economy, efficiency, and just policy, I know of no better example in the republic. While the whole southwestern and southern portion of our domain is in a blaze of Indian war that is costing the nation at the rate of $40,000,000 a year, peace and tranquility reign uninterruptedly throughout Dakota under the wise and conciliatory policy pursued by her people in their dealings with the savages.

And now, sir, I appeal to this honorable body and ask if you will sanction, by your approval, a measure so fraught with injustice, bad faith, illegal and unconstitutional oppression and wrong as this bill? If the principles of justice and equity yet linger within this legislative hall, where the representatives of the people meet and exercise the sovereign power of this nation; if the binding force of the official oath still retains its solemn obligations; if, while so much time is spent in reconstructing states, it would be unwise to inaugurate a system for the destruction of organized territories, I ask that you will withhold your approval from this measure, so fraught with ruin, disaster and oppression to the loyal people of Dakota, whose vested rights and political existence it aims to destroy.

BURLEIGH'S VIEWS ON THE CONDUCT OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

The reader of this book has become somewhat acquainted with Hon. Walter A. Burleigh, the most prominent and for a time the most influential citizen in the affairs of the territory. He has been seen as an Indian agent, a citizen, a man of affairs, a politician, a philanthropist, and a delegate in Congress, but he has not revealed himself in his public addresses. Mr. Burleigh, while he did not excel as an orator, was an interesting speaker and spoke frequently during the political campaigns of his day at the different centers of population in the territory, but no record was made of his speeches. He never failed to have a numerous audience.

An occasion, however, when he was at liberty to express his views on the Indian policy of the Government, while holding his seat as delegate to Congress in the closing days of the session of 1868-69, came up in the House on February 9th, the Indian appropriation bill being under consideration, and the contest outside as well as inside of Congress, at that time being between the advocates of the "peace policy," so-called, and their opponents, the army policy defenders (though both factions were the avowed friends of peace, but differed radically in their methods of securing it).

Mr. Burleigh was entitled from experience and from study to speak somewhat authoritatively on this subject. It is due to him and to the untutored people whose welfare he was untiring in promoting that his views regarding the Indian policy should be understood by the people of Dakota whom he represented. His remarks on this subject were made in the House, February 27, 1869, and are here given in part, the purpose being to show his position with reference to the general policy of the government and the manner in which its stewardship of the Indian's interest had been discharged. This was his farewell speech in Congress.

Mr. Burleigh opened his remarks by showing that the Government had no well defined policy for the government of Indians; he then contrasted the national solicitude for the imported African with its oppression and cruelty towards the aboriginal inhabitants of our country, and speaking of the wrong inflicted on the Indian, he said:

We have driven the Indians from their homes without compensation and without mercy. We have wrested from them the title to their lands by pretended, or at least, ostensible purchase. We have withheld the payments until they were comparatively valueless, or refused them altogether on unfounded pretexts. We have paid them in depreciated currency when we agreed by solemn treaty to pay them in gold and silver; we have paid them in worthless trash when we promised them the money for their lands; we have defrauded the Indians in the fulfillment of our stipulations for their clothing and food and their agricultural, mechanical and educational advancement; we have failed to afford them our promised protection against the worse than barbarous whites which infest their settlements; we have hunted them down and murdered them like wild beasts of the forest; and what is worse than all these, our people have polluted every tribe in the land by poisoning the fountain of life from which the Indian springs with the most loathsome of diseases, more poisonous and destructive to the race than the sting of the scorpion, the bite of the serpent, or the leprosy of old; we have, in a word, violated every feature of our plighted faith in regard to them, and have seen them degenerate, suffer, and perish under our positive oppression or cruel neglect, while we have held them to the severest accountability for all the pledges of obedience and good behavior which we have extorted from them in our treaty negotiations. Our official records will fully substantiate all these allegations, disgraceful and humiliating as they are to our national pride and honor.

The speaker then reviewed the treaties which had been made with the Creeks, Cherokees, Delawares, and other tribes during the early days of our republic, showing in nearly every instance fraud and deceit on the part of the agents of the Government, both in securing the treaties and in carrying out their stipulations, and the record proved further that the Government itself had violated its pledges to the Indians in almost every instance. A striking example of the faithlessness of the Government toward the Delawares was then related, as follows:

In the darkest hour of our Revolutionary war with Great Britain, when our forefathers were struggling for life against the gigantic power and vast resources of the mother country, the proud mistress of the ocean, a flickering ray of hope was shed on the gloom overshadowing their cause by two treaties of alliance made with the United States, one on the part of France and the other on the part of the Delaware Nation, both of them concluded with great solemnity and ratified by acts of Congress in 1778. Great Britain had subsidized the six nations, the Mohawks, the Iroquois, and other tribes, and armed them to aid the troops of the crown in their efforts to defeat the Colonial forces. The emissaries of George III had circulated reports among the Indian tribes that the United States designed to extirpate the Indians and take possession of their country; and it was necessary to pledge the faith of the Government to the Delawares by that solemn treaty so as to arrest the disasters of the war and secure the aid and cooperation of that powerful nation. On the 17th of September, 1778, said treaty was concluded at Fort Pitt under the title of "Articles of Agreement and Confederation," made and entered into by Andrew and Thomas Lewis, Esqrs, commissioners for and in behalf of the United States of one part, and Captain White Eyes, Capt. John Killbuck, Jr., and Captain Pipe, deputies and chief men of the Delaware Nation of the other part. By this treaty all former offenses were mutually forgiven, and perpetual peace and friendship declared to subsist between the United States and the Delaware Nation from thenceforth through all succeeding generations; a perpetual alliance, offensive and defensive, declared; an engagement on the part of the Delawares to aid the United States by furnishing their best and most expert warriors, to permit the United States troops to pass through the lands of the Delaware Nation; to supply the Colonial troops with corn, meat, horses, and everything else within their power. And in order that the old men, women and children should be protected while their warriors were battling for their own liberties and the liberties of our fathers, the United States agreed to build a fort to shelter and defend them against the dreaded attacks of the Mohawks and the Six Nations, and garrison with United States troops, if any could be spared.

The fourth article provides for the administration of justice by impartial trials before judges or juries of both parties, according to the laws, customs, and usages of the contracting parties, and for the surrender and delivery of criminal fugitives, servants and slaves escaping from the respective states of the Delaware Nation and the United States.

The fifth article declares that the confederation entered into by the Delaware Nation and the United States renders the Indians dependent on us for clothing, equipments and munitions of war; to provide for which an Indian trading agent is to be appointed by the United States, with an adequate salary, whose chief aim is to be the advancement of the mutual interests of the confederating parties.

The sixth article recites that "The enemies of the United States have endeavored by every artifice in their power to possess the Indians in general with the opinion that it is the design of the states aforesaid to extirpate the Indians and take possession of their country. To obviate such false suggestions the United States do guarantee to the aforesaid nation of Delawares and their heirs all their territorial rights in the fullest and most ample manner, as it hath been bounded by former treaties, as long as they, the said Delaware Nation, shall abide by and hold fast the chain of friendship now entered into. And it is further agreed between the contracting parties, should it be found conducive to the mutual interests of both parties, to invite any other tribes who have been friends to the interests of the United States, to join the present confederation and form a state whereof the Delaware Nation shall be the head and have a representation in Congress."

By the law of nations this treaty bound the United States to protect the rights thus guaranteed to the Delaware Nation. The territorial right of eminent domain to a state as large as Pennsylvania was expressly conceded to the Delawares by this treaty. It was under these promises and guarantees that the most expert and best warriors of that nation went forth to battle for the cause of liberty for themselves and our forefathers. Many of the best scouts were drawn from the warriors of the Delawares. Six hundred effective warriors were furnished General Washington by this devoted tribe during one season. The United States and the Delawares were both fighting on the same issue—for independence from the British crown and of all the world. The brave warriors of the Indian Nation fought our battles; the tribe supplied our troops with food and horses; we paid them in continental money, unredeemed specimens of which remain among the Delawares to this day; the War of Independence closed with a halo of glory; the celebrated Delaware chief, Hengue Pushees, had won the rank of lieutenant-colonel for his courage, daring and efficiency as a scout. He was gratefully thanked by General Washington for his invaluable services in the War of the Revolution; and this red hero, with his brave followers, went home to their wigwams to prepare for the admission of their state into the Union.

Where are they now? Alas, their braves are no more; their hearts have been broken by our ingratitude, by our base refusal to keep our treaty stipulations. On the 21st of January, 1785, they removed with the Wyandotts to Ohio and Indiana; this is to be the new state promised them. On the 9th of January, 1786, a part of the land ceded is taken away; on the 3d of August, 1795, many of the Indian tribes are placed on the Delaware lands; in June, 1803, their boundaries are diminished; on the 18th of August, 1804, they surrender more of their lands; on the 4th of July, 1805, a new boundary is established, and on the 21st of August, 1805, the Delawares release to the United States a portion of their lands; on the 3d of September, 1809, another cession is made to the United States, commissioners pretended that the lands allotted to the Delawares and Wyandotts belonged to the Miamies; on the 22d of July, 1814, the war with Great Britain induced us to make a second war treaty with the Delawares to procure their aid and to make a second faithless promise to establish the boundaries of their lands forever; on the 8th of September, 1815, the United States recognized the fidelity of the Delawares in taking up the tomahawk and going on the war path in defense of their unselfish allies of the pale faces; on the 3d of October, 1818, they ceded all their lands in Indiana, the Ohio lands having been ceded before. They removed to the White River in Missouri and Arkansas, and on the 24th of September, 1820, they are removed to the lands between the Kansas and the Missouri rivers, and a broken fragment of the nation that had gone to Cape Girardeau, in 1793, where they had received a grant from the Spanish governor for lands west of the Missouri in Kansas. But they are to hold these Kansas lands forever; this was to be their last removal. The boundaries were fixed by two large rivers, and the other two lines made the square complete which they were to hold forever. They were now happy; they had made great progress in agriculture and manufactures; in the raising of horses, sheep and cattle; and another fragment of the nation had been removed from a fertile, beautiful tract of land on the Sandusky River to a permanent home in Kansas, under the promise that the Delaware Nation should thereby be united under one head, and that thirty-six sections of land should be appropriated for the establishment of schools for the education of the Delaware children.

Where are these brave Delawares now? They have been driven from this last permanent home down near the Canadian River, and a pitiful tract of eighteen miles square is all the territory that remains for this once mighty nation which was to form a state; to have representation in Congress; to hold the vast lands held by them in 1778 by fixed boundaries as an independent state. That pitiful tract of eighteen miles square of land would hardly furnish sepulture for the heroes of that nation who have sacrificed their lives in battle in two great wars, and for the martyrs of that nation whose blood has been shed and whose hearts have been broken by the tyranny, ingratitude and cruelty of this magnanimous Government, whose Christian mission has been proudly proclaimed to the world to be to protect, nourish, cherish, civilize, educate and defend these wards and pupils of American civilization. With the history of this Indian nation before us, these friends of William Penn, these allies and soldiers of George Washington, these allies and soldiers of General Harrison, will not again be disturbed in their new home until some adjoining marauding band of pale-faced robbers covet it and apply to the Government of the United States to further protect, cherish and befriend their ancient allies, the Delawares, by driving them back to the waste of the American desert, where they will perish of hunger and furnish a poor repast for the prairie wolves.

History teaches us that retributive justice, sent from God, has overtaken all sinful nations, in all times. The crime of slavery has been expiated by the lives of a million of our countrymen, and our cruelty and bad faith toward our Indian wards is calling down upon us the righteous vengeance of heaven.

An outrage so horribly cruel as to exceed almost the bounds of belief was committed upon the Indians at Fort Kearney in 1856. The facts were substantially as follows: Two young Indians belonging to a party of Cheyennes were sent to the road to beg some tobacco of a driver of a mail wagon. The driver fired upon them, whereupon one of them, as the Indians themselves afterwards said, "being a fool and mad," shot an arrow and wounded the white man. The chief of the Cheyenne party, on seeing this, ran out with others to the protection of the mail driver and punished the young Indian who had shot the arrow by whipping him according to the Indian laws. But this whipping did not wipe out the Indian boy's offense. An "Indian outrage" must, of course, be made out of the case and the military be called on to avenge it. The next day, accordingly, the troops from the fort valorously sallied forth and attacked the Cheyenne party, who refused to fight them and ran away, leaving their horses, bows and arrows and robes in camp. Six young braves remained behind to make something like a formal surrender. They went up to the soldiers, threw down their arms, and held out their hands in sign of submission and were mercilessly shot down in cold blood when only a few yards from the troops.

Another instance: During the summer of 1854 some bands of Sioux were encamped within six miles of Fort Laramie. They were regarded as friendly Indians and were on terms of friendship with the officers of the fort. A man from a neighboring tribe, whose relations had the year before been slaughtered by the troops of the fort, happened to be among these bands of Sioux. Some Mormon emigrants passed by the Indian camp and a cow escaped from them and ran toward the Indian village. The Indian whose relatives had been killed, by way of revenge for the loss, killed the cow. Complaint was made at the fort, and the chiefs, upon being called upon, said they would see that reparation was made for the damage which had been done. But this was not satisfactory to the commanding officer. He detailed a brevet lieutenant with a company to arrest the Indian. The company proceeded to the Indian camp with two pieces of artillery. Demand was made to the chiefs, but the offending Indian said to them:

"I have taken a lodge here. I am willing to die. You have nothing to do with the matter; the responsibility is not upon your people, but upon me alone."

This remark was no sooner made to the lieutenant than he fired, killing one man and crippling the principal chief. The chiefs rallied and exhorted the men to commit no outrage. Their influence controlled the action of the Indians, but a drunken interpreter excited the lieutenant and caused him, perhaps, to fire his cannon. The next thing was the sounding of the war whoop, and the lieutenant and some of his men were killed. The others ran and were pursued by the Indians, and every man of them was slaughtered.

Who will say, reasoning from analogy and common sense, and especially from a philosophical view of Indian character, that the whites were not to blame in this case? And yet, concealing or distorting the facts, the ears of the public were made to tingle with the report of "another Indian massacre," and an official announcement from the war department deluded the Government and people into a belief that the affair was an ambuscade and a part of a deliberate plan on the part of the Indians to massacre the troops and plunder the fort.

I will now cite another glaring case of injustice toward the Winnebagoes, a tribe of Indians formerly located in that portion of the Northwestern Territory which is now embraced in the State of Wisconsin. Our first treaty with these Indians was in 1816; since then we treated with them in 1829, 1832, 1837, 1848 and 1855. In 1862 we find the Winnebagoes located upon a beautiful reservation in the State of Minnesota, where they were prosperous and happy, many of them having acquired a practical knowledge of agriculture and the mechanical arts. Their treaty of February, 1855, had guaranteed to them a permanent home on a reservation eighteen miles square, and a large sum of money. There they had erected their houses, opened their farms, and remained perfectly peaceable. It was at this time that the Sioux outbreak took place in that state, but the Winnebagoes remained steadfast to their treaty obligations. But their time had again come. Their reservation, their lands, their homes, were demanded by the people of Minnesota. The permanent homes which the Government had guaranteed to them must be abandoned. Their attachment to the graves of their fathers and friends availed them not. The Government assented; it lent its aid to forcibly violate its own solemn treaty with these friendly Indians and without the least valid excuse force them from their comfortable houses to a barren and inhospitable country 500 miles westward on the Missouri River. There hundreds of these friendly Indians died from exposure and starvation. When sickness and suffering compelled them to seek the settlements for succor they were forced back by military power over stones and ice, marking their trail with the blood that trickled from their lacerated feet. I have seen among these same friendly Winnebagoes, while thus persecuted by the sanction of the Government, the starving infant struggling with fretful cries at the breast of a dying mother to draw the warmth of life from those nipples chilled and milkless under the embrace of death. Hundreds of these people died then and their bones are bleaching upon those inhospitable plains as monuments of foul disgrace to our nation by whose oppressive policy these innocents have been destroyed.

But all of these atrocities pale into insignificance before those committed upon the Indians of California, Oregon and Washington territories on the western slope. The massacre by Chivington at Sand Creek, Colorado, by which hundreds of men, women and helpless children were butchered in cold blood is another striking instance of our cruelty.

During the massacre in Minnesota in 1862 several white women and children were taken captives and carried to the Upper Missouri. Through the interposition of Colonel Galpin and a number of friendly Sioux, who exchanged their own horses for them, two women and five little girls were ransomed and returned to their friends in Minnesota. The Indians who had performed this act of humanity traveled down to the Yankton agency, a distance of 400 miles, where they were to be reimbursed for this act by the Government. Week after week passed away and neither clothing nor food came to the relief of these faithful friends. Despairing of early relief, one morning ten of their number came to me for a letter, stating who they were, and obtained permission to go out and hunt for the support of themselves and families. The third morning out, and when on Ponca Creek, about twenty miles back of Fort Randall, which post was then garrisoned by the Sixth Iowa Cavalry, a Captain Moreland, in command of some twenty men, overtook them. They presented him with the letter I had given them for their protection, whereupon the captain requested them to leave their arms and go with him to the fort for food. The Indians obeyed, but had not proceeded eighty rods when the brutal captain ordered his men to fire upon the Indians, who were in advance, and murdered nine out of the ten in cold blood on the spot. The tenth member of the party escaped and bore the horrible tidings of this damnable tragedy to his kindred far up the Missouri, while the bones of his comrades still remain on that fatal spot to chronicle the foul deed and point unmistakably to the cause of the Sioux war which followed with fearful and just retaliation and cost the treasury of the nation more than thirty million dollars and the loss of hundreds of innocent lives.

These and similar outrages have been the cause of all our difficulties with the Indians; while with most of the tribes located on reservations, with annuities and under the control of agents, no trouble had been found. Especially had those Indians been peaceable and improved in the arts of civilized life who had been placed under state rule. The New York and New England Indians have exhibited no act of hostility for eighty five years, and have abandoned their roving and savage habits. In view of these facts I would favor the transfer by the Government of the Indians to the respective states and territories wherein they are located. None are so well fitted to take charge of our Indian tribes as the people who reside with them, whose lives and property, whose wives and children, are within reach of the tomahawk and the scalping knife; who are themselves always vitally interested in maintaining peaceful relations with the Indians by a uniform course of just, fair, and impartial dealing.

The interest on the money expended in carrying on our Indian wars would be sufficient to comfortably provide for all the Indians. All we have to do to quiet our Indian trouble, and restore peace to the borders, and regain the confidence and friendship of the Indians, is to treat him kindly, deal with him justly, and convince him by humane acts that we desire to befriend and save him.

Instead of sending soldiers armed with instruments of death and munitions of war to demoralize, degrade and murder them, let us send philanthropists laden with kindness clothing to feed the hungry and clothe the naked and all the implements of peace necessary for their physical, mental and moral advancement. Make comfortable homes for the poor, wandering tribes, feed and clothe them until they become sufficiently advanced in the arts of civilized life to provide for themselves. Teach the rising generation to till the soil, instruct them in the mechanic arts, in all the varied duties of domestic life, and raise them as rapidly as possible toward our own standard, thereby fitting them for a better mode of life, and their incorporation into the states and territories of the Union. No class of men are so easily managed, more harmless and reliable, than the North American Indian when once you possess their confidence; none more unmanageable, heartless and cruel than they when that confidence is destroyed by wrongs and oppression. The expense of feeding, clothing and providing homes for our 250,000 Indians does not exceed two million dollars annually and by adopting the humane policy we would save five times this amount, which now goes to support the army in the Indian country. Of two deficiency bills now pending before Congress, one calls for $500,000 for feeding and taking care of 12,000 Indians for eight months, under the charge of General Harney; while the other calls for $13,000,000 for carrying on our present Indian war in the Southwest for the last six months and against a much smaller number of Indians. Forty regiments of troops are now engaged in the Indian country, including the Kansas regiment, and the expense to the Government for carrying on this war will exceed forty million dollars a year.

Three years ago I proposed a plan to this House which looked to the setting apart of a large reservation in the Northwest for the exclusive use and occupancy of all the Indian tribes north of the Platte and east of the Rocky Mountains. I am still of the opinion that this is the true policy so far as the unlocated tribes are concerned, and that one or two other reservations should be set apart on the Pacific Coast for the location of the tribes west of the Rocky Mountains. Upon these reservations all the tribes should be located except those now provided for and which are advancing in civilization and toward citizenship. This course will close our Indian wars forever; this will restore peace, permanent and enduring in its character. It will do away with the necessity of at least two-thirds of our army; it will save from fifteen to thirty million dollars annually to the national treasury; it will save hundreds of valuable lives every year; it will obviate untold miseries, wipe out our national injustice, and reclaim the poor, neglected, down-trodden Indians from their present state of abject misery, and restore them to the enjoyment of life and its attendant blessings, which are the free gift of God to all his children.

Our "Indian Peace Commission" was organized two years ago. This commission is composed of the first men in the civil and military service. After a thorough investigation, had in the heart of the Indian country, these commissioners were forced to the conclusion that our troubles were due to the aggressions of the whites and bad faith on the part of the Government, and it was agreed by the commissioners that a radical change was demanded, and that a pacific policy was the only one which promised success. Accordingly, treaties were negotiated with nearly all the tribes east of the Rocky Mountains, and although the stipulations for food and clothing were long delayed by the Government, the 30,000 Sioux who were parties to the treaties had remained perfectly friendly, and will continue so as long as we fulfill our part of the obligation.

General Harney, an officer of the regular army, who has seen more than fifty years of honorable service, much of which has been in the Indian country, was selected as one of the commissioners. He was present and took part in making all these late treaties. He knew just what they contained, what they meant, and was wisely selected to take charge of the large district which has been set apart for the sole use and occupancy of the Sioux Nation. It was late in the season when this veteran officer undertook the herculean task of locating and feeding these Indians through the approaching winter. The only means of transportation to the district was up the Missouri River, the waters of which were so low as to more than double the cost of transportation. There had been but $200,000 placed in his hands to enable him to carry into effect the solemn treaties with the Sioux, who, upon the faith of its guarantees, had just abandoned the warpath and pledged themselves on a future life of peace and friendship. The number of Indians who, by the terms of this treaty, were to receive a pound of beef and a pound of flour per day, exceeded twenty-five thousand in number. Provision had to be made to feed them for at least six months. After making allowance for those who could not get into the reservation before spring, it was estimated that 15,000 would have to be subsisted for at least six months before supplies could reach them in the spring. This alone would require 3,000,000 pounds of beef, which, at a cost of 12 cents a pound, amounts to $432,000; and 3,000,000 pounds of flour, at 10 cents per pound, $300,000; a total of $732,000. In addition to these articles it was provided by treaty that houses should be built, sawmills erected, horses and cattle purchased, farming and mechanical implements supplied for the use of the Indians. For the faithful performance of which General Harney was supplied with the insignificant sum of $200,000. He went forward, encountered the difficulty and overcame it. He realized that the issues of peace and war were in his hands. To fail to carry out the letter and spirit of the treaty was to rekindle the flame of a long, cruel and costly Indian war throughout the Northwest, while the discharge of the national obligation promised the enjoyment of peace and tranquillity throughout that entire section of country which had so long been the scene of savage warfare. By the honest, fearless and determined efforts of this just man, this true patriot and philanthropist, the peace and safety of our frontiers have been secured, a long and cruel war averted or arrested, and millions of dollars saved to the treasury, while the warmest gratitude of unnumbered thousands of our citizens in the Northwest attest the value of the meritorious services which he has rendered to them and the country.

But two methods for the adjustment of these difficulties are now thought of. That proposed and so successfully inaugurated by the peace commission commends itself to the favorable consideration of the Christian statesman and philanthropist, and the true economist. By its adoption the Indians will witness our returning good faith and rejoice; they will abandon the warpath and settle down on their reservations; peace and safety will reign uninterruptedly throughout our entire territorial domain; hope will once more be lighted in the red man's heart, and the spirit of his brave progenitors will again elevate his depressed nature. On the contrary, if war, murder, robbery and rapine are to be persisted in, and the policy of extermination, or subjugation even, is to be carried out, our frontiers are doomed to a fresh baptism of fire and blood unparalleled in the history of Indian warfare, and our national treasury will be doomed to inevitable bankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker, I have entered on the last month of my congressional duties. I neither ask nor desire political honors. A sense of duty alone has prompted me to the consideration of this subject. On the pages of my country's history these feeble utterances in behalf of this down-trodden race will stand as a lasting admonition of past cruelty and neglect toward all the Indian tribes of this country, and as a warning of judgment to come, if time continues and God reigns, unless we discharge the obligations which he has imposed upon this Government toward this oppressed and persecuted people.

RECONSTRUCTION COMPLETE. PRESIDENT PROCLAIMS PARDON AND AMNESTY

President Johnson's final proclamation restoring to citizenship all who had been engaged in rebellion against the Government was promulgated on December 24, 1868. The great majority of offenders had been cured of their political disabilities at an earlier period but there had been many exceptions of those who had been mainly instrumental in bringing on the war. This proclamation leaves none outside the pale of citizenship:

Whereas, the President of the United States has heretofore set forth several proclamations of amnesty and pardon to persons who were concerned in the late rebellion against the lawful of the Government of the United States, which proclamations were severally issued on December 8, 1863; March 26, 1864; May 29, 1865; September 7, 1866; and July 6th of the present year; and,

Whereas, the authority of the Federal Government having been established in all the states and territories within the jurisdiction of the United States, it is believed that such prudential reservations and exceptions as at the dates of said several proclamations were deemed necessary and proper, may be now wisely and justly relinquished, and that an universal amnesty proclamation for participation in said rebellion be extended to all who have borne any part therein will tend to secure permanent peace, order and prosperity throughout the land, and to renew and fully restore confidence and fraternal feeling among the whole people, and their respect for and attachment to the national Government, designed by its patriotic founders for the general good.

Now, therefore, be it known, that I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, by virtue of the power and authority in me vested by the Constitution, and in the name of the sovereign people of the United States, do hereby proclaim and declare, unconditionally and without reservation, to all and every person who directly or indirectly participated in the late insurrection and rebellion, full pardon and amnesty for the offense of treason against the United States, or of adhering to their enemies during the late war, with the restoration of all rights and privileges under the Constitution and laws, which have been made in pursuance thereof.

In testimony whereof I have signed these presents with my hand and have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this 20th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America, the ninety-third.

By the President,

(Signed)

ANDREW JOHNSON.

E. W. SEWARD,

Acting Secretary of State.

INDIANS SUFFER FROM PRAIRIE FIRE

Later in the year a disaster befell a band of Yanktons under Chief Two Bears, who were out on Knife River, a western tributary of the upper Missouri, for their fall hunt to get their winter's supply of meat. There were about one hundred families in the band, numbering all told about five hundred people and a relation of their misfortune will serve to exhibit the calamities the poor natives had to contend with. They had encamped near the stream and had set up their tepees, numbering about one hundred in the tall grass bordering the river. It was in October and the grass was in condition to burn fiercely. A prairie fire swept in on the little village in the evening, and came so rapidly that their danger was imminent before they realized it, for many had been engaged in efforts to check the onspeeding flames. The smoke blinded them, and suffocated a number. It was particularly severe on the women and little people. Sixty of the tepees were burned and nine of the men received fatal injuries, dying during the fire. Many of the squaws were seriously burned and disfigured for life, while the children suffered intensely. One little fellow had his fingers burned off and his hand scorched to a crisp. Many of the children were severely burned in the face, hands and feet. These Indians lost all their blankets, a large quantity of flour and a large store of meat. Nearly one-half of the number had been so severely burned as to require medical aid. The weeping and wailing of the mourners, the moans of the suffering men and women, and the cries and shrieks of the tortured children formed a scene of woe and despair of the most pathetic description. The United States Indian agent at Grand River Agency being notified, removed the sufferers to the agency, where they received the best medical treatment and care that could be given at that place, and kept them until they were able to be sent home to the Yankton Agency. Many of them were permanently crippled, and all bore marks of the ordeal of fire through which they had passed.

A cold wave swept over the Dakota plains early in March, 1869, and the fifth day of that month was dangerously cold, the mercury sinking to twenty-five below zero. A party of Santee Indians who had been in camp on the Vermillion River for a few weeks prior, broke camp and started out for Fort Dakota at Sioux Falls. An aged squaw, named Owincatowin—"Blue-all-Over"—became exhausted four miles from the fort and lay down. Her Indian husband fixed a tepee over her and covered her with blankets, then went to the fort and set up their lodge near the stockade. The husband then returned for his squaw, found the tepee and blankets, but the woman had disappeared. Search was made for an entire day and the venerable Owincatowin was finally discovered sitting on bare ground, with her hands to her mouth, frozen stark and stiff.

A trapper named Kolshauff, a discharged soldier from the fort, who had been trapping on the Sioux all winter was fatally frozen during the same cold spell.

CHAPTER XLIV GENERAL ULYSSES S. GRANT, PRESIDENT

At the beginning of the career of Dakota Territory in 1861, there resided at Galena, Illinois, an industrious, frugal and exemplary citizen who was engaged in operating a tannery. The great War of the Rebellion was inaugurated almost simultaneously with the organization of Dakota, and the United States having been since the close of the Mexican war, on a peace footing, save an occasional uprising of warlike Indians, or refractory Mormons, the regular army had dwindled to a comparatively small force; and a large proportion of its officers, being southern men, had resigned their commissions and accepted positions in the army of the Southern Confederacy. This left the Federal Government practically without an army at a time when its perpetuity was threatened and the dissolution of the union of states already declared.

The only reliance and recourse of the Federal Government in this crisis was the masses of loyal people, almost wholly inexperienced and untrained for military service; but it was the only resource—the dernier ressort—and President Lincoln promptly called upon the states to furnish 75,000 volunteers. There was a prompt and overwhelming response. A certain ratio of the number was allotted to each state and Illinois was among the number. Governor Richard Yates was the executive at the time, and his call for militiamen brought thousands of intrepid volunteers to Springfield; but few were qualified to undertake the important duty of organizing them into companies and regiments and preparing them for actual war.

The unostentatious tanner of Galena was among the number who responded, and in tendering his services to the governor he asked to be placed where he could do the most good. He was accepted and promptly employed in the work of organizing, disciplining, drilling and equipping the raw recruits. He had been a lieutenant and captain in the regular army, was an educated soldier, and a graduate of the West Point Military Academy, and had served with credit during the war with Mexico in 1847-8. He had a wife and young children to support, and the army did not appeal to him as offering the best inducements for a home, for which reason he had resigned his commission several years prior to the breaking out of the Civil war, and entered upon an industrious life as a civilian.

The work of organization at Springfield was hastily completed because of the emergency which demanded defenders. Three hundred thousand additional volunteers had been called for. The war had actually begun, and in nearly all the southern states the Confederate forces were in the field. There was a hostile force threatening Northern Missouri and Governor Yates hesitatingly commissioned his efficient helpmeet in organization, as colonel of the Twenty-first Regiment of Illinois Volunteers (infantry) after the troops of the regiment had refused to go into service with their former colonel. The regiment was mustered into the service of the United States, and its colonel was dispatched with his untried recruits to the threatened district of the neighboring southern state, Missouri.

We now turn to a page of the Colonel's biography and glean an account of this, his first experience as a military commander:

My sensations as we approached what might be a "field of battle" were anything but agreeable. I had been in all the engagements in Mexico that it was possible for one man to be in, but not in command. If some one else had been colonel and I lieutenant-colonel, I do not think I would have felt any trepidation.

I received orders at Palmyra to move against Col. Thomas Harris, who was said to be encamped at the little town of Florida, some twenty-five miles south of where we then were. At the time we had no transportation and the country about Salt River was sparsely settled, so it took some time to collect teams and wagons and drivers to move our camp and garrison equipage, provisions and ammunition. While preparations for moving were going on I felt quite comfortable, but when I got on the road and found every house deserted, I was anything but easy. In the twenty-five miles we had to march we did not see a person, old or young, male or female, except two horsemen who were on a road that crossed ours. As soon as they saw us they decamped as fast as their animals could carry them. We halted at night and proceeded the next morning at an early hour. Harris had been encamped in a creek bottom for the purpose of being near water. The hills on either side of the creek extend to a considerable height, possibly more than a hundred feet. As we approached the brow of the hill, from which it was expected we could see Harris' camp, and possibly find his men ready formed to meet us, my heart kept getting higher and higher, until it felt to me as though it was in my throat. I would have given anything then to have been back in Illinois, but I had not the moral courage to halt and consider what to do. I kept right on. When we reached a point from which the valley below was in full view, I halted. The place where Harris had been encamped a few days before was still there, and the marks of a recent encampment were plainly visible, but the troops were gone. My heart resumed its place. It occurred to me at once that Harris had been as much afraid of me as I had been of him. This was a view of the question I had never taken before, but it was one I never forgot afterwards. From that event to the close of the war I never experienced trepidation upon confronting an enemy, though I always felt more or less anxiety. I never forgot that he had as much reason to fear my forces as I had his. The lesson was valuable.

Harris had been apprised of the coming of the Union troops and for reasons that will be appreciated by military men, had removed his camp three or four days before the Twenty-first Illinois reached their deserted camp.

We will not follow the career of the Illinois colonel through the succeeding eight years further than to mention that the unassuming citizen of Galena of 1861 is now, in 1869, President of the United States, chosen to that high and responsible office by an overwhelming majority of his countrymen, who gave their almost unanimous voice to his election. His wonderful career through the Civil war had been one of remarkable successes and no serious failures. His name became a talisman of victory. The initials of his name, U. S., were suggestive, and he came to be famous as United States Grant, Uncle Sam Grant, Uniform Success Grant, Unconditional Surrender Grant, Unequalled Soldier Grant, and many other appellatives of like character. He rose from the rank of colonel to the generalship of the army, a rank previously held only by Washington and bestowed on him by special acts of Congress. No military or civil career in the annals of our country exhibits more fairly earned laurels or rapid and honorable promotion.

NEW FEDERAL OFFICIALS FOR DAKOTA

The inauguration of Ulysses S. Grant as President of the United States, March 4, 1869, was the signal for a radical change in the official roster of Dakota Territory as it had been under President Johnson. Many of our territorial leaders, men who had worked strenuously and spent their own money for the success of the straight republican ticket, were grievously disappointed to see all the good plums go to outsiders— in fact they were indignant. They had counted with certainty on the secretaryship, the surveyor general, and others not necessary to mention. These positions dispensed valuable patronage which gave them a peculiar value. Mr. Brookings secured a judgeship which was the only recognition the victorious republican party was awarded; while Judge Kidder, who ran for Congress on the people's ticket, and United States Marshal Litchfield, who supported him, were reappointed. It was suggested at Washington, as a consolation to the Dakotans (who were numerously represented there), that by sending us new men to fill the offices, they were assisting in populating the territory with very desirable people.

Grant's newly appointed officials were John A. Burbank, of Indiana, for governor, vice Andrew J. Faulk; Turney M. Wilkins, Iowa, secretary, vice S. L. Spink, elected to Congress; George W. French, Maine, chief justice, vice Ara Bartlett; Jefferson P. Kidder and W. W. Brookings, associate justices. Judge Kidder succeeded himself and Mr. Brookings succeeded John W. Boyle, third district; William H. H. Beadle, Wisconsin, surveyor general, vice William W. Tripp.

The office of surveyor-general appears to have been conceded to a certain congressional district of Wisconsin in 1860, with an indefinite tenure, when Gen. W. H. H. Beadle, of Grant County, that state, was appointed to that position. It was a report in official circles at that time, that Mr. Beadle was a growing favorite for the nomination of representative to Congress by the republicans of his Wisconsin district, which alarmed the then incumbent, who was a very competent and ambitious gentleman and earnestly desired to retain the place. Perceiving that Beadle might be a formidable opponent he made a determined and successful effort to secure his appointment to the office of surveyor-general of Dakota. This was good policy and good politics, and somewhat in line with the counsel given by Gen. James H. Lane, of Kansas, who held a commission as major general in the volunteer army during the early days of the Civil war, and who was desirous of being elected United States Senator from that state when it was admitted into the Union. He was bitterly opposed in his senatorial ambition, but there were a number of prominent Kansans who were eager for promotion in the army and knowing this Lane frankly told them that the course of least resistance lay in their "boosting him" into the senatorship when they could have the military position. His suggestion was acted upon. After Mr. Beadle, the surveyor-general of Dakota came with unremitting regularity from Grant County, Wisconsin, until President Cleveland came in and changed the program. George H. Hand was United States attorney, Dakota. No change was made in this office for the reason that Mr. Hand's term had not expired. Laban H. Litchfield, Dakota, United States marshal, succeeded himself. N. J. Wallace of Union County and Benj. F. Campbell, of Clay County, respectively register and receiver of the United States land office, Vermillion, vice George Stickney and Nelson Miner. Gilbert P. Bennett, Union County collector and John Pope Hodnett, Illinois, assessor internal revenue, vice William Shriner, of Clay, and D. M. Mills of Union County. Agent of the Wahpeton and Sisseton Sioux Indians, Jarrett W. Daniels. Governor Burbank was the brother-in-law of United States Senator Morton, of Indiana, who had won fame as the energetic war governor of the Hoosier state during the Rebellion, and was a close friend of the President as well as a leader in the Senate. The land office and internal revenue appointments were given, with the exception of Hodnett to the republicans recommended by Delegate Spink.

WYOMING

The Territory of Wyoming was finally erected into a separate territory, in April, 1860, when President Grant appointed and the Senate confirmed the foling officers: Governor, John A. Campbell; secretary, Ed M. Lee; chief justice, John H. Howe; associate justices, John W. Kingman, Wm. Jones; surveyor-general, Edward Ruger; United States marshal, C. Howe; United States attorney, Joseph M. Carey; receiver United States land office, Frank Walcott.

There were two sections of the organic act of the new territory that were of special interest to Dakotans—the boundaries and the date when the act became operative. Though passed and approved in 1868, it did not go into effect until the federal officers were appointed as above noted. These two sections named are appended:

BOUNDARIES OF WYOMING

That all that part of the United States described as follows: Commencing at the intersection of the 27th meridian of longitude west from Washington with the 45th degree of north latitude, and running thence west to the 34th meridian of west longitude; thence south to the 41st degree of north latitude; thence east to the 27th meridian of west longitude; and thence north to the place of beginning; be and the same is hereby organized into a temporary government by the name of the Territory of Wyoming.

The various provisions of the act, with the exceptions given here were almost identical with the organic act of Dakota. The last section, No. 17, enacted as follows:

And be it further enacted, that this act shall take effect from and after the time when the executive and judicial officers herein provided for shall have been duly appointed and qualified; Provided, That all general territorial laws of the Territory of Dakota, at the time this act shall take effect, shall be and continue in force throughout the said territory until repealed by the legislative authority of said territory, except such laws as relate to the possession or occupation of mines or mining claims.

Approved, July 25, 1868.

NEW INDIAN POLICY

A new Indian policy was inaugurated with the coming in of President Grant's administration in 1869. Henceforth it was intended to rely mainly upon peaceful diplomacy and ample rations, etc., to control the Indian wards. General Sherman's treaties, made in 1868, with the hostile Sioux were relied upon, if faithfully executed on the part of the Government, to maintain peaceful relations not only between the Indians and whites, but between the various Indian nations. The first step in the new departure was a practical divorce of the Indian bureau from party politics. The religious denominations, including the Quakers, were recognized and a large proportion of the agents were taken from the army and assigned to duty as Indian agents at the various agencies. In Dakota, Capt. Dewitt C. Poole was assigned to the Whetstone Agency; Bvt. Maj. G. W. Randall to the Cheyenne Agency; Bvt. Maj. J. A. Hearn to Grand River; Capt. Wm. J. Broatch to the Yankton Agency; Bvt. Maj. W. H. French, to Crow Creek; Bvt. Maj. W. H. Hugo, to the Poncas; Capt. H. Clifford to the Upper Missouri tribes, and a Quaker, Samuel Jenney, succeeded Maj. J. M. Stone, of Yankton, as agent of the Santees, at Niobrara. Maj. Pat Conger, at the Yankton Agency, Dr. Joel A. Potter at the Ponca, and Maj. J. R. Hanson, in charge at Crow Creek and the Upper Missouri Agency, were relieved. By virtue of his office as governor, John A. Burbank became superintendent of Indian affairs for Dakota Territory. General Parker, of New York, a full blooded Oneida Indian, who had served on the staff of General Grant during the war for the Union, was appointed commissioner of Indian affairs.

While there was no Indian war in the Dakotas in the year 1860, there were a number of Indian bands at large which had not deserted the warpath in accordance with the peace treaties and which hung around the forts and along the trails and highways, seeking an opportunity to rob and kill white people. They claimed that they were not parties to the peace treaties and would not be governed by them. They were implacable enemies of the white race on general principles. The purpose and character of their attacks on the forts is described in the following letter from Fort Stevenson, August 4, 1869. The writer says:

We were attacked by a band of Sioux Indians, numbering about seventy, at 6 o'clock this morning, and repulsed them with a loss on their part of ten killed and - wounded, while on our side no one was injured. They were after a lot of oxen belonging to a train from Fort Totten, that came here for military stores and forage brought up and landed here by steamboats. They succeeded in putting five arrows into one animal, and came very near hitting two bull whackers. These attacks are quite frequent, and the Indians seldom fail to kill or wound some of us. This band belongs to the Little Bull faction. They are too lazy to hunt, but have fleet horses, and prefer to fight and gather spoils from the whites. They are not very well armed.

A battle in which Indians were the combatants was fought near the Ponca reservation and not over twenty-five miles from Fort Randall, on the 18th of September, 1869. The tribes engaged were the Pawnees, said to number 500, and an equal number of Sioux—Yanktons and Santees. The Sioux had been stealing ponies from the Pawnees on the Platte, and were followed to Dakota by the Pawnees, who made reparation by stealing a large number of Sioux ponies. The invaders, with the spoils, were overtaken by the Sioux at the place mentioned and an all day's battle followed, in which the Sioux were worsted with severe loss, and the Pawnees made good their escape, with their booty, to their own country.

The Indians in the far Northwest, who had not been parties to the treaties of 1868, were troublesome in 1869 and committed a number of atrocities. General Sheridan, who was in command of the military division of Missouri, which included Dakota, in a letter to General Sherman, who was then commanding the United States army, gave an account of Indian affairs in the West and Northwest that was no doubt true and was strongly prejudicial to the Indians, tending to arouse a popular sentiment favorable to a war that would practically exterminate all the wild tribes. This led to a brief war with the Piegan Indians in Montana, and the annihilation, practically, of what was known as Red Horn's band. At the session of Congress following the condition of the Indians and their relation to the Government formed a prominent subject in the President's message and in the department reports. President Grant was not disposed to throw all the blame on the redmen, and cited the fact that no provision, or no adequate provision, had been made to carry out the treaty obligations of the Government; and the secretary of the interior, in his report, expressed his conviction that it was unfair to put the whole blame on the savages. He said:

The great cause of all our difficulty with the wild tribes is the fact that civilized settlements are constantly narrowing the boundaries of their hunting grounds, crowding them out of regions which they have by immemorial tradition regarded as their own; while no thoroughly consistent good faith is kept in redeeming the promises we made to them as a condition of their acquiescence in the new order of things.

The secretary had reference to the new peace and industrial reservation policy of the Government, which had been put in practical operation only to a limited extent; and recommends that Congress make an explicit definition of the purposes of the Government on the subject of Indian treaties, and take such action as in their wisdom may seem best to "avert the evils that now seem imminent." He concludes:

If I were to waive all questions or inquiry as to the material objections of a Christian nation under such circumstances, I think it would be demonstrably clear that, as a mere question of pecuniary economy, it will be cheaper to feed every adult Indian now living, even to sleepy surfeiting, during his natural life, while their children are being educated to agriculture, than it would be to carry on a general Indian war even for one year. The shocking barbarities and mutilations of the dead, of prisoners, which are often referred to, are the usual accompaniment of Indian warfare. By preserving peace we may hope to avoid them, and I cannot believe it is beyond the wisdom and resources of a great nation like our own, to give a peace policy a thorough trial.

SHERIDAN'S STATEMENT

As there are two sides to many questions, so there were two sides to this Indian question, and the views of a prominent military commander will give the situation from that standpoint. In an official communication to General Sherman, in March, 1870, General Sheridan stated the position of the army in clear and vigorous terms, as follows:

The reservation is the "last ditch" to the wild Indian, but to get him there he must be forced by the troops. Those who think he can be induced to go there by other means are mistaken. When on the reservation he will have to be kept there by the presence of troops, and thus become tangible for the good work of civilization; and he can only be protected in his rights while there by troops keeping off the emigrants who entrench upon his land. All these points are practically exhibited each year.

The Cheyennes, Arapahoes, Comanches, Kiowas and Apaches have just been forced on by the troops. During the last year, as soon as I withdrew the troops from the Sac and Fox Reservation, the emigrants took possession. A flood of emigration, almost ten thousand strong, moved in solid mass and occupied the Osage Reservation, because there were no troops there to keep them off. All the other reservations on which the Indians may yet be placed will be lost in the same manner unless guarded by the military.

Yours truly,

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

IRISH REPUBLICANS

John Pope Hodnett, of Chicago, was appointed assessor of internal revenue for the District of Dakota Territory in April, 1869, succeeding David M. Mills, of Elk Point. Mr. Hodnett, though a young man of not more than thirty years of age, had been a leader of a political element in the United States known as "Irish republicans." Prior to the Civil war it was rarely one met an Irishman who was not a democrat. They seemed to find a congenial political brotherhood in that party, and it was a general belief that this was largely due to the influence thrown around them in the City of New York upon their reaching this country from their native land. As a rule the democratic party has governed New York City for nearly three-quarters of a century, and the officials of that city whose duties required them to mingle with foreigners coming into the country could quietly influence their political opinions regarding questions in the new land of freedom to which they had come. Other powerful influences, not political, were also said to favor the democratic organization prior to the great rebellion. This mighty conflict between the Federal Government and the seceding states opened a way for northern democrats to align themselves anew politically. Prior to this secession the southern or slavholding states, including those that attempted to withdraw from the Union, formed the citadel of the democratic party, and seldom failed to exhibit a united front in favor of the democratic candidate for the President and vice president, and with the aid of New York State which, owing to the immense voting population of New York City being largely democratic, was enabled to control the presidency and the policy of the nation. It was therefore a matter of important national interest to begin the political education of the emigrants, who have been pouring into the country from foreign shores ever since this republic was founded, as early as possible after their arrival, in order to start them right, which, by the guardians of the City of New York, was supposed to be via the democratic highway. And this was done for scores of years.

The great war emancipated the slaves and abolished slavery in the United States. It also united, practically, the northern people against a dissolution of the Union, and brought the northern democrats and republicans shoulder to shoulder on the battlefield and at the ballot box during the continuance of the war. Out of this situation grew the conditions from which Irish republicanism sprung, which, coupled with the Fenian movement which had for its purpose the emancipation of Ireland from English domination gave to the new Irish republican organization a weighty voice in the arena of politics, and the voice was being uttered in distinct tones and in unambiguous language by hundreds of eloquent Irish republicans all over the land. The organization was more of a western than an eastern association in its inception. "On the free soil of the West that had never been tainted by the footprints of a slave, Irish republicanism had its birth," as its eloquent speakers claimed and its numerical strength came from the central and western portions of the country largely. The new political aspect produced by the war gave the democrats of the North an opportunity to align themselves with the same party to which the republicans were attached, namely, the union party, without bolting their organization or betraying any political trust, and a very large number of leading democrats, famous afterwards as soldiers and statesmen, remained ever after in the republican camp. Mr. Hodnett was prominent in this movement; a native Irishman; a fine speaker, though somewhat given to the fanciful and flowery imagery of oratory; and President Grant had selected him with others for federal favors in recognition of the political element they represented. Mr. Hodnett entered heartily into whatever was being done to build up and develop the territory and induce hither the tide of immigration which was flowing out from the older states. During the first summer of his residence he took up a claim about seven miles north of Yankton, a beautiful tract of prairie. There happened at the time of his settlement to be a small sheet of water embraced within its boundaries, to which the new owner gave the name of Lake Lalla Rookh. In the exuberance of his fancy he arrayed his new possessions in the apparel of romance, clothing them with beautiful groves, waving grain fields, and brilliant gardens; regarding the lake, he declared, in the lines of Moore, that:

There is not in this wide world a valley so sweet
As the vale in whose bosom the bright waters meet;
O, the last rays of feeling and life must depart,
Ere the bloom of that valley shall fade from my heart.

Surrounding Mr. Hodnett's terrestrial gem, filings were made for Col. John M. Collins, provost marshal of Alexandria, Virginia; William Hodnett, Esq., A. B. M., LL. D.; G. W. Babcock, clothier, 390 Broadway, New York; John Griffie Hallowin, merchant, 320 Broadway, New York; Thos. H. Keefe, of the firm of C. B. Farwell & Company, Chicago; Archibald Craig, Esq., Brooklyn; Daniel Destere Farrell and James Thompson, Chicago. These were all men of wealth, and the avowed intention was to make fine improvements by breaking, sinking wells, planting groves and erecting buildings. The grand plan, however, failed to mature. His eminent and honorable neighbors were too deeply engrossed in other affairs to give their attention to the improvement of Dakota prairies, and even Mr. Hodnett's ardor cooled in time, Lalla Rookh losing all of its charm and nearly all its sparkling water later in the season during a prolonged dry spell. The claim was abandoned but Mr. Hodnett did some valiant service by public lectures at eastern points in behalf of the territory.

AN INTERNATIONAL CASE

The frontier of civilization had advanced well into the Yankton Indian cession by 1870 but there was yet a wide area left in which marauding Indian bands belonging to the tribes beyond, committed their depredations and were frequently bold enough to attack the sentinels at the forts and capture Government horses and cattle. The Yanktons had begun a new career, a large number of them putting aside forever the methods and garb to which they had been accustomed, and were devoting themselves to civilized industry, to the education of their children, and to the building of substantial cabins. Christian associations had been given almost absolute control of the education and religious welfare of the red men, and very largely of their material welfare also. The Episcopal society erected three church buildings and three mission houses on the Yankton reservation, and established four schools where the average attendance was about sixty pupils in each school.

The American Board of Missions had about seventy-five pupils under instruction. The custom of disposing of their dead by laying their bodies upon scaffolds had been abandoned largely, and the ceremonies usual at Christian funerals adopted, while the mortal remains were confined and consigned to the mother earth. But beyond the Yanktons many scores of miles, hundreds of hardy adventurers had gone and established wood yards along the river for the accommodation of the 100 steamboats that were then plying the River Missouri, and these people had frequent fatal quarrels with the Indians. It will never be known how many of them were killed, and in many instances their correct names were never reported, so many of them passed under a pioneer sobriquet describing some physical peculiarity. Steamboats were frequently fired into—and all boats carried passengers as well as freight—so that human life on the upper river was by no means safe and secure. An incident of fatal shooting that grew out of this serious condition, though the Indians were not directly concerned in it, occurred early in June, 1870, on board the steamboat Octavia, between Forts Berthold and Buford. A captain of the British army named Spear had taken passage on the boat for Fort Benton, where he would find an escort to take him to some point in the British possessions where his regiment was stationed. Owing to the hostile spirit of a portion of the Indians in that region, and their boldness in their marauding expeditions, a squad of soldiers accompanied the Octavia as they did other boats in the upper waters, for the purpose of guarding the boat at night when it was tied up to the shore. The Octavia had laid above Berthold, in a neighborhood where a guerrilla band of Indians was suspected of lurking, and the sentinels had strict orders regarding the challenging of any parties moving about the boat at night, and when a challenge was not answered to assume that the party was an enemy and fire. Private William Barry, of Company E, Thirteenth United States Infantry, was on guard on the hurricane deck in rear of the pilot house, and sometime after midnight heard someone approaching whose footsteps he judged to be someone wearing moccasins or in bare feet. He challenged in a loud voice, "Who comes there?" He received no answer, and waiting a reasonable time drew up and fired, killing Captain Spear, who chanced to be aboard bare-footed, possibly in quest of a more comfortable place than his heated stateroom. The soldier was placed under arrest and rather harshly treated, though he had, undoubtedly, acted in good faith in obeying orders; but his victim being a British subject, it was felt that the affair would have to be rigidly investigated and a satisfactory showing made, or the British lion would require placating by a large indemnity from Uncle Sam and possibly the life of the soldier. Barry was not only confined and bound on the boat, but was kept nine days in irons at Fort Buford, and another month in the guard-house, when he was turned over to the civil authorities and sent to Yankton, the nearest point within the judicial district where the charge could be legally investigated. Here he had a preliminary examination before United States Commissioner Congleton, he having been charged with murder, and was discharged, the commissioner finding that the killing was not unlawful or criminal, but was committed in the discharge of duty specially imposed on him by the discipline in force on the boat, and that Captain Spear had exposed himself in violation of the well known rules in force on the boat. Barry started back to his regiment, but in the meantime the British ambassador at Washington had taken up the matter and demanded a more rigid and thorough investigation by the court. Barry was the second time arrested under instructions from Washington to have the case tried in court, the testimony made a matter of record and sent to Washington together with the findings of the court, and there was to be no hesitation in procuring all evidence because of cost. The case was subsequently tried at Vermillion before Judge Kidder, where the British government was represented. The result was a clean acquittal of the prisoner, who was found amply justified, considering the critical situation of the boat on the occasion when the lamentable affair occurred. The British lion's wrath was fully appeased when all the facts were laid before the ambassador, who confessed that had the unfortunate affair happened in her majesty's dominions, the soldier would not only have been justified, but would have received a substantial token of her majesty's approval because of his courage and faithfulness to duty.

Notwithstanding the prosperous condition of the territory at this time and the apparent freedom from any apprehension of danger that existed among the great body of rural settlers, there was barely a week that did not bring intelligence of Indian hostilities in the upper country, and numerous marauding parties were abroad on the plains watching an opportunity to commit some depredation. The Indians were pledged to peace by their treaties, and the large majority observed the treaty; but it seemed such an easy matter to violate it by many of the younger element who had no personal connection with making it, and many of them regarded the pledge as given under duress. At any rate the military forces were kept constantly employed north of the 45th parallel.

HOMICIDE AT TOTTEN

On the night of April 30, 1870, John Ahlfeldt, orderly sergeant of Company D, United States Infantry, was shot and instantly killed at his quarters at Fort Totten. John Holt, a private, was sleeping with the orderly, and at or near 9 o'clock at night he heard someone come to the orderly's door and ask for a light, which was customary for the soldiers to do. The orderly got up and lit a lantern and went to the door, which he opened, and he then discovered that the person was preparing to shoot him, when he ran to the other door of his room, and had opened it ready to escape when he was shot through the body, expiring almost instantly. Holt claimed that the voice of the party who did the shooting was that of James Kehoe, and on this statement, Kehoe, who was found in his bunk with his pantaloons on, and a cartridge box open on his bunk, was placed under arrest charged with the crime, and confined in the guardhouse. General Whistler, who was in command of the fort, and Captain Wainright, appeared at the scene of the shooting right after it occurred and after hearing Holt's statement, directed the arrest and confinement.

The prisoner was turned over to the civil authorities, and there being no court at that time nearer than the Second District, at Yankton, Kehoe was taken to that place and confined until the next term of the tribunal which was held in June, when Kehoe was indicted by the United States grand jury; but the case was not tried until the following October. At the trial the evidence produced against Kehoe was the same as has been stated, with the addition that he was intoxicated when he went to his bunk. Kehoe's defense rested mainly in the absence of any motive for the commission of the crime, and on the testimony of a soldier in the adjoining bunk that Kehoe did not leave his bed from the time he first retired until arrested. And one witness swore that he saw the flash of the gun which was used in the shooting at the parade ground, which could not have been seen had the shot been fired from the door, as testified by Holt. The only evidence connecting Kehoe with the affair was that of Holt, who claimed that he identified his voice. The case occupied six days, Kehoe being defended by ex-Judge Ara Bartlett, Gen. Wm. Tripp, Bartlett Tripp, and J. D. Boyer. Warren Cowles, United States district attorney, prosecuted. The jury, after an all night's session, brought in a verdict of "not guilty," and Kehoe was discharged. Ahlfeldt, the slain orderly, was a native of Denmark, a young man about twenty-six years old, and highly respected. He had been an officer in the volunteer service during the Civil war. His murderer was never discovered; but the event served to arouse considerable public criticism of the loose and lawless methods that it was alleged were prevalent at the frontier military posts, and other Government stations; but which were not brought to public notice through the legally constituted tribunals.

WINTER WHEAT

The first recorded effort and experiment to grow winter wheat in Dakota was made by John J. Thompson, on his farm ten miles east of Yankton. He began on a very small scale in 1869, with encouraging results, and in the fall of 1870 put in forty acres, from which he reaped such a harvest as to attract attention not alone in the territory but in Iowa. Prior to that time it had been affirmed by farmers that the snowfall was too precarious in the territory for successful winter wheat culture, and that the plant was almost certain to be winter killed, because of the high winds which blew the surface soil away during our dry and comparatively snowless winters. Mr. Thompson's success was not accepted as determining the matter; and but little attention was given to the cultivation of any but the spring variety until possibly twenty years later, when the cultivation of winter wheat being better understood, was again undertaken in the southeastern part of the territory. Wheat is not the principal crop grown on these southern farms, but nearly every homesteader persists in raising a few acres for "company," and it is now generally conceded that the winter variety is a surer crop because it receives the benefit of the rains in early spring which gives it such early progress that it is not affected by the dry weather which frequently prevails when the spring crop most needs moisture.

BOHEMIAN IMMIGRATION

A large colony of Bohemians, numbering about five hundred families, from Chicago and vicinity, through their advance agents Frank Bem, Vac Janda, and others, selected a location in Bon Homme and Yankton counties, and in the vicinity of the old Town of Niobrara, Nebraska, in July, 1869. These agents had visited other portions of Nebraska and Dakota, and finally settled upon this locality as offering the best lands for farming purposes, with the most promising prospect for rapid development of the country. The tract of land selected in Dakota embraced a little over four townships, in Southwestern Yankton County and Southeastern Bon Homme County, about equally divided between these two counties. The settlement began in the neighborhood of Lakeport, ten miles west of Yankton. The colonists reached Yankton in September, 1869, and all, with few exceptions that settled in town, selected their claims during the fall months, and many of them made small improvements, going so far as to construct sod houses that would furnish them a winter dwelling and enable them to get to work early in the spring. The approaching winter proved unusually severe, and the spring of 1870 was tardy in its advent. Those of the colonists who lived in their hastily constructed sod houses suffered hardships, and many of them were sick and unable to do any sort of work. The citizens of the towns opened their purses and relieved the most needy. Doctor Burleigh, whose large farm near Bon Homme adjoined the Bohemians, displayed his generosity by going among them and administering to those who needed medical assistance; he also loaned them, without charge, a large number of cows, also horses and wagons and did a great deal for their comfort and for the relief of their pressing necessities. It was claimed that the colony numbered not less than twelve hundred men, women and children, a very large proportion settling on this Dakota tract. Vac Janda settled, with a number of others, at and around the old Town of Niobrara, Nebraska. The following year the colonists set to work in earnest, broke up a large amount of land, built farm buildings and raised a quantity of sod crops. They were an industrious class of people, a large proportion of good farmers, and quite enterprising. It may be stated too that as a class they were well provided with money, and some of them were reputed to be quite wealthy. The colony in time prospered remarkably, and has continued prosperously. Their settlement is now one of the wealthiest, best improved and most productive portions of the territory that was. Many of the farms are adorned with fine orchards and substantial modern residences and up-to-date improvements, with all the accessories needful in profitable farming. Many of the original colonists have passed away, but their descendants as a rule maintain the old homesteads and are annually adding to the productions, the beauty and wealth of the settlement.

The Bohemian settlement extended about twelve miles northwest, and the same west of Yankton into Bon Homme County. Their first buildings were rude, but their improvements were substantial, and two years after their colony was founded, they were raising large crops of grain and had begun the starting of herds of fine cattle. Being well experienced in fruit culture, they began experiments with apple and cherry orchards at an early day, and have been very successful in this direction. Their settlement now abounds with fine orchards and they have already been compelled to seek a market for their fruit outside the territory.

GOOD CROPS AND LARGE VEGETABLES

Dakota had reached a point in the development of its agricultural resources when nature was pleased to surprise the cultivators of the soil with a variety of products that could be classed as extraordinary for size and weight, and in 1869, which had been a propitious season for all products of the soil, the good dame had been more prodigal of its favors in this regard than had been customary. It was an excellent season to inaugurate a county agricultural fair. In the little towns along the Missouri Valley, Elk Point, Vermillion, Yankton, Bon Homme, and even Fort Randall, the stores and market places were embellished with mammoth squashes, huge pumpkins, golden corn, No. 1 wheat, oats and barley, stacks of onions, pyramids of potatoes, and so on, and the farmers and gardeners who furnished them, with one accord declared that what they had left at home far surpassed that which they had brought in for exhibition. The soil of the older farms of the territory had now become domesticated by tillage, and was prepared to take advantage of the favorable climatic conditions. The farmers declared that many of their squashes and pumpkins were so large and heavy that they could not load them in their wagons, and many of the varieties were of such superior quality that they intended to ship them back to their former neighbors and friends in the East that they might become eye-witnesses of the products of "grasshopper-ridden" and "dronth-stricken" Dakota soil. Michael Robinson, of Smutty Bear, exhibited sixteen onions whose united weight was twenty-two pounds. Those who had tears to shed were invited to a raw onion feast. Doctor Thomas became locally famous for his success in raising celery. Thomas C. Watson, of Brule Creek, displayed sweet potatoes that weighed four pounds each; Joseph Emerson, of Yankton County, exhibited early Goodrich potatoes that made the "eyes stick out," not the eyes of the tubers, however. Emerson's melons, sweet corn, oyster plant, and other products of his well tilled garden made an attractive exhibit. Judge Kidder, on his Vermillion farm, raised potatoes as well as corn, etc., and from one hill dug out twelve that weighed altogether sixteen pounds. Harry Ash raised beets that were twenty inches in length and eighteen inches in circumference. Politics, railroad and all ordinary topics were relegated, and everyone talked of these marvelous productions. Nature had been in an over-generous mood for the purpose apparently of convincing the Dakota people and the world generally that the soil of Dakota was poor of any section of the Union.

A TERRITORIAL FAIR—THE FIRST

As all portions of the territory where settlements had existed for a few years were indulging an enthusiasm over this unwonted generosity on the part of Mother Earth, there were many who saw in the occasion an inviting time to stimulate emigration to the territory. In Yankton an organization was effected for this purpose, and also with a view of forming a county agricultural society. A numerously attended meeting followed at the schoolhouse, where a county organization was effected to be known as the Yankton County Agricultural Society and Bureau of Immigration. Gen. J. B. S. Todd was elected president of the association; A. J. Faulk, vice president; Mark M. Parmer, treasurer; and T. A. Kingsbury, secretary. An executive committee was appointed made up of Chas. H. McIntyre, W. P. Lyman, W. A. Burleigh, John Stanage, and M. K. Armstrong. It was declared to be the object of the association to hold a county exhibition if thought feasible; and also to disseminate among the people of the eastern states reliable information regarding Dakota and its agricultural resources particularly. The executive committee and the officers chosen were authorized and requested to prepare and have published such information, and also draft a set of rules for the government of the association. The following names were signed to the roll of membership: Louis Volin, J. R. Sanborn, J. M. Stone, J. B. S. Todd, Jas. W. Evans, Charles Eiseman, G. W. Kingsbury, M. U. Hoyt, J. A. Lewis, C. H. McIntyre, Wm. Tripp, A. J. Faulk, J. S. Gregory, J. B. Van Velsor, Simon Eiseman, W. P. Lyman, John J. Thompson, Wm. Leeper, M. E. Bonesteel, Geo. M. Campbell, George Hoosick, W. A. Burleigh, John Stanage, John E. Moran, John Sherrer, T. W. Brisbine, Mark M. Parmer, Henry Fisher, Rudolph Vonhis, Warren Osborne, Stephen Mosely, Grove Buell, J. F. Taylor, G. N. Propper, T. A. Kingsbury, M. K. Armstrong, Millard A. Baker, Maris Taylor, C. H. Edwards, Henry Bradley, Frank Bronson, S. H. Morrow and Henry Brown. County fairs were thereafter held regularly with Yankton County the seat of the territorial and state fair.

DAKOTA'S PROGRESS

After ten years of settlement and cultivation and experience, the people of Dakota who had been observant of the climate, soil, productions and natural resources of Dakota, had reached the conclusion that it was one of the best sections of the United States for general farming, including the rearing of domestic animals, and although the settlements had made but slight inroads upon the great treeless domain between the Missouri and Big Sioux and Red River of the North, all inhabited sections shared the general belief in the substantial character of the territory as an agricultural region capable under cultivation of contributing its full share to the food supplies of the world; the improvements of the year in country and town seemed to furnish a sort of turning point from a temporary to a more permanent class of improvements; everything betokened confidence in the future of Dakota, and enterprising men laid the foundations for permanent business and a growing trade.

The year 1860 was the most prosperous the territory had enjoyed. There had been comparatively a large increase in population, and a great deal of building and other improvements made in the towns and farming settlements. The season had been a favorable one for all kinds of grain, and the reports from the farms of the yield of wheat per acre seemed in many cases exaggerated, running as high as forty bushels. Considerable grain was shipped by steamboat during the fall to points on the lower Missouri. The year excelled in good crops, immigration and general improvement, and in the advancement of churches and common schools. At Yankton there were hundreds of new arrivals each month at the hotels, men who came to "spy out the land;" there was an extensive steamboat trade, boats arriving and departing during the boating season almost daily; the settlement of the Bohemian colony in Bon Homme and Yankton counties was an event of sufficient importance to render the year a notable one; there was abundant employment for the builders of brick and frame buildings, labor was at a premium; there was constant demand for native lumber, and prosperity beamed from every industry and every home.

From the records of the United States land office at Vermillion, the only one in the territory, though two others were established the same year, there were 300 claims taken in the month of June, and nearly all settled upon in the six counties of Minnehaha, Lincoln, Union, Clay, Yankton and Bon Homme. Immigration had just begun to cross the line into the interior and adjoining counties of Turner and Hutchinson. The number of claims taken during the month of May in the same counties was 186, nearly all by farmers and actual cultivators of the soil. Lincoln County received the greatest increase of population during the year, and Yankton was second. The City of Yankton increased in population a trifle over one hundred, and more than this number of sojourners were occupants of the hotels and boarding houses, coming and going. Yankton was the principal rendezvous for eastern parties, who made it their headquarters while prospecting the newer portions of the territory or contemplating a business venture, and in this way a large number of Dakota's early settlers became personally acquainted with the town and its people.

There had been small progress made in locating new towns in the territory during the decade beginning in 1859 and ending in 1869. Canton and Eden, in Lincoln County, had made a beginning in 1868; Sioux Falls had been abandoned in 1862 and reoccupied as a town just at the close of the decade; two small trading points that flourished for only a brief time under the names of Granville and Mapleton, in Minnehaha County, had been settled. This was the extent of the towns and trading points in the settled portions of the territory (with Swan Lake just budding into villagehood) that had been made since 1859, when Sioux Falls, Elk Point, Vermillion, Yankton and Bon Homme were occupied as towns. These places had grown and improved slowly, but met the full demand for market towns, while the number of farms and the farming population had grown in greater proportion.

The organization of Minnehaha County, which was perfected in 1862, was permitted to lapse after the abandonment of the county in August of that year on account of Indian hostilities. Nearly six years thereafter, a few settlers having ventured in during the preceding year, the Legislature reorganized the county by an act approved the 4th of January, 1868, retaining the former boundaries and appointing William Melvin, John Wilson and John Thompson county commissioners, and Edward Broughton register of deeds. The board appointed the remaining county officers.

The earliest settlers of the county when that country began to be settled permanently, in 1868, were John Langness, John Thompson, John Nelson, William Melvin, S. Delaney, John Aasen and his two sons, G. Gunderson and Ole Oleson. Langness came from Goodhue County, Minnesota, and crossed the Dakota line about due east of old Medary, and did not find a white settler in the Sioux Valley until he struck William Melvin's cabin, seven miles below the Dells. Some of the parties named above, particularly Thompson and Nelson, probably settled there in 1867. Langness has said that when he arrived in Minnehaha County he did not have a cent. He had with him his wife and one child, his father, mother and a sister. He also had two cows, one ox, a wagon, and owed $80 back in Minnesota, which was represented in a portion of the personal effects he brought along. He became a prominent and useful citizen and amassed a fortune from the land of the Minnehaha.

CHAPTER XLV

DEMOCRATS ELECT DELEGATE TO CONGRESS

THE DECADE BEGINNING WITH 1870—RAILROADS WERE DAKOTA'S PRESSING NEED—REVIEW OF THE PROGRESS OF SETTLEMENT—TERRITORIAL TREASURER'S REPORT—TOWNS AND POSTOFFICES—FIRST TELEGRAPH LINE—FEDERAL CENSUS BY COUNTIES—DAKOTA POLITICIANS AND POLITICAL PARTIES—BURLEIGH SEEKS REPUBLICAN NOMINATION—YANKTON COUNTY THE BATTLE GROUND—THE REPUBLICAN TERRITORIAL CONVENTION—NAMES OF DELEGATES—A SPLIT—BURLEIGH AND SPINK BOTH NOMINATED—DEMOCRATS NAME THEIR FIRST PARTY TICKET—DEMOCRATIC TERRITORIAL CONVENTION—NAMES OF DELEGATES—ARMSTRONG NOMINATED FOR DELEGATE TO CONGRESS AND ELECTED.

The decade beginning with 1870 was destined to be one of great and permanent importance to the territory. Railroads for the first time entered the territory during the second year of the decade, except that the Union Pacific had trespassed upon our soil in 1867-68 while Dakota embraced within its western boundaries the future Wyoming country; the Missouri swarmed with steamboats carrying merchandise and gold-seekers to Montana, and tens of thousands of tons of goods of many kinds to the military posts and thousands of Indians, great numbers of whom had promised to abandon the war path and in good faith undertake a civilized life, a promise that by a great majority was faithfully observed as we of today can testify. Immigration flowed into the territory through Fargo, Grand Forks, Wahpeton, Big Stone, Brookings, Watertown, Sioux Falls, Flandreau, Canton, and through the country opened up by Dakota's first railroad, the Dakota Southern, and through the gateway at Wahpeton on the headwaters of the Red River of the North down that wonderfully prolific and fertilized valley to Pembina on the northern border, part way across the northern portion of the territory to Bismarck on the newly constructed Northern Pacific Railroad. The Black Hills were opened and drew to their auriferous gulches and mountains scamed with valuable minerals, thousands of experienced miners, and husbandmen flocked to her pine laden slopes and fertile valleys all in one grand crusade. Overspreading the lands with the abodes and industries of civilization almost within twelve months. Immigration crept up the fertile grass covered valleys of the Big Sioux, the Vermillion and James rivers, and spread out over the intervening prairies, reclaiming to the uses of a civilized, industrious, Christian people, though not compactly, the entire area of the former Yankton Indian domain ceded in 1850. It was a decade of wonderful progress and prosperity, and notwithstanding serious reverses caused by drouth and the grasshopper scourge, the material improvement of the territory was steady, substantial, and foretold the early retrieval of the entire domain of Dakota to the occupation and uses of a highly civilized, intelligent and progressive God-fearing people.

A fleet of steamboats also plied the waters of the Red River of the North from its source to Winnipeg, reaping abundant reward from the growing settlements that bordered its banks and extended well into the interior.

MOSES K. ARMSTRONG

Pioneer of Yankton County, 1859. Member of first and succeeding legislature. Territorial delegate to Congress, 1870. Served two terms, retiring March, 1875.

THE INDIANS

In 1870, Gen. D. S. Stanley was in command of the military district of Dakota, with headquarters at Fort Sully. The 14th and 17th U. S. Infantry were stationed at different forts in the territory and at the Indian agencies, which then included Fort Randall, Fort Sully, Fort Rice, Fort Stevenson, Fort Buford, Fort Union, Fort Totten, and Fort Wadsworth then or near the Sisseton Reservation; and also the Indian agencies at Whetstone, Rosebud, Pine Ridge, Crow Creek, Fort Ramson, Fort Sully, Fort Bennett and the Cheyenne Indian Agency; Grand River, Standing Rock, Fort Berthold, Devil's Lake, and Fort Meade in the Black Hills, then being constructed.

From all unprejudiced accounts the Indians along the Upper Missouri Country even, as far away as Fort Benton, were unusually quiet and peaceable in 1870. Steamboats appeared to enjoy an immunity from that source, not a social and soliciting immunity, but were not menaced by any unfriendly conduct on the part of the red men. There were a number of depredations reported by small parties whose purpose was plunder of some sort and who coming across an opportunity of their roaming, seemed unable to refrain from the vicious practices and time-honored customs of their race to confiscate the white man's property, and occasionally take his scalp along as an evidence of prowess, which would be carried back to his tribe and displayed as a badge that would aid in elevating him to the rank of chief. But there were no signs of hostility toward the whites that indicated a general sentiment of that character among the Sioux; and the credit for this agreeable state of affairs was ascribed to President Grant's new peace policy. Whatever disturbances occurred were notably above Fort Berthold, reaching beyond Fort Buford, and were attributed to the Crows and other Mountain Indians.

ENTERPRISE OF RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS

Not alone in a material way did the territory make encouraging progress in the period alluded to. The religious and educational interests of the territory were also notably promoted. One of the best practical as well as theoretical educators in the West had come to be a Dakotan during the year 1869, and while not connected, officially, with the educational department of the territory, the new surveyor general, W. H. H. Beadle, was a host in the educational field for which he felt so much friendliness and earnest interest, that he gratuitously devoted much of his time to assisting those charged with administering the law governing common schools and speaking to educators and those being educated.

The church organizations were all under the supervision and direction of superior men and aggressive forces. Rev. Joseph Ward, of the Congregationalists, an organized host and a host at organization in himself; Bishop Robert Clarkson, of the Episcopal denomination, assisted by Reverend Doctor Hoyt, Rev. P. B. Morrison, and Rev. S. D. Hinman, who had charge of the Indian missions; the Methodist organization, under the leadership of the presiding elder, Bennett Mitchell, located at Sioux City; Bishop Marty, of the Roman Catholic Church, was in charge of the Dakota field; the Baptists were also quite aggressive under the Rev. Geo. W. Freeman, of Elk Point, while the Scandinavian Lutherans and the German Lutherans were doing their full part in the religious work of the territory. It would seem that in all the commendable important constituents of growth and improvement, the fabric of the best civilization and civil government, was being made use of in the work of constructing the foundations and superstructures of the territory's religious and educational institutions. It was a prosperous period largely for those who counted prosperity only in dollars; it was much more substantially prosperous to those who counted the increase of general improvement—the increase of churches and schoolhouses; the growth of the church in membership, the school in pupils, and the multiplying of the number of school structures; the improvement of roads by the needed bridging of streams, and a general uplift which all these improvements betokened. Dakota Territory, so scrupulously avoided a few years before, was becoming better known and appreciated by the good people of the country.

In 1870 the common school system of the territory was represented by eleven public schools in Union County; six schools in Clay County; three in Yankton with two private schools in the city; four in Lincoln County; one in Bon Homme, and one in Minnehaha. It will be observed that the white settlements of the territory were still confined to the four Missouri River counties, and two on the Big Sioux. It is probable that a school had been established at Pembina during this year which was the beginning of white immigration to that quarter, but no report from it was received by the superintendent.

It will be observed, or should be, that the history of Dakota Territory so far as it has to do with the white settlement, has been confined to a very narrow portion of the great domain, but stretching from Pembina on the Red River of the north, along the eastern boundary to the intersection of the Big Sioux with the Missouri River, thence west and northwest for 150 miles along the Missouri. There was no organized county north of the few counties in which local governments were established in 1862. All was a waste of fertile prairie, inhabited, if at all, by a very few widely scattered bands of Indians, most of whom belonged to the Dakota or Sioux Nation.

RAILROADS WANTED

The topic that most interested the substantial element of Dakota's population in the year 1870, was connected with securing railroad facilities that would furnish a ready outlet for the surplus farm produce of the settled portion of the territory, which was growing larger and more valuable, as well as more difficult to dispose of profitably, as time passed. Wheat was the principal staple of our farms, and the expense of hauling it to market at Sioux City ate up the small margin left to the producer after his crop was harvested and cared for. The general sentiment of the settlers in the Missouri Valley favored a road connecting at Sioux City, and passing up the valley through Elk Point, Vermillion, Yankton and Bon Homme. Above Bon Homme the population was more of a nomadic character and somewhat indifferent, having at that time very little, if anything, to transport to eastern markets, and for that which they wished to sell, finding a good market at the fort and Indian agencies convenient to their settlements. There were also commercial advantages and economy which the merchants as well as people had to consider. The steamboats could be depended upon during the boating season, but for five months in the year, stated as an average, the river was closed and merchandise was subject to a long and expensive haul in freight wagons, and was not always procurable at the time needed.

Yankton had without intent and through circumstances that she could not control, excited the suspicion in the minds of many settlers in Clay and Union counties, in the southern portion of those counties, which then contained a large majority of the population, that the people of the Capitol City were opposing a line of road with Sioux City as the starting point, and favoring the McGregor and Western, then building through Northern Iowa, which would practically ignore, by its proposed route west of the Big Sioux, the principal towns and a majority of the settlements in both Clay and Union counties. The only justification for this feeling toward Yankton, was the apparently earnest efforts of the McGregor and Western to build their road through to the Big Sioux at Canton or near there, then across to Yankton on the Missouri. This projected road was not in the least due to any effort made by Dakota interests. The McGregor and Western was seeking a Missouri River terminus and Yankton was then its choice.

The sentiment of Yankton was governed to a large extent by its ambition to secure the advantages of steamboat traffic, which was at this time controlled by

Sioux City, and unquestionably led the sentiment of the latter place to obstruct any movement toward extending the railway beyond to any Missouri River point.

In order to defeat or neutralize this opposition, Yankton made an effort to secure railway connection with the Illinois Central at LeMars, and at one time the project appeared to have the favor of the Illinois Central Company. As a rival of Sioux City, this connection seemed to guarantee to Yankton the cooperation of the strongest railway corporation in the West, in advancing the city's commercial interests, and it may have been the apprehension that such a road would be built that modified the sentiment of hostility at Sioux City, and finally led her to favor, rather than oppose, the extension to Yankton, from that point.

TOWNS AND POSTOFFICES

There were few towns and postoffices in Dakota Territory in 1870. The number had made but a trifling increase in ten years. The traveler coming in to the territory from Sioux City and crossing the Big Sioux on the Government bridge, would journey a distance of twenty miles to Elk Point before reaching a town, though a postoffice had been established at Jefferson, eight miles east of the Point, on the stage road. Elk Point was the county seat of Union County, and had grown to be something of a village; a weekly newspaper, the Elk Point Leader, was published, conducted by F. O. Wisner. The population of the town was claimed to be 500. Eight miles northwest was a new town called Liberty, owned by the Curtis family, somewhat famous as vocalists, where there could be found a postoffice, sawmill, schoolhouse, blacksmith shop and the Curtis residence. On the journey the traveler would have observed a fair sprinkling of log cabins and some frame residences, along the road. From Liberty it was seven miles to Vermillion, situated on the bank of the Missouri River, fated to be its destroyer ten years later; Vermillion had about six hundred population; it was the county seat of Clay County, the home of the Dakota Republican newspaper, conducted by Lucien O'Brien, and a United States land office, the seat of the United States Court for the First Judicial District; with two hotels, a sawmill nearby, a number of stores, and a number of lawyers, doctors, and a due proportion of clergymen. Clay County had made considerable progress in agriculture and was fairly well settled in its southern townships and along the lower valley of the Vermillion River. Crossing the Vermillion River was the Government bridge, and eight miles west was the Town of Lincoln, or rather the stage station and postoffice. It was located by Mr. Taylor, who came in with the New York colony in 1864, and took up a homestead there. It contained a first rate hotel kept by Mr. and Mrs. Taylor, was the seat of a schoolhouse, blacksmith shop, and possibly a country store. Sixteen miles further west by north the James River was crossed on the Government bridge, and four miles beyond the James the traveler would reach Yankton, the capital of the territory; said to be the finest natural townsite on the Missouri River, although Lewis and Clark did not observe its municipal topography, but gave their only recommendation in that line to the mouth of White River and a tract adjoining. Yankton was now an incorporated city, with fine hotels, two church edifices, Episcopal and Congregational—public school, an academy, the Dakota Hall, for young ladies seeking a higher education, two newspapers—the Union and Dakotian, and the Yankton Press; a town of about twelve hundred population, governed by a city charter and the usual officials provided for by such legislative grants, doing a large commercial business with the forts and Indian agencies, and ranchmen, to the west and north, and the prospective terminus of the Dakota and Northwestern Railroad from Sioux City, then theoretically under construction; also the McGregor and Western or the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul then building through northern Iowa; also the Columbus and Yankton from Nebraska; and the Minnesota and Missouri River, now the Southern Minnesota Railroad.

Twenty miles by land due west, located on the banks of the Missouri River, was the little Town of Bon Homme, county seat of Bon Homme County, where two good stores were kept, a fairly good hotel, schoolhouse, two or three residences, blacksmith shop, and other appurtenances of a promising village including a postoffice and courthouse. Eight miles farther was located the new Town of Springfield, where a United States land office had just been installed, and a new land district formed called the Springfield Land District. The firm of Bonesteel & Turner was just arranging to open a store here. A hotel was kept by a widow lady. The town was located nearly opposite the new Santee Indian Agency and Reservation in Nebraska, from which it afterward derived a portion of its prosperity. Beyond Springfield thirty-five miles was Greenwood, on the east bank of the Missouri, the official residence of the Yankton Indian agent, and the seat of the Yankton Indian Reservation. Fifteen miles above Greenwood but on the opposite side of the Missouri, Fort Randall was located, and at this time was garrisoned by four companies of United States troops. Opposite Randall was a postoffice called White Swan, and a few miles above another called Wheeler, both in Charles Mix County, of which Wheeler was the seat. Twenty miles above Randall, on the east side of the Missouri River, lay Harney City, a frontier trading point, and a steamboat landing. Harney City was opposite the mouth of Whetstone Creek or the point where the Government agency had been established for the Sioux on the great reservation. The supplies for Spotted Tail and Red Cloud's Indians were landed at Whetstone landing and hauled out to the agencies in the interior. There was quite an Indian settlement at Whetstone in addition to the agent and his white employees. There was a postoffice at Harney, and an average population of 200, made up largely of cattlemen, herdsmen, "wood-hawks," and a few merchants, restaurant keepers, and others, and it was spoken of by those who had visited the place as the wildest frontier town in the country. No serious crimes, however, were known to have been committed there.

The Hamilton settlement was the next point where a little colony of white people had made a settlement on Platte Creek, on the east side of the river. This was the home of Major Hamilton and his sons and a few others. Hamilton had been on the frontiers over fifty years, and had become quite famous. He is referred to in another chapter. As the necessities of the Government required the transmission of a voluminous mail, all the forts and agencies above Randall were supplied once a week; and the telegraph was extended from Yankton to Fort Sully in the early '70s, being built by the United States Government. The Hamilton settlement was the last of the white settlements on the public lands in that direction.

The old Town of Mixville in Todd County had not prospered, and all of Dakota in Todd and Gregory counties, had been included in the Great Sioux Reservation. Sixty-five miles east of north of Yankton lay the Village of Sioux Falls, which after seven years of repose, had been released from the burden of a military reservation, and was growing rapidly. It contained the old military barracks, four stores, a hotel, about three hundred people, and there was then talk of starting a newspaper. Twenty miles south, on the Big Sioux, was the new Town of Canton, with a population of over one hundred, the county seat of Lincoln County, with two or three stores and two hotels, a widely scattered hamlet, a schoolhouse, and great expectations. Sixteen miles south of Canton, by the road, was "Buck Wheelock's" town, Eden, which boasted a postoffice. There were three country postoffices below Eden, in Union County, named respectively, Virginia, Sioux Valley and Le Roy, then came Richland, at the mouth of Brule Creek, where there would be found a store, hotel, postoffice, and two residences.

Above Vermillion twelve miles, on the Vermillion River, was the Bloomington Flour Mills, owned by James McHenry and John W. Turner and operated by water power. A postoffice was established here; six miles farther was a new point called Lodi. Swan Lake, in Lincoln (now Turner), County was a post-office on the Yankton and Sioux Falls route, and Bergen, Yankton County, east of the James River, was also a postoffice. Both have long since been discontinued.

The James River Valley had been explored by homesteaders to a point called Rockport in the southern part of Hanson County, where a settlement was made; also one at Maxwell City, and at Olivet in Hutchinson County, but no mail route had been established in that direction. Gen. C. T. Campbell's ranch on Dawson Creek, Bon Homme County, was a favorite stopping place for explorers, and ranchmen, who traversed the country from Yankton over the James River Valley.

On the Red River of the North, the Town of Pembina was becoming an important center. The northern part of the territory had been erected into a judicial district, the third, and the United States District Court held two terms annually at Pembina, Chief Justice George W. French, presiding. The United States custom house and land office were located here, a number of stores were doing business and trading for furs, a good hotel had been built by Mr. Stutsman; and nearly was being erected Fort Pembina, garrisoned by United States troops. St. Joseph was another postoffice on the Pembina River, thirty miles west of Pembina, then an important point. There were a few flourishing farming settlements on the Red at this time, and land was being homesteaded in Pembina County, and also in Richland County at the headwaters of the Red. There was also a postoffice at Fort Abercrombie.

A few homeseekers had also gone into Brookings County in 1870, and selected land, but no mail routes had been established north of Sioux Falls.

Dakota Territory had increased in population during the ten preceding years from about two thousand to 14,200, but the only permanent towns or trading centers that were established during the decade were Canton, Lincoln County; Springfield, Bon Homme County; and Lincoln (now Meckling), in Clay County. The other towns that survived had their beginning before the territory was organized. Union and Clay counties had gained largely in their farming population; Yankton County had not done so well. Bon Homme and Yankton had profited by the Bohemian immigration; Minnehaha and Lincoln were just beginning to attract settlers. But there was no longer a disposition to decry Dakota; it entered its second decade with a reasonable certainty of rapid growth and moderate prosperity.

DAKOTA FINANCES

REPORT OF THE TERRITORIAL TREASURER, FOR 1869-70

Treasurer's Office, Yankton, D. T., Dec. 31, 1870.

To the Honorable Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

T. K. HOVEY, Territorial Treasurer.

FIRST TELEGRAPH LINE

The first telegraph line constructed in Dakota was built by John F. Daggett, S. V. Clevenger, and D. M. Percy, all of Sioux City, during the summer and fall of 1870, and was completed from Sioux City to Yankton, on Monday, December 5th, of that year, when the first office was opened and messages sent and received on that day. The office was in the new St. Charles Hotel, Capital Street. Actual work on the line was begun about October 1st, under the supervision of A. T. Dinney, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Cottonwood and ash poles were used because they could readily be procured, the plan being to replace them with red cedar which could be obtained in the country west of Yankton. The length of the line, with its necessary switches, was sixty-seven miles. The cost was $8,000, or about one hundred and twenty dollars a mile. Yankton, Vermillion and Sioux City contributed toward the building of the line, and offices were opened at these points on the same day. Mr. Daggett was the operator at the Sioux City office; William Lower, in charge at Vermillion, and Mr. Clevenger took charge of the Yankton office. The first rates established would appear exorbitant if charged at the present time. For ten words from Yankton to Vermillion, 35 cents; to Sioux City, 75 cents; to Omaha, $1.75; to Chicago, $2.65; to Washington, $3.90; New York, $4.35. No office was established at Elk Point at first, owing to the failure of the parties to come to an understanding regarding the subsidy.

An act of Congress passed in February, 1871, provided for the construction of a telegraph line, under the direction of the United States Government War Department, from Yankton to Fort Sully by way of Fort Randall, the cost not to exceed $8,000 for each 100 miles. The act also provided that the ownership of the line should not vest in the United States but in the contractors or builders of the line, and the $80.00 a mile paid by the Government should be a loan to be repaid in telegraph tolls, the Government holding a lien upon the line until the sum advanced was repaid. The same parties who constructed and owned the Sioux City and Yankton line built the Fort Sully extension; and in 1872 the Government established a weather bureau and signal station at both Yankton and Sully.

THE DECENNIAL CENSUS

The Federal census taken June 1st, 1870, disclosed the following important information regarding the population, improvements, and many other items, of the Territory of Dakota. The census was taken at that time under the direction of the United States marshal, Laban H. Litchfield:

The population of the United States and territories by this federal census was 78,767,000.

The reader of this history is well informed of the political party situation in Dakota prior to 1870. Practically there had been no democratic party in the territory or in the United States during the administration of Andrew Johnson which terminated in March, 1869. The democratic party was allied with the President in his reconstruction policy, and its members as well as republicans, were the recipients of his favors in the appointments to various Government positions throughout the United States. The assassination of Mr. Lincoln made a vacancy in the office of President which Vice President Johnson was called upon to fill by authority of the Constitution, but this did not give him the confidence of the people to the extent that Mr. Lincoln had possessed it, and with his elevation to that high office came the anxious question whether he would follow in the steps of his predecessor—the greatest fear being that he would be less charitable in his dealings with the “ex-rebels,” as the people of the revolted states were called, than would Mr. Lincoln have been, whose kindliness and sympathy for the unfortunate were among his prominent traits of character; and Mr. Johnson, early in his career as President, emphasized his attitude toward the leaders of secession by his oft-repeated declaration that he would “make treason odious.” Circumstances, however, forced Johnson into a position of practical antagonism to the ruling sentiment of the republican leaders of Congress on the reconstruction question, and naturally enough the democratic party took sides with him because of this antagonism to republican leaders, and not because he represented democratic principles, or was endeavoring to foster any policy of that party regarding the reconstruction of the revolted states, for both policies—that of the President as well as Congress—were probably republican in their origin, and both had the sanction and active support of prominent republicans of the country. And it may fairly be claimed that had Mr. Lincoln lived to carry forward his reconstruction plan, whatever it may have been, because of the confidence reposed in him by the people, the President and Congress would have worked in harmony, and there would have been no serious division between the executive and legislative departments of the Government.

In Dakota, if the reader will remember, at the republican convention of the year 1866, when the first symptoms of a division between Congress and the President were publicly manifested in our political gatherings, the democrats of Dakota responded to the calls made by the republican or national union party, in attending caucuses and conventions, and were able by the preponderance of their numbers, caused by republicans declining to indorse the Johnson policy, to capture the organizations and make the nominations for legislative and county officers from their own political flesh and blood.

While a number of the republicans remained with the old organization, the larger portion withdrew, and under the leadership of W. W. Brookings, a new republican organization was formed in the territory that made Mr. Brookings its candidate for delegate, in opposition to Doctor Burleigh, the Johnson-republican candidate. Burleigh was elected, and during the ensuing two years the contest between the President and Congress grew more embittered, the breach widened until it was beyond closing or healing, and thousands of republicans who had started in to support the President at the beginning of the division, had discovered that they were being practically landed in the democratic party, had called a halt, and were allying themselves with the now acknowledged republican organization represented in the reconstruction policy of Congress.

Doctor Burleigh was a life-long republican, although he had been one of the principal supporters of Mr. Johnson. He was probably the strongest personality that had ever appeared in the political field in Dakota, although the honor might be divided with General Todd. He was the embodiment of energy; he was possessed of a liberal education, and had acquired much valuable and varied knowledge of practical affairs. Professionally, he was among the best. He was a strong common-sense speaker. He was recklessly extravagant in expenditures, and the expenses of his campaigns were not considered a legitimate reason, by himself, for defeat. He had a very large following in the republican party, and could always command strong support from individuals in the opposition. He had a faculty of becoming on familiar terms with his supporters and controlling them. He was, taken altogether, a very strong, magnetic, influential man, of good ability in public life; but during his successful political career he appeared to have less confidence in his own merits as an element of strength in vote-getting than in the less commendable practices of the politician; and he conducted his campaigns, apparently, with little concern for the methods employed if the methods promised to contribute to his success. He could not be denominated a machine politician, for he was not controlled by any associates, and himself constituted the machine, if he had one. It may be said, however, in extenuation of this phase of his public career, that he believed he was fighting an enemy who would resort to every expedient to accomplish his defeat, and he was compelled, in self-defense, to "fight the devil with fire."

But as the term of President Johnson neared its close, stamped with the disapproval of the people, and at the same time the term of Doctor Burleigh terminated, leaving him without a party, it was discerned that the doctor was not disposed to be counted among the anti-republicans. His pyrotechnic political display in Wyoming in 1868 was said to have been inspired by a desire to keep the territory from electing a Wyoming democrat as delegate. Mr. Spink, the regular republican nominee, was elected delegate. Another two years elapses, and the political conditions in Dakota were no longer chaotic. The breach between the President and Congress no longer existed. Grant was President; the congressional policy had been sustained, and the southern states that had seceded were being restored to the Union in accordance with the congressional plan. Doctor Burleigh was emphatically a republican and ambitious as ever to secure a nomination from that party for the office of delegate. In this he was opposed at first by nearly all the leading republicans of the territory. He had with him, however, a strong contingent of the rank and file, and as his only opponent was Mr. Spink, an able man but poorly equipped for a political leader, Burleigh early succeeded in winning over some of the influential men of the republican party. He also had the sympathy and quiet support of a large number of democrats who were willing to aid in his nomination but would vote for a democrat in case one was nominated, and there was every indication that Moses K. Armstrong would be able to secure the democratic nomination and with it the united support of his party.

The pre-convention battleground in 1870 was Yankton County, and nearly every voter in the county, regardless of his party affiliations, was an interested spectator if not a participant of the struggle between Burleigh and Spink for control of the caucuses and convention which was to elect delegates to the territorial nominating convention. As the great majority of voters were keenly interested in the strife, it followed that many of the democrats gave a helping hand and voice to help the side he favored, or like the woman in the old-time fictitious story which related that the good wife saw her husband and a bear engaged in a hand to paw conflict, and believing that each party was entitled to fair play and no favors, shouted: "Go it husband; go it bear;" for in this political duel between these republican factions they foresaw such an irreconcilable division in the republican ranks as would give to the democrats more than an equal chance of capturing the congressman—and the end fully justified their foresight.

Mr. Spink, who then held the delegateship, was a candidate for reelection and the probable choice of the republicans of the territory, though Col. G. C. Moody, an able lawyer, had numerous friends who were urging his candidacy, but the partisans of these aspirants worked in harmony. In this situation the primary caucuses and county conventions were called by the republican committees, and the contest between Burleigh and Spink, at these primaries, was of the fiercest character. In Yankton County there were three precincts. No. 1, east of James River, where the caucus was held at the farm residence of John J. Thompson. No. 2, at Yankton; caucus at Stone's Hall. No. 3, at the farm residence of Royal H. Jones, west of Yankton about five miles. These caucuses were held on the 27th of August, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. What was known as the Crawford County caucus system, borrowed from Wisconsin, had been adopted for these caucuses, which required the election of delegates to be made by ballot. It was the forerunner of the later primary election.

The first district caucus met at the hour appointed at Thompson's and elected L. H. Litchfield, chairman, and A. K. Marvin, secretary. The following resolution was presented by Mr. Brookings, a Spink supporter:

Resolved, That this is a republican convention, called for the transaction of business relating to the republican party, and that the tellers be instructed to receive votes from no one but recognized republicans; and that when the tellers are in doubt as to the political principles of any voter, the voter be directed to disclose his political faith before his vote is received.

The motion to adopt the resolution was lost by a vote of 94 to 85, which indicated that there was a number of anti-republicans present; and the Spink element, under the leadership of Judge Brookings, withdrew and repaired to the house of Mr. Shepherdson, where they held an independent caucus. Those remaining went forward and elected nine delegates to the county convention, namely: Ole C. Peterson, Peter W. Johnson, H. H. Davenport, L. H. Litchfield, John J. Thompson, Christ Brued, Frank Bronson, Iver Bagstad and M. A. Baker, all receiving 95 and 96 votes each.

The Spink party, at Shepherdson's house, elected A. P. Hammon, chairman, and Erick Iverson, secretary, and elected the following named delegates to the county convention: Erick Iverson, Ole Sampson, W. E. Root, Mathias Larson, Clark West, A. P. Hammon, A. L. Van Osdel, Ole C. Peterson, Peter Johnson, and then adjourned.

The second district caucus was held at Stone's Hall on Capital Street, in Yankton, and was very largely attended, showing that the people were deeply interested in the political situation, and political problems. T. W. Hammon was elected chairman, and Turney M. Wilkins, J. D. Boyer and Dr. O. H. Conger, secretaries. Mr. Geo. N. Propper proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That all persons who will pledge themselves to support and vote for the nominees of the republican convention to assemble at Vermillion on the 6th of September next, and for the nominees of the republican county convention to assemble on the 30th inst., are invited to participate in the proceedings of this meeting, and no one who will not so pledge themselves, shall be allowed to vote at this meeting, and who are supporters of President Grant and his administration. The resolution was unanimously adopted.

George A. Batchelder, O. C. Baldy, William Tripp, James Beadle and Ed Barker were appointed tellers to receive and count the votes. The election of delegates by ballot was then proceeded with; the attendance was crushingly numerous, and many of the voters were questioned about their political antecedents; trouble arose, fraudulent voting, repeating and stuffing the hats was alleged, and finally there was a withdrawal of a large portion of the assemblage, who repaired to the Hanson Building on the opposite corner. The result of the ballot at this caucus at Stone's Hall was the election of T. W. Hammon, J. D. Sears, J. A. Bunker, Henry Arend, Nelson Learned, Simon Eiseman, A. L. Hinman, M. T. Woolley, John Lawrence and Daniel O'Farrel, who received 135 votes each. The caucus then adjourned.

The withdrawing party gathered at the Hanson Building, where George H. Hand was elected chairman and J. D. Boyer, secretary. The election of ten delegates was then proceeded with, and the following named chosen: J. D. Boyer,

PIONEERS OF DAKOTA TERRITORY

G. W. Kingsbury, editor of the first newspaper in Dakota
H. T. Bailey, of first party of A. H. Shober, President of first emigrants to Yankton Territorial Council
C. J. Johnson, brother of the first cabin in Yankton
William Jayne, first Governor of Dakota Territory
C. E. Hanson, chief clerk of first Territorial House

M. U. Hoyt, Rudolph Von Ins, J. R. Hanson, W. E. Babcock, H. J. Brisbane, Wm. Miner, George H. Hand and William Leaning. The caucus then adjourned.

The Third District caucus met at the house of Royal H. Jones, and elected Warren Cowles, chairman, and M. B. Doyle, secretary. The following named delegates were chosen: W. H. H. Beadle, Frank Bem, George Campbell, Dr. J. W. Wheelock, Jacob Ruffner, Washington Reed, Joel A. Potter, and S. K. Felton, who received 120 votes each. There was another set of delegates voted for, who received about thirty-five votes each, which shows that the caucus was well attended for a rural caucus, and that the voters were awake to their political privileges.

In the three caucuses, or rather five, including the double-headers, there had been about five hundred and fifty-five votes polled, and by comparing this total with the caucuses previously held, and those afterward held for a number of years, we believe it will be found that the record high mark for attendance was reached at this time. The total vote of the county at the election held shortly after was 869—it was conceded that everybody voted who was able to get to the polls, at this election—of which number Armstrong received 330; leaving 533 divided between Burleigh and Spink, or twenty-two votes less than was cast at the three republican caucuses.

The Yankton County convention was called for August 30th, and as two sets of delegates had been elected from two of the precincts, and no "olive branch" was tendered from either side, there was no effort made to unite. Two conventions were held, two sets of delegates elected to the territorial convention and two county and legislative tickets nominated.

The Spink convention elected J. D. Boyer, M. U. Hoyt, J. R. Hanson, O. C. Peterson, Ole Sampson, A. P. Hammon, Erick Iverson, Jacob Braun and Rudolph Von Ins delegates to the territorial convention; and the following resolution was also adopted:

Resolved, That the delegates elected by this convention be instructed to vote against the nomination of Walter A. Burleigh at the republican convention in Vermillion, and to oppose his nomination first, last and all the time.

The Burleigh Republican convention met with their delegates present from the three precincts, at Stone's Hall, organized, appointed committees, and then adjourned to Burleigh's Hall on Broadway, where the Committee on Resolutions reported the following:

Resolved, That we desire, above all other things politically, the harmony, integrity and success of the Republican party and the permanence of republican principles in the nation and territory; that we refer with pride to the record of our national party; its triumph over treason and for liberty; its defense of civil, and guarantee of political rights.

Resolved, That we heartily endorse the administration of President Grant and the republican party in Congress in their faithfulness to the principles of our party, their guard of the public credit, reduction of the public debt, perpetuity and support of the system giving free lands to actual settlers, and the honorable administration of public affairs.

Resolved, That we do and ever will support and sustain the great fundamental principle of the republican party—that the people and they alone, are the only legitimate and natural source of political power in a free government, and to them alone belongs the right to make and unmake laws and to remove and appoint their own public servants.

Resolved, That we regret the recent action of politicians in the county in failing to act with the majority of the republican people.

Resolved, That we pledge ourselves to the faithful support of the nominees of the regular republican convention to be held at Vermillion, September 6, 1870.

The following named delegates to the republican territorial convention were then elected: J. A. Potter, T. W. Brisbane, Iver Bagstad, Frank Bronson, A. J. Faulk, Arthur Linn, S. Eisman, Warren Cowles and T. W. Hammon.

The following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the delegation of Yankton County to the territorial convention to be held at Vermillion, on the 6th of September, 1870, are hereby instructed to cast the vote of the county as follows:

said county for Hon. W. A. Burleigh, as a candidate for delegate to Congress, first, last and all the time, and the majority of said delegates shall cast the whole nine votes as a unit. The convention then adjourned.

THE REPUBLICAN TERRITORIAL CONVENTIONS, 1870

The republican territorial convention was held at Vermillion, September 6, 1870, meeting at Lee & Prentiss's Hall. Col. G. C. Moody, chairman of the territorial committee, called the convention to order, and nominated Mr. Curtis, of Union County, for chairman. Warren Cowles nominated Aaron Carpenter, of Clay, and Carpenter was elected. The first jangle occurred over the appointment of a Committee on Credentials. It appeared that Clay County was the only county in the convention that did not have a contesting delegation; and S. C. Fargo, A. J. Smith, T. C. Hartshorn, A. J. Mills and Fred J. Cross, of that county, were appointed the credentials committee. The convention then adjourned until 5 o'clock P. M., to give this committee time to make up its report and hear the contests. The committee were not able to agree, but divided; three, Hartshorn, Fargo and Smith, recommending the admission of the Burleigh delegates throughout, and Mills and Cross recommending the Spink delegates.

This occasioned considerable debate and questioning, and a partial demand for a reopening of the work of the committee, which terminated in the refusal of the Spink delegates to attend the convention after recess. The three members of the committee then reported that there were no contesting delegations, and recommended the seating of the following named delegates: Todd County—John W. Smith, Todd Randall, E. W. Raymond. Charles Mix County—W. T. McKay, William Hobrough. Bon Homme County—Nathan McDaniels, W. H. Orcutt, John W. Owens. Yankton County—J. A. Potter, S. Eisenman, T. W. Brisbane, Warren Cowles, Oliver Bagstad, Frank Bronson, A. J. Faulk, Arthur Linn, T. W. Hammond. Clay County—A. Carpenter, T. C. Hartshorn, Knud Larson, C. H. Bennett, A. J. Smith, A. J. Mills, F. J. Cross, Amund Hanson and S. C. Fargo. Union County—Archie Christie, C. B. Vradenburg, R. R. Green, David Walters, John Edwards, H. W. McNiel, B. F. Smith, J. A. Smith, I. N. Flannagan, James Ross. Lincoln County—Perry C. Park, G. W. Harlan, W. R. McLaury. Minnehaha County—R. F. Pettigrew, C. M. Coats.

The report was adopted.

The convention then elected T. W. Brisbane, of Yankton, permanent chairman, and H. W. McNiel and F. J. Cross, secretaries. The nomination of Doctor Burleigh for delegate to Congress was then made by acclamation. T. W. Hammond, of Yankton, was then nominated for territorial treasurer; William Shriner, of Clay County, for territorial auditor, and Rev. H. W. McNiel, of Union County, for superintendent of public instruction.

Warren Cowles from the Committee on Resolutions, submitted a report, as follows:

Resolved, That the republican party of Dakota Territory approves the administration of President Grant as honorable, patriotic and economical, and fulfilling in an eminent degree the purposes for which governments are formed; and we pledge to that administration and its distinguished head an unwavering and earnest support.

Resolved, That we recommend to the people of this territory the candidates, we, in obedience to public sentiment, have presented to them, as men eminently worthy of their suffrages and support, and we hereby pledge ourselves, and pledge the people of this territory, to procure for them a triumphant election in October next.

Resolved, That railroads in this territory are the great and primary want of this people; and it is the wish and sentiment of our men of all parties, that Congress give to the several railroads seeking passage through our territory, liberal grants of land to aid in their construction. And our candidate for delegate is hereby pledged and instructed, when elected, to proceed to Washington and urge upon Congress, with all the influence he can bring to bear, and by all the moral power of our entire people, to procure for the Dakota and Northwestern Railroad, traversing the country from north to south, and the McGregor and Yankton, and Southern Minnesota railroads, entering the territory at Canton and Sioux Falls, respectively, the granting of such aid in lands as shall secure their early construction—these three railroads being preeminently necessary to the early and rapid development of our territory.

Resolved, That we deeply deplore the passage of the act of Congress of the 13th day of July last, requiring all preceptors on the public lands to make speedy payment for the same, as a law which a large portion of the settlers of this territory cannot comply with. It will have the effect to give capitalists and speculators the principal portion of the public land of this territory, and drive from the land and the territory thousands of the poor men who have sought a residence among us, and are creating homes with so much labor and privation. We urge upon our candidate, if elected, to proceed to Washington and in the name of the men of all parties in this territory, to persuade Congress next winter, to repeal this harmful law so far as it applies to our people.

Resolved, That it is the sentiment of this convention and the people whom they represent, that the policy heretofore and now pursued of withholding the public lands of this territory from sale, except to actual settlers, has proved itself a wise policy, and one tending to the rapid settlement and development of the country, and we desire the same policy continued as long as these lands in the territory are open to settlement.

The resolutions were adopted. A central committee composed of Laban H. Litchfield, of Yankton, chairman; Wm. H. Hobrough, Charles Mix; John Smith, Todd County; John W. P. Owens, Bon Homme; Horace J. Austin, Clay County; E. Le Gro, Union; N. Phillips, Minnehaha; C. L. Gardner, Lincoln County, was appointed. The convention then adjourned.

THE ANTI-FURLEIGH CONVENTION

The Spink delegates assembled at the schoolhouse, in Vermillion, and were called to order by G. P. Bennett, of the central committee. J. F. Curtis, of Union County, was chosen temporary chairman, and M. U. Hoyt, of Yankton, secretary.

A Committee on Credentials was then appointed consisting of G. P. Bennett, of Union; F. J. Cross, of Clay; B. S. Gillespie, of Lincoln; A. P. Hammon, of Yankton, and Charles Allen, of Minnehaha, which reported the following named delegates entitled to seats: Minnehaha County—John Thompson and Charles Allen. Lincoln County—B. S. Gillespie, A. E. Wheelock, John Falda. Union County—G. P. Bennett, Emory Morris, J. F. Curtis, D. Ross, Sr., H. N. Wicks, A. Gibson, P. Crum, S. L. Parker, Ole Holte, J. B. Mannes. Clay County—F. J. Cross and A. J. Mills. Yankton County—M. U. Hoyt, J. D. Boyer, Erick Iverson, Ole Sampson, Jacob Brauch, Ole C. Peterson, J. R. Hanson, A. P. Hammon and Rudolph Von Ins. Todd County—C. H. McIntyre, proxy for three delegates elected from that county.

On motion, J. F. Curtis was made permanent chairman, and F. J. Cross, of Clay, secretary.

A motion was adopted requiring twenty-two votes to nominate a candidate.

An informal ballot was then taken for the nomination of a candidate for delegate to Congress, resulting as follows: Yankton County, Spink, 4; Moody, 5; Minnehaha County, Spink, 2; Lincoln, Spink, 2; Moody, 1; Todd, Spink, 3; Clay, Spink, 2; Union, Spink, 10. Total, Spink, 22; Moody, 6.

The formal ballot was then taken, giving Spink, 24; Moody, 5; whereupon Spink was made the unanimous choice.

W. S. Smith, of Lincoln, was nominated for territorial auditor; T. K. Hovey, of Clay County, for territorial treasurer; and E. H. Webb, of Union, superintendent of public instruction.

The following central committee was then appointed: O. B. Iverson, Minnehaha; J. Q. Fitzgerald, Lincoln; Fred J. Cross, Clay; G. P. Bennett, Union; Geo. H. Hand, Yankton.

The Committee on Resolutions made the following report which was adopted:

Resolved, By the republicans of Dakota Territory in delegate convention assembled, that we heartily approve and cordially endorse the administration of President Grant, recognizing in him one whose every effort is directed to the promotion of the best interests of the people and the Government.

Resolved, That the patriotic and unswerving course of the Congress of the United States as exhibited in reconstruction, in finance, and in foreign affairs, merits and receives our cordial approval and our warmest praise.

Resolved, That as the representatives of the republican party of Dakota, we unreservedly denounce the conduct of W. A. Burleigh, and his principal supporters in Dakota, for the outrageous, indecent, and illegal manner in which he and they have sought to override the republican party of Dakota, and foist upon them, by rowdyism and bullying, a candidate who has no claims as a republican, and in whose honesty and integrity they have no confidence.

Resolved, That it is the duty of the republican party in Dakota, while it guards with a jealous care the political welfare of Dakota, to foster and encourage all measures that tend to advance our material interests; to encourage immigration; to establish and maintain schools; to build and support churches; and to lend their united aid to the development of every section of Dakota.

Resolved, That we extend the right hand of fellowship to the people of every nation, race or creed, who come among us desiring to be good citizens, and to share the blessings and advantages of our free and beneficent Government.

Resolved, That we view with unfeigned pleasure the railroad enterprises now inaugurated in Dakota, and will at all times stand ready to aid to our utmost all such improvements in any section of Dakota.

Resolved, That we will support, by all honorable means, the candidates selected by this convention for delegate to Congress and territorial offices, recognizing in their success the triumph in Dakota of right over wrong, of honesty over fraud, bribery and deceit, and of true republican principles over mongrelism and money bags.

Mr. Spink was then introduced and made an address, after which the convention adjourned.

THE MISFORTUNE OF MR. SPINK

Mr. Spink had entered upon the office of a delegate to Congress at an unpropitious time. His term began with President Grant's first term; and as Grant had been chosen by an overwhelming majority of the states, he had a host of prominent supporters among the senators and representatives in Congress and among his old army comrades, who were clamorous for the federal appointments.

Doctor Burleigh, who preceded Mr. Spink, had become delegate in 1865, the year of President Johnson's accession, and because of his ardent support of Mr. Johnson in his contest with Congress, was enabled to control nearly all the federal appointments in Dakota as is shown by the list previously given, from governor to postmaster, and was also a power in matters affecting interests outside the territory.

From this circumstance, voters generally in the territory, and Mr. Spink's friends particularly, had expected that he would be able to secure many of these offices; but they did not at the time realize the changed conditions that followed the coming in of President Grant. It had not been the policy of Mr. Lincoln to appoint to the leading federal positions, citizens of the territory, and there was ten-fold greater pressure upon Grant for places in the federal civil service than beset Lincoln. Nevertheless, Mr. Spink's friends had agreed upon a list of positions which they expected him to make strenuous efforts to secure, and which covered nearly the entire field; but later, as the appointments of the new President were announced, it was discovered that the claims of Dakota had been only slightly considered. Senator Morton, of Indiana, secured the appointment of Burbank for governor; Senator Hamlin, of Maine, secured the chief justiceship for French; and General Belknap, the secretaryship for Wilkins. Mr. Brookings was appointed associate justice, which should be credited to Delegate Spink though Maine influences turned the scale. Surveyor General Beadle was appointed through Wisconsin influences backed by a good army record. Judge Kidder and United States Marshal Litchfield were reappointed through influences from Minnesota and Vermont for Kidder, and Pennsylvania for Litchfield, though both these officials had opposed Spink's election. Mr. Spink secured the appointment of Colonel Campbell, of Vermillion as register of the Vermillion land office, with the aid of Gen. Phil Sheridan, and during the second year the offices of assessor and collector of internal revenue for his partisan friends. The Indian agents, under the new peace policy, had been assigned to various religious denominations. The offices mentioned, with a few postoffices, were the sum of federal patronage that fell to Mr. Spink. During his entire term the new governor of Dakota, Doctor Burbank was a force at Washington to be reckoned with in all matters of patronage.

These several conditions, growing out of the national situation as affecting politics and patronage, served, though unjustly, to weaken Mr. Spink in the home political field. He was required, by his opponents, at least, to compare the results of his stewardship with that of his predecessor; and as the only item in the account that was given great prominence was that relating to federal appointments, it was not a difficult matter, therefore, to show that he had failed to measure up to the standard of his predecessor. It was conceded that he had been faithful and unremitting in attending to his duties; had been watchful in securing all the needed appropriations; had labored to divide the territory on the 40th parallel, and in a general way had been a creditable representative of the territory; but it was manifest when the campaign opened in 1870, that his record, set against that of his predecessor who was now opposing him for the nomination, would not prove an attractive campaign document. It was used, however, with some unfriendly shading by Spink's opponents.

The result of the election indicated that Mr. Spink had not grown in popular favor during his career, neither had he fallen behind. He received about the same number of votes that were given him two years before, and in the intervening time, Wyoming had been organized and taken away the vote of Laramie and Carter counties which gave Spink nearly four hundred in 1868.

THE DEMOCRATIC TERRITORIAL CONVENTION

September 1st, the following call was issued by the democratic territorial central committee:

A convention for the nomination of a candidate for delegate to Congress, and also for the nomination of candidates for territorial treasurer, auditor, and superintendent of public instruction, is hereby called to meet at Yankton, D. T., Saturday, September 10, 1870, at 2 o'clock, P. M. All voters who approve of the principles of the democratic party, and are in favor of reform in the management of the affairs of the territory, are cordially invited to participate in the county convention. Each county will be entitled to representation as follows: Union County, 10 delegates; Yankton, 9; Minnehaha, 2; Clay, 9; Bon Homme, 3; Todd, 3; Lincoln, 3; Charles Mix, 3; Pembina, 1. The committee respectfully recommends that where there are no county committees, the democrats of the county meet at the county seat of each county, on Tuesday, the 11th day of September, at 2 P. M., and select the delegates their county is entitled to. After consultation, the two committees deem it for the interest of the democratic party to make the foregoing united call.

J. L. Fisher, Clay County, chairman; Michael Ryan, Union County; J. B. Van Velsor, Yankton County; Jonathan Brown, Bon Homme County; democratic central committee, September 8, 1868.

A. G. Fuller, Yankton County, chairman; D. T. Bramble, Yankton County; Hugh Fraley, Bon Homme County; Felicia Pallas, Charles Mix County; democratic central committee, June 20, 1868.

The democratic territorial convention met at Yankton, September 10, 1870. J. L. Fisher, Clay County, who had been conceded the chairmanship of the territorial committee, called the convention to order, and named George W. Kellogg, of Union, president. Dr. J. G. Lewis, of Clay, was elected secretary. On motion of E. B. Wixson, of Union, the chair appointed a Committee on Credentials consisting of E. B. Wixson, Union; G. D. Laughton, Clay; Bartlett Tripp, Yankton; H. C. Greene, Bon Homme; and Gen. C. T. Campbell, Chas. Mix.

The committee reported the following named delegates, entitled to seats, to-wit: Union County—Joseph T. Cullaman, Francis Reandeau, G. W. Kellogg, Christ Maloney, Michael Curry, Henry Smith, Shepherd Young, G. W. Beggs, E. B. Wixson, William Gray. Clay County—G. D. Laughton, Joseph Nooman, Charles Kilton, J. L. Fisher, George Curliss, F. D. Snow, N. Sorenson, J. G. Lewis, and N. McHugh. Yankton County—F. J. Trowbridge, J. B. VanVelsor, Abel Stafford, C. D. Owens, O. B. Orton, Bartlett Tripp, J. F. Dowling, Henry Bradley, and Thomas Frick. Lincoln County—J. Gehon, Benj. F. Hill and M. L. Stone. Todd County—Stephen F. Estes, Nicholas Johnesse, and Deminick Bray. Charles Mix and Buffalo counties—John Dean, Cuthbert Ducharme, C.

T. Campbell, Jas. P. Sherman, Felicia Fallas, Joseph Volin. Minnehaha County—John Bailey and John Ford. Bon Homme County—H. C. Greene, H. C. Davidson, and R. W. Andrews.

On motion the convention proceeded to a permanent organization, whereupon Dr. J. E. VanVelsor, of Yankton, was elected permanent chairman, and H. C. Davidson, secretary.

On motion of G. W. Kellogg, the chair appointed Dr. J. G. Lewis, O. B. Orton, Yankton; H. C. Greene, Bon Homme; C. T. Campbell, Chas. Mix; and John Bailey, Minnehaha, a Committee on Resolutions; which committee after due consideration, made the following report:

Whereas, The exigencies of the times demand that political parties should lay aside old and worn out issues, and present to the free and intelligent voters of the country matters of present moment, in order that there may be a speedy return to the prosperity of former times, and the burden of self-government be more equally divided; therefore,

Resolved, That we favor the lowest rate of taxation consistent with a safe administration of the Government, and preservation of public credit, the careful husbanding of our public resources, and the most rigid accountability to the people on the part of all the public servants.

Resolved, That taxation to be just, must be for public purposes, equal and uniform, and that the national Government has no right to levy a tax upon one individual to promote and advance the interests of another; and that a protective tariff is in conflict with the fundamental doctrine of equality and uniformity in taxation, and wholly repugnant to the principles of republican government.

Resolved, That we will oppose to the utmost of our power the present policy of the republican leaders, which by the unjust and burdensome taxation of labor, and equally unjust nontaxation of wealth, is rapidly drawing broad and deep lines of distinction between labor and capital, and by special and corrupt legislation, is dividing our people into castes, and urging into hostilities the great interests of the nation.

Resolved, That we favor such public measures as will insure the early opening of our undeveloped prairies by the honest and energetic settler, and condemn every measure calculated to throw them into the hands of the foreign speculator; therefore we demand the early passage of the laws now pending in Congress granting lands for the building of railroads in our midst; and remonstrate against all measures tending to bring our lands into public market.

Resolved, That the opening and developing of the rich mineral fields and pine forests of the Black Hills is a matter of great commercial interest to the people of Dakota, and we deem it the duty of our public officers to exert every energy to accomplish the removal of the wild tribes of Indians from that region, that the same may be opened to the advancing march of civilization.

Resolved, That we pledge ourselves to favor such measures as will offer the greatest inducement and encouragement for the immigrant to settle on the public lands.

Resolved, That we favor the prompt recognition of the just claims of the Federal soldiers and sailors and their widows and children.

Resolved, That upon the declaration of principles we invite every elector of the territory, without regard to former party relations or associations, to join hands with us at the coming election in electing to office honest and capable men.

The resolutions were adopted.

Nominations being in order, the chair appointed G. W. Kellogg, J. L. Fisher, and H. C. Greene, tellers.

The Yankton County convention had instructed its delegation to present Moses K. Armstrong as a candidate for the nomination of delegate to Congress, and on motion an informal ballot was taken for candidates for that office, resulting as follows: M. K. Armstrong, 25; J. W. Turner, Clay County, 17. Mr. Turner then made a brief speech of thanks and withdrew from the race, and Mr. Armstrong was then nominated by acclamation. The following nominations for territorial officers were then made: Territorial treasurer, T. J. Sloan, of Clay; auditor, G. W. Kellogg, of Union; superintendent of public instruction, J. W. Turner, of Clay.

On motion of Bartlett Tripp each county delegation presented a name for the territorial central committee, as follows: Yankton County, Bartlett Tripp; Clay, J. L. Fisher; Union County, E. B. Wixson; Todd County, Stephen F. Estes; Bon Homme, H. C. Greene; Charles Mix, C. T. Campbell.

Mr. Armstrong then appeared before the convention escorted by O. B. Orton, E. B. Wixson, and H. C. Greene, and made a brief speech accepting the nomination. The convention then adjourned.

In the campaign following, General Todd, the old democratic leader, made public announcement that he would not support Mr. Armstrong, but would cast his vote for Doctor Burleigh.

THE CAMPAIGN

The campaign, which it is customary to open after the nominations have all been made, had been going on, as to Spink and Burleigh, for two or three months prior to the convention in September, so that the opening of the formal campaign, after Armstrong came into the field, simply added a few torchlight processions and hosts of public speakers. The public meeting took the place of the impromptu evening gatherings, and organization went forward with more system. It was quite plain to the unprejudiced observer before this formal campaign had made much progress that Armstrong had the natural enthusiasm of the voters with him—that is those who were supporting him manifested the greater confidence, and the active men among the masses knew better than the leaders did where there was disaffection, and who was profiting by it. Burleigh drew away from Armstrong some of the democrats through General Todd's influence and through his own, but as he strengthened himself in this way he also strengthened Armstrong, who drew votes from Spink from a class who became alarmed lest Burleigh should be elected by the democratic vote, and preferring Armstrong to the doctor, dropped Spink and went to the democrats. Spink was informed of this and saw the danger to himself. The bitter personal pre-convention campaign between Spink and Burleigh had produced such a deep seated animosity that under the impression stated, though it may have been without any foundation sufficient to affect the result, and may have been magnified by Armstrong's friends in his interest, it produced at least a slight stampede and may have been sufficient to change the result as it would have been under normal conditions. It is well to remember that Mr. Armstrong had been for many years enjoying the closest confidential relations in business matters with nearly all the prominent leaders in the Spink faction save Mr. Spink, and his uniform success in his territorial legislative campaigns was due to their friendship and votes and not to the preponderance of democratic votes.

OFFICIAL VOTE

The election was held on the 11th of October, with the following vote:

County or Precinct	Spink	Armstrong	Burleigh
Union County	277	323	210
Clay County	210	170	248
Lincoln County	150	21	72
Yankton County	214	330	319
Bon Homme County.....	20	79	132
Charles Mix County.....	1	127	79
Mimelaia County	110	4	24
Fort Thompson	21	55	9
Fort Sully	3	40	1
Pembina Precinct	10	38	2
St. Joseph Precinct.....	3	20	0
Totals	1,023	1,108	1,102

Armstrong was declared elected.

The territorial officers declared elected were: William Shriner, Clay County, auditor; Thomas W. Hammon, Yankton, territorial treasurer; H. W. McNiel, Union County, superintendent public instruction.

CHAPTER XLVI
FIRST BI-ENNIAL LEGISLATURE. BURBANK, GOVERNOR

1870

BURLEIGH'S CONTEST AGAINST ARMSTRONG—SPINK ALSO BECOMES A CONTESTANT—ARMSTRONG SEATED—LAND DISTRICTS ESTABLISHED AT PEMBINA AND SPRINGFIELD—BLIZZARD FATALITIES—PUBLIC LANDS—LEGISLATURE IN FIRST BI-ENNIAL SESSION, NINTH IN NUMBER—GOVERNOR BURBANK'S FIRST MESSAGE—IMPORTANT LAWS ENACTED—DISTRICT COURT FOR NORTHERN DAKOTA—IOWA PRISON FOR DAKOTA CONVICTS—BRULE CITY'S CAREER.

The contest inaugurated by Doctor Burleigh against M. K. Armstrong, who had been declared elected as delegate to Congress by the territorial board of canvassers was based on the charge of certain illegal and fraudulent votes cast for said Armstrong in the several counties of the territory. As there was a difference in the total vote of the two candidates of only ninety-six votes, throwing out of a small portion of these alleged fraudulent votes would give Mr. Burleigh a plurality, and would assure him the coveted seat unless Mr. Spink, the other unsuccessful candidate, should be able to prove that Doctor Burleigh had received a larger number of illegal votes, which he was preparing to do in the event that Armstrong should be counted out by Congress. Armstrong's vote was 1,108; Burleigh, 1,102; and Spink, 1,023; as officially declared. The board of canvassers was composed of Chief Justice French, Governor Burbank and Secretary Batchelder. The canvass took place on the 28th of November following the election. Mr. Burleigh's notice of contest was served on Mr. Armstrong about December 26th and alleged illegal votes for Armstrong, as follows: Charles Mix County—Joe Ellis precinct, 88 votes; Campbell's ranche, 28 votes; total 126. Bon Homme County—Emanuel Creek, 20 votes; Yankton County—Starr's precinct, 10 votes; Yankton precinct, 30 votes; Bagstad's precinct, 10 votes; Haggins's Bend, 10 votes; total 60 votes. Union County—Sioux Point, 30 votes; at other precincts, 45 votes; total 75 votes. Clay County—Vermillion, 50 votes. In all 331 votes.

The taking of testimony was begun at Yankton in the second district court before Judge Brookings, and considerable testimony adduced showing that bribery had been resorted to though not in the interest of Armstrong particularly. The matter was carried up to the House of Representatives, and was not finally settled until 1872, Armstrong meanwhile having been given the seat on his certificate from the territorial board. Mr. Spink, in the meantime had entered the lists as a contestant against Armstrong, though it was understood that his purpose was to defeat Burleigh's effort. Armstrong had the outspoken support of Spink's friends in the contest, for it was quite well known that so far as the bribery charge was concerned, it would affect Burleigh's vote quite as much as it did Armstrong's, but there was no testimony that the principals had been directly connected with the purchase of votes. It was expected that Burleigh would drop the case and not carry it to a final decision, but this expectation was disappointed.

On the 22d of February, 1873, the House of Representatives decided the contest cases of Burleigh and Spink against Armstrong, giving the seat to Armstrong, and also decided the validity of the election held on Indian and military reservations. The following is quoted from the proceedings:

Mr. Merrick: "I ask to take up the report from the Committee on Elections in the contested election case from Dakota. It will save the House trouble if I make a brief statement. The report of the committee goes to the validity of the elections held on military reservations and also to elections held on Indian reservations. The committee determined it was not valid under the laws of Dakota to hold an election precinct within an Indian reservation, but it also held it was perfectly competent to hold a poll within a military reservation, because military reservations are simply the temporary occupancy of public lands by the Federal Government without any severance of sovereignty so far as the territories are concerned.

"The committee find on that state of the case, admitting the validity of the returns of an election held on a military reservation, the sitting member is duly entitled to his seat. They find further, even throwing out a few altogether and dismissing the returns in favor of either party on a military reservation, there were sufficient illegal votes thrown in behalf of the contestant which, subtracted from his account, still leaves the sitting member entitled to the seat. Without further discussion I submit a resolution that Mr. Armstrong is entitled to the seat, with a supplemental resolution providing for the payment of the contestants."

The clerk read as follows: Resolved, That Moses K. Armstrong was duly elected and is entitled to retain his seat in the Forty-second Congress as delegate from the Territory of Dakota.

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, W. A. Burleigh, $1,428, and to S. L. Spink, $680, the same being for their actual, reasonable and necessary expenses incurred in prosecuting their contests for a seat in the House as delegate from the Territory of Dakota.

Mr. Holman demanded a separate vote on each resolution.

The first resolution was agreed to unanimously.

The House divided on the second resolution, and there were ayes, 86; noes, 42. So the resolution was agreed to.

NEW LAND DISTRICTS

The Springfield Land District was established by act of Congress, approved May 5, 1870, with the following described boundaries, viz:

Commencing on the Missouri River at the intersection of the line between ranges 57 and 58 west; thence north with said range line to the intersection of the line between townships 120 and 121 north; thence west on said township line to the west line of the territory; thence down said line to the southern line of the territory; thence east to the place of beginning. Said district as above bounded shall be known and designated as the Springfield district, and the office of said district shall be located at the Town of Springfield, or such place as the President shall direct in the Territory of Dakota.

The Pembina Land District was established by act of Congress, approved May 5, 1870, at the same time and in the same act establishing the office at Springfield. S. L. Spink was then the delegate in Congress. The district was bounded and described in the act as follows:

That portion of the territory bounded on the east by the western boundary of the State of Minnesota; on the south by the line between townships 120 and 121 north; on the west by the west line of the territory; and on the north by the 49th degree of north latitude; which district shall be known as the Pembina district; and the office of said district shall be located at the Town of Pembina or at such place as the President shall direct in said territory and the President of the United States shall have power to change the location of said land office in said territory, from time to time, as the public interests may seem to require.

Prior to the opening of this office there had been but one claimant for land in that portion of the territory. This was Joseph Rolette, who filed at the land office at Vermillion, that being the only one in the territory, and its jurisdiction covering the entire territory. The first persons to file at Pembina were Judson LaMoure and William R. Goodfellow, who had resided in the southern part of the territory, in Union County, as early as 1860.

The southern boundary of the Pembina district extended as far south as an east and west line drawn through Milbank, thus covering area considerably greater than the present State of North Dakota. There was considerable immigration at the time into the country bordering the Big Stone Lake and Lake Traverse, and extending down the Red River to Fort Abercrombie.

The Vermillion District known in the organic act as the Yankton Land District, embraced all the territory bounded on the north by the 5th standard parallel; east by the eastern boundary of the territory; south by the Missouri River, and west by the western boundary of Yankton County, extended north to the said 5th standard. Vermillion was the seat of the land office. These districts were defined by act of Congress, but at the same time, June, 1870, Congress enacted that the President should have authority to change the boundaries, and also the seat of the land office whenever he might deem it best for the public interest.

DEATH IN THE BLIZZARD

A heart-rending case of fatal freezing occurred near Vermillion during the blizzard which began January 20, 1870. Mr. C. W. Dowd, with his wife and three young children, undertook a trip across the prairie, from seven miles above Vermillion, intending to reach the town and secure more comfortable quarters than their claim house afforded. The storm was raging fiercely, and there was plenty of food and some fuel in the house, and the venture to seek other shelter under the circumstances, with his little family including his wife, was imprudent and hazardous, and the resolve of Mr. Dowd to undertake it is unaccountable. The dread occasioned by the storm must have affected his mind, and deprived him of all judgment. The family was bestowed in a lumber wagon as comfortably as possible, considering the fury of the winds, and started on their journey. The cold was intense; the storm increased in violence. The air was filled with snow, covering the faces of the animals, blinding them, and they refused to travel in the teeth of the gale, insisting upon turning despite Dowd's best efforts to keep them in the right direction, as he supposed. The suffering of his wife and children became so painful that the husband was obliged to take them out of the wagon, and give them a chance to exercise their bodies in order to keep from freezing. He thought they could follow behind the wagon, but this they were unable to do, and one by one they fell by the wayside literally frozen to death, until all had perished except Dowd himself, who though badly frozen finally reached a habitation three miles from the town, where he was cared for. He survived after a long struggle, but the appalling bereavement, coming so suddenly, and with such shocking force, undermined his ambition, and left him the wreck of his former self.

A genuine Dakota blizzard opened its batteries upon the settlement of the territory on the 13th of March, 1870, in the evening, and continued for three days. The temperature was not dangerously cold, but long exposure to the elements would so weaken a person that exhaustion would follow, and to be overcome exposed to the storm and drop asleep was sure to be followed by fatal results. The ground was covered with a heavy blanket of snow at the time which served to feed the fury of the gale, and literally filled the air. It was a dangerous storm, and the blinding snow made it extremely hazardous to venture out of doors. A large number of cattle were lost to the farmers of the territory, having been driven out of their winter quarters to the prairie pastures during the mild weather of a week or two that preceded the storm. Captain Waldron, of Yankton County, lost fifty head from a herd that he had bought the previous summer in Kansas. The animals were suffocated by the snow which covered their faces, melting and freezing until their heads were encased in a solid cake of ice. The aggregate losses in the territory ran up to many hundreds. It was regarded as the most destructive storm in respect to live stock fatalities that had visited the territory since its settlement. Not many persons were caught away from shelter by the storm, due to its breaking forth in the early night of the 13th; but there was one heart-rending and fatal experience which deserves a place in this record, if for no other reason than as a warning to others. On the Sunday morning preceding the storm, which began about 9 o'clock the same evening, Charles Greeno and William Gray, a young brother of Mrs. Greeno, thirteen years of age, left Greeno's farm about twenty-five miles above Yankton on the James River for a visit to town where young Gray's parents resided. Their conveyance was an open lumber wagon drawn by a yoke of oxen. When within six or seven miles of town, one of the oxen became exhausted and refused to walk and Greeno concluded to give him an hour's rest. It was then after dark, and before the hour expired the storm broke loose. An empty cabin stood nearby, and this was taken possession of as the best shelter to be had for the night if the storm continued. The cabin had been loosely built, and the snow found its way in and piled up in drifts so that it was barely more comfortable than no shelter. Greeno housed his oxen on the side of the cabin which he thought the least exposed, and then made a fire, using the door of the cabin, his wagon-box, and finally his ox-yoke, for fuel; but this did not give much relief. The cold was intense, and the little boy was much the greatest sufferer. Greeno had three or four overcoats of different kinds that he was accustomed to carry in his wagon, and with these he made the boy as comfortable as he could; he also took off his boots and stockings and gave them to the little fellow, reserving a pair of overshoes for himself. There was no abatement of the terrible gale and drifting snow. The night was passed stamping in the snow which drifted in through the crevices between the logs. The boy, Greeno covered up with the overcoats, permitted him to sleep a little. The only food they had when they left home was two biscuits, and these they had eaten Sunday. Monday and Tuesday passed and the storm continued unabated. Little Willie was growing quite weak as Greeno despairingly observed. Wednesday morning the lad's condition appeared so critical that Greeno resolved to brave the storm with him and make an effort to reach an inhabited cabin that he believed was not more than two miles away. Willie had complained very little and was willing to undertake the trip. They had been seventy-two hours without food, and during this time had been partially benumbed with cold. Greeno's anxiety for the boy, he believed, kept himself from falling asleep and perishing. The oxen had broken away from the cabin on Monday or Tuesday, and were out in the storm. Greeno and the boy finally started for the settler's cabin two miles away, but they had made but little progress when Willie gave out and declared he could not walk, and asked to be taken back to the cabin. Greeno was so weakened that he could not carry the little fellow, and was obliged to return, which they did with great difficulty. Greeno realized that the boy's condition had become dangerous; he tramped out a place in the snow and made a bed of the overcoats, Willie declaring in a weak voice, that he felt quite comfortable, but his brother-in-law felt that he was dying. Just then the ox that had given out on the road, rushed into the cabin as if crazed, stood a moment lashing its tail, when it fell over, dead, knocking Greeno to the ground, and partially covering the dying boy whom Greeno believed was dead before this happened; but he was himself too near a collapse to remember anything distinctly. He pulled his knife, however, and made an effort to cut a piece of meat from the ox; but after cutting into the animal was unable to draw out his knife and left it. He spent the day and the following night at the cabin; the storm quieting down Wednesday night, and Thursday morning he started off toward a cabin he saw in the distance. He nearly perished on this journey. He fell over three or four times, and with great difficulty managed to regain his feet. He finally caught a glimpse of a man and team a long distance off, and immediately shouted to him, and gave all the signals of distress he could think of to attract his attention, which he finally did, and the man came hurriedly to his relief, knowing that it must be some one who had been caught in the storm. When Greeno saw that his cries and signals had been observed he fell into the snow nearly unconscious. His deliverer proved to be an acquaintance from town, J. O. Johnson, who was out on a wood hunting expedition. Johnson took the unfortunate man to Yankton, where he received such attention as his condition demanded, and in time—late in the spring—recovered.

losing a large portion of both feet, which required amputation. The overshoes had protected his feet much better than the boots and stockings could have done. Little Willie was removed from his bed of snow, stark and cold in death's embrace, and buried in the Yankton cemetery the following Sunday. Willie's parents resided in Yankton, and Josiah Gray, well and favorably known, was an elder brother. Greeno was 110 hours without sleep or food, and benumbed with cold. His escape from death was regarded as providential, and his endurance, all the conditions considered, as almost unparalleled.

PUBLIC LANDS

In the winter of 1870 the question of offering the Government lands in certain portions of the United States at public sale, a plan that had been in vogue up to the year 1862, when the homestead law was enacted, was generally agitated and the subject was discussed in the newspapers of the country, the weight of opinion being decidedly adverse to the proposition. Congressmen were beset by strong interests desirous of securing large tracts of choice lands, and bills were presented in Congress authorizing the sale of lands in districts where the land had been open to preemption and homestead a number of years, and had not all been taken. The people of Dakota were strongly opposed to any sale; public meetings were held in the various communities of the territory, and resolutions adopted expressing the hostile sentiment of the people which were forwarded to Congress. The effort finally grew so unpopular that its advocates were obliged to drop it, and it was never thereafter revived. The settlement of the public lands, especially in the Northwest had been retarded during the '60s by the Civil war and the wide spread Indian troubles, at this time happily ended; and immigration revived early in the decade beginning with 1870, and the steady and moderately growing increase in the absorption of the agricultural lands has been the history of the occupation of Dakota by actual tillers of the soil.

The first year of the decade mentioned was rendered somewhat remarkable in the annals of early Dakota because of the increase in the amount of Government lands taken up by actual settlers largely, which was shown by the records of the land offices at Vermillion, Clay County, and Springfield, Bon Homme County, though the last named office was not opened until October 21st of that year, and a third office at Pembina on the 19th of December, from which no returns are given during the brief time the office had been prepared to receive filings. The amount taken in the several counties is shown in the annexed statement: Yankton, 80,041.83; Lincoln, 61,041.42; Union, 46,919.77; Bon Homme, 46,483.31; Minnehaha, 37,377.35; Brookings, 2,172.24; total, 359,861.53; and of this amount 217,209.21 acres were taken under the pre-emption law, though the homestead law had been on the statute book eight years. It does not appear that any filings had been made up to this time in either Turner or Hutchinson counties, but both had been receiving the vanguard of its pioneers for possibly a year prior to this statement. It was estimated that the increase of population in the territory during the year amounted to about ten thousand, and that practically all of it had come in after June 1st, and after the federal census was taken, and had in great part found homes on the public lands. For the new land offices mentioned, L. Norton was appointed register and Gabriel A. Augersberg, receiver, at Springfield; and Enos Stutsman, register, and Geo. F. Potter, receiver, at Pembina.

LEGISLATURE—FIRST BIENNIAL SESSION

In the Legislative Appropriation Bill passed by Congress and approved March 3, 1869, it was provided:

That hereafter the members of both branches of the Legislative Assemblies in the several territories shall be chosen for two years, and the sessions of the Legislative Assemblies shall be biennial, and each Legislature shall, at its first session after the passage of this act, make provision by law for carrying this act into effect.

Under this law and also under the law of the territory then in force, members of both branches of the Legislative Assembly of Dakota were elected at the election held in 1869; but inasmuch as the session of the Legislature was held in 1869-70, it was deemed necessary, under the clause in the congressional act providing that "each Legislature shall, at its first session after the passage of this act, make provision by law for carrying this act into effect," to elect the members of the House of Representatives at the election held in 1870, as provided by the law of the territory which was accordingly done and a House composed partly of the members elected the year before was chosen.

This action raised the question which of the two Houses would be the lawful body, and the secretary of the territory would be called upon to decide at least in the first instance, which one he would recognize; and in order to have the matter passed upon by the highest authority available, Mr. Geo. A. Batchelder, then secretary, submitted the problem to Hon. Hamilton Fish, secretary of state of the United States, who in turn submitted it to Hon. A. T. Aekerman, attorney general of the United States, who delivered an opinion discussing the question at length, concluding with:

Hence, I am of opinion that the Legislature chosen in October, 1869, is, in both branches, the lawful Legislature of the territory for the space of two years from the commencement of its term, and that its successor should be chosen in 1871, at a time to be fixed at its first session.

Accordingly the Legislative Assembly elected in 1869 was duly recognized and the members thereof convened for the ninth session, at Yankton, the capital, in Stone's Hall, on Monday, December 5, 1870. The governor and the secretary of the territory had offices in the same building. The capitol building heretofore used for the sessions of the Legislature had been rented for other purposes since the change to biennial sessions, hence new quarters had been provided for the law makers.

The Council was called to order by Amos F. Shaw, the secretary of the preceding council, who called the roll of members, when the following named persons answered to their names:

First Legislative District, Union, Lincoln and Minnehaha counties—J. C. Kennedy, Emory Morris (Union), and William M. Cuppett (Lincoln). Second District, Clay County—Silas W. Kidder, Nelson Miner, and John W. Turner. Third District, Yankton and Jayne counties—Charles H. McIntyre, James M. Stone, Jacob Brauch and Moses K. Armstrong (Yankton). Fourth District, Bon Homme and Hutchinson counties—Hugh Fraley (Bon Homme). Fifth District, Charles Mix and Buffalo counties—William McKay (Charles Mix). Sixth District, Todd and Gregory counties (not represented at this session).

Chief Justice French then administered the oath of office to the members elect; whereupon Mr. Morris, of Union, nominated Mr. Brauch, of Yankton, for temporary president of the Council; and Mr. Armstrong nominated John W. Turner. A ballot being taken, Mr. Brauch was elected, and took the chair. Harvey J. Brisbane, of Yankton, and George T. Rea, of Lincoln, were placed in nomination for temporary secretary, and Mr. Rea was chosen.

The Council then adjourned until 11 o'clock A. M. Tuesday. The House of Representatives was called to order by George L. Foster, chief clerk of the preceding House, who called the roll of members, and the following persons answered to their names:

First District, Union, Lincoln and Minnehaha counties—Charles Allen (Minnehaha), O. B. Iverson, C. P. Dow, John C. Sinclair, Sterling L. Parker (Union), H. A. Jerould (Lincoln). Second District, Clay County—F. J. Cross, Andrew J. Mills, Randolph Mostow, Amos F. Shaw, Noah Wherry, and Philip Sherman. Third District, Yankton and Jayne counties—George H. Hand, Nelson Leitch, Ephraim Miner, A. P. Hammon, and Ole Sampson (Yankton). Fourth District, Bon Homme and Hutchinson counties—James Keegan, Elias W. Wall (Bon Homme). Fifth District, Charles Mix and Buffalo counties—Joseph La Roche, William Holbrough (Charles Mix). Sixth District, Todd and Gregory counties—Not represented. Seventh Representative District, Pembina County—John Hancock, elected to succeed Enos Stutsman, resigned to accept registership of the Pembina Land District.

The oath of office was then administered to the members by Associate Justice Brookings.

A temporary organization was then effected. Mr. Hand nominated Amos F. Shaw for temporary speaker, and Mr. La Roche nominated Philip Sherman, of Clay. Mr. Shaw was elected and took the chair.

George I. Foster was then elected temporary chief clerk, when the House adjourned until 11 A. M. Tuesday, the 6th inst.

On the second day the Council was unable to effect a permanent organization owing to a disagreement among the republican members, who were in the majority. Emory Morris was the leading republican candidate, and John W. Turner, the democratic candidate. A ballot was had, resulting in six votes for Morris, viz.: Messrs. McIntyre, Stone, Brauch, McKay, Cuppett and Kennedy, 6. Morris and Miner voted for Kidder; Armstrong and Fraley voted for Turner; Kidder voted for Miner, and Turner for Fraley. There were twelve votes cast, requiring seven to elect. The Council then adjourned until the following day at 10 o'clock.

The House met on Tuesday morning, and after roll call and prayer proceeded to the election of a permanent speaker. Mr. Miner nominated George H. Hand, of Yankton, and Mr. Mostow nominated Amos F. Shaw, of Clay; and Mr. La Roche nominated Sterling L. Parker, of Union. A ballot being had, Mr. Hand received the votes of Messrs. Leonard, Miner, Hammon, Sampson, Iverson and Jerauld, 6. Mr. Shaw received the votes of Messrs. Allen, Cross, Mills, Mostow, Wherry and Dow, 6. Mr. Parker was voted for by Messrs. Sinclair, La Roche, Sherman and Kennedy, 4. Mr. Sherman received the votes of Messrs. Keegan, Wall and Holbrough, 3. Mr. Hand voted for Mr. Hammon, and Mr. Parker for La Roche. No choice, whereupon the House took a recess until 2.30 P. M., when the body again met and proceeded to ballot for speaker, the result being: Hand, 7; Parker, 3; Shaw, 7; Hammon, 2; La Roche, 1; Sherman, 2. No choice, and the House then took a recess for one hour, during which time the differences existing in the republican membership were amicably arranged, and upon reconvening Mr. Hand was elected speaker by a vote of 18 to 2 for Sherman, and two blank ballots. Those voting for Mr. Hand were Messrs. Allen, Iverson, Dow, Sinclair, Jerauld, Cross, Mills, Mostow, Shaw, Wherry, Leonard, Miner, Hammon, Sampson, Wall, Holbrough, 18. Mr. Sherman received the votes of Messrs. Keegan and La Roche. Mr. Hand was declared elected speaker, and escorted to the chair. The following subordinate officers were then elected: George I. Foster, Yankton, chief clerk; C. B. Valentine, Union, assistant clerk; John McClellan, Minnehaha, sergeant-at-arms; E. C. Stacy, of Clay, fireman; Eugene Williams, of Union, messenger; and Rev. Joseph Ward, Yankton, chaplain.

The usual committee to notify the governor and Council were then appointed, when the House adjourned until 10 o'clock Wednesday.

The Council met on Wednesday, the third day, and after the usual preliminaries proceeded to ballot for president. Six ballots were taken, all resulting as on yesterday.

After the sixth ballot, Mr. Turner withdrew as a candidate, making the following explanatory remarks:

Mr. Chairman: We have now reached the third day of our session and have cast thirteen unsuccessful ballots for president of this body, and are still no nearer a permanent organization for business than on the first day we convened. I am a democrat, and my party in this Council is in the minority, but I have considered it a duty to my political associates here who have nominated me and supported me with unflinching devotion to remain as their candidate before this body until all honorable efforts towards my election proved unavailing.

and the interests of the people began to suffer. I am well aware that the few democrats in this body have the balance of power to prevent a permanent organization, but while I claim to be a strict party man, I do not consider it my sworn duty as a representative of the people to remain a candidate here for the purpose of blocking the wheels of legislation. This has never been the policy or intent of the party to which I belong, and I do not now desire to stake my own greed for office against the suffering interests of the territory. Thanking my political associates here for their persistent and unwavering support in my behalf, I most respectfully withdraw my name as a candidate for the presidency of this body and hope upon the next ballot the republican members of the Council may make choice of a president, that we may at once proceed to the performance of the duties for which we were sent here.

The balloting for president then proceeded, Messrs. Turner, Fraley and Armstrong having been excused from voting. The ballot resulted: Morris, 5; Miner, 1; Kidder, 2; McIntyre, 1; and Morris was declared elected, and was escorted to the chair by Messrs. McIntyre and Turner, upon taking which he addressed the Council as follows:

Gentlemen of the Council—Allow me to express my humble, sincere gratitude for the marked respect you have shown me. I accept the position with which you have honored me with appreciation of its grave responsibilities. So far as my feeble judgment and limited experience will enable, I shall studiously endeavor so to discharge its duties as to merit your worthy cooperation. And I shall entertain the fond hope that all our deliberations, guided by a profound regard for the general public welfare of our territory, and aided by the divine power upon which depends the existence of all governments, may be attended with associations pleasant to ourselves and result in the advancement of the real benefit and true happiness of every individual within the influence of our action. I thank you for your attention.

The permanent organization was then completed by the election of the following officers: George T. Rea, of Lincoln County, secretary; H. C. Greene, of Bon Homme, assistant secretary; Louis Sampson, Yankton, sergeant-at-arms; Andrew Rammer, Union, fireman; Robert Crew, Clay, messenger; Rev. P. B. Morrison, Clay, chaplain.

The usual committees were appointed to inform the governor and the House of the organization.

Mr. Turner introduced a memorial to Congress asking for the extension of the session to sixty days; and Mr. Armstrong presented a memorial for the amendment of the pre-emption law, extending the time of proving up, when the Council adjourned.

The delay in the organization of the Legislature arose from antagonisms growing out of the late election when the republicans were divided between Spink and Burleigh, candidates for delegate. While no particular significance attached to the selection of the speaker or president so far as the proceedings before the Legislature were concerned, it seemed desirable by each faction to secure such endorsement, and the Spink faction won in both houses. While the democrats did not contribute directly to this result, their moral support was with the victorious side owing to the report that Mr. Burleigh would proceed to contest the seat awarded to Armstrong, and steps had already been taken with this in view. It will be borne in mind that the members of the Legislature were elected in 1866, but no session of the Legislature was held that year, and the attorney-general had decided that the members then elected were the lawful members of this present Legislature. All parties had nominated and voted for members of the House in 1870, and had the opinion upheld this last election, the democrats would have had a good majority of the House.

On the fourth day the two Houses met in joint convention and received the governor's message, which was delivered in person, and is herewith presented, because of the official information it furnishes regarding the material conditions of the territory:

BURBANK'S FIRST MESSAGE

Gentlemen of the Council and House of Representatives:

In accordance with the usual executive custom I communicate to you from the sources of information which I have at command the condition of public affairs in this territory.

and recommend for your consideration and legislative action such measures as, in my judgment, will promote the general welfare of the people.

BIENNIAL SESSIONS.—By an act of Congress, approved March 3, 1860, it was provided that thereafter the members of both branches of the Legislative Assemblies of the several territories should be chosen for the term of two years, and that the sessions should be biennial instead of annual, as before; also that at the first session after the passage of that act each Legislature should make provision by law for carrying the act into effect. In the absence of the necessary appropriation to provide for the expense of a meeting of the Legislature last year I did not deem it advisable to call the members together. I see no cause now to regret the course taken in this respect, as I am not aware that any public interests suffered thereby; while the rapid increase of our population during the past year, and the occurrence of various events of interest within that time, will bring up questions requiring action upon your part in many important particulars. This being the first meeting since the passage of the act referred to, it will be necessary to so change the laws of the territory affected by it as to make them conform with its provisions. It is perhaps unnecessary that I should, in this connection, admonish you, in view of the changes that have taken place within the past two years, and the fact that two years more must elapse before the assembling of another Legislature, that the short time which you are allowed to remain together should be employed so as to yield the largest possible amount of wise and judicious legislation.

CODIFICATION OF THE LAWS.—With those to be enacted at the present session, the territorial laws will be comprised in nine different volumes, the work of as many legislative bodies. Their revision and codification has become a matter of the greatest importance, and the difficulty and uncertainty growing out of the present want of systematic arrangement is well known to all who have occasion to refer to them. I recommend that you provide by an act of the Legislature for the proper performance of this work by competent persons at the earliest practicable moment, and look to Congress to indemnify the territory for any expense thereby incurred. The value of law lies in its certainty; and nothing so detracts from the good effects of legislation as frequency of amendment, change, and the confusion and fragmentary character of badly arranged, illy digested and poorly expressed laws.

TERRITORIAL FINANCES.—By an act of the Legislature the territorial auditor and treasurer are allowed until the first week in January in which to prepare and lay before you their reports. I am not, therefore, at this time in possession of accurate official information relative to the financial condition of the territory. At the proper time, however, I presume you will be furnished with detailed reports from those officers, and I am led to believe that the showing will be a favorable and satisfactory one.

EDUCATIONAL MATTERS.—By a letter received from Hon. T. McK. Stuart, dated September 9, 1860, I was notified of his resignation of the office of superintendent of public instruction, to which he had been elected, and I subsequently appointed Hon. James S. Foster to fill the vacancy, subject to the approval of the Council. His report has not been received by me, but it will probably be laid before you some time during the present week, as provided by law, and it will doubtless contain some suggestions of importance for you to act upon. The common school system of the territory is yet in its infancy, but there is an undoubted disposition on the part of our intelligent population to give it an active and earnest support. While we have the experience of the old settled eastern states, as well as that of the younger but equally vigorous and prosperous western ones, to profit by, there is certainly no reason why our system should not be made as near perfect and as successful in its operations as any that can be devised.

TERRITORIAL PENITENTIARY.—By the provisions of an act of Congress, approved January 22, 1867, the net proceeds of the internal revenue of this territory for the three fiscal years ending June 30, 1868, were to be set apart for the purpose of erecting a penitentiary building. I am informed, however, by a letter received from the secretary of the treasury, in response to one addressed to him on the 4th of July last, that the expense of collecting revenue in this territory during the period named exceeded somewhat the amount of the collections made. As it is highly important that the territory should be provided with a suitable penitentiary, it will be necessary to take some other steps looking to this end.

INSANE PERSONS.—It is also important that some provision should be made for the custody and treatment of insane persons. The care of their property is provided for in our laws, but we have no enactment under the authority of which the persons themselves may be properly cared for. Humanity dictates that this unfortunate class of persons, however few may be their numbers, should not be neglected when prompt and careful treatment might result in their permanent recovery. In view of this, it is important that provision should be made for their removal to the asylums of neighboring states until their wants can be properly met within our own borders.

PREEMPTION LAWS.—It has been decided by the commissioner of the general land office that the provisions of the second section of the act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to extend the provisions of the preemption laws to the Territory of Colorado and for other purposes," apply also to this territory. The enforcement of this law as thus interpreted would result in a very great hardship so far as a large proportion of the settlers of this territory are concerned, requiring them to prove up and pay for their claims within a year after the passage of the act, and before they will have time to raise another crop, without reference to their past misfortunes or their ability to do so. The task of reclaiming and subduing the wild and untilled prairie is at first a hard and unsatisfactory one, but the industrious immigrant, however small may be his possessions when he begins the work, must inevitably succeed in a few years in bringing about his own worldly prosperity and independence if he has only the elements to contend with. So different would be the workings of this law from the usual liberal policy of the Government when dealing with its poor but industrious citizens, and so manifest must be the hardships which will result from it, that I trust it may be one of your first acts to memorialize Congress for such a change in its provisions as will enable the settler to so far reclaim the wild land which he seeks to render habitable as to insure for himself a living thereafter before being compelled to pay for it.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.—Under the wise and humane policy of President Grant marked progress has been made by the different Indian tribes in this territory towards civilization. As their ability to supply the food and raiment necessary to their comfort has been lessened, their wants have been met through the bounty of the Government, while they have also been encouraged to cultivate the soil, instructed in the arts of peace, and directed in the paths of Christianity. The wild and savage nature of the Sioux Indians cannot be changed in a day, but the treatment they are receiving is having a marked effect upon them. The character of the food, in itself, with which they are supplied has a tendency to change their wild nature very materially from what it was when they fed alone upon the buffalo and other animals caught in the chase. With their progress towards humanization, it is important that an ambition to rise higher in the scale, and to become intelligent producers instead of indolent consumers, should be implanted within them. Unless this can be done, their future career must necessarily be a brief one, since the rapid settlement of the country will soon leave them no spot upon which their wild and savage disposition can be satisfied, and it is clearly not in accordance with the spirit of our free institutions that one class of people should live solely upon the industry of another. It must be confessed, however, that the class of people who are making their homes upon our broad prairies bestow much less thought upon questions growing out of the future civilization and prosperity of the red man than they do upon the one of greater importance to them, whether or not their own safety may be fully assured while building homes for themselves and their posterity. In this respect a marked improvement has been shown the past year. The few companies of troops stationed at the different agencies have served to effectually prevent trouble, their presence alone proving sufficient to convince the Indians that while the Government was disposed to deal justly by them, it was also determined to require a strict observance of treaty stipulations in return. Our frontier now rests in security, and the husbandman turns the sod without fear of the whoop of the savage or the crack of his rifle. I trust that this feeling of security may be still more firmly fixed in future, and that, as the Indian shows a disposition to accept the new order of things and shake off his wild nature, the old condition of fear and hate between him and the white man may pass away.

RAILROADS.—Up to the present time the settlement of the territory has been confined almost entirely to the lands bordering upon the Missouri River and tributary streams in its southeastern portion, and even here the difficulty of securing a regular and constant market, dependent upon a reliable and speedy means of transportation, has prevented the farmer and grazer from realizing as much from the care and labor bestowed as they could have desired. Before the meeting of another Legislature the Northern Pacific Railroad, which passes through the northern portion of the territory, will doubtless have been completed across our border. This will open up to settlement a vast portion of country which, in its present isolated situation, offers almost no inducements to the immigrant, but which, with the facilities which this great thoroughfare will afford for communication with the world at large, will be rapidly settled and cultivated. Several other lines of railroad are also projected through the southern and central portions of the territory with a view to their eventually forming a part of the great iron network which is soon to cover the whole of our vast country. For these lines, bills asking for grants of land to aid in their construction are pending before Congress and in some instances have already passed one branch of the National Legislature. We can scarcely estimate the value of these proposed roads as mediums of communication, and as instrumentalities in the speedy development of our wonderful agricultural resources. While we should memorialize Congress to encourage with needful and even generous aid these works, we should protest against any policy which may undermine our greatest bulwark of national strength—the natural right of labor to the soil—by sapping the foundations of the homestead and preemption laws, which insure our fertile soil to the hardy yeomen of the nation. Let us see to it that all lands granted in aid of these roads shall be guarded by such restrictions as will secure to actual settlers the lands so granted, in quantities not greater than 160 acres to any individual, and at a price not greater than $2.50 per acre, and that the alternate sections shall be obtained only by homestead and preemption as at present. These laws are our boasted blessing, which extend their broad arms of protection around the homes of the pioneer and make continued appeal to every citizen of the world to come forward and "emancipate the soil" by industrial development—to build homes and establish a patrimony for their children, loyal to our Government and sacred to her free institutions. We should look with jealous alarm upon any policy which may cripple or abridge the benignant action of these laws, or which may bar and bolt the doors of our national heritage and give the keys of bondage to rapacious and close-listed monopolies, when millions of industrious and landless poor are knocking at our threshold and begging for the privilege of raising their own bread.

Economy.—In the conduct of public affairs I recommend an economy bordering on parsimony. The territory is yet in its infancy, and though vigorous and promising, it requires only that aid which will promote a natural and healthful growth; and while she remains in her swaddling clothes of claim shanties and partially cultivated settlements, and under the care of the mother Government, we should shape our expenditures to the lowest possible fraction.

THE FUTURE.—The present winter will probably be marked by the historian as the crisis for Dakota. The partial failure of the crops in sections where the lands are still new and unreclaimed, and the large influx of settlers, coming, in many instances, without the necessary means of subsistence or the proper safeguards against the severity of our northern climate, may cause, to some extent, privation and discouragement. In the future prosperity of the territory, however, I have the greatest confidence and I do not doubt that with the opening of spring will begin a steady onward march, resulting in the speedy development of our abundant resources; and that another decade will find upon our fertile soil as yet a stranger to the plowshare the myriad dwelling places of a hardy, vigorous and intelligent people, surrounded by the innumerable blessings bestowed by a kind Providence upon the citizens of a great and free republic.

JOHN A. BURBANK.

Yankton, December, 1870.

The message met with a very favorable response from the members of the Legislature, who testified their satisfaction by ordering many thousands of copies printed in the English language. Mr. Hancock, the Pembina representative, whose constituents were largely Canadians, and who were familiar with the French language and who could read English indifferently, secured the adoption of an order to print 300 copies in Canadian French. There was likewise an order passed to print some hundreds in the Norwegian and German languages, all of which were pigeon-holed by the territorial secretary, who had no funds to disburse for printing documents in foreign languages.

The various committees were appointed by each body, and a new committee added by the House, known as the Committee on Benevolent Institutions. This was the first legislative action taken by a Dakota Legislature looking to the care and custody of insane and other unfortunates, and an act was passed during the session providing for the custody of criminals and the care of other public charges.

Mr. Hancock introduced a bill early in the session to incorporate the Dakota Central, Yankton and British Possessions Railroad Company.

A bill to amend the election law of the territory by striking therefrom the word "male" was defeated in the House by a vote of 15 to 7. The session was an unusually quiet one after the organization, devoted to legitimate legislative business, and though the number of measures passed was less than the average of former Legislatures, a large number of measures were considered.

Among the important laws enacted was the herd law, entitled an act to protect cultivated land and young timber from trespassing animals. The grain raising farmers demanded this law; fencing material was expensive and difficult to procure, and herding was much cheaper at that time and grazing land abundant. The measure met with but slight opposition. An act concerning divorces was also passed. Also establishing a bureau of immigration, which appointed James S. Foster, commissioner, and appropriated $200 annually for postage and circulars; and $300 annually for general purposes; an act defining the manner of organizing unorganized counties; an act defining the boundaries of certain counties; an act apportioning the members of the Legislative Assembly; a new election law; an act defining the judicial districts; to organize Brookings County with Martin Trygstad, L. M. Hewlett and Elias Thompson, county commissioners, and W. H. Packard, county clerk; county seat at Medary. An act to organize Hutchinson, Turner, Hanson and Buffalo counties. A large number of memorials to Congress covering a variety of subjects, mail routes and public roads leading the lists, were passed.

The apportionment law passed by this Assembly, for the first time exhausted the limit of membership allowed by the organic act, viz.: thirteen members of the Council and twenty-six members of the House. The Council limit had been reached, however, in 1863. Under this latest apportionment the counties were set off into districts as follows: First District—Union County; three councilmen and five members of the House. Second District—Clay County; three councilmen and five members of the House. Third District—Yankton County; four councilmen and four members of the House. Fourth District—Bon Homme and Hutchinson counties; one councilman and two members of the House. Fifth District—Charles Mix and Buffalo counties; one councilman and two members of the House. Sixth District—Lincoln, Minnehaha, Brookings, Deuel and Armstrong counties; seven members of the House. Seventh District—Pembina and Hanson counties (Dakota); one councilman and one member of the House. Todd and Gregory counties and all representation west of the Missouri River were dropped from the new apportionment, that country having been set apart by treaty as a portion of the Great Sioux Indian Reservation.

The Legislature changed the boundaries of the judicial districts, and for the first time gave to the northern portion of the territory one of the three courts and an associate justice. Pembina, Brookings and Deuel counties were constituted the Third District and the District Court appointed to be held at Pembina in June and September.

Clay, Union and Lincoln counties were made the First District, and two terms of court were to be held in each county during the year.

Yankton, Armstrong, Jayne, Bon Homme, Hutchinson, Charles Mix, Minnehaha and Buffalo, and all of the territory not included in the other districts were constituted the Second District, and two terms of court each year were appointed to be held in Yankton, Bon Homme, Charles Mix and Buffalo and Hutchinson united; and one term at Sioux Falls.

KEEPING CONVICTS

A law was enacted by the Legislature of 1870-71, designating the penitentiary at Fort Madison, Iowa, as the official penitentiary of the Territory of Dakota. The United States had confined its Dakota convicts in the United States prison at Detroit, and in some instances at Fort Madison, but the territory had had no occasion for a penitentiary until Frank Sullivan was convicted of horse stealing in the Territorial Court at Yankton in October, 1870, and was sentenced by Chief Justice French to three years' hard labor in the "Iowa state prison at Fort Madison." Sullivan thus became Dakota's first convict. It cost the territory 50 cents a day to defray the expense of his care and custody. He was taken to prison and safely delivered to the warden by Sheriff Harvey J. Brisbane, of Yankton County, about the middle of December, 1871. Sullivan was an old offender, and the crime for which he was convicted was rather remarkable in criminal annals, and in one respect it had a ludicrous feature. In the spring of 1870 Frank Sullivan was arrested in the up river country by U. S. Marshal Litchfield, for stealing horses from the Indians, brought to Yankton, tried for the offense, and through the efforts of Gen. William Tripp, his lawyer, was acquitted and set free. He remained in Yankton, and during the summer obtained employment with Bartlett Tripp, a half-brother of his former attorney, and while so employed, and during the temporary absence from town of Mr. Tripp, Sullivan forged his employer's name to an order on S. Eiseman & Co., for a suit of clothes, which he procured. The forgery was soon discovered, and a warrant for Sullivan's arrest was issued. He had flown in the meantime; but the sheriff found him at an Indian camp in Smutty Bear's bottom, brought him to town and locked him up. He was subsequently arraigned before Justice of the Peace Brisbane and, waiving examination, was held to answer to the District Court, and in default of bail was committed to jail. On the night following election he escaped from jail, went to the stable of Gen. William Tripp, who had gotten him out of his first scrape, took his horse and fled in a westerly direction. He was overhauled in Bon Homme County, where he had been trying to negotiate another forged order, with General Tripp's name to it, with John Owens, and had the horse still in his possession. He was again brought to Yankton, lodged in jail, securely ironed, and at the October term of court tried and convicted of horse stealing, and sentenced and confined as above related. He was a young man, not more than twenty-five years of age, of pleasing address, and apparently could have succeeded well enough in life by pursuing an honorable occupation and a law-abiding course. On the contrary, he became the first to enter prison walls for crime committed against the statutes of Dakota Territory.

CRESCENT CITY

A new colonization scheme on a large scale was inaugurated in the fall of 1870 by the Peoria Emigration Society, of Peoria, Illinois. This society sent its agents to Dakota to look up a suitable place for a colony of about two hundred heads of families and single men. The agents investigated and finally decided upon a location about seventy-five miles above Fort Randall and within four miles of the mouth of White River on the west side of the Missouri River. Here they found a grand country, and an excellent townsite which they had named Crescent City, and picked out about two hundred quarter sections for their colony. Good deposits of building stone and an excellent steamboat landing were among the attractions at Crescent City. The location met the description given by Lewis and Clark of that particular section. The colony did not follow the lead of its representatives. It is probable that in selecting the location the agents were not informed that it was Indian country, and they learned this upon making application to file at the local land office. They had selected the part of the Great Sioux Reservation later known as the Lower Brule Reservation.

This colony was called also the "White Earth Colony." Their representatives, discovering that they had selected Indian land, recrossed the Missouri and located opposite the mouth of White River, laying claim to a townsite and 193 quarter sections of land surrounding on the east side, and a few miles below the future townsite of Chamberlain. The town was afterwards named, at a meeting held at Peoria, "Mattalousa," in memory of a Sioux Indian chief who had rescued a wounded United States officer from a band of savages, took him to his own tepee, nursed him to health and restored him to his friends. This town was popularly known as Brule City, and was the first settlement founded in the Missouri above Charles Mix County and south of Bismarck. It was located on the east bank of the Missouri River and about opposite the mouth of White River, and some ten or twelve miles below the present City of Chamberlain. That vicinity had for some time been favored for the location of a colony of farmers with a trading point of their own, and the western bank of the river was the favorite, but the land there being Indian country, settlers were forbidden to take up residence on that side. The Brule City move was under the supervision of Mr. Daniel Harnett, a pioneer of Sioux City and Dakota, and Mr. John Nelson was at the head of the first party of emigrants, while Mr. Charles Collins, editor and proprietor of the Sioux City Times, was a member of the company and an active worker. It was for a time looked upon as a movement connected with the Fenian organization, but subsequent events did not justify the apprehension.

D. W. Spalding was a prominent member of this company, and the last man to abandon Mattalousa when the country was added to the Great Sioux Reservation in 1870, by President Grant's proclamation. When the lands were again placed in market by the executive proclamation of President Hayes, Brule County had been organized and Chamberlain, some twelve miles above, had been laid out and occupied, which appears to have discouraged the founders of Brule City, who made no further effort to promote its commercial interests.

JAMES M'GARRY TELLS OF THE GRANDEUR OF A MISSOURI VOYAGE—THE DESTRUCTION OF SNAGS—THE MISSOURI ONE OF THE GREAT NAVIGABLE RIVERS OF THE WORLD.

Up to about the year 1835 the commerce of the Missouri had been largely carried on by means of sail and oarboats and mackinaws. Steamboats, however, were plying in the lower river as will be seen by the following printed in a directory of the City of Cincinnati in the year 1819, which appears to announce the first attempts to navigate the Missouri with craft propelled by steam:

The steamboats Expedition, 120 tons, and the Independence, fifty tons, built near Pittsburgh, are both destined for the same voyage of discovery, the Independence being the first steamboat that has undertaken to stem the powerful current of the Missouri. They both arrived at Franklin (Boon's Lick), Howard County, 200 miles up the Missouri from its mouth, in the month of June, 1818. It is now ascertained beyond a doubt that this important and extensive river, for several hundred miles at least, can be navigated by steamboats with the same ease and facility as the waters of the Ohio and Mississippi.

Following the pioneer efforts of the Expedition and Independence came numerous voyages that finally penetrated as far as the mouth of the Big Sioux, and for a long time that locality was looked upon as the head of navigation. Pierre Choteau did not share in this belief. He was interested in steamboat lines, and about 1832 had two boats built especially for the upper river trade, one of which, the Antelope, under Mr. Choteau's direction as pilot, made a successful trip to Fort Pierre, and soon after the other boat, named the Assinaboine, succeeded in reaching Fort Union. This success revolutionized the carrying trade of the upper river, and also carried consternation into many an Indian village, where the inhabitants had never seen or heard of a steamboat, and it was a long time before they could become accustomed to them. At first they were regarded as a living monster that would devour everything in its path and the superstitious natives could hardly be induced to remain near the place where a boat was tied up. But their fears gradually wore away until it was not an unusual thing to see a half hundred friendly redskins taking passage from one Indian village to another and paying the transportation charges with a buffalo robe. Other companies employed steamers after Choteau's successful trip to Pierre, but were never able to get beyond Fort Union, near the mouth of the Yellowstone, until 1849, when the Genoa, under Captain Throckmorton, is said to have made a successful run to Fort Benton. Mr. James Parsons, late of Yankton, is authority for this statement. He claims that he made the trip on the Genoa in 1849 as cabin boy, being then eighteen years of age. He bases his statement as to the time on the discovery of gold in California, which important event occurred the same year.

CAPT. JOE LA BARGE

In 1832, Joseph La Barge, then but seventeen years old, was running on the Mississippi, and was present at the Indian battle of Bad Axe, Wisconsin. During the same year he came on to the Missouri River, and began learning the river, preparing himself for the profession of a pilot, the most important department in the steamboat industry, and highly lucrative to men who were thoroughly trained to it. His first trip on the Missouri was on the steamboat Yellowstone, 1833, which was built in Pittsburgh in 1827, and was the first steamboat to engage in the upper Missouri trade. She was built and owned by the American Fur Company, of St. Louis, Pierre Choteau, president, and was commanded in 1832 by Captain Young. She was laden with miscellaneous merchandise designed for trading purposes with the Indians. This boat went up the river to the mouth of the Yellowstone River, the trip taking all summer. In those days and for some time afterwards steamboats were of a primitive character, both in appearance and construction, being of very heavy draft, leaving St. Louis drawing five and six feet of water. They were very narrow, had single engines, side wheels, and were very hard to manage. Still the trip of the Yellowstone was made, but with very hard work. The Yellowstone ran back to St. Louis and up the river once more that fall, and La Barge spent the winter with Cabanne, a trader, who was located in the neighborhood of the present City of Council Bluffs, though on the west side of the river. The Yellowstone continued to run on the Missouri during the year 1833 and 1834, and during this latter year the company sold her and built a new boat called the Assiniboine, named after the Indian tribe or the river of that name in Western Canada, to take her place. She was commanded by Captain Pratt. She made a very successful trip, but in 1835 she was burned about three miles below where Fort Abraham Lincoln was afterwards built. There was no insurance, and the company lost about seventy-five thousand dollars in furs, which was a very large amount at that time. They had put on board the boat all of their fine fur, thinking they would be safer there than on the Mackinaw boats.

La Barge was now a licensed pilot, and a young man of high character; and was made captain of the company's boat as well as pilot, in which employment he continued for thirty years, and never lost a boat. In 1839 he built his first steamboat for the Missouri trade and during the succeeding thirty-five years built fifteen steamboats, the last one being the John M. Chambers, and the first stern-wheeler he constructed. He was convinced that a stern-wheeler was better adapted to the Missouri River than any other kind of boat, and unquestionably the best style for navigating the Yellowstone.

Steamboating was very profitable in the early days, according to Captain La Barge. The passenger boats on the Missouri River from 1864 to 1869 were the finest and most substantial ever built, and cost from one hundred and ten to one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars each. They were not as large as some of the Mississippi boats, but in all their furnishings and accommodations, including the table, they were unexcelled. People demanded floating palaces and would not travel on an ordinary steamboat if they could avoid it.

La Barge recalled a number of trading posts along the river in the years 1833 to 1840, and mentioned one called Fort Vermillion, which he says was just below the mouth of the Vermillion River, and a large establishment.

The beginning of navigation on the Missouri River, as understood in these modern days, refers to the time when vessels propelled by steam power first began to plow its waters. Antedating that period for a century, large mackinaw boats propelled by oars and drawn with the aid of ropes by men or animals, carrying several tons of freight and an ample crew, transported merchandise from the mouth to the head of navigation near the Great Falls, a distance by river of about three thousand miles.

Steamboat traffic on the upper Missouri, which was inaugurated in 1830 by Pierre Choteau with the steamboat Antelope or Assiniboine, did not exhibit any notable increase for the following twenty years. There was not a sufficient increase of business to demand it.

The Harney expedition of 1855 and the building of Fort Randall in 1850-57 gave temporary employment to two or three vessels. But the fur trade, which was the only substantial industry, was amply accommodated by scores of mackinaws, a few itinerant traders with ponies, and the occasional trips of steamboats other than Choteau's two stern-wheelers, that made voyages whenever occasion demanded as far up as Fort Union, which was supposed to be the head of steam navigation for a number of years. Above that fort transportation by river was furnished altogether by mackinaws.

Following the construction and operation of Choteau's boats, the American Fur Company put the steamboat Trapper in the upper river carrying trade in 1840. In 1841 the General Brooks was added. In 1843 the Prairie Bird, owned by Honore Picotte, and in 1851 the American Fur Company launched the St. Mary. It was not until the discovery of gold on Salmon River in what is now Montana became known to the public, about 1862, that the steamboat traffic began to show notable increase. The discoveries on Salmon River were made as early as 1850, and a large mining population had entered the country from California and other Pacific coast and mountain communities, and this population were not long in ascertaining that the Missouri River was the most economical route for immigration from the east, and the preferable route for carrying the large amount of freight, which was growing rapidly as new discoveries were made. And in 1862 the famous Indian war led by Little Crow broke out, the hostiles driven west to the Missouri and beyond making an emergent demand for twenty-fold increase in transportation facilities. New military posts were erected, new Indian agencies established along the upper river. Many of the expeditions against the hostile red men found it economical and expedient to patronize the river. New boats by the score were built expressly for the upper Missouri, the side-wheeler had been discarded as not adapted to the channel, and all boats then built or later were on the stern-wheel model. Even the mammoth Dakota and Montana crafts, equal in carrying capacity to the Mississippi River boats, were built on the stern-wheel pattern. These new boats, possibly to the number of 100, were constructed for the comfortable accommodation of hundreds of passengers as well as having a freight capacity reaching in some of the vessels as high as 500 tons. From the two or three in 1855, the number of steamboats reported to be employed in 1861-65 was not far from fifty, and during the next fifteen years this number was annually augmented until it reached seventy-five plying between Sioux City or Yankton and Fort Benton and intermediate points. And after 1873 another large fleet was also employed at Bismarck after the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad to that point. In the meantime the navigation of the Yellowstone had been added to the Missouri. During this long period the transportation traffic of the upper Missouri River exceeded that of the Mississippi above St. Louis.

Among the natural advantages of Yankton during the years of its early settlement was an excellent steamboat landing, extending nearly the entire length of the city's river front. This was not the case with any other settled point on the river above Sioux City until Fort Randall was reached. This gave to the future capital city a steamboat trade and steamboat accommodations. The steamboats Chippewa, Key West and Spread Eagle reached Yankton from St. Louis in May, 1859, all bound for the mountains loaded with supplies for the fur companies. The arrival of a steamboat was quite an event, and was the signal for a grand roundup at the river of the entire population. According to the general understanding at that time no steamboat had yet been able to reach Fort Benton owing to a very rapid current called the rapids some distance above the Yellowstone's mouth. On this trip each of these boats had started out early, expecting to find a good stage of water in the upper river, and their officers were determined to get through to Benton if possible. The Chippewa was successful, the others from defect in construction failing. The winner carried a cargo of 250 tons for the American Fur Company of St. Louis, which it delivered at Benton. It was considered a notable achievement, and the successful boat nailed the elk horns to its pilot house as a trophy of championship. The other boats transferred their cargoes to mackinaws about nine hundred miles this side of Benton and the remainder of the trip was made by cordelling the small boats through. The Chippewa returned in September and reached St. Louis five months from the date of departure, making the round trip of 6,400 miles in that time.

Another claim has since been set up for the first voyage to Benton. Mr. James Parsons, of Yankton, stated that the Chippewa was ten years behind the first Benton boat. He says that he made a trip to Fort Benton in the steamboat Genoa, Captain Throckmorton, in 1849. He was cabin boy on the Genoa, and eighteen years old, and fixed the date from the historical fact that it was the year of gold discovery in California. Steamboat men generally discredited the claim, the captain of the Genoa not having made it at the time or at any time afterwards.

BURNING OF THE CHIPPEWA

Captain Humphries, of the good steamboat Chippewa, with Commodore Choteau, of the American Fur Company, and the crew and passengers of the steamer, reached Yankton from the upper river on Wednesday, July 3, 1861, in mackinaw boats, bringing the startling intelligence that the boat had been destroyed by fire and explosion when lying-to for the night at a point about one hundred and twenty miles above the mouth of the Yellowstone. The doomed boat reached Yankton about the 15th of May, from St. Louis, on her way to Fort Benton, laden with a cargo of 160 tons, and carrying a number of passengers, among whom were four ladies, bound for the gold mines of Salmon River. The cargo was made up of outfitting goods for the American Fur Company's fort at Benton, annuity goods for the Blackfeet Indians, a large stock of groceries and provisions for merchants in Bitter Root Valley, and a large quantity of ordinary black and giant powder, amounting to 5,925 pounds, which was securely stowed away in the magazine surrounded by a barricade of boxes of tobacco to protect it from accidental explosion. Just after the boat had laid by for the night on the south shore a deck hand lifted a hatch for the purpose of descending into the hold to see that everything was safe, when the alarming discovery was made that the hold and its contents were on fire, which had already made dangerous headway. The flames poured out through the hatch so quickly and fiercely that the deck hand was seriously burned. Every effort possible was made to quench the fire, but it had reached beyond control and the boat's facilities were of no avail in the effort to fight it. It was soon evident that the vessel was doomed, the flames spreading to the light woodwork in less time than it takes to tell it, and very soon cutting off all ingress to the engines. Captain Humphries ordered everybody ashore and, fearing the hot blaze would communicate with the powder magazine, the passengers were obliged to abandon their personal effects. Once they had reached the shore these people clustered near the boat. Appreciating their danger, the captain induced them to remove to a point about a quarter of a mile away. They were reluctant to do this, but entreaties and explanations finally satisfied them that they had better follow the captain's energetic counsel. The time employed in securing the safety of these people precluded the removal of the boat's books and records. It was thought best to cut the boat loose and let her drift down stream. This was done, and the flaming vessel swung away from shore and drifted to the opposite bank, where it grounded. She was now a mass of flames, roaring like a Niagara. Daylight had waned and the blazing boat illuminated the surrounding plains for miles. It formed an amazingly brilliant picture, but those who saw it were in no condition of mind to appreciate its magnificent features. And now came the climax of the grand spectacle. The hull of the boat was lifted up from the water, a deafening roar was heard, the waters of the river were forced up in great waves and columns, the ground trembled under the feet of the appalled spectators. Even the trees were swayed violently, and the air was literally filled with the blazing embers of the boat and its contents. The magazine had been reached by the flames and the phenomena of trembling earth and spouting water were the effect of the explosion. It was a scene of vivid reality, surpassing in its awful grandeur the power of ordinary language to describe. The plains were covered for a long distance with charred fragments of the boat and cargo. It was evident that the work of destruction had been very complete.

From the time when the fire was first discovered to the moment when the giant explosion occurred just sixty minutes elapsed. The work of many months was eaten up and scattered to the winds in just an hour. The destruction was so rapid and so complete and the direful disaster coming upon them so unexpected, like a bolt of lightning from a cloudless sky, that none realized the extent and thoroughness of the calamity for some time after the explosion occurred, and only when the tension of mind and body relaxed and gave way to Nature's appeal for repose, and the darkling veil of night had been drawn over the scene, the small colony of castaways on the shore began to look about for a resting place only to discover how complete was their destitution, how every trace of comfort had been obliterated by the destruction of the boat. Their situation was apparently one of extreme peril, particularly to the women. They had not a mouthful of food, no shelter, no beds but the bare earth, no weapons, simply the clothes that covered their bodies. They were nearly seven hundred and eighty miles by river from Fort Benton and 120 miles by river back to Fort Union, the nearest point where they could expect to find any relief. There was no boat above them and they knew nothing of the boats that were coming up the river. One might come along in a day and more likely not for a week. They felt that their situation was bordering on the desperate. In this forlorn and dangerous dilemma, Captain Humphries remembered a camp of "Wood Hawks," men who kept cordwood to sell to the steamboats, a few miles below and he soon had the entire party on the march for that camp, which was reached shortly after midnight, where a good-sized cabin was found well supplied with buffalo robes, some blankets, and coarse food. Especial attention was given to the comfort of the ladies, whose welfare was the first consideration.

The next morning the captain was able to procure canoes and a good-sized rowboat for the trip down to Fort Union, at which post an abundance of small boats and provisions could be had for those who wished to return. At Union everything needful was procured and all that desired were given free transportation and accommodations on the mackinaws for the trip home, intending to change to the first steamboat they should overtake bound downstream. As luck would have it, they were still on the outlook for a returning boat when they reached Yankton, but were quite indifferent about finding one, for they had grown accustomed to their narrow quarters, were having the finest of weather, and under more fortunate circumstances would claim that they were enjoying the voyage. A few of the male passengers and also a number of the crew had left the small boats at various points on the down trip, taking passage on the boats that were met bound for Benton, and there were a number. The few ladies of the party were doing their best to be cheerful, but all of them had lost heavily in personal apparel and stocks of goods they were taking into the mines. They were going back home to receive the condolences of relatives and friends, but intended to make another effort the following year. All the people were most emphatic in praising the conduct of the captain. He had been everything that was manly and noble, patient, cheerful, bearing the hardest part like a brave, Christian gentleman. It was worth some small misfortune at least to have earned such sincere testimonials to his merits as a man and a steamboat commander. It was the intention of Commodore Choteau, who represented the fur company, to charter another boat at St. Louis and endeavor to take a stock of supplies through to Benton before the close of navigation. The Chippewa had been in the upper river trade for five years and was credited with making the first trip to Benton. It was a favorite craft with the Dakota people, who learned of its destruction with sincere regret.

The party passed on in a few hours. They were traveling at the rate of 75 to 100 miles a day, and expected to reach St. Joseph, Missouri, the first railroad point, inside of a week, where the passengers would board the cars for home.

PROFITS OF STEAMBOATS—INCIDENTS OF MACKINAW TRAVEL

A large number of steamboats engaged in the transportation of passengers, merchandise and supplies, to the upper Missouri country, including the forts, Indian agencies, supply depots and the gold fields of Idaho and Montana, in 1866. Beginning April 1st, the steamboats going up the river were the Deer Lodge, Cora, Waverly, St. Johns, Jennie Brown, Big Horn, Marcella, Mollie Dozier, William J. Lewis, Only Chance, Tacony, Iron City, Peter Balen, Favorite, Amelia Poe, Goldfinch, Ontario, W. B. Dance, Desmet, Ned Tracy, Dora, David Watts, Huntsville, Helena, Miner (Northwest Fur Company), Lillie Martin, Luella, Jennie Lewis, Tom Stevens, Mary McDonald, Gallatin, Lexington with troops, Marion, Agnes, Montana, Ben Johnson, H. S. Turner, Nellie Rogers, Amanda, Pocahontas, Jennie Brown, and Rubicon, with Colonel Reeves, of the Thirteenth Infantry, commander of the Military District of Dakota.

The owners of steamboats that carried on the Missouri River traffic from 1863, for several years, found their business very profitable. A St. Louis authority gathered some statistics on this point from a number of the boat owners in 1866 that showed the profits of the Mollie Dozier for that year to be $50,100; the St. Johns, exclusive of the trip made for the Government with the Sherman Indian Peace Commission, $17,000; the W. J. Lewis, $40,000; the Deer Lodge, $70,000; the Peter Balen, trip of ninety-six days, $65,000; the Tacony, $16,000. The steamboats Goldfinch, Iron City and Peter Balen were owned by one company, and cleared a profit of $100,000. A large number of the owners declined to state their profit, but the statistician averred that none were less than $10,000, and from that sum to $40,000. There were in the neighborhood of forty steamboats engaged in this traffic, and the aggregate net profits of the entire fleet was set down at $1,500,000.

During the fall of 1866 the arrival of miners at various Dakota ports, coming in mackinaw boats and skiffs, from the gold fields of Montana and Idaho, was much greater than during the year preceding, an evidence that the Missouri River route was in great favor among the gold diggers. Yankton being the capital and having an excellent boat landing, was about the only desirable halting place for these parties until Sioux City was reached. It was estimated that two thousand of these home-seeking adventurers stopped over at this point during October and November, and employed land transportation to the nearest railway point. As a rule the miners had a good-sized sack of gold, and how much more could only be conjectured. An inquiry as to the amount of treasure they had accumulated was met by an evasive answer as a rule. Where they made purchases they paid in gold dust and nuggets, all the merchants and one of the saloons, having provided scales for weighing the yellow metal. Nearly all the available horses, mules and vehicles that could be procured, were engaged during this period in transporting these people from Yankton to the nearest railroad point, and many more passed on to points below before abandoning the river. After October, the weather turned quite cold, and the open boat travel became so uncomfortable that Yankton became the transfer point for nearly all arrivals. Some boats, however, were built and fitted out for all sorts of weather. One large craft arrived on the 1st of November. She was seventy-five feet in length, fitted up with a deck, covering a cabin and sleeping bunks. She had on board eighty-two passengers, and was owned and commanded by Zina French, of Fort Benton, where the boat was built. The craft drew nine inches of water and could easily make 100 miles a day, with her canvas spread. She was fitted for rowing and sailing, and her owner claimed that he would clear a net profit of $5,000 from this one trip. As a rule, the boats found ready purchasers at the various stopping places—parties buying to obtain the pine lumber, of which they were mainly constructed. A number of the older buildings in the Missouri River towns were partially constructed of material that was grown near the headwaters of the Missouri.

A party of three miners who, with seven others, were making the trip from Fort Benton to civilization, reached Yankton October 20th. About sixty miles above Fort Randall the party tied their craft up for the night near a sandbar and close to shore, and the men went out on the bar to sleep. During the night one of the party procured an axe, and with one blow crushed the skull and instantly killed one of his companions. He struck another in the shoulder, nearly severing the arm. The wounded man made an outcry and awoke the entire camp, when the murderer seized a rifle and escaped into the timber. The miners supposed they had been attacked by Indians, and without stopping to investigate hurried the wounded man to their boat, into which they jumped and pushed off downstream, leaving the dead man on the bar. The absence of the murderer and the wounded miner's story soon convinced the party that the Indians had had no part in the tragedy; but anxiety for the condition of their wounded companion determined the party to continue on to Fort Randall, where he could get medical aid. The party reached the fort during the day following, and placed their injured comrade in care of the post surgeon, informing the authorities at the post of the tragedy that had occurred. The commanding officer immediately dispatched a detachment of troops, accompanied by a number of the miners, to the locality of the homicide, but the slayer had made his escape. The slain man was given a decent burial. It was conjectured that the murderer had planned to kill the entire party with the axe, while they slept, seize their gold, and make his escape, after disposing of the bodies, by taking the boat. His plan failed, and he was then an outcast in the wilderness.

A few weeks later a man answering to the description of the murderer, which had been left with the sheriff, was arrested at Yankton and locked up. He had that day reached the settlement from the west, traveling afoot, and represented that he had left the steamboat Miner some distance up the river for the purpose of hunting; that the boat left him and he was obliged to walk, and for a time was lost on the prairie. He had a preliminary examination before Justice of the Peace George Pike, Sr., and was able to prove an alibi to the satisfaction of the court. A member of a mackinaw party that had reached town the night before the trial testified that the accused was at Fort Benton as late as October 12th. Such being the case, he could not possibly have been a member of the unfortunate crew, and he was discharged. He gave his name as Burton Baker. His close resemblance given of the murderer, and his arrest under circumstances that seemed to justify suspicion was all there was in the case against him. He was overjoyed when the judge released him. He had been apprehensive that something might be found to confirm the charge, and possibly Judge Lynch would take him in hand, as was frequently done in Montana in similar cases. He had been having a year of hard luck in the mines, he claimed, and had become familiar with the frowns of fortune. He reasoned that it would be in keeping with his luckless year to be held up here on a murder charge. The action of the judge led him to hope that he had reached a turn in the road, and might expect a change of fortune.

BATTLE WITH THE HOSTILES

Steamboating on the Missouri River was a precarious occupation in 1863. The country was in the midst of the Civil war and the State of Missouri was overrun with guerilla bands which did not hesitate to attack the steamboats engaged in transportation, claiming they were in the Confederate service and justified in their depredations by the well known laws of war. For this reason, the boats were compelled to wear a heavy iron armor, as the rebel bandits in some cases were supplied with artillery, and all had good rifles, therefore the boats were likewise fitted with artillery, and as a rule their armor consisted of heavy boiler iron. Running the gauntlet from the rebels, and reaching Dakota, as in the case of boats laden with Indian, military and Montana freight and passengers, the boats entered the field of the active Indian war, and after reaching the vicinity of Fort Pierre the hostile Sioux were encountered, and for a thousand miles above there was a daily liability of attacks from marauding bands of the Sioux, well armed with rifles and supplied with an abundance of ammunition. Boats insufficiently armored frequently returned riddled with bullets.

Eighteen hundred and sixty-three was the first full year of the great Indian war which broke out in the fall of 1862. It was the dryest year ever known by Missouri steamboatmen, the season of the lowest water in all the western rivers, the Mississippi included, and boats found it difficult to make any headway in the upper Missouri even with half a load. The Indians were defiant and bold and cunning. General Sully's first campaign was undertaken this year, and he consumed the whole season in getting his necessary supplies to a point near Fort Pierre, where, abandoning his dependence on the river, he made up a hasty equipment for a brief land campaign, and learning of the whereabouts of a large force of hostiles pursued and overtook them and fought the battle of Whitestone Hills.

In May the steamboat Robert Campbell, Jr., left St. Louis, heavily loaded, for Fort Benton. This boat met with the usual hostilities of the guerilla bands, and finally reached the theater of Indian warfare in Dakota in July, its voyage having been seriously hampered by the low water and meeting with Indian hostilities at a number of points. It had on board the Government Indian agent, Major Latta, in charge of a large quantity of Indian goods which the Government was sending to these same hostile Indians as presents, a custom that had been in vogue for some years, and designed as rewards for the peaceful conduct of the Sioux. These goods the agent would land at certain points where the Indians would gather to receive them, but this season they refused them, and the death penalty had been threatened against any that accepted them. But the Government representative insisted on landing the supplies at the appointed places and did so at great personal risk. Meeting with frequent warlike incidents, the Campbell finally reached Fort Berthold, where a good portion of its cargo was left, and then concluded to go on to Fort Union and store the remainder. It had reached a point forty or fifty miles below the mouth of the Yellowstone.

At Fort Berthold, Captain La Barge, in command of the Campbell, learned that he had been followed for a week by a Sioux war party numbering 500, which designed to seize the boat at the first favorable opportunity. The Sioux were on the right or west bank of the stream, and doubtless expected to find its opportunity when the boat had landed for fuel. At this time the Campbell had been joined by the steamer Shreveport, and the latter had been engaged to take a portion of the Campbell's cargo to Fort Union, and had already made a trip and returned for another load, when they were overtaken by the hostile Indian force. Joseph La Barge was master of the Campbell, and John Gunsolis and James P. McKinney, pilots. Col. C. J. Atkins was a passenger on the Campbell, also Alexander Culbertson and his Indian wife. Mr. Atkins related the incidents of the battle, which are reproduced from Volume 2, Collections of the North Dakota Historical Society, 1908, Prof. O. G. Libbey, secretary.

(At this time, July, General Sibley, with his army, was advancing across Northern Dakota to meet these hostiles.)

Opposite Tobacco Garden, which was on the timbered side of the river, there was on the right hand, a high bluff. We saw that the woods on the left swarmed with Indians and that many ponies were tied there. We saw that the Indians were making great demonstrations of friendship, throwing their tomahawks down and scraping dirt over them and calling out for the boat to land. Alexander Culbertson and his squaw both told Captain La Barge that this was a dangerous war party and that they meant mischief. From what the Indians said among themselves Culbertson warned every one to be on guard against treachery. Captain La Barge called for volunteers to go ashore in the yawl and bring the chiefs on board. Atkins volunteered, but Captain McKinney would not let him go, as Culbertson warned him that the Sioux would kill every man in the yawl. The captain, with the Shreveport near at hand, stopped at a sandbar in the river, and the yawl was ordered to go to a dry bar that ran out into the river several rods from the steep wooded bank, which was at that point four or five feet high. When the Indians saw the yawl coming they crowded eagerly down on the sandbar, filling it completely from the water's edge to the bank. They reminded one of wild beasts about to spring on their prey. The yawl was manned by one of the deckhands and six roustabouts as oarsmen, and as it neared the shore an Indian picked up a dead tree top and threw it down to indicate where the landing was to be made. When the yawl reached the sandbar, one of the men got out and pulled it up and held it steady, while one of the Indians got in and seated himself with the steersman at the stern. Others shook hands with the oarsmen, standing in the water near the boat or with one foot on the gunwale. When the man on the bank made ready to shove off the boat, an Indian suddenly reached back over his shoulder for an arrow, seeing which Atkins, who had been keeping a sharp lookout from the deck of the McDonald, leveled his gun and fired at him. At the same instant he saw the Indian sitting in the stern of the yawl raise his spear and thrust the stroke oarsman through the body and leap out of the boat into the water. The steersman instantly sprang overboard and hidden by the gunwale managed to pull the boat off from the shore amid a shower of bullets and arrows, and swam with it back to the steamboat Campbell.

On board this boat a barricade had been erected of boxes and flour sacks, extending around the front of the boat, and behind this lay eighteen well-armed men, mostly passengers. A signal was now given, when a heavy volley from both the Campbell and the Shreveport cut through the mass of Indians on the bar like a reaper through grain. The dead lay thick all over the sand, while among them the wounded struggled to escape to the woods before the second volley was fired. From the shelter of the timber the Indians opened fire on the boats and a sharp fusillade was continued on both sides for some time. Then the boys on the boats began firing on the ponies tied in the timber, and the Indians made every effort to save them. One Indian, hideously painted with a white stripe down the middle of his breast and transverse stripes like ribs extending from it on each side, rode out on the bank in full view, and sat there waving a lance upon which were several scalps. All the whites on the boats appeared to have fired at him simultaneously, for both Indian and pony went down as if struck by lightning. Two of the pilots were firing from the rear of the pilot-house and an Indian who had crawled down far enough to command a view of their position, opened fire on them at close range. By watching carefully they finally located their assailant by the smoke of his discharge, and killed him at the first fire.

Of the men in the yawl, besides the one killed by the spear thrust in the first of the fight, two more were shot while trying to escape in the boat, one of whom died instantly, and the other died soon after being taken aboard. One man received an arrow wound nine inches deep, but recovered, being just able to walk when the boat returned from its voyage.

A day or two after this battle, which was called the Battle of the Shreveport, there was a report at Fort Union that the Indian loss in the fight was twenty-eight killed and forty-seven wounded, beside eight ponies killed and four wounded. The whites' loss totaled three, as already narrated, who were buried the following day under a heavy guard. But it was evident that the Indians were not seeking a renewal of the conflict, for they were not afterwards seen.

Capt. Abe Hutchinson, it appears, navigated the Yellowstone River during the Civil war, according to the St. Louis Republican. In 1864 he started from La Crosse, Wisconsin, with the steamers Chippewa Falls and Cutler for Fort Benton. The Chippewa Falls was ordered up the Yellowstone in September, 1864, proceeding ninety miles above the mouth and relieving the Eighth Minnesota Regiment, or a portion of it that had been left in that quarter at the time of Sully's expedition in 1864. The Cutler was low water bound during the season at the mouth of the Marias River, which empties into the Missouri a few miles below Benton. She returned to La Crosse in 1865.

The Key West, Coulson line, Capt. Grant Marsh, master, was the first steamboat to reach the mouth of Powder River, a tributary of the Yellowstone. This was in 1873, and the achievement gave new importance to the Yellowstone as a navigable stream. The purpose of the trip was to enable General Forsythe, U. S. A., to select sites for two military posts in that section then overrun with hostile Sioux Indians. The sites were selected, but the posts were not built until 1877-78.

The people of Yankton were taken by surprise on Thursday, the 17th of November, 1864, to find the town literally overrun with a large number of gold miners who had reached here that morning from the gold fields of Idaho and Montana. They came in a fleet of seventeen mackinaw boats and numbered 180 men. Among them was William Thompson, who is mentioned in the early part of this history as one of the party who came to Dakota in company with M. K. Armstrong, and who went to the mines during the summer of 1863. Mr. Thompson had about three thousand dollars in gold on his person, most of it in leather belts supported by his shoulders and strapped around his body, the weight of which made him appear somewhat awkward as he moved around shaking the hands of his old pioneer friends. The party left Virginia City, Montana, on the 1st of October, and traveled overland about one hundred and fifty miles to a point on the head of the Yellowstone where they had arranged for the building of eighteen boats, which they found all in good condition and ready for the long voyage which they were about to undertake. They reached the Yellowstone October 8th, and started down the river on the 11th. Two days later one boat was wrecked by striking a rock, and was abandoned. On the 27th they came out into the Missouri and halted at Fort Union to purchase supplies. The first sign of Indians was met about one hundred and fifty miles below Union, but the savages did not trouble them. Near Painted Woods they passed a large camp of hostiles who opened fire on them but did no damage. The weather turned very cold after leaving Fort Rice and they suffered considerably. As they were in the hostile country they were continually on their guard and cautious about landing. They traveled all night after reaching Fort Sully, but had no trouble except from the extreme cold weather and floating ice. They landed at Yankton on the 17th having made the voyage in the boats, a distance of 1,700 miles in forty-seven days. Every man was well supplied with gold dust and nuggets, and paid for their purchases in town by exchanging gold at $45 an ounce, gold being worth about two dollars and sixty-five cents in greenbacks, which was then the currency of the realm. They were a high-spirited body of men, temperate, orderly and intelligent, and from Mr. Thompson's statement their aggregate gold supply was in excess of half a million dollars in gold, or a million and a half in greenback currency. They sold their boats for the value of the lumber they contained, and chartered a large number of teams and various patterns of vehicles from lumber wagons to stage coaches to take them to the railway points east and south, estimated then to be 300 miles away.

THE NAME YELLOWSTONE

West of the Missouri, in the northern portion of the Dakota, were a number of rivers, the principal one and the only navigable stream being the Yellowstone, one of the famous rivers of the world, its headwaters and the mountainous countries environing them, being at one time a veritable garden of the fur industry nearly a century before Dakota was organized, a fairy land of natural wonders and majestic scenery, sustaining many tribes of Indians whose representatives seldom came in contact with the white man except in his capacity of Indian trader. Lewis & Clark met these wild tribes, and Bonneville, a quarter of a century later spent three years among them, and the majestic topography of their country, the most attractive scenic portion of America's broad realm.

The boundaries of the Territory of Dakota at the time of its organization embraced the entire Yellowstone country, including its headwaters and it was not deprived entirely of it when Montana was carved from its western boundaries. The capacious mouth and a few miles of the noble rugged stream remained to add renown to the County of McKenzie in the northwest portion of the territory.

Capt. H. M. Chittenden, of the Corps of Engineers, U. S. A., an author eminent among the historians as well as explorers of the Northwest, furnishes much information regarding the country. Chittenden says:

"This river (Yellowstone)," say Lewis and Clark in their journal for the day of their arrival at the mouth of the now noted stream, "had been known to the French as Roché Jaune, or as we have called it, the Yellowstone." The French name was, in fact, already firmly established among the traders and trappers of the Northwest Fur Company when Lewis and Clark met them among the Mandans. Even by the members of the expedition (Lewis and Clark's) it seems to have been more generally used than the new English form; and the spellings "Rejone," "Rejhone," "Rochejone," "Rochejohn," and "Rochejhone" are among their various attempts to render orthographically the French pronunciation.

By whom the name "Roche Jaune," or its equivalent form, "Pierre Jaune," was first used it would be extremely interesting to know, but it is impossible to determine at this late day. Like their successor, "Yellowstone," these names were not originals but only translations. The Indian tribes along the Yellowstone and Upper Missouri rivers had names for the tributary stream signifying "yellow rock," and the French had doubtless adopted them long before they saw the stream itself.

It thus appears that the name, which has now become so celebrated, descends to us, through two translations, from those native races whose immemorial dwelling place had been along the stream which it describes. What it was that led them to use the name is easily discoverable. Seventy-five miles below the ultimate source of the river lies the Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone, distinguished among the notable canyons of the globe by the marvelous coloring of its walls. Conspicuous among its numerous tints is yellow. Every shade, from the brilliant plumage of the yellow bird to the rich saffron of the orange, greets the eye in bewildering profusion. There is indeed other color, unparalleled in variety and abundance, but the ever-present background of all is the beautiful fifth color of the spectrum. So prominent is this feature that it never fails to attract attention, and all descriptions of the canyon abound in references to it. Lieutenant Doane (1870) notes the "brilliant yellow color" of the rocks. Captain Barlow and Doctor Hayden (1871) refer in almost the same words to "the yellow, nearly vertical walls." Raymond (1871) speaks of the "bright yellow of the sulphury clay." Captain Jones (1873) says that "about and in the Grand Canyon the rocks are nearly all tinged a brilliant yellow."

That a characteristic which so deeply moves the modern beholder should have made a profound impression on the mind of the Indian need hardly be premised. This region was by no means unknown to him, and from the remote, although uncertain, period of his first acquaintance with it the name of the river has undoubtedly descended. Going back, then, to this obscure fountain head, the original designation is found to have been, in the Munetaree, one of the Sioux family of languages, "Mi-tsi-a-da-zi," or Rock Yellow River, and this, in the French tongue, became "Roché Jaune" and "Pierre Jaune"; and in English, "Yellow Rock" and "Yellow Stone."

In the spring of 1864 the first steamboat to reach Dakota Territory was the Benton, and the date of its arrival at Yankton was April 22d. It had come from Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and brought quite a quantity of stoves and glass for the merchants of Yankton. At the time it was considered a remarkably early arrival—in fact, the earliest that any one could remember since the first steamboats began running up to any Dakota point. The boat was named in memory of the distinguished Missouri senator, Hon. Thomas H. Benton, who was then looked upon as the representative of all western interests from the Missouri to the Pacific, and almost the only prominent statesman of the country who was accustomed to express confidence in the material resources of the trans-Missouri and trans-Rocky Mountain region.

Fort Benton, at the head of steamboat navigation on the Missouri and the last of the American fur companies posts was named to commemorate his services, and a city has been built adjoining the site of the old post. Benton's public career, unsullied by any act that would discredit his patriotism and personal honor, recommends his name and memory to the people of this Upper Missouri region as one they can with honor to themselves, perpetuate upon their maps, and in sculptured marble.

Fort Benton was lost to Dakota politically at the time Montana was organized as a territory. It had early become an important depot of supplies not only for the American Fur Company but also for the thousands who had found their way to the newly discovered gold fields on the headwaters of the Missouri and Columbia rivers. In 1865 thirteen steamboats reached that port from St. Louis, carrying in the aggregate 1,000 tons of freight upon which the freight charges were 18 cents a pound; in 1866 the number of boats increased to thirty-seven carrying 4,000 tons of freight at 11 cents a pound, and in 1867 there were fifty-three steamboats that deposited 7,300 tons of freight there at a cost of 9 cents a pound, showing a reduction in the carrying charges of just 100 per cent in three years.

A very destructive conflagration at the docks in St. Louis, on the 29th of March, 1869, consumed a number of Missouri River Montana steamboats that were receiving cargoes for the Dakota country and the mountains. Among the burned vessels that were bound for Dakota and Montana points were the Ben Johnson, Carrie B. Kountze, Henry Atkins, G. B. Allen, and Jennie Lewis. Hundreds of passengers were aboard the doomed boats, but all were gotten out alive, though their baggage and personal effects were largely destroyed. The total money value of boats and cargoes was about a half million dollars. The Ben Johnson and G. B. Allen had finished loading and were ready to depart that evening. The St. Louis levee was thickly lined with boats at the time, and those that were burned were hemmed in by other craft that had to be extricated to save them, leaving the Missouri vessels to be devoured by the flames that rapidly spread from boat to boat.

During a cold snap in November, 1868, five steamboats were caught in a freeze up in the Upper Missouri, remote from any landing, and were obliged to remain in their icy harbor all the succeeding winter. These were the Ida Stockdale, forty miles above new Fort Sully; Urilda, ten miles below old Fort Sully (Pierre); Nile, near the mouth of American Creek; Benton, and Hiram Wood, just above Fort Randall. The passengers were obliged to land and walk to the nearest point where conveyances could be had to take them to their destination. A large force of practical steamboat men came up in March, 1869, for the purpose of securing these vessels when the ice broke up, and this they were enabled to do without damage to any of the vessels. The entire list came down the river safely in the spring of 1869, and went on to St. Louis to secure their cargoes for up river.

TORNADO ON THE YELLOWSTONE

Gen. Mark D. Flower, of St. Paul, owner and captain of the Missouri River steamboat, the Osceola, held a contract with the Government, in 1877, for transporting freight to different points on the Yellowstone River, and while engaged in this work encountered a tornado, on June 22d, when near the mouth of Powder River, 225 miles from Bismarck. Of the particulars of the storm, which was the only one ever reported of a similar character in which a steamboat was destroyed while under way, General Flower gave out a statement, in substance as follows:

The tornado struck us at six o'clock in the evening of June 22, and in the twinkling of an eye reduced the staunch little steamer to a helpless wreck, threw us into the river, and damaged or destroyed a great part of our cargo. The boat was proceeding up the Yellowstone at a point 225 miles above Bismarck. We were near the mouth of Powder River, and not very far from the scene of the Custer massacre last year. The banks of the river are low at this point. We had no timber for shelter or even to tie the boat to. In all my experience I never witnessed anything so terrible. The tremendous wind, accompanied by hail and rain, came down on us with only a moment's warning, catching us on our starboard quarter and careening us over to an angle of about forty-five degrees, when our entire upper works—cabin, smokestacks, steam pipes and all—were swept into the boiling, surging current of the Yellowstone. Relieved of the upper works, the boat righted up, and by this means our lives were saved. Many were blown overboard, but saved themselves with the assistance of the floating wreckage, and others who were lucky enough to hold to the floating hull. The cabin and upper works were split into kindling wood and floated away. After the storm had somewhat abated, by strenuous efforts the hull, or what may more properly be termed the remains of the wreck, was fastened to the shore, and we proceeded to save what we could of the Government freight, amounting to some sixty thousand dollars, which was considerably damaged. Much of the cargo went into the river and floated away.

I was blown sixty feet from the hurricane roof and fell in the river, striking a spar and injuring my side and back seriously. Mrs. Flower, who was the only lady on the boat, went overboard with the cabin, but was rescued. She lost her entire wardrobe, however, excepting the clothing she wore. Captain Haycock and his son, Abner Haycock, of St. Louis, were my pilots, and both stood to the wheel until blown with the pilot house into the river. The entire force of officers, crew and carpenters did their duty faithfully. J. Jones, fireman, and Bob Small, second cook, both of Memphis, Tennessee, were drowned. My safe, containing books and papers and several hundred dollars in money, went to the bottom, irretrievably lost. We remained near the wreck until we saved all we could of the freight, and until passing boats took it away and rescued us. I had no insurance, as companies refused to insure against the unknown dangers of the Upper Missouri and Yellowstone.

NAVIGABILITY OF THE MISSOURI RIVER

In later days an impression has gained lodgment in the public mind that the open season for navigation in the Upper Missouri closed early in the fall owing to low water. This impression was erroneous. A world of testimony exists contradicting it, and if the logs of the steamboats navigating the upper river between 1860 and 1890—which were the active prosperous years of the business—are properly consulted, they will furnish the best of evidence that the close of navigation and the freezing over of the surface of the stream, were simultaneous occurrences. In nearly every season adventurous masters found their craft locked in the ice away from harbor, when winter set in. These events usually occurred in November. Here is produced the log of the steamer Pemimah, one of the Coulson line of steamers, relating the incidents of a trip from Yankton to Fort Buford (above the 48th parallel), and return, which occupied twenty-five days; leaving Yankton October 11th and returning November 6th. The boat carried one cargo to numerous points below Bismarck; reloaded at that port and went on to Buford. Every delay and obstacle of the voyage, bearing upon the navigation of the river is noted, which must render it an accurate and reliable record to be studied by those who would know the facts concerning the practicability of navigating this wonderful river, whose value to the nation has yet to be properly appreciated. Its improvement, in a manner that will be durable and permanent, awaits the dawning of that appreciation in the minds not only of the people at large, but more particularly in the comprehension of our national congressmen.

There was nothing exceptionable, one way or the other in this voyage of the Peninah; the season was an average one; and the hindrances due to low water are explicitly noted. The Peninah was a good substantial craft, fitted for passengers as well as freight; stern wheel as all the Missouri boats were; built for the Missouri traffic, and ably commanded. Here follows the log:

Left Yankton at 8 o'clock a. m., Oct. 11th, '77. 170 tons aboard for Sully, Cheyenne, Standing Rock and Bismarck, and laid up for the night at the mouth of the Niobrara. Oct. 12, met the Dugan ten miles below Yankton Agency, and the Tiger at the Agency. Reached Randall at 4:20 p. m., and tied for the night opposite Whetstone Agency. Oct. 13, off at daylight. Met the C. K. Peck seven miles below American Creek at 2:45 p. m. Laid up just below Bijou Hills. Oct. 14, sparred over 20 inches in two places below Brule under high bluffs on east side of river. Tied up opposite Brule Agency. Oct. 15, sounded below Yellow Medicine and arrived at Red Cloud at 11 p. m. Oct. 16, wooded at Big Cedar at 9:30 a. m. Got to Pierre at 6:20 and laid up at Peoria bottom at 1 a. m. Oct. 17, arrived at Sully at 9:30 a. m., put off freight and left at 10:10 a. m. Got to Cheyenne at 12:30 p. m. Put off freight and left at 2:30 p. m. Wooded at McKenzie's Point at 6:30 p. m. 18th, landed at the head of Devil Island at 11 a. m. and wooded. 19th, wooded at Fox Island at 4 a. m. Laid there until daylight. Off again at 4:40 a. m. and wooded at Manning's bottom. 20th, arrived at Standing Rock at 1 a. m. Discharged 90 tons of freight and left at 9:20 a. m. Unloaded freight at Fort Rice at 3:30 p. m. and left at 4:15 p. m. 21st, landed at Bismarck at 3 a. m. and commenced loading for Buford. Nellie Peck left for Buford at 9 a. m. this morning.

Oct. 22, left Bismarck at 4:30 p. m. with 183 tons, with Nellie Peck 31½ hours ahead. 23d, landed at Fort Stevenson at 3:30 p. m., 23 hours from Bismarck. Left Stevenson at 4 p. m. and passed Berthold at 8 p. m. 24th, wooded at Little Missouri at 4:30 a. m. Met the Rosebud there at 12 m. Met the Silver City ten miles above the slide. Met the Fontenelle at Upper Knife River at 3 p. m. 25th, passed the steamer Custer at Tobacco Garden, and wooded at Joe Lanning's at 7 a. m. Nellie Peck was, at this point, five hours ahead. Wooded at Scott's at 6:30 p. m., and laid there until 7:45 p. m. Oct. 26th, arrived at Fort Buford at 2:30 p. m., 3 days, 10½ hours out from Bismarck. Discharged 183 tons of freight. Nellie Peck unloading on our arrival. She left at 8 a. m.

27th, left at daylight and wooded at Lanning's. Laid up ten miles below Knife River. 28th, under way at 2:30 a. m. Wooded at Mandan Village at 5 a. m. Met Rosebud 20 miles above Berthold 10:35 a. m. and passed Berthold at 12:30 p. m. Passed steamer Sherman aground above Stevenson at 4 p. m. Laid up at Knife River. 29th, off at break of day. Sparred at Painted Woods; wind terrible. Arrived at Bismarck at 5 p. m., making the round trip from Bismarck to Buford and return in 7 days and 30 minutes. Nellie Peck in five hours ahead of us. Laid at Bismarck all night.

Oct. 30th, left Bismarck at daylight for Yankton. Laid up at Beaver Creek. Oct. 31st, sparred three hours above Standing Rock; had to lay a line before we got off. Left Standing Rock at 12 m., and laid up at Spring Brook woodyard. November 1, took on 15 cords of wood at Wanita bottom at 7 a. m. Aground again and had to spar from 1 p. m. until 4 p. m. Laid up opposite the Moreau. Nov. 2d, under way at daybreak. Tied up opposite Cheyenne at 6:15 p. m. Nov. 3d, left at daylight and passed the Silver City at 8:30 a. m. Met the Black Hills at Farm Island at 2:50 p. m. Laid up at Red Cloud. Nov. 4th, met the Josephine at Dry Point at 1:30 p. m. Laid up at Gray Island. Nov. 5th, met the Big Horn at Joe La Roche's at 9 a. m. Wooded, 37 cords, at Mulehead, at 11 a. m. Met the Silver Lake at 1:30 p. m. below Mulehead. Met the Key West below the Yankton Agency. Laid up at Yankton bluffs. Nov. 6th, passed the Fontenelle at the foot of Bon Homme Island. Broke our camrod here and laid up to repair it. Off again at 1:30 p. m. Landed at Yankton, making the round trip from Yankton to Buford in 27 days, 8½ hours. Receiving and discharging, with our way freight down, 400 tons. Dave Campbell, Ben. Jewell, pilots; Jno. W. Rowe, and A. W. McLean, engineers.

The Peninah finished her season's work by another short trip to Red Cloud agency, Lower Brule, carrying 193 tons, returning to Yankton on the 11th of November.

LOG OF THE FANCHON

For the purpose mainly of showing the importance of the Yellowstone River as channels for the transportation of freight and passengers during the earlier days before railroads came in and monopolized the carrying business, the following paragraph taken from the "River News" column of the Bismarck Tribune of August 3, 1877, furnishes abundant evidence:

The steamer Fanchon, Captain Sweeney, made the best time this season to the mouth of Tongue River, two days and seven hours, carrying 160 tons of freight. She left Tongue River at 5 P. M., July 20th, with seventy five Crow Indians and 100 ponies. The steamers General Meade and Fanchon arrived from Tongue River and report the river falling fast; boats are experiencing trouble in reaching Tongue River. The Rankin is high and dry at a point below Powder River. Captain Hemingway came down on the Fanchon and will procure jackscrews and material and try to launch her. The Victory has her barge aground at Peninah shute. The Western is filling up for Tongue River and will depart on the arrival of tomorrow's train. She will be followed by the Far West Tuesday. The Key West, Big Horn, Peninah and Roschud are employed carrying supplies from Tongue River to Big Horn post. The steamer Benton got away with a fair trip. By telegram from Fort Benton to Captain Marratta, superintendent Coulson Inc, the steamer Durfee left Benton for this place the 1st inst, and will arrive here Sunday. The river at this point is falling fast. The following steamers are now at the landing: Fanchon, Florence Myer, Western, Far West, General Meade, R. W. Dugan, and Fontenelle. The Fanchon will go to St. Louis and will get away some time tomorrow. The General Meade, R. C. Mason, master, left Cantonment post, Tongue River No. 1, Tongue River, Montana, at 3 o'clock P. M., July 30th; wind very strong; 6.10 P. M., met steamer Fletcher; 6.35 P. M. met steamer Tiger; 8 P. M. passed steamer Rankin high and dry. July 31st, 6.55 A. M., met steamer Alex Kendall, laid up on account of wind from 8.35 A. M. to 5 P. M.; met steamer Savannah above Glendive woodyard. August 1st, 4.15 A. M., met steamer General Custer; 5 A. M., met steamer Victory near cutoff; 3 P. M. met steamer Kate Kinney at Big Muddy; 4.20 P. M. met steamer Josephine. August 2d, 5.45 A. M., met steamer Silver City at Knife River; 7.15 P. M., met steamer Benton; 8 P. M., laid up at Painted Woods on account of heavy storm. August 3d, landed at Bismarck at 9.15 A. M. We have Captain Hemingway and crew, who are going home to build a boat suitable for the Little Horn River.

GRANDEUR OF A TRIP ON THE MISSOURI

The steamer Helena was a new boat in 1878, and as she was about starting out from St. Louis on her first long voyage of nearly three thousand miles to Fort Benton, her captain and part owner, James McGarry grew reflective:

If I were to tell a foreigner of the trip I am going to take on the Helena tonight he might not say anything, but he would mentally set me down as a most consummate falsifier. An Englishman, with his ideas of space and distance formed by contemplation of the size of his own country, would simply and firmly decline to believe in the existence of a river upwards of three thousand miles in length, and as for telling him that it was navigable for upwards of two thousand seven hundred miles, and that a craft like the Helena would make the trip, it would only increase his admiration for your powers of fabrication. I doubt if one man in five hundred could draw a rough charter of the northwestern states and territories and get them in a proper position let alone the matter of outline. A little study of a map of the United States would give them a few ideas about the extent of a voyage impossible in any other country in the world. Just think what an institution the Missouri River is. We pull out of St. Louis, run north twenty miles and turn into the Missouri River, and then we are booked for a voyage through six states and through a country richer in all that makes wealth than any other portion of the land. The river, running west, passes by Jefferson City, reaches Kansas City, forms the boundary line between Kansas and Missouri, and in its course kisses the feet of Fort Leavenworth, Atchison and St. Joseph, forms the boundary between Nebraska and Iowa, and touches Omaha, Council Bluffs and Sioux City, and then makes a western detour and elevates to the dignity of a port, Yankton, in Dakota Territory, a town which the influx of strangers to the Black Hills has made a thriving city. The river then strikes northward through the center of Dakota Territory, striking, when 600 miles north, Bismarck, a thriving little city known to the world as the present western terminus of Jay Cooke's Northern Pacific Railroad. Civilization is here left substantially behind, and for 1,400 miles the Missouri describes a semicircle through some of the grandest scenery on the globe, military stations, mining camps and natural landmarks, fantastically named by man alone, serving to give notice of distance passed until the end of the wild and wonderful journey is reached, with the head of navigation at Fort Benton, a United States military station, with a prosperous and growing town springing up under its protection, with its inhabitants enriching themselves by trade with the miners who throng the auriferous regions of the space remaining between here and the golden shore of the Pacific. The river at this point is wide and deep, but thirty miles further up the Missouri pours down in a glorious cascade over a rocky ledge ninety feet high, making a sight rivaling in grandeur and excelling in the beauty of its surroundings the fearful and glorious Falls of Niagara.

During the boating season of 1860 there were 143 landings made by steam boats at the Yankton levee. A large proportion of the Government annuity goods for the Indians and supplies for the military posts, came to Sioux City by rail, thence by river to the fort and Indian agencies above. In view of the prejudice which existed in certain quarters against the navigation of the Upper Missouri, growing out of rival interests or misinformation, the foregoing should be considered a sufficient refutation of any statement that the upper portion of the Missouri River is not a practicable navigable stream. Only during the low water season in the fall did steamboat men find difficulty in ascending the river; then the sandbars and snags were troublesome. Snags were much more numerous at that time than of later years; they having been removed by Government boats expressly rigged for the purpose. It may be claimed that all the most dangerous haunts of the snag have been explored and this enemy to navigation destroyed. This work was for many years in charge of Capt. W. H. Gould, a veteran steamboat man and a very intelligent and observing gentleman. He is authority for the statement that there can be no increase in the number of snags in the river, and has not been since the settlement of the country. This is because the settlers have removed the trees from the river banks. During the ordinary boating season, which usually begins from the middle of March to the first of April and continues until the last of October and frequently well into November, the navigation of the Missouri River was not seriously hampered except by sand bars during low water in the late fall, and was free from accidents other than those common to navigable streams everywhere. Steamboats did not cease to navigate the Missouri because of any hindrance or obstacle to navigation.

Railroads were extended to and across the great river and carried passengers and freight more expeditiously and at less rates if necessary than the boats could afford. The inevitable result was steamboats were compelled to abandon the river and seek employment where such keen competition did not exist, until such time as the demands of population and business may again require its use not only as a channel of commerce but as a regulator of rates. That time would seem to be approaching rapidly.

With the exception of 1863, which year was memorable as the driest ever known in the northwestern country, steamboating was favored by a good stage of water each season and numerous fleets of steamboats were engaged in plying its waters. The traffic was uniformly good for fifteen or twenty years. In 1869 the river opened about the middle of March, and the spring freshets had given a good stage of water to the channel. By the middle of May the boats that had been registered at Yankton, the only commercial port at that time on the river in Dakota Territory were the Deer Lodge, Henry M. Shreeves, Antelope, North Alabama, Only Chance, Urilda, Big Horn, Ida Reese, Huntsville, Andrew Ackley, Peninah, Nile, Viola Belle, Silver Bow, Mountaineer, Lacon, St. Johns, Arkansas, Tempest, Sallie, Mollie Eberts, Bertha, Silver Lake No. 4, Columbia, Colossal, Hiram Wood, Utah, Ida Stockdale, Miner, Ida, War Eagle, Tacony, Colorado, Flirt, Evening Star, Emilie LeBarge, Admiral Farragut, Silver Bow, Nick Wall Evening Star, Minnie, Submarine No. 21, Sully, Cora, Fannie Barker, Big Horn, Ida Reese No. 2, Importer, Peter Bolen, and Nick Wall. During the entire season about seventy-five boats were engaged in the Missouri above Sioux City and forty to seventy-five were employed each year after the beginning of the emigration to Montana in 1863, until after the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad to Bismarck in 1873.

GOVERNMENT SHOULD PROTECT AND PRESERVE THE RIVER BANKS

The day will come when our Government will extend its policy of "conservation of our natural resources," to such an improvement of the Missouri River as will permanently protect its banks from the destructive effects of flood waters and prevent the waste of many scores of thousands of acres of our most valuable agricultural lands, which are now annually washed into the river to feed sandbars and also to be carried away to the gulf. The Missouri, properly improved, together with the Yellowstone, would furnish rare pleasure to thousands of tourists who would find great enjoyment and valuable entertainment in a summer's trip by waterway to the headwaters of the Yellowstone as well as the Missouri. This improvement should be constantly agitated by the people of the many states watered by these grand arteries, whose natural attractions viewed from the deck of a properly equipped vessel, are in many prominent features, unrivalled in any part of the world. In the upper reaches of these rivers, the scenery has been pronounced by cosmopolitan travelers, the most diversified and attractive that can be found in any portion of the eastern hemisphere. The Legislatures of the Missouri River states would do well to take the subject in hand.

SUPREME COURT ASSIGNS JUDGES

The Supreme Court of the Territory of Dakota met in annual session at Yankton, the capital, on January 13, 1871, and passed an order locating the seats of the three District courts, the place and date where the sessions should be held, and assigning the judges, to-wit: French, Kidder and Brookings. Northern Dakota, for the first time was recognized in this order. The first District Court was appointed to be held in Vermillion on the second Tuesday of February and November of each year, and Hon. Jefferson P. Kidder was assigned as judge of the district. The Second District Court was appointed to be held at Yankton on the second Tuesday of April and October in each year; Associate Justice Wilmot Wood Brookings was assigned as judge. The Third District Court was appointed to be held at Pembina on the first Tuesday of June and September of each year. Chief Justice French was assigned as judge. This removal of the chief justice from the capital, where this official had heretofore resided was said to have been at the earnest solicitation of Chief Justice French himself, who was adventurously inclined and anxious to get a glimpse of the wilds of the North then something of a topic because of the construction of the Northern Pacific Railway across the northern portion of the Dakotas. Invidious critics, however, set afloat a report that the true motive in inducing the chief justice to voluntarily exile himself to that remote region of dog trains and pemmican, where courts had been an unknown quantity, was that he might escape the responsibility of unraveling many of the intricate legal problems presented by the attorneys who practiced in the Second District Court. The capital city bar at the time was made up of many of the most able lawyers in the Northwest, including Hon. Bartlett Tripp, Col. Gideon C. Moody, Hon. Solomon L. Spink, Gen. William Tripp, Gen. W. H. H. Beadle, Hon. George H. Hand, E. H. Brackett, Esq., Calvin J. B. Harris, and litigation of cases of national importance was not infrequent in the court having jurisdiction not only of a portion of the settled part of the territory but of a vast region of Indian country which supplied cases worthy of the efforts of the most profound disciples of Blackstone. Judge French was said to have been a justice of the peace in Maine, and not familiar with our statutes regulating intercourse with the aborigines of the Northwest. The judge himself, however, assumed the full responsibility for the change, urging that an impairment of his health was one potent reason for desiring a more northern habitation; and he was further moved to be insistent in the matter because of the feeble condition of Mrs. French who would accompany him in hopes that the invigorating climate and pure water of the far North would restore her.

It had furthermore been a debatable question with the judges since the organization of the territory, whether the prerogative of assigning the judges and fixing the time of holding the courts was lodged in the Legislature or in the Supreme Court, and this step would furnish an opportunity to test the question, so far as the assignment of the judges was concerned. The Legislature paid no attention to this action of the court; but the governor, two years later, during the pendency of the Wintermute murder case, and the litigation arising out of the construction of the Dakota Southern Railroad, reassigned the judges by proclamation.

PEMBINA, SEAT OF THE U. S. COURT—RED RIVER SETTLEMENTS

Regarding the northern region wherein the chief justice would make his official residence, it was claimed that it was in the midst of a partially settled, fairly improved, and delightful part of the territory and was on the threshold of a surprising growth. The Pembina River from its mouth to St. Joseph, thirty miles, was well settled and improved with many excellent farms. The Gingras horse farm and villa was near St. Joe. Pembina had been the seat of an U. S. Custom House and postoffice for twenty years, but stimulated by a number of important recent events was making considerable advancement. It still retained the custom house and postoffice, and now possessed a U. S. land office, a fine hotel, a number of private residences, and was the seat of the U. S. Court for the Third Judicial District. Enos Stutsman, Judson LaMoure, Wm. R. Goodfellow, and George I. Foster, formerly of Yankton and Union counties in the south, were among the leading men of Pembina, which at this time was the only permanent white settlement in Dakota north of the 45th parallel.

A steamboat, the Selkirk, commanded by Capt. Alexander Griggs plied between Pembina and some points above, and also with Fort Garry and Winnipeg, Manitoba. The distance by river from Pembina to Garry or Winnipeg was called 200 miles. The country bordering the Red in the Canadian province was quite well settled and improved. Fort Garry was the principal Hudson's Bay Company post, and used as a military rendezvous and trading center. It was substantially constructed, on an ample scale, and stored within its walls was an enormous amount of manufactured goods designed for the fur trade, and to supply the settlers in that province. It was garrisoned by two companies of Canadian volunteers under Captain Herkimer. The Riel Rebellion had but recently been quieted, and troops were held for the purpose of checking, in its incipency, any further disorder. The United States consul at Winnipeg suspected that the fires of the malcontents were still smouldering though nearly extinguished. Winnipeg was then a town of 600 inhabitants, and adjoined the fort on the north. Opposite Garry, on the east bank of Red River, was St. Boniface, where was located a convent, bishop's palace, and cathedral—all magnificent buildings. Father Tasche was the bishop. Fort Pembina, about two miles south of the town had been built in 1870; it was a two company post, commanded by Colonel Wheaton.

Frog Point, sixty miles above Pembina, south, was a small and unimportant settlement. Eighty miles by land south of Frog Point, Georgetown was reached, on the Minnesota side which contained a dozen houses including a Hudson's Bay Company store. Fifteen miles south of Georgetown was the proposed crossing of the Northern Pacific Railroad, where a village of tents was discovered in 1871, inhabited by scores of people who were waiting the coming of the iron horse. Hotels, stores, saloons, all in canvas houses, flourished and much more ex-was in circulation. The country from Georgetown to Fort Abercrombie was fair, but the reputed annual overflow of the Red River Valley would seem to preclude the hope of its ever being even moderately well settled and improved. Such was the academic opinion of the time. The highlands back from the valley were very fertile and well watered. Timber existed in sufficient quantity for the necessities of pioneer improvement. Still further south up the Red River Valley was Breckenridge, Minnesota, where the St. Paul & Pacific Railroad (now merged with the Great Northern Pacific) reached the river and became the head of navigation.

COURT AT PEMBINA

The first session of the United States Court to be held in the northern portion of Dakota Territory, then the Third Judicial District was convened at Pembina in June, 1871. Chief Justice Geo. W. French presided. Warren Cowles was the United States attorney; Judson LaMoure was deputy United States marshal assisted by Deputy Luther. George I. Foster was clerk of court, and Enos Stutsman, foreman of the grand jury. At the October term following Norman Kittson was foreman of the grand jury. Indictments were found by these grand juries against a number of parties in the new settlement of Centralia (now Fargo), charging them with the illegal sale of intoxicating liquor.

On Saturday morning, the 17th of March, 1872, on the tenth anniversary of the meeting of the first Territorial Legislature, the United States Deputy Marshal McCausland, escorted by a company of federal troops from Fort Abercrombie, proceeded to arrest all parties at Centralia, now Fargo, who were engaged in selling intoxicating liquors at that point. Although all had paid their internal revenue tax, the receipt for which was displayed in their place of business, it did not protect them. They were all charged with introducing and selling intoxicants on the Sisseton, Wahpeton and Sioux Indian reservation.

The parties arrested had a preliminary hearing before United States Commissioner Geo. I. Foster and were held to answer to the United States District Court, which held its sessions at Pembina, and would convene in June following. Their bond was fixed at $500 each. These liquor dealers had paid the special tax required by the Government, and were under the impression so claimed that this authorized them to engage in the retail liquor trade, which, however, was not the case neither there nor elsewhere. The payment of this special tax did not relieve them from liability under the territorial law, which required a license; but in their cases there was also a treaty provision that inhibited the liquor traffic at that point and all along the valley of the Red River to the northern boundary. The country had ceased to be an Indian reservation, or Indian land more properly, by the treaty with the Chippewas, made in 1864; but there was a clause in that treaty that provided:

That the laws of the United States now in force, or that hereafter may be enacted, prohibiting the introduction and sale of liquors in the Indian country, shall be in full force and effect throughout the country hereby ceded until otherwise directed by Congress or the President of the United States.

Under this provision of the treaty, which had all the force and effect of law, these trespassers at Fargo were all liable to severe punishment.

McCausland, the deputy marshal, undertook to escort a number of his prisoners who failed to give bond to Pembina, where court would be held, and was found frozen to death near Frog Point, sixty miles north of Fargo, March 27, 1872. Two of his prisoners had escaped in the night and McCausland started out to search for them. The weather was extremely cold. McCausland was not again seen until his lifeless body was discovered. He was thirty-two years of age and highly respected.

GENERAL CONDITIONS IN 1871

The year 1871 was quite favorable for farming operations in the territory. The farming settlements, however, had not then extended beyond the boundaries of the Missouri, the Red River, Big Sioux and Vermillion River counties, limited on the Missouri to Charles Mix on the west, and on the Big Sioux to Minchaha on the north. Immigration had begun to invade Brookings, Richland, Turner and Hutchinson counties, and two or three adventurers had settled as far north as Rockport in Hanson County. The settlements had, however, grown in population; the Government land had been taken up quite compactly for from ten to fifteen miles back from the rivers mentioned, and a large amount of grain and vegetables were produced in the aggregate; twenty fold more than was needed for home consumption or that could be utilized in the territory. Dakota was just beginning to demonstrate its agricultural strength and prove the value of the resources of its soil.

There was considerable immigration to the territory, including farmers, mechanics and trades people, so that the towns as well as the farming settlements flourished and grew in population and improvement. The Missouri River was, it might well be said, thronged with water craft, and hardly a day passed during the boating season that did not witness the arrival or departure of steamboats from the levees of Dakota's older towns. In 1871 was the beginning of actual work on our first railroad; immigration was encouraging, and there was an apparent awakening to the opportunities afforded in the territory to energetic and enterprising people. The area of cultivated acres was doubled. Four new counties were admitted into the small family of organized counties—Turner, Hutchinson, Hanson and Richland. It appeared that Dakota had arrived at the point where pioneer methods and customs were given a final farewell and the more modern, aggressive and enterprising life adopted.

The political feuds in the territory, the continual factional quarrels in the republican party which had characterized Dakota politics from the beginning of settlement, no doubt injured the standing of the territory at Washington and in Congress, and when these factional troubles resulted in the election of a democrat as delegate in a territory where the republicans outnumbered the opposition more than two to one, which was the case in 1870, there were many forcible and disparaging epithets uttered by the Washington authorities who were looking ahead to the time when Dakota would add another republican state to the Union, and whose position depended upon the continued ascendancy of the grand old party, in giving expression to their opinion regarding Dakota and its republican officials and politicians. A prominent citizen of the territory, writing from Washington in the early part of 1871, who had occasion to visit several of the departments and who was also interested in procuring from Congress land grants to aid in the building of Dakota railroads stated:

No territory in the Union has come before the general Government with so many internal quarrels, troubles and disputes as Dakota since its organization. You meet with that charge in Congress and at the departments, and that want of harmony among federal officials and the people has endangered and certainly postponed our advancement and estopped material aid.

It was further suggested that but for the feeling of indignation and resentment engendered in the minds of leading congressmen, favorable action might have been had upon one or more of Dakota's applications for land grants in aid of railroads. It will be noted, however, that these reprehensible conditions disappeared as industrial interests increased and gave the people something better to employ their time.

Hon. Moses Kimball Armstrong began his service as delegate to Congress from Dakota Territory, March 4, 1871. He was then in Washington.

A new administration of territorial affairs was inaugurated January 2, 1871, the democrats having elected their territorial ticket with Armstrong as delegate.

in Congress. George W. Kellogg, of Union County, took the office of territorial auditor, relieving J. O. Taylor, also of Union. Thos. J. Sloan, of Clay County, relieved T. K. Hovey, also of Clay, as territorial treasurer; and Hon. John W. Turner, then of Clay County, but about to remove to Turner County, succeeded James S. Foster, of Yankton, as superintendent of public instruction.

The year 1871 was an off-year in Dakota elections; the county officers, members of the Legislature, and the delegate to Congress and territorial officers being elected for two years in every even numbered year. There was a provision of the law, however, authorizing the holding of annual elections for the purpose of filling vacancies, and the election of a portion of the board of county commissioners, the term of one member expiring each year. The election of 1871 was held on the 10th of October, the second Tuesday, and as a rule no party lines were drawn: the officers elected represented the non-partisan spirit of the voters; but the opposition, or what would have been the opposition, under normal political conditions to the republican organization, scored the larger number of successes.

RIGHTS OF A TERRITORIAL DELEGATE IN CONGRESS

The extent of the privileges and rights of a delegate to Congress from a territory were never clearly defined and settled until 1871. He was allowed the privilege of introducing bills and of speaking, and was restricted regarding the making of motions and other privileges. While James G. Blaine was speaker in 1871 (and S. L. Spink delegate from Dakota), the question came up on a bill relating to the Territory of Montana, at that time represented by Delegate Cavanaugh. The bill had been read a third time and was placed upon its final passage. The vote stood on a division, ayes, 66; noes, 22; no quorum voting.

Mr. Cavanaugh then said, "I call for tellers; I believe no quorum voted."

Mr. Garfield, of Ohio, afterwards President, then interposed with the question: "Can a delegate from a territory call for tellers on any question?"

The speaker answered: "The chair would rule that he could not; but as the vote on a division did not disclose the presence of a quorum, the chair thinks it would be better to have tellers in order that presence of a quorum may thereby be shown."

Tellers were accordingly ordered, the House again divided, and the tellers reported that there were ayes, 84; noes, 45.

Mr. Cavanaugh then called for the yeas and nays.

The speaker then said: "The point being raised, the chair must rule that the gentleman from Montana cannot demand the yeas and nays."

Mr. Cavanaugh then said: "I desire, if the chair will pardon me, to make a single remark upon this point. I would like to have the question settled that we may ascertain what is really the status of a delegate upon this floor. I wish to have it decided whether, when the House has under consideration a bill affecting directly a territory and pertaining to the people of that territory and to nobody else on earth, whether under such circumstances the delegates have not a right to demand a vote by yeas and nays upon a question so important to his constituents."

The speaker replied: "The point is raised without argument and without much time to devote to its consideration, but the chair will very briefly give his views upon it. The delegate from a territory is the accredited agent of the territory, sent here to express by argument or by personal interviews with members the wants and wishes of his constituents upon bills which may affect them. But the moment the function of voting is reached the power of the delegate ceases. The right to object where unanimous consent is asked; the right to demand divisions or tellers; the right to call for the yeas and nays are very largely the functions of a voter in this House; and oftentimes the very largest function that the member can exercise is included in those particular demands. Of course the right to make such demands grows out of, and must inhere in, the function of voting. The delegate, not possessing the right to vote, cannot exercise any of those privileges which are a direct outgrowth of the right to vote."

Mr. Cavanaugh: "One more question and I have done. Here is a measure directly interesting to my constituents. Have I not the right to demand the yeas and nays on this vote?"

The Speaker: "The chair will answer the gentleman. He will readily see that there is no need of a delegate having that right. The body that is to decide the question voted upon is the House of Representatives. The Constitution provides that the yeas and nays 'shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal.' If no member chooses to demand the yeas and nays, of course they cannot be taken; but if one-fifth of the members desire the yeas and nays, some individual member will of course make the demand."

Mr. Eldridge: "I demand the yeas and nays."

Mr. Niblack: "Upon the question of order I would like to be heard for a moment. I believe that the rights of a delegate on this floor include the right to make motions. Is not that the fact?"

The Speaker: "That is so; but it would not be within the function of voting. A motion merely brings the question up for the decision of the House."

Mr. Niblack: "Then the question in my mind is whether the calling for divisions and other incidental matters connected with voting does not rest upon the same ground with motions."

The Speaker: "The chair thinks differently. These proceedings directly connected with voting cannot fall within the privileges of the delegate. The calling for a division belongs to the individual member, and is his absolute right. The calling for the yeas and nays is also the absolute right of one-fifth of the members and is guaranteed by the Constitution. The House cannot by any rule restrict or enlarge this privilege and the gentleman from Wisconsin, in the exercise of his right, now demands the yeas and nays."

Mr. Garfield, of Ohio: "As I raised this question, I hope the chair will indulge me in a single remark. When the delegate from Montana asked for a division I did not raise the question. I did raise it, however, when he demanded tellers. I do not know whether there is any philosophical reason which might apply in one case more than the other. But it seemed to me that while delegates are allowed the right to make motions and offer amendments, while they have the right to be heard in debate, yet when we pass to action—when we come to voting, either by rising, by passing between tellers, or by a call of yeas and nays, the right of a delegate naturally then ceases; and as he cannot take part in any vote, so he cannot demand that any of the rest of us shall vote in any particular form."

The Speaker: "The right of a delegate to take part in debate is as broad as that of any member of the House. The right to make motions follows necessarily, because it is on a motion that debate is entertained. If you strip the delegate of the right to make motions you logically strip him of the right to debate, because all of the debates of the House are upon motions in some form. But beyond that point, as the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Niblack) will perceive, the function differs, and the privilege of voting is reached."

Mr. Niblack: "The question in my mind is whether the calling for a division can be considered to be more than a motion."

The Speaker: "It is different from a motion in the points to which the chair has adverted. The precedents on the general question involved are not numerous but they sustain the ruling of the chair. The immediate predecessor of the present occupant of the chair would not accept the objection of a delegate, and in the opinion of the chair it is not competent for a delegate to make an undebatable motion, as that the House adjourn, or that a bill lie on the table."

DAKOTA LEGISLATURE IN EXTRA SESSION

An extra session of the Legislature of Dakota was held in April, 1871, for the purpose of enacting a law to authorize the issuing of county and township bonds for the purpose of aiding the construction of railroads in the territory. The proceedings of that memorable session, and a full account of the railroad building done under the law enacted is given in another chapter devoted to early railroad enterprises in the territory. A perusal of the incidents related in that chapter will indicate that the attention of the early settlers, who were all scattered over a half dozen organized counties and one or two that were not organized, was engrossed with the railroad projects mentioned, and in anticipating the many benefits that would accrue to all sections when railroad facilities were afforded.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS

During the summer of 1871 a company of distinguished journalists and correspondents visited the Red River of the north country. The Northern Pacific Railway was then in process of building across the State of Minnesota; capitalists from Europe were in this country investigating its merits, and many of the leading newspapers were systematically engaged in promoting the great enterprise, which was viewed as a national affair of the first importance not only in a commercial light but as the medium through which a vast empire of mineral and agricultural areas were to be brought within the range of occupation and development by a civilized and aggressive people. The party to make this journey included the then renowned traveler, Bayard Taylor, who represented the

New York Tribune, then one of the greatest of American newspapers, conducted by the greater moulder of public opinion, Horace Greeley; Governor Hawley, of Connecticut, for the Hartford Courant, of extensive influence with the capitalists of New England; Colonel Knox, for the New York Herald, of world-wide fame as a newspaper; William Cullen Bryant, for the Springfield (Mass.) Republican—Bryant was then in the zenith of his active life as a journalist, poet and author; Governor Bross, for the Chicago Tribune, an eminent editor and politician and a newspaper of national reputation and influence; Samuel Jones, of the New York Times, and Major Bundy, of the New York Mail. The party started from Duluth, which point they had reached by steamer; thence over the new Northern Pacific to the end of the track; the party then returned to St. Paul from which place they took the St. Paul and Pacific for Breckinridge—the latter leg of the journey to the head of Red River by stage, the road not being completed to the Red River Point but was finished and opened a few weeks later. At Breckinridge the party boarded a Red River steamer and steamed down to Winnipeg or Fort Garry, returning by the same or a similar craft to a point on the Red River near where the Northern Pacific Railroad crossed it; thence by overland coaches to the end of the track of the Northern Pacific, where they boarded a construction train for home. It was a part of the program of this exploring expedition, taken for the purpose of investigating and publishing to the world some facts regarding the natural resources and natural wealth of the country, that the same party would make a journey up the Missouri River by steamboat, and possibly up the Yellowstone the same season, but this portion of the trip was postponed indefinitely.

TEXT BOOKS FOR SCHOOLS

Under the law then in force it was the duty of the territorial superintendent of public instruction to select the text books for the common schools of the territory and publish them in the territorial newspapers. The following list was selected by the Hon. John W. Turner, the superintendent, in November, 1871; McGuffey's New Eclectic Speller; McGuffey's New Primary Charts; McGuffey's New Eclectic Readers; McGuffey's New Eclectic Speakers; Eclectic Penmanship; Norton's Elements of Philosophy; Cole's Institute Reader; Harvey's Elementary Grammar; Harvey's English Grammar; Ray's Series of Algebras; Huxley's and Yeoman's Physiology; Cornell's Geographies; Quackenboss's Arithmetic; Quackenboss's Histories of the United States.

In the winter of 1870-71, there were but twenty-eight schools kept in the various counties in the territory. Eleven of these were in the County of Union; six in Clay County; five in Yankton County; two of which were private schools in the city; four in Lincoln County; one in Bon Homme, and one in Minnehaha.

SURVEYING THE INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY

The boundary line between the United States and British America had not been definitely established as late as the close of the year 1871. It was a matter of great importance to the Territory of Dakota, fixing as it would the northern boundary of the territory; and in his message to Congress at the opening of the session in December, 1871, President Grant said:

I again renew my recommendation for an appropriation to determine the true position of the forty-ninth parallel of latitude where it forms the boundary between the British North American possessions and the United States from the Lake of the Woods, Minnesota, to the summit of the Rocky Mountains. The early action of Congress on the recommendation named, would put it in the power of the war department to place a force in the field during the next summer.

REMARKABLE PRAIRIE FIRES

In the early days of October, 1871, the settled portions of the territory were visited by a number of most destructive prairie fires exceeding in scope, fury and damage, any that had been known since the settlement of the country. The year 1871 was one of great conflagrations elsewhere, surpassing in their magnitude, intensity and destructiveness, all precedent. The great Chicago fire that occurred about that time, was a most appalling disaster and enlisted the sympathy and active benevolence of the people of the civilized world. It yet remains in the annals of the world's disasters as one of the most deplorable conflagrations that ever visited the abodes of a civilized people. There were also forest fires in Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota, of unprecedented extent, that not only destroyed extensive lumber districts, but swept away entire towns, and called for the sacrifice of many lives. The smoke from these fires hung like a pall over half the area of the states where they occurred. In Dakota there were no forests, but there were millions of acres of wild prairie grass, and it at times appeared that the air acted the incendiary, so inexplicable was the origin of these fires; and so intense their heat that it was impossible to remain near them without danger of burning or suffocation, and their speed as they swept over the prairies was absolutely frightful. An ordinary fire-guard or a public road that the settlers had grown accustomed to regard as an effectual barrier to the progress of these scourges, proved no obstacle whatever. Even the James River and the Vermillion were unable to successfully oppose them and were crossed at various places, the flames appearing to leap across the streams as if drawn or attracted by a powerful magnet. There is little doubt that the fires wherever they occurred during that season were out of the ordinary course of Nature. It was remarked that the Chicago fire exhibited phenomena never observed before, especially with regard to the intensity of the heat, which far in advance of the flames, seemed to cause spontaneous ignition. Many structures were observed to burst out in flames that were two or three blocks in advance of the visible conflagration. Parties who attempted to combat these Dakota prairie fires could not approach the burning grass near enough to work with any effect—the blistering heat moved along like a wall far in advance of the devouring flames.

The farming communities suffered great loss from this calamity. In many instances the fires had swept away the entire property of individual farmers, including dwellings, barns, well filled wheat bins and corncribs, and thousands of live stock. To hundreds of the husbandmen it brought penury and suffering, having burned every thing except the clothes they wore. So general was this destitution, and in so many cases so complete, that the citizens of the several villages and trading points, including the cities, within the territory, organized relief associations which were active during the succeeding fall and winter in extending needed assistance to the unfortunate sufferers.

An incident growing out of this lamentable event deserves mention here as showing again that "one touch of Nature makes the whole world kin." It had been charged that a party of Yankton Indians were responsible for setting out the prairie fires in Bon Homme County. Great damage had resulted to the settlements, and deep indignation felt toward any who were charged with firing the prairie. The report came to the ears of some of the Yankton Tribe. It was stoutly denied; and the charge being investigated by the agent, Maj. S. D. Webster, a Christian gentleman, it was proven that the Indians were innocent of the offense. But perceiving that a great calamity had fallen upon the white settlers, and much suffering entailed that would be much more severe during the approaching winter months, the Indians made a contribution of $100 for the relief of the needy, transmitting the money with the following letter:

Yankton Agency, D. T., October 24, 1871.

G. W. Kingsbury, Esq., Yankton, D. T.

Sir: I have the honor to enclose to you, to be handed to the committee for the relief of the sufferers from prairie fires in the counties of Bon Homme and Yankton, a check for $100. This is presented by and in behalf of the Yankton Sioux Indians.

Pa-da-ni-a-pa-pi, the "One Struck by the雷," said:

"My Father: I come to you to say that I speak for my tribe, and to deny that the Yanktons were the ones who set fire to the prairies. But I am sorry that any of the and so I wish for my tribe to have something sent to help them. I am clothed and have enough to eat. I want something sent that they may have food, and to show that I feel for them. The Yanktons wish to be good neighbors."

It is in accordance with this wish of the people, expressed by the head chief, that I transmit the amount of $100. I am, sir, very respectfully, &c.,

S. D. WEBSTER, U. S. Indian Agent.

There was that connected with this generous gift that seemed to atone for many injuries the Indians had been charged with inflicting upon the pale-faces, and it certainly modified the popular prejudice against the red people because of their presumed thoroughly inhuman proclivities.

EX-VICE PRESIDENT HAMLIN

About the middle of September, 1871, the people of Dakota were entertained with a visit from Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, then a United States senator, and vice president during Abraham Lincoln's first term as President. The senator visited all the points on the Missouri River as far west as Springfield, and was very cordially received and hospitably entertained by the people. His wife accompanied him, and his daughter, the wife of the secretary of the territory, Mrs. George Alexander Batchelder, resided at Yankton at that time. Mr. Hamlin made a number of brief addresses while on his tour, in which he predicted a prosperous future for Dakota.

THE INDIANS

While the hostility of the northern Sioux Indians along the Yellowstone River was directed toward the Northern Pacific Railroad enterprise, the same tribes were at war with the Gros Ventres and Mandan tribes, who were at peace with the whites and had always maintained a friendly attitude. It is altogether probable that the hostiles were instigated in their warfare against these peaceable Indians by a prejudice they entertained against all of their own race who were on friendly terms with the whites. During the summer quite a serious battle occurred near the Milk River Agency where the upper Sioux rendezvoused, between the Sioux and a large party of Gros Ventres in which a prominent Sioux chief, Standing Buffalo, was killed. This Standing Buffalo was a Santee and was personally inclined against hostilities, but his people at that time mainly refugee Santees from Minnesota, were for war and persuaded their chief to lead them. The battle was a fierce one, with heavy losses on both sides—the combatants ceasing to fight, overcome by exhaustion. Neither side could claim a victory which left the way open to renew the combat whenever opportunity offered. The Gros Ventres, while good and reliable warriors, were not disposed to war, and in their conflicts with the Sioux, the latter were as a rule the aggressors.

George P. Belden, a famous writer of frontier affairs and author of the "White Chief," a popular border romance, was shot and killed while riding alone eight miles below Grand River near a little spring on the Moreau Trail, August 31, 1871. His body was found two days after and buried at the Grand River Agency. The shooting was doubtless done by a lone Indian who seeing Belden dismount for the purpose of getting some water, shot him through the head, then firing two more shots in his head, mounted Belden's mule and rode away.

An order was issued in 1871 by General Stanley, commanding the District of Dakota, requiring a large number of wood-choppers to withdraw from the Sioux Reservation and wood camps along the Upper Missouri. The order was based on an article in the Treaty of 1868, which the Indians complained had not been enforced. The wood-choppers were accused of hunting on the Indian lands and destroying much game which the Indians claimed they needed for their subsistence; it was further alleged that the Indians should have the patronage of the steamboats that purchased fuel at these points on their reservation, which would come to them if the whites were excluded, an indication that the Indians were preparing to take hold of their industrial life in earnest.

GENERAL ITEMS

The existence of a fairly good quality of coal was discovered on the Dakota line of the Northern Pacific Railway, in 1872, by the civil engineers under General Rosser, who were extending the surveys for that national highway west of the Missouri. Surveying parties were the first to use it in their camps, and found it a fairly good fuel where timber was lacking.

A party of United States deputy surveyors from the surveyor general's office of Dakota visited the northern part of the territory in the fall of 1871, and laid out several townships along the line of the proposed Northern Pacific Railway from Fargo west including the fertile Cheyenne Valley. The party was in charge of J. C. Blanding and J. Q. Burbank, and its corps of assistants included John Cunningham, William Brown, H. W. Jarvis and John Gill.

The St. Paul and Pacific Railway reached the Red River of the North at Breckinridge, Minnesota, during the summer of 1871, and the line was opened for traffic to the headwaters of Red River. From that time for several years the steamboat industry flourished in the Red River Valley. A rush of immigration followed and a new town called Chahinka or Richville was founded on the Dakota side by Mr. Rich. The name was changed to Wahpeton some time later. Folsom Dow, W. E. Root, J. C. Blanding and J. Q. Burbank, who had been among the Dakota pioneers of the Missouri Valley, took up claims adjoining, and a county named Richland was carved out by the Legislature 1870-71, which was the third county organized north of the 46th parallel in Dakota Territory; Kittson being the first, Pembina, the second, reorganized in 1867.

The Dell City Journal began its career in October, 1871. It was owned and published by J. C. Ervin, at Dell City, Minnehaha County. Dell City afterwards became Dell Rapids, and for a few years maintained a commendable rivalry with Sioux Falls for commercial and manufacturing and stone producing supremacy.

The Springfield Times by L. D. F. Poore, and the Sioux Falls Pantagraph, by W. F. Kiter, were launched on "the uncertain sea of journalism" in 1871. The Pantagraph, after a few years of strenuous effort, changed owners and its title, and became the Sioux Falls Press. The Times has flourished and promises to hold out indefinitely, having an excellent local support which it has enjoyed from the beginning.

In January, 1871, the number of practising physicians in Dakota Territory was nineteen, a fact that was vauntingly referred to in the territory's immigration literature as an inducement to homeseekers who desired to find a sanitarium to reside in. Doctors who had no means of support outside the practice of their profession were warned by the experience of a Yankton practitioner to avoid the territory—because this particular physician had had but one case since hanging out his sign, and that was a job of digging postholes. He subsequently became a popular physician, as the growth of population brought with it many partial invalids from the malarial and humid regions of the East.

The Missouri River packet and freight steamboat, Ida Reese, while on her way to Fort Benton, struck a snag and sunk in shallow water, just above Fort Thompson, on the night of the 18th of June, 1871. The boat was heavily loaded with a valuable cargo of Indian goods belonging to the Government, and sutler's goods belonging to the Durfee & Peck Transportation and Trading Company. The value of the boat was $20,000; and the value of the cargo was estimated at $100,000. The boat was insured for $12,000. Large quantities of whisky and bacon were in the hold, and these were saved without damage, especially the former, which was waterproof, and belonged to Montana parties.

A wagon road from Yankton to Sioux Falls was laid out in the fall of 1871. The assessment of real and personal property in Minnehaha County, Sioux Falls Village included, in 1871, amounted to $15,320 for realty, and $43,014 for personal property. It will be understood that Minnehaha County, in point of settlement, was two years old, the Falls and a large section of the county having been occupied for seven years as a military reservation or being within the zone of Indian hostilities.

The County of Minnehaha improved considerably during the year 1871, securing a number of new homesteaders, while the Village of Sioux Falls made encouraging advancement. Richard E. Pettigrew, of Wisconsin, had recently settled there, and was a very enterprising young man, and had come in from Grant County, Wisconsin, the year before. Charles K. Howard, O. B. Iverson, John Langness, Captain Thompson, Albert Fenney, John McClellan, Nye Phillips, Mr. Walker, who was the sheriff, and William Van Eps, a merchant, were all public-spirited young men who had confidence in the future of the embryo metropolis.

Agricultural fairs were held in the fall of 1871 in the counties of Clay, Yankton, and Bon Homme, and were all creditable exhibitions.

In 1871, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton was in her prime, and it may be claimed with fairness that she was the most famous as well as most highly esteemed woman in either hemisphere, unless we except the model Queen of Great Britain, Victoria. Mrs. Stanton was devoting her life to the amelioration of her sex to the great benefit and advantage of womanhood in general, and issued to her sisters throughout the world an invitation to send to her an account of any "remarkable or unusual achievements" by women. A Dakota lady, at Elk Point, deeming herself as coming within the limit of "unusual achievement," notified Mrs. Stanton that she had presented her husband with four children within ten months.

TURNER COUNTY ORGANIZED

The County of Turner, forming one of the second tier of counties on the south, in the Territory of Dakota, was taken from the counties of Lincoln and Hutchinson, an equal, or about an equal, portion from each. The boundaries of the county were defined by act of the Legislative Assembly, approved January 13, 1871, as follows:

Beginning at the southeast corner of Hutchinson County; thence north along the east boundary of said county to the north line of town 100; thence east along said township line to the west boundary of range 51; thence south along said range line to the north line of Clay County; thence west along said county line to the east boundary of Yankton County; thence east along the north boundary of said county to the place of beginning.

The law further provided that William W. Aurner, Vale P. Thielman, and Lewis H. Elliott, should be the first county commissioners, and C. S. Scott, register of deeds; and located the county seat on the southeast quarter of section 9, township 07, range 55; to be known and designated as Swan Lake City.

The county embraced eighteen congressional townships; its surface is slightly rolling except where broken by the Vermillion River, Turkey Ridge and other creeks, and even with this exception it was the claim of the pioneers, who as a rule are quite well informed regarding the topography of the county wherein they have located, that practically every acre of the 415,000 in the county, was tillable. The soil is deep and rich, famous as a corn and fruit soil. It is a well watered section, having the Vermillion River which enters the county from the north near the center and trends towards the eastern border, having a valley from one to three miles wide; also a stream called the West Fork, a tributary of the Vermillion, which enters the county from the northwest and crossing diagonally, empties into the Vermillion proper two or three miles west of Parker. Turkey Ridge Creek enters the county from Hutchinson on the west, and passes through the center and southeastern portion to Centreville where it empties into the Vermillion. There are several small creeks tributary to both the Vermillion and its branches, and also to Turkey Ridge Creek.

Hon. John W. Turner, one of the pioneers of Dakota Territory and among the first to settle in Turner County, which had been named in his honor, was probably the oldest person in Dakota Territory in 1871, when he was engaged in building grist-mills in the Vermillion Valley, and had just been elected to the position of territorial superintendent of public instruction on the democratic ticket. It was at this election that the republicans were divided and ran two territorial tickets and were defeated by the democrats under the leadership of Armstrong. Mr. Turner was born on the 23d of February, 1800, at Western, Oneida County, New York, in a dwelling owned by Gen. William Floyd, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He received very little education during his boyhood, and on reaching his twelfth year he entered a store as clerk in the Village of Herkimer, New York. In the year 1819, he removed with his father to Oswego County, and assisted him in the erection and operation of a grist-mill. Here our subject became enamored with politics, and his first political appointment was deputy sheriff and keeper of the jail in Oswego County. While holding these positions he was appointed inspector of customs for the Oswego District, by Pres. Andrew Jackson, and continued in that position eleven years. He was also deputy United States marshal for the Northern District of New York at the time of the Canadian rebellion, and actively employed in protecting American shipping interests on the lakes. In 1846 he removed to Michigan and engaged in the lumber trade, which he continued for twelve years, when he was elected sheriff of Saginaw County, and closed out his other affairs. He studied law during his term as sheriff, and was admitted to practice at the close of his official services.

He removed to Dakota Territory from Michigan in 1863, and settled in Clay County. He was an old-line Jackson democrat and a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church. During Mr. Turner's active years the democratic party was the ruling political force in the United States. In Dakota he was a democratic leader, and was sent as a delegate to the National Peace Convention held at Philadelphia in 1866. He was for several terms a member of the Territorial Legislature from Clay County; and was elected superintendent of public instruction for the territory in 1866 on the Johnson republican ticket, and again in 1870, and in the latter year was appointed by Governor Burbank a delegate to the National Immigration Convention at Indianapolis.

Nearly all the old hamlets and villages that possessed titles in the pioneer age of Turner County have been abandoned as centers of commerce and municipal industries, and surrendered to the more needful pursuits of agriculture, since the railroad came that way with the townsite agent. Within a year after its organization, and in some instances prior to that important event, there were business centers at Swan Lake, on Turkey Ridge Creek, and about four and a half miles southeast of the center of the county; Turner City, six miles east of Swan Lake, on the Vermillion, where a flour mill had been erected by J. W. Turner and Peter Turner; Marion, in the northwestern part, on the west fork of the Vermillion; Ohio, near Centreville, in the southeast, where Laird Bros. operated a cheese factory; Mattoon, in the same section, where Baker & Douglass built a flour mill; Childstown, founded by James A. Childs, in the western portion, on Turkey Ridge Creek; and Finlay, founded by Rev. James J. McIntire, of Wisconsin, who with a colony of farming people from the Badger State took up their abodes surrounding. Swan Lake was the first settlement in the county, and this fact was probably due to its having been the principal station on the Yankton and Sioux Falls or Fort Dakota Military Road, and also the starting of the stage line when a mail route was established between Sioux Falls and Yankton in 1865. Turner was the second in point of antiquity; and stood on the banks of the Vermillion River; there was not much of a town, but the view of the Vermillion Valley from Turner was a picture of grandeur and beauty. Two or three years later a large colony of Mennonites took up land near Childstown. Finlay contained a store, two hotels, and a blacksmith shop. Vale P. Thielman was the leading spirit in all enterprises. Nearly all these old towns, like the pioneer people who founded them, have passed away.

The Swan Lake townsite was surveyed and platted in February, 1871, by B. S. Gillespie, county surveyor of Lincoln County. The original owners of the town were W. W. Aurner, Vale P. Thielman, William Cuppett and James S. Foster. Bartlett Tripp, of Yankton, was the owner of a half block in the embryo city. Being the county seat, Swan Lake was the political head center of the county, and a newspaper, called the Swan Lake Era (now the Parker New Era), was established October, 1875, by H. B. Chaffee, of Vermillion. It was republican in politics, and was published regularly once a week. Charles F. Hackett, a practical printer, of Yankton, purchased the plant three years later, and continued the publication in Swan Lake until the following December, 1879, when he removed to Parker, the new railroad town, and changed the title of his paper to the "New Era." It has since been one of the flourishing and influential institutions of Turner County and the territory. A school was opened at Swan Lake in 1872. Rev. W. H. H. Ross, of the Episcopal Parish of Sioux Falls, preached to the people once a month; Dr. J. S. Hughes, of Lodi, Methodist, sermonized once in three weeks; and Reverend McIntire, of Finlay, supplied the pulpit once a fortnight. Concerning the first settlements in the county, Mr. Thielman places the date in July, 1869, when claims were taken at and surrounding Swan Lake by Mr. Aurner, Col. Gideon C. Moody, Lewis H. Elliott and F. C. Hills, of Yankton, and George W. Ripley. The Mr. Hills mentioned became a prominent railroad official at Sioux City later. None of these parties made settlement. The first improvement at Swan Lake was a sod house built by Mr. Aurner, finished inside with cottonwood boards unplanned. It became the principal hotel in the village.

The county had been surveyed, and a few trappers found employment along the Vermillion and Turkey Ridge waters prior to 1869. From 1865 to 1869, a weekly mail was transmitted from Fort Randall via Fort James to Fort Dakota at Sioux Falls. Soldiers carried the mail pouch and their route lay across the northern part of Turner County.

Settlements were made as early as 1869 in the southeastern corner of the county while that portion was a part of Lincoln. William Lowrie was one of the first. H. H. Hammond and family, Mrs. C. J. Emery and family and William Robinson. M. G. Laird, A. Laird and Jud Pierce, Fred Smith and Andrew Baker took claims and in 1871 the Town of Centerville was located on Doctor Smith's claim. Turner City, a few miles north of Centerville, was established by Hon. J. W. Turner and two brothers, D. C. and P. H. Turner, in the winter of 1870-71, where quite a settlement was made in the spring by the coming in of C. B. Valentine, destined to take a leading part in politics, Cyrus and David Morris, Jackson Davis and son John. Centerville, on the Vermillion River, at this early day exhibited indications of becoming an important business center owing to its favorable location and to its manufacturing advantages due to a good reliable water power. Lovejoy and Haynes brought in the first thrashing machine in 1872, which was expected to do the thrashing for the whole county at that time. The Town of Ohio was directly across the river from Centerville where the Laird Brothers manufactured cheese and operated a good farm.

The first white women to settle in the county were two sisters, daughters of Rev. C. W. Batchelder, of Yankton. These were unmarried ladies, young women, Helen and Annie. Aurner was their brother-in-law. Thielman and Charles S. Scott also took claims near Swan Lake in 1869, and in 1870, Conrad F. Lange, Henry Clay Ash and Fayette Place took up land in that vicinity with James A. Child, a near neighbor. J. H. Shurtleff and W. K. Hollenbeck settled near Finlay in 1871 and Robert Chipperfield soon after. In the extreme northern part of the county James T. Allen and Andrew Ellstrom were the earliest settlers.

Mr. Aurner had an experience in July, 1871, that testified to the remarkable quality of his nerve while in the peril of great misfortune. He was accustomed to visit Yankton once a week and drove a span of white mules hitched to a light lumber wagon. The distance was twenty miles, and it was generally believed that the mules galloped nineteen-twentieths of the distance with Mr. Aurner standing upright in the wagon box. He was a temperance man, and though unusually energetic and at times eccentric, he was at all times clear-headed and was highly respected. On one occasion, in July, 1871, in company with Vale P. Thielman, he was making one of his trips to the territorial capital, the mules traveling at their customary "twelve-mile gait," and when near Clay Creek, in crossing a gully made by a recent rain, the braces connecting the wagon tongue with the front axle gave way. Mr. Aurner was thrown from the wagon striking upon his right hand, and Mr. Thielman was somewhat shaken up. The mules, however, hauling the tongue of the wagon kept on toward their destination as though nothing serious had occurred. Aurner and Thielman started on after the mules afoot and caught them some two miles away, borrowed a wagon from a farmer and resumed their journey. At this point Mr. Aurner became conscious that his right arm was injured. It was bent backward just above the wrist and gave him the most intense pain. Reaching town he was driven immediately to a surgeon who discovered that the wrist bone of the right wrist was broken. The surgeon prepared to give his patient chloroform to alleviate the pain during the operation of "setting the bone," but Aurner declined to take it, saying that he wanted to "see how it was done." And he looked on very coolly and not much concerned while the operation was being performed. Such was the fortitude of the landlord of the Swan Lake Hotel and the pioneer of the Turkey Creek Valley.

J. W. Turner, Henry Davis, Cyrus Morris, Calvin Hill, West Negus, C. P. Hankins, Jacob Shaulter, Richard Williams, O. B. Gray, and a Mrs. Clem, and O. C. Baldy, of Yankton, with his wife, settled in the vicinity of Turner City late in 1871 or 1872. Baldy opened a store. Rev. L. Bridgmen was an early missionary at Turner. An elderly man named Putterbaugh lost his life in a prairie fire in the fall of 1872. He went some distance away from his house to fight the flames and was suffocated by the smoke, fell unconscious and was roasted to death.

A County Agricultural Society was organized at the courthouse in Swan Lake on March 1, 1873. There had been such uniform success attending farming operations that the citizens felt ambitious to acquaint the outside world with the advantages of the county, and selected this society as a proper and the best medium through which to make known the resources of the soil. G. W. Shelley called the meeting to order, and Thomas Buchanan was elected chairman, and D. B. Conway, secretary. A committee consisting of E. Bowditch, Vale P. Thielman and G. W. Shelley, reported the names following for officers of the society: J. J. McIntire, Finlay, president; J. W. Turner, Turner, vice president; D. B. Conway, Spring Valley, secretary; H. J. Hammond, Centerville, treasurer. Directors, H. B. Cooley, Turner; J. H. Shurtleff, Finlay; J. A. Childs, Childs-town; Thos. Buchanan, Spring Valley; M. C. Laird, Ohio; Dr. F. Smith, Centerville; Peter Nelson, Swan Lake. Committee on Constitution and By-Laws, P. H. Turner, Turner; V. P. Thielman, Swan Lake; S. F. Andrews, Spring Valley; H. H. Deyo, Ashville; Jud Pierce, Ohio.

An adjourned meeting was held on the 5th of July following when the constitution was adopted, and the society named the "Turner County Agricultural Society." A proposition to hold a county fair was discussed, but was put over until a month later to give the crops more time to guarantee a creditable exhibition. It was later decided to postpone the exhibition to the next year, and in the meantime to make preparations for it. Next year the grasshoppers came Immigration to the county was quite encouraging, considering the competition all over the Northwest to secure it.

Prominent among the settlers of 1872 who largely located in the Vermillion Valley were A. J. Dennison, Horace Warner, Eugene Burgess, T. F. Collins, Henry Day Manger and family, O. K. Stanford, Lucius Thompson, James and Sarah Sheldon, Ira Barnes, D. C. Smith, and G. Phillips. The Dakota Southern Railroad was being built in 1872, which was a convenience to the pioneers of Turner County, and proved an economy, as they were now permitted to supply themselves with good hard coal from Elk Point and Vermillion at a cost of $17 a ton. In 1873 the new arrivals included T. B. Costain, with a family, also C. M. Mansfield, Wm. Roantree, Albert Newby, Geo. Whitmarsh, John Boynton, J. E. Sargent, James Williamson, Elisha Shaw, Miss Vina Alexander, Thomas and Oscar Elce, Charles Thompson, Louis Richards, Orange Still, John Shepperdson and others.

The year 1874 will be regretfully remembered as the year of the seventeen-year locust scourge which devastated the larger portion of the farming settlements of Turner and every other county in the territory, extending its ravages into Minnesota, Iowa and Nebraska. The losses of many of the farmers were complete, the insects devouring every blade of corn and the growing grain. Turner County was in the path of the scourge and suffered heavily.

The Chicago and Milwaukee Railroad entered the county from Canton in 1879, and established the new Town of Parker, which was made the county seat. The other railway town was Marion, an old trading point which now became the junction of the running water branch of the Milwaukee Railroad.

THE COMING OF THE RAILROADS

CHAPTER XLIX

RAILROADS NEEDED TO SETTLE THE TERRITORY

In the year 1858 the railroad nearest to the southern portion of Dakota was the Dubuque & Pacific which had been built as far west as Cedar Falls, Iowa. It is now a part of the Illinois Central system. The building of this line under the title of Dubuque & Pacific was the first public intimation of the sentiment then forming for a railroad across the continent which eight years later crystallized, and the construction of the Union Pacific from Omaha was begun. The Dubuque & Pacific encountered the difficulties which beset all railroad enterprises of that day. Its projectors had enterprise abundant, but very little money and depended upon local aid from towns and counties as the work progressed. The state gave the company 3,200 acres of land per mile, and this grant was available whenever a section of twenty miles was completed and operated, but the sale of the lands was slow and the towns were suspicious, and taken altogether these pioneer railroad builders are not to be envied. There were at least a half dozen other railway lines putting out from the Mississippi in Iowa and Minnesota at this time, and all seem to have been hampered in their work by lack of funds.

The Legislature at its first session granted a charter to the Missouri & Niobrara Valley Railway Company naming as incorporators Bligh E. Wood, A. W. Puett, J. W. Boyle, J. A. Jacobson, Lyman Burgess, Reuben Wallace, J. Shaw Gregory, D. T. Bramble, Enos Stutsman, Geo. M. Pinney, W. W. Brookings, Jacob Deuel, M. K. Armstrong, Austin Cole, John McBride, Christopher Maloney, John Stanage, H. Donaldson, H. D. Betts, N. Edmunds, J. Jagley, George Jerome, A. W. Hubbard, John H. Charles, W. P. Lyman, Frastus Conning, R. N. Rice, Elihu Washburn, L. R. Kimball, R. B. Mason, W. F. Shafter, and Lyman W. Gilbert.

Railroads had but recently begun to reach out from the Mississippi River into Iowa, at this time, so that this early action of the Dakota Legislature might seem quite premature without an explanation connecting it with a much more important national enterprise.

The Union Pacific Railroad bill passed Congress on the 24th of June, 1862. It provided for a main line commencing on the 100th degree of longitude west from Greenwich, and also for two branches, one to start from Kansas City and unite with the main line at the 100th meridian, and a more northern branch starting from the east bank of the Missouri River in the State of Iowa, and to connect with the main line on the 100th meridian.

This last was the Council Bluffs or Omaha Line, and it was also provided that whenever a railroad should be constructed to Sioux City, Iowa, a third branch should be built from that point to the 100th meridian starting point. The President of the United States was authorized to designate the company that should build this branch, and this was the branch the Missouri River and Niobrara Valley Company was organized for the purpose of constructing. The Union Pacific Railroad was regarded as a war measure, the Civil war then raging having developed conditions that menaced the security of California, and the existing routes from the Atlantic seaboard around Cape Horn or across the Isthmus of Panama. Every state in the Union that was represented in the United States Congress, furnished the commissioners who had charge of organizing the Union Pacific, and these commissioners were named in the law. The Government took upon itself the whole financial burden of the enterprise by making a magnificent land grant to the company and by practically guaranteeing its bonds sufficient in amount to build and equip the road. A provision of the law authorized the construction of the northern branch to start from Sioux City, whenever any railroad had reached Sioux City from the east.

THE MISSOURI & NIOBRARA VALLEY RAILROAD

Anticipating the coming of such a road to Sioux City at an early day (the McGregor and Western and the Dubuque & Pacific or Dubuque & Sioux City, being then under construction), the Dakota Legislature passed the Missouri & Niobrara Valley Railroad bill, which was a very liberal grant of privileges and powers. The road had its eastern terminus on the west bank of the Big Sioux River in the County of Cole (now Union). From the Big Sioux the road was to run westerly through the counties of Cole, Clay, Yankton, Bon Homme and Todd to a point on the Missouri River within seven miles of the mouth of the Niobrara River, or some point where a practicable crossing could be found, then up the Niobrara Valley to the western boundary of Dakota at any point most suitable for leaving said territory in order to reach by a practicable route the South Pass of the Rocky Mountains.

A little study of the list of incorporators will reveal to the reader the names of several of the most prominent railway men at that time in the United States, some of whom were named in the law of Congress authorizing the Union Pacific to be built. There are Wm. B. Ogden, Elihu Washburn, Erastus Corning, men of national fame and at that time at the head of the country's great transportation enterprises. Every member of the Legislature that passed the bill is included in the list of incorporators suggesting that they knew a good thing when they saw it in the form of a railroad charter that had such substantial backing.

The company held a meeting at the Ash Hotel, Yankton, November 8, 1862, at which were present a large number of the resident incorporators; organization was had by the election of W. W. Brookings, chairman, and James Tufts, secretary. On motion of Mr. Bramble the places of all incorporators who had become non-residents of the territory by removal were declared vacant. The board then proceeded to the election of officers of the company. Newton Edmunds was elected president; James Tufts, secretary; John H. Charles, of Sioux City, treasurer. J. Shaw Gregory, James Tufts, Newton Edmunds, Geo. P. Waldron and M. K. Armstrong were appointed a committee to collect, prepare and furnish information in regard to the route from Sioux City to the South Pass, and lay such information before the incorporators of the Union Pacific Railway Company, and also before any committee of Congress that might call for it. Surveyor General Hill was appointed a special agent of the company to represent its interests before the Committee of Congress, and also to urge that the Pacific Railroad charter be so amended as to extend its grants and privileges to the Missouri & Niobrara Valley Company. A committee to draft by-laws was appointed, and the meeting then adjourned to reconvene December 20, 1862, at the Council Chamber. The entire tenor of the proceedings at this meeting, the earnestness manifested by the leading spirits of the occasion, the scrupulous care taken that every requirement of the charter should be faithfully complied with, and a complete record made in durable form of its proceedings were evidence that those who were engineering the project felt that it was something more than a paper railroad, while the names of many of the incorporators were an evidence that the organization was strongly backed and no doubt had the support of a number of the most influential railroad men in the country.

In accordance with legal notice, the directors of the company held a meeting at the office of Surveyor General Hill, on the 17th of November, 1864, for the purpose of opening the books for subscription to the capital stock of the company.

President Newton Edmunds presided, and James Tufts, the secretary being absent, J. R. Hanson was elected secretary pro tem. Addresses were made by General Hill, Hon. W. A. Burleigh and Mr. Brookings. Hon. Geo. M. Pinney presented the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That books of subscription to the capital stock of the Missouri & Niobrara Valley Railway Company be opened as follows: At Yankton, Dakota Territory, on the 1st day of December, 1864, at the office of Gov. Newton Edmunds and under his supervision; at the City of Detroit, Michigan, on the 23d of said December, at the office of Jerome & Swift; at the City of New York on the 1st day of February, 1865, at the office of A. G. Jerome; and in the City of Washington, at the office of B. B. French, on the 15th day of said February, and that the agents having charge of opening said books be authorized to collect upon all subscriptions one-fourth of 1 per cent upon the amount subscribed, for immediate expenses, and account to the business treasurer of the company for the same; and that Gen. George D. Hill be appointed the agent to open the books at Chicago, Detroit, New York and Washington. The meeting then adjourned.

Following this a call was made for a public meeting of the directors of the company and the citizens of the territory, and in accordance therewith a citizens railroad meeting was held at Picotte's Capitol Building in Yankton, on the 7th of November, 1864, to consider the railroad interests of Dakota. W. W. Brookings called the meeting to order and Governor Edmunds was elected president. Vice presidents were elected, also, as follows: Rev. Dr. M. Hoyt, Lt. T. Elwood Clark, Rev. L. P. Judson, Albert F. Hayward and S. C. Fargo. As it was determined to make this meeting the nucleus of a permanent organization for the development of the railway interests of the territory, and there would be necessity for a permanent officer to attend to its correspondence, Hon. W. W. Brookings was elected corresponding secretary.

Congress had amended the Union Pacific Railroad law at the last session, by giving the President of the United States discretionary authority to designate the company which was to build the north branch of the Pacific Railroad from Sioux City westward to a junction with the main line at Fort Laramie, Wyoming. This branch company would receive the same land donations and Government aid that was granted to the Union Pacific Company, which comprised a grant of every alternate section of land for ten miles on each side of the road; and on the completion of each twenty miles the Government gave the company $10,000 of United States Bonds, for each mile so completed, taking a subordinate 300 on the lands as security, and the company was further authorized to issue a first mortgage bond on the lands for a sum not exceeding sixteen thousand dollars a mile, thus enabling the company to raise $32,000 a mile to pay for the expense of construction. Although railroad building material was very high in price owing to the Civil war, this sum afforded a tempting margin to capitalists, and the leaders of the nation in great transportation enterprise were eager to secure the benefits of the law. Surveyor General Hill made the important address at this meeting and explained the situation so clearly as to arouse the keenest interest and enlist the most cordial support of the meeting.

A resolution was then adopted requesting the president of the Missouri & Niobrara Valley Railroad Company, Gov. Newton Edmunds, to advise the President of the United States that the said company will apply to him to be designated as the company to construct the north branch of the Pacific Railway westward from Sioux City according to the intention of the act of Congress. On the motion of Mr. Brookings, the chairman appointed the following named citizens a committee to draw up a report on the most feasible route for the northern branch, and present it to the Legislative Assembly which convened about two weeks later. The chair appointed W. W. Brookings, John W. Boyles, J. Shaw Gregory, Geo. W. Kingsbury, and Jas. S. Foster. On motion of General Hill, Governor Edmunds and T. Elwood Clark were added to the committee, and the meeting then adjourned.

This company maintained its organization for some time and General Hill as agent opened subscription books to the capital stock in Washington, New York, Detroit, Chicago, and Yankton, but the company was not able to secure the cooperation of the United States Government; other interests more powerful checkmated its efforts.

John I. Blair, of New Jersey, was the great railroad builder in Iowa for a number of years. He built the Illinois Central and also the Northwestern Road through Iowa to Council Bluffs, completing it in 1866. He also organized a company called the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company under the laws of Iowa, and had that company designated by the President to build the north branch of the Pacific. There was no railway at Sioux City at this time, but Blair, in 1867 constructed the north branch of the Pacific Railroad from Missouri Valley, Iowa, to Sioux City, and also from the Missouri Valley West, crossing the Missouri at Blair, and connecting with the Union Pacific at Fremont, Nebraska. When it was learned that Blair had secured this valuable franchise, which had been done quietly, and while Mr. Lincoln was President, there was great indignation among the settlers of the Missouri Valley above Sioux City, and very earnest efforts were made to get a reconsideration of the matter. Andrew Johnson had become President in the meantime and before anything was done toward the actual building of any road. The Legislature of Dakota for 1864 passed an urgent memorial on the subject, furnishing a vast amount of information regarding the advantages of the Missouri and Niobrara route, and Governor Edmunds, in his message to the Legislative Assembly of 1864-5 calls attention to the subject in the following pointed language:

The location of the northern branch of the Pacific railroad is doubtless a question of far greater importance than any to which I can at this time call your attention, and when presenting, as we do, for the consideration of the President of the United States, by far the shortest and most practicable route up the valleys of the Missouri and Niobrara rivers to intersect the trunk line in the vicinity of Fort Laramie, thus forming almost an air line from the passes of the Rocky Mountains to Chicago—the great railroad center of the Northwest—our claims, it appears to me, are paramount to all others which have been heretofore contemplated or even spoken of for this line of road.

I call your attention to this subject at the present time for the reason that it is reported that a company has already been designated to construct the line under consideration, and that it is contemplated by this company to construct the road from Sioux City down the valley of the Missouri River in a southeasterly direction for a distance of one hundred miles or more, to intersect the branch of the Pacific road running west from Omaha. How long will it take, I beg leave to inquire, to reach California, by traveling in this direction? It is probable that Congress, in making such liberal appropriations to encourage the early construction of this line of road, contemplated or expected the roads of the Government would be used for constructing a railroad running southeast from Sioux City, in order to form a railroad connection with the Pacific coast. I think not. I have no doubt that Congress, when legislating upon the subject, expected the companies or persons selected to construct the several branches would at least try to shorten the distance and time to California by constructing the roads in that direction.

Believing this to be the case, I recommend that you early call the attention of the President to this subject and memorialize him to reconsider the action of his predecessor, President Lincoln, in designating the company to construct this branch of the Pacific railroad, and in case this cannot be done, that you lay the matter before Congress and solicit from that body such legislation as will require the company designated to construct this branch in starting from Sioux City toward California by the most direct and practicable route.

The memorial passed at the last session of the Legislative Assembly on this subject, approved January 12, 1893, clearly sets forth not only many of the advantages gained by selecting the Niobrara route, but also some of the disadvantages in adopting the route southeast from Sioux City. I respectfully submit this subject for your consideration, hoping that you will, by prompt and judicious action, secure to your constituents the advantages to be derived from having this road constructed through the southern portion of this territory, fully believing this to be in accord with the views of a large majority of Congress in making the appropriation to encourage its construction.

The flight of time and the development and consummation of many of the plans of the leading railroad builders, enables us at this day to see that the original design of this Dakota enterprise had its origin in a broadminded and substantial plan concurred in by the leading transportation interests of the country, to run the north branch of the Union Pacific Railroad on a route substantially as laid in this Dakota Charter of 1862, and this was well known to such Dakotans as Surveyor General Hill, Newton Edmunds, M. K. Armstrong, General Todd, and others, then residents and prominent in the affairs of the young territory. The north branch of the Union Pacific has in fact not been built to this day, as originally contemplated, but the railway from Sioux City south to Missouri Valley, thence west across the Missouri River at Blair, Nebraska, and thence to Fremont, Nebraska, to a connection with the Union Pacific was the line that secured the grants and loans from the Government. President Lincoln, at the time he designated Mr. Blair's company was wholly engrossed with the great problem of the Civil war, and could not have given the subject such consideration as its importance demanded. What might have become one of the principal commercial arteries of the country, became a short local line of little importance and is not now nor has it ever been popularly recognized as the north branch of the Pacific Railroad, though at one time it was dignified with the name of the Sioux City and Pacific Railway.

URGENT DEMANDS FOR IMPROVED TRANSPORTATION

Railroad facilities were demanded by the growing interests of Dakota in 1867. Farmers needed cheaper and speedier transportation for their surplus products; merchants needed better facilities for procuring their merchandise, and the people needed more ample and comfortable facilities for traveling. The Union Pacific Railway was well under way, and the northern branch was under construction from Missouri Valley to Sioux City, which had apparently extinguished the ambition of the Missouri and Niobrara Valley Railway Company which had relied chiefly upon securing from President Johnson the designation of that company to build the north branch of the Pacific. This having been denied the company was not in a position to prosecute so expensive a work, through a country entirely uninhabited, or practically so except for a short distance, and the project was given up.

DAKOTA AND NORTHWESTERN

In the winter of 1866-7 the Legislature enacted a law incorporating the Dakota and Northwestern Railroad Company. This was prior to the action of Congress prohibiting territorial legislatures from granting special charters. The granting of this charter was the beginning of earnest practical efforts to secure a railway west from Sioux City. The names of the original incorporators of the company indicate that the incorporation was formed in good faith and with the design of building a railroad forthwith from Sioux City up the Valley of the Missouri, touching at Elk Point, Vermillion and Yankton. The act of incorporation was the last of the special charters granted to any corporation or individual, Congress having, a little later, inhibited the territorial legislatures from granting any special charters. The law was considered a very favorable enactment for the railroad company hence the care that was taken to conform to all its requirements by the company, for a number of years following its enactments, waiting for a donation of land from the Government. It finally passed into the control of the Dakota Southern Railroad Company. The names of the incorporators were: John L. Blair, president of the Northwestern Railroad Company and builder of the Sioux City and Pacific; A. W. Walker, vice president of the same company; Alexander Ramsey, United States senator from Minnesota; D. S. Norton, Ignatius Donally, Geo. S. Becker, Edmund Rice, Green Clay Smith, Newton Edmunds, George M. Pinney, Donald McLean, J. W. Boyle, A. J. Faulk, William Tripp, J. B. S. Todd, W. A. Burleigh, Ara Bartlett, B. M. Smith, S. L. Spink, M. K. Armstrong, D. T. Bramble, W. N. Collamer, H. C. Ash, A. G. Fuller, James S. Foster, Geo. W. Kingsbury, George Weare, John P. Allison, F. M. Zeibach, Mahlon Gore, L. D. Parmer, John H. Charles, E. Kirk, J. C. C. Hoskins, J. Stone, James E. Booge, William Freency, C. K. Smith, C. K. Howard, Theoph. Bruguier, T. J. Kinkaid, Charles Labreeche, O. F. Stevens, Geo. W. Kellogg, I. T. Gore, Wm. Gray, Michael Curry, D. M. Mills, J. W. Turner, J. P. Kidder, P. H. Jewell, Nelson Miner, Ole Bottolfson, A. VanOsdel, Felix LaBlanc, Canute Weeks, Amon Hanson, James McHenry, R. M. Johnson, Austin Cole, Hugh Fraley, P. H. Conger, R. I. Thomas, John Thompson, Kerwin Wilson, Wm. Stevens, Wm. Cox, C. Ducharme, J. V. Hamilton, C. H. McCarthy, John Dillon, Joel A. Potter, J. A. Lewis, Joseph S. Collins, Geo. B. Hoffman, Hiram Dryer, Gus Gilbert, John Goeway, E. H. Durfee, J. Shaw Gregory, W. P. Lyman, Geo. H. Hand, F. J. Dewitt, and William Bordino.

These parties were largely citizens of Dakota Territory and Sioux City, and were representative business men who had become interested in this enterprise with the determination to secure the building of a railroad up the Missouri Valley from Sioux City. They did not promise to build and equip the road, but they expected to place it in such a condition, with the surveys made, right of way secured, with the addition of some county, town and individual aid as would induce railway construction men, and some of this class were represented among the incorporators to take the franchise and build the line, which was contemplated to run from Sioux City along the Dakota side of the Missouri to the Big Cheyenne. The incorporators or a quorum of that body met at Yankton July 4, 1867, and organized by electing Judge J. P. Kidder, president; A. G. Fuller, secretary, and James S. Foster, treasurer. The meeting then adjourned to reconvene August 20th. At the August meeting there were present the officers elected in July, also W. A. Burleigh, Wm. Tripp, Ara Bartlett, S. L. Spink, D. T. Bramble, Wm. N. Collamer, H. C. Ash, Geo. W. Kingsbury, Hugh Fraley, W. P. Lyman, Geo. H. Hand, Wm. Bordino, Newton Edmunds, L. H. Litchfield.

On the motion of General Tripp a committee was appointed to procure the necessary books and receive subscriptions to the capital stock for the purpose of raising the necessary funds to make a preliminary survey of the line of the road, so far at least as from the Big Sioux River to Yankton, prior to the meeting of Congress, and that all incorporators present at the meeting shall stand personally responsible to this committee to pay their share of the expense for obtaining the books, the price for which must not exceed fifty dollars. The committee appointed consisted of Wm. Tripp, A. G. Fuller, D. T. Bramble, Geo.

H. Hand and Wm. N. Collamer. On motion, Wm. Tripp, S. L. Spink, Geo. H. Hand, James S. Foster, A. G. Fuller, D. M. Mills, James McHenry, Hugh Fraley, Joel A. Potter and Patrick H. Congar were appointed a committee to open the stock subscription books, also to prepare a memorial to Congress for the purpose of procuring a land grant to assist in the construction of the road, and to cause a preliminary survey of the line to be made, and to transact any other necessary business. This meeting adjourned to meet October 25th, to hear the reports of the committees.

At this October meeting George Stickney was elected chief engineer and another adjournment was taken to January 6, 1868, when the directors met in annual meeting at Fuller's Hall, Yankton, and elected officers, as follows: W. A. Burleigh, president; J. P. Kidder, vice president; A. G. Fuller, secretary; M. K. Armstrong, treasurer; Wm. Tripp, attorney, and George Stickney, chief engineer. A preliminary survey of a portion of the line of this road had been made in November, 1867, by Chief Engineer Stickney from the Sioux River to Yankton, and a very favorable route was found. The company proposed to apply for a land grant, and this survey was made to aid in securing the favorable action of Congress.

Chief Engineer Stickney's report follows:

To the Stockholders of the Dakota & Northwestern Railway Company:

Gentlemen: I herewith submit a report accompanied by a profile of a preliminary survey of the Dakota & Northwestern Railroad, made by direction of a meeting of the incorporators assembled at the office of the surveyor general of the territory on the 25th day of October, 1867:

The initial point of this survey is at the intersection of the line dividing lots No. 1 and 2, of section 14, township 80 north of range 48 west, with the Big Sioux River in Union County, Dakota Territory, distant from Sioux, Iowa, five miles, thence in a right line to a point on the south line of lot 2 of the northwest quarter of section 19, township 91, range 49 west, at a distance of fifty-seven rods from the southeast corner of said lot. This point is in the Town of Elk Point. This town is the county seat of Union County, is situated in a rich agricultural district immediately adjacent to an extensive body of good timber. On the line of the river at this point is a good steam sawmill. Distance from Elk Point to the initial point on the Big Sioux, 14.7 miles; from the point in the Town of Elk Point the line of survey is a right line to a point on the west line of township 92 north, range 50 west, at a distance of seventy rods from the southwest corner of said township. This point is 7.2 miles from Elk Point; here is a large body of excellent timber on both sides of the Missouri River. From this point the survey extends in a right line to a point on the west line of section 10, township 92, of range 51 west, at a point five rods north of the quarter stake on the west side of said section, thence north seventy degrees west 112 rods, to a point in the Town of Vermillion. This town, the county seat of Clay County, is situated on the Missouri River, has a good steamboat landing with an abundance of good timber and is rapidly improving, being centrally located in the county. From said last mentioned point in the Town of Vermillion the survey extends as follows: North 84 west 364 rods to a point on the side of the bluff on the east side of the Vermillion River, thence south 84 west twenty-six rods to the east bank of the Vermillion River, thence on said course twenty-two rods to the west bank of said river, thence on said course 154 rods 15 links to a point on the south side of the Government wagon road, thence on a right line to the northwest corner of section 17, township 93, range 54 west, thence in a right line to a point eighty rods south of the northwest corner of section 17, township 93, north of range 50 west, thence in a right line to the quarter post on the west line of section 18, township 93, north of range 50 west, in the Town of Yankton, Dakota Territory. The distance from the Big Sioux River to Yankton, on the line of this survey, is 54.4 miles. This line passes the entire length through one of the richest agricultural portions of Dakota, a section of country rapidly settling up. The soil is a rich alluvial deposit, easy of cultivation, producing abundant crops of all the cereals and all kinds of vegetables. This section of country is peculiarly adapted to the raising of stock. There is an abundance of good timber on the south side of the line of this survey at an average distance of two and a half miles. In the bluffs on the north side of the line, at short intervals, are beds of limestone and boulders, suitable for building culverts and foundations of buildings. The Town of Yankton, the capital of Dakota Territory, the termination of this survey, is situated on the north bank of the Missouri River on a high level plateau, with a permanent steamboat landing; this is the largest town in Dakota in the Missouri Valley; it has already a large and rapidly increasing trade; it is the depot of supplies for an extensive trade for hundreds of miles above on the Missouri River, and now contains nearly a thousand inhabitants. At a natural point near Yankton in the Upper Missouri it is surpassed in natural advantages by no other location.

The roadbed will require an elevation on an average throughout of not more than three and one-half feet. There is an abundance of gravel and hard loam at Vermillion and Yankton for grading purposes, and throughout the entire route there is a vast supply of timber on the south of the line. There are only two bridges on the entire line to be built, one over the Vermillion, the other over the James River. The construction of these bridges is not difficult or expensive. The vast trade of the Upper Missouri River demands an early completion of this road, not only to Yankton, but to the mouth of the Big Cheyenne and westward until its western terminus shall be the shores of the Pacific. As the Platte Valley is a natural thoroughfare to the Pacific on our south, so the Missouri Valley is a natural and practical central route for a railroad to the Pacific, passing through the rich mineral and agricultural regions of the Black Hills and Montana Territory. The interests of the people of the whole country and the general Government demand the earliest possible completion of a railroad across the continent by way of the Valley of the Missouri River.

GEORGE STICKNEY, Chief Engineer.

The cost of building one mile of ordinary railroad in Iowa at this time was about fifteen thousand dollars. It was stated that the iron cost about eighteen dollars for each twenty-four foot rail weighing 448 pounds delivered; 440 rails to the mile, costing $7,929, or a little over 4 cents a pound; 440 joints, $170.00; 40 kegs of spikes at $38 per keg, or 4 cents for each spike; 2,500 ties at 50 cents each, $1,250. For laying one mile of track $425.00. Grading cost all the way from $1,300 to $9,000 per mile. Right of way was donated as a rule. Bridges over the ordinary rivers, $10,000.

The officers of the Dakota & Northwestern Company and those of a new company organized at Sioux City called the Missouri Valley Railroad Company held a meeting at Sioux City, February 1, 1870, where the Dakota Company made a transfer of its franchise, books, etc., to the Iowa organization, under an agreement that the purchasing company should build a line of road from Sioux City to Yankton via Vermillion by the 1st of September, 1871.

The first grading for a railroad made in the Territory of Dakota was one mile on the line of the railroad projected from Sioux City to Yankton. One mile of grading was completed near Elk Point in Union County in the summer of 1870, under a contract awarded to George Stickney, the chief engineer of the company, and a resident of Union County. The work was done in compliance with the company's charter, which was a special instrument given in 1867 before Congress prohibited the passing of special charters, and was considered a very liberal and valuable charter.

OTHER RAILROADS BUILDING TO DAKOTA

In May, 1869, Gen. John Lawler, of McGregor, Iowa, and Dr. J. J. Whitney, of Prairie du Chien, Wisconsin, visited Yankton, and remained several days looking over the city and country surroundings. General Lawler was the vice president of the McGregor & Western Railway Company, which at that day was building west through the northern tier of Iowa counties, and was projected to enter Dakota about twenty-five miles south of Sioux Falls, about where Canton is located, thence south by west to the Missouri River, striking that commercial artery at Yankton. These gentlemen were favorably impressed by their observations and gave the people much encouragement, stating that the plans of their company had been matured after a thorough examination of the country and Yankton was to be their Missouri River point. Later in the same month, Chief Engineer Shephard, of the same company, came over for the purpose of informing himself regarding the topography of the country hereabouts and other matters of consequence to his company. On the 9th of July following, Capt. C. E. Woodman, engineer in charge of the western division of the road, reached the Missouri River at Yankton, after having made a reconnoitering survey of a line from near Canton to Yankton. He informed the people that his report would be favorable to the construction of the road. In the meantime the McGregor and Western became merged with the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, and the western division was called the "Yankton Division of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul." Nothing more came of this project and the company subsequently selected Chamberlain as its Missouri River point.

George Walcott, a civil engineer, made a preliminary survey of a line from Sioux City to Yankton, via Elk Point and Vermillion, in November, 1860, presumably in the interest of Sioux City, or parties who contemplated building the road, but no further step was taken by the parties responsible for the survey.

These various movements together with the pressing and increasing demand had served to accentuate the popular interest in the railroad question, and as Yankton appeared to be the objective point of all the various projects and was conceded to have the most at stake in the early success of the project it was looked to lead off on some practicable plan, at the same time it was apparent that no assistance, but opposition could be looked for unless the road accommodated the settlements along the Missouri Valley, which in fact were the only settlements of influence and population in the territory at the time. Out of this situation grew the agitation of a plan to subsidize a railway company by the issuing of territorial or county bonds or both. It was doubted whether this could be legally done under the authority of the organic act and sanctioned by a legislative enactment, but there seemed an almost unanimous voice in favor of resorting to it if a market could be found for the bonds. In connection with the proposition it was currently reported that where the bonds were issued by authority of a vote of the people interested, the courts would sustain their validity, notwithstanding the lack of express authority in the organic act, and so it proved.

A meeting made up of the prominent men of the territory was held at Yankton, September 21, 1860, for the purpose of discussing this matter, as well as other propositions. Representatives were present from all the counties and settlements. Judge Jefferson P. Kidder, of Vermillion, was made president, and Gen. H. A. Pierce, of Yankton, secretary. Addresses were made by Congressman Spink, Judge Kidder, Judge Brookings, Capt. Nelson Miner, of Vermillion, Gen. William Tripp, George Stickney, Union county; F. J. Dewitt, Charles Mix; and the situation was quite thoroughly discussed. The question of securing a grant of land from the national Government or aid from that source in any other way was talked over, but not in a hopeful spirit. Land grants were no longer favored by Congress. Nothing definite was accomplished at this meeting, and without any other conclusion than that the interests of the territory urgently demanded railway facilities, the meeting finally turned the subject matter over to a committee of one from each county, which was instructed to enter into correspondence with railway people and with capitalists, with the view of effecting the extension of some of the lines then pointing westward through Iowa and Minnesota, into Dakota. It was manifest, however, that the representatives from the other counties east of Yankton were not inclined to favor such a line as the Yankton division of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul, from Canton to Yankton, as that would not benefit the present interests of Union, Clay and Vermillion counties, but would be the cause of settling up rival trading points to those already established, and would divert immigration to the lands bordering the new railroads. A road from Sioux City up the Missouri Valley seemed to arouse the greatest interest. The committee was duly appointed, consisting of H. A. Pierce, Yankton County; T. O. Wisner, Union County; George Stickney, Clay County; Franklin J. Dewitt, Charles Mix County; J. Q. A. Fitzgerald, Lincoln County; John Thompson, Minnehaha County; H. C. Ash, Jayne County; W. A. Burleigh, Bon Homme County; and Enos Stutsman, Pembina County.

This committee was instructed to report at a subsequent meeting to be called by President Kidder, but the record fails to disclose that there was ever held another gathering of territorial scope to consider this subject.

With the Yankton people there was an earnest sentiment, based upon the most important conditions, that railway facilities must be secured, and from the date of this meeting the efforts of the people were largely directed in negotiations looking to the construction of a road.

Gen. G. M. Dodge, and Hon. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, prominent citizens and railroad projectors and promoters, visited the settlements in the Missouri Valley in October, 1869, and held meetings. They proposed the organization of a company for the purpose of building a railroad from Sioux City up the immediate Valley of the Missouri to a connection with the Northern Pacific, which at that time was expected to cross the Missouri near the mouth of the Yellowstone. These gentlemen were sanguine that they could secure the building of the line, and at the meetings held they were assured of the hearty and liberal co-operation of the people. On their return to Sioux City, a company was organized, composed of G. M. Dodge, John T. Baldwin, A. W. Hubbard, E. Creighton and James S. Wilson, for the purpose of constructing a road from Sioux City to the Big Sioux River, a distance of about five miles through Iowa, there to connect with the proposed Dakota & Northwestern already organized, which has been mentioned, whose charter could be secured and which conferred valuable franchises.

RAILROAD CORPORATIONS REPORT TO LEGISLATURE

The Legislative Assembly of 1870-71 adopted a joint resolution requiring all railroad companies organized under the laws of Dakota Territory to make an immediate report and statement of the condition of the corporation, and what had been accomplished, in order that the Assembly might have reliable data upon which to base a memorial to Congress for a grant of lands to the territory to be used in promoting the construction of railways. The Dakota & Northwestern Company submitted its report January 25, 1871, as follows:

The act of incorporation under which this company organized was approved January 11, 1867. The company organized as required by said act early in June following, and in August the board of directors ordered a preliminary survey of their proposed line from the Big Sioux River to Yankton, which was made by Chief Engineer George Stickney during the following November. On the 6th of January, 1868, an annual meeting of stockholders was held at Yankton, when books of subscription to the capital stock were opened and 6,490 shares of stock subscribed. A board of directors was elected, the report of the chief engineer, herewith attached, was received and approved. No further steps were taken during 1868. On the 4th of January, 1869, at the annual meeting of the directors, the books of subscription were again opened, when the remaining portion of the capital stock of $1,000,000 was subscribed and the books were closed. The stockholders met at the same time and elected a board of directors.

On the 23d of November, 1868, the stockholders of the company held a special meeting pursuant to a thirty days' call, for the purpose of authorizing the company to make arrangements for the construction of the road by the company or by the Missouri Valley Railroad Company. A committee appointed to consider the proposition of the latter company reported in favor of accepting the proposition of the Missouri Valley company, and authorizing the Dakota & Northwestern to transfer its franchises to the Missouri Valley road upon the conditions that a survey of the road be made, and one mile of grading be completed by the 1st day of September, 1869, and the whole road completed and in running order from Sioux City, Iowa, to Yankton, Dakota Territory, by the 1st day of September, 1871. The survey has been made and the one mile of grading done.

The Missouri Valley company was organized under the laws of Iowa for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Sioux City, Iowa, to a point of junction with this company at the Big Sioux River, and for the further purpose of acquiring the right to construct the line of road of this company in accordance with the laws of the territory. The first condition under the articles of agreement was complied with, and we have every assurance and are satisfied that the second will be, as well as the further condition which requires said company to construct the remainder of the line in accordance with the terms of this company's charter and its contract with said valley company road. A failure on the part of the Missouri Valley company to comply with the terms and conditions of said contract will, by the terms of the same, revert all the rights, privileges, franchises, etc., embraced in its charter to this company.

The Missouri Valley company, we are assured, is engaged in perfecting its plans for the building of the road, and have furthermore applied to Congress for a grant of lands to aid in its construction, said grant to be made to the Dakota corporation; said lands, if granted, to be sold to actual settlers at the price of $2.50 per acre. In consideration of the great benefits to flow from the construction of this line, we ask the Legislative Assembly to aid by memorial to Congress, to secure a land grant which we are confident will secure the completion of this line of railroad within the next twelve months.

Congress has abundant precedent for granting lands to aid in the railroad development of our young and promising territory. In conclusion, we desire to say that on our application for the right of way along the line of this road we have received, in every instance, a cheerful grant of the same by the property holders, an assurance of further aid in the full and speedy completion of this great enterprise.

J. B. S. TOWN, Secretary.

J. P. KNEAR, President.
Yankton, D. T., January 6, 1871.

THE YEAR 1869 GOOD FOR CROPS

The year 1869 was the most notable for immigration and good crops the territory had yet experienced. Farmers in many instances threshed out forty bushels of wheat to the acre of ground planted, and two or three small cargoes of this grain were shipped down the river on some of the late steamboats. There was a great surplus of wheat and the mills had not then been erected to grind it. Wagon transportation to Sioux City ate up all the profits, and it was the very best of fortune to find the outlet by boats for a portion of the surplus of the counties across the river, as well as in Dakota. The necessity for a railroad was forced upon the attention of the people by conditions of this character, which were certain to grow more urgent another year; and the energy and ability of the territory was given in good earnest to securing railway facilities. Public meetings were held where addresses were made showing the advantages of railway facilities, though everyone seemed to have settled that question with himself affirmatively, and ways and means for supporting an enterprise were suggested; committees were appointed who visited the railway managers in their eastern offices and endeavored to enlist them to build their lines into the territory. The prosperity of every branch of industry apparently was dependent upon securing railway facilities, and if settlements were to expand and population and production increase, such facilities were indispensable and urgent. Steamboat transportation was not dependable, because navigation closed when most needed to move the grain. It was a railway that the situation demanded imperatively to relieve the congested condition of the farmers' cribs and grain bins. Railroad companies had been organized in the territory and preliminary surveys made from Yankton to Sioux City; from Yankton to Columbus, Nebraska, and also from Yankton to a point in Southern Minnesota. Representative men had been sent out to the railway and financial centers east for the purpose of enlisting individuals of wealth or railway corporations in the project of constructing a line into the territory and through its most important and promising centers of population, but nothing tangible had been accomplished. While the situation at home was keenly realized, railway builders had not appeared to be favorably impressed. As a rule, they looked upon the enterprise with disfavor, promising no adequate returns for the capital required to construct and operate a road, and they were loath to consider a proposition unless it was accompanied by a substantial subsidy. All or nearly all the western railroads had been aided by grants of land and county bond donations; the Dakota proposition had neither to recommend it. The contention on the part of the railway men was that there was not sufficient patronage from the grain fields and commerce of the territory at the time to warrant the investment of the money which would be required to build, equip and operate the road, and a subsidy of lands or bonds would be needed to make up the estimated deficiency. Millions of acres of unclaimed land still awaited settlement on the frontiers of Iowa and Minnesota, and railway men were apt to consider that years would elapse before there would be any more than moderate progress in the settlement of the wide wastes in those states, which would be the first to invite the attention of the immigrant from the East. Had the price of wheat gone to a dollar a bushel it might have been a factor in favor of Dakota's railway development at that time, but prices of all farm products averaged low, indicating that the supply was abundant, the demand very moderate. And nothing of the kind occurred or was likely to occur for a generation, and the situation in the territory, as well as the spirit of enterprise that dominated those old Dakotans, would not admit of a surrender.) They had the will and they were bound to find the way. The only feasible project at this time and the one that had a large majority of public sentiment behind it, was a road from Sioux City up the Missouri Valley on the Dakota side. Such a line would reach the important towns of Elk Point, Vermillion and Yankton, which were the principal centers of trade, and at Yankton would connect with the Missouri River, an important item to the projected road in securing the up-river business and the contracts for transporting the army supplies and Indian goods sent up by the Government. The cost of grading this line would be much cheaper than the average.

Sioux City had a monopoly of the Dakota business, and was also the starting point for a large number of up-river steamboats. Competition between the railroad and the river had induced the railways to make a rate from Chicago to Sioux City as reasonable as the boats could afford from St. Louis to Sioux City, the Chicago market was also an eager competitor, while in the matter of time the railway possessed a decided and permanent advantage.

The Sioux City business men were not friendly to an extension of their road into Dakota, but it was apparent to even the most casual observer that if the southern portion of the territory was to have a railroad it must come from Sioux City or that point would lose one half of its business. Had any of the other railway projects which the people of Dakota had in view at that time been successful, they would have deprived Sioux City for a time, at least, of its most valuable trade territory, and there were prospects of securing railway facilities from other directions.

A NEBRASKA ENTERPRISE

Reference has been made to the Yankton and Columbus Railway. This company though organized in 1868 at Yankton under the laws of Dakota, was also in 1869 organized at Columbus under the laws of Nebraska, there being substantial reasons for doing so, the principal advantage being the securing of state and county aid. The officers of the new organization were John Rickley, president; W. W. Brookings, vice president; Will B. Dale, secretary; Charles H. Whaley, treasurer. W. W. Brookings, Newton Edmunds, J. R. Hanson, Will B. Dale, Chas. H. Whaley, S. L. Holman, directors. Rickley, Dale, Whaley, and Holman were the Nebraskians. The plan was to secure a donation of county bonds from the counties through which the road would pass, sufficient to pay the cost of right of way, grading and tying, and already the Legislature of Nebraska had made a grant of Nebraska state lands to this company. This enterprise was inviting to Yankton people, and was supposed to have the favor of the Union Pacific Railway. It was kept alive through the succeeding year and a meeting was held at Yankton January 14, 1871, for the purpose of promoting it; the Nebraska interest manifesting a determination to build the line considering the feasibility of making an effort to obtain the grant of certain lands understood to have been forfeited to the State of Nebraska by certain railroad companies which had failed to comply with the terms of their grant; to aid in building a railroad from Yankton to Columbus in that state. Chief Justice French presided at this meeting, and Maj. I. R. Hanson, of Dakota, and Hon. S. P. Sanders, United States senator of Nebraska, were secretaries. Addresses were made by Jas. S. Foster, Hon. S. P. Sanders, W. W. Brookings, Surveyor General Beadle, Secretary of the Territory George Alexander Batchelder, Bartlett Tripp, M. T. Woolley, Mr. Herrick, Gov. Newton Edmunds, and Col. G. C. Moody. This route from Yankton to Columbus had already been surveyed and a profile made of the line by Carl C. P. Meyers, and an excellent route found. Finally a committee was appointed consisting of Governor Edmunds, Colonel Moody, Secretary Batchelder, Jas. S. Foster, General Beadle, S. P. Sanders and Saby Strahn, the last named of Aten, Nebraska, to visit the Legislature of Nebraska, then in session, and make an effort to secure the legislation necessary to enable the Yankton and Columbus Railway Company to obtain control of the forfeited lands. A portion of the committee attended the session of the Legislature, and met with much encouragement but found some impediments in the way that had to do with the organization of the company, but which could have been easily corrected. It was doubtful, however, whether the matter could be reached in time for the Legislature then in session to act upon it. The project does not appear to have received any further attention due no doubt to the improving prospects of obtaining an eastern connection through Dakota lines already projected. It was also apparent that Yankton could expect no support whatever beyond its immediate community for this enterprise, it being considered by the communities east of the capital as detrimental to their interest, and helpful only to a very small area of the then settled and productive area of the territory.

During the session of the Minnesota Legislature of 1865, a memorial was passed by that body, asking Congress for a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad from La Crescent, Houston County, Minnesota, via Blue Earth City to the Town of Yankton, Dakota Territory. The La Crescent, Rochester and Yankton Railroad Company had already been formed, and M. K. Armstrong, of Yankton, was one of the incorporators. The land grant asked for was ten sections to each mile of road, the total length as established by survey being about 275 miles, and connecting the Mississippi and Missouri rivers in the Northwest. The bill granting the land passed the Senate, but did not get through the House. The company was unable to go ahead without the aid of the land grant, and the enterprise seems to have been given up by its projectors.

Work on a number of railroads through the State of Iowa, from the Mississippi had been going forward in a spasmodic manner for several years, each advance shortening the distance of wagon transportation between Dakota points and the railroad. Dakotans watched with much interest the forward movement of these highways. The building of the Union Pacific west from Omaha had given an impetus to the work on the Iowa lines, particularly the Northwestern from Clinton, and in February, 1866, this road began running a passenger train to Boone, Iowa, from Chicago, which enabled the Dakota passenger to reach Chicago in seventy-two hours, "long measure." The stage trip to Boone occupied fifty-three hours continuous traveling when the roads were good, according to the advertised schedule, and thence by rail to the lake metropolis in twenty hours.

In the fall of 1866, engineers began the survey of the north branch of the Union Pacific Railroad, from Missouri Valley Junction to Sioux City, Iowa. This enterprise was one of the railway puzzles of that age, it being farther away from the Pacific at its terminus than when it left its initial point at Sioux City, but Mr. John I. Blair, of New Jersey, who was then the railway king of the West, built an extension west from Missouri Valley some time later, joining the Union Pacific at Fremont, Nebraska, which carried the western terminus a few miles farther in a Pacific direction, and aided materially in consuming the substantial appropriation made by the Government.

On the first day of January, 1867, the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad was opened for traffic to the Village of St. Johns, afterwards called Missouri Valley (Iowa). The railroad from Missouri Valley to Sioux City was built in 1867, and completed in March, 1868. It was the first railroad to reach Sioux City. It was built by John I. Blair and was called the Sioux City and Pacific, being constructed under the charter granted by Congress for building the Union Pacific Railway, and constituted the north branch of the Union Pacific.

Under a charter granted by the Legislature of Dakota of 1866-7, the Minnesota and Missouri River Railroad Company was organized at Yankton on the 26th day of February, 1867, by the election of M. K. Armstrong, president; Newton Edmunds, vice president; George H. Hand, secretary, and D. T. Bramble, treasurer. This company had some very strong financial support in Minnesota, where Mr. Armstrong's brother resided, and had been lieutenant governor of the state. There was a great deal connected with its initiatory work that gave good grounds for believing it would develop into something substantial. According to the terms of its charter, the line started at a point on the boundary line of the State of Minnesota between Minnesota and Dakota, about due east of Sioux Falls, and running southwest terminated at the Missouri River—the terminal point being left undetermined, but either Vermillion or Yankton, or any intermediate point could be selected. A reconnoitering surveying party made an inspection of the proposed route from Yankton to Sioux Falls during the summer, and a practicable route was found that varied little from an air line. This survey was made by Messrs. Armstrong, Spink, Fuller and Bradford, of Bon Homme.

Mr. Armstrong, who was a skillful civil engineer, and Mr. Samuel Morrow, a practical surveyor, then made a preliminary survey of the line, starting from Yankton, thence along the territorial road north, crossing the James River at a place called Bruid's Ferry; thence over a gently rolling prairie, crossing Clay Creek, Turkey Creek, Vermillion River, and the Big Sioux River in the great bend west of the Falls, reaching the state line of Minnesota at a distance of sixty-eight miles and thirty-seven chains and eighty links, at which point a connection was made with the proposed Southern Minnesota Railroad, and also the surveyed line of the Minnesota Valley Railroad from St. Paul via Mankato to the Missouri River.

The stockholders of this company met January 7, 1868, and elected a board of directors, as follows: M. K. Armstrong, W. W. Brookings, Newton Edmunds, Geo. W. Kingsbury, S. L. Spink, D. T. Bramble, Geo. H. Hand and A. G. Fuller. The officers chosen by the directors were: S. L. Spink, president; A. G. Fuller, vice president; Geo. H. Hand, secretary; D. T. Bramble, treasurer; W. W. Brookings, attorney; M. K. Armstrong, chief engineer.

The Yankton and Columbus, Nebraska, railroad enterprise was set on foot in November, 1868. On Saturday, the 21st of that month, a meeting of the citizens of the territory was held at the capitol building at which Governor Edmunds was elected chairman and James S. Foster, secretary. The meeting was addressed by Messrs. W. W. Brookings, Geo. H. Hand, S. L. Spink, Joel A. Potter, G. W. Kingsbury and General Foster. Messrs. Spink, Potter and Edmunds were appointed a committee to invite John I. Blair, the eminent railroad builder, who had constructed the Northwestern Railroad across the State of Iowa, and the Sioux City and Pacific to visit Yankton and to confer on railroad matters. Messrs. I. N. Higbee, Hand and Kingsbury were appointed to ascertain the cost of a preliminary survey of a line from Yankton to Columbus. Mr. Brookings was selected to open up correspondence with the parties in Columbus who were favorable to the enterprise. Messrs. Gov. A. J. Faulk, J. E. Witherspoon, D. T. Bramble, C. H. McIntyre, J. Shaw Gregory, G. W. Kingsbury, M. K. Armstrong, J. L. Foster, Simon Eiseman, J. B. S. Todd, J. M. Stone and J. R. Hanson were appointed a finance committee. The meeting then adjourned to meet on the 28th instant.

A preliminary survey of this line was made by Engineer C. C. P. Meyer, in the late fall of 1868. He found a good route and quite direct. The expectation at that time, engendered by the active cooperation of the Columbus people, and intermediate points, and a promising prospect of state aid through a grant of state lands, was that the Yankton and Columbus would be constructed, and by way of the Union Pacific afford Dakota its first outlet. Mr. Meyer's report was submitted to the Legislature in 1868.

The Vermillion Valley and Northern Pacific Railroad was surveyed by H. J. Austin, chief engineer, in the summer of 1871. In his report of the survey the engineer says:

The route may pass nearly in a direct line and with few curves the whole distance of 300 miles. Starting from Vermillion, the route passed nearly north along the Vermillion Valley in Clay County, touching Bloomingdale, Lodi and Riverside; thence into Turner County, touching the towns of Mattoon, Ohio, Turner and Finlay; thence north on the second guide meridian between McCook and Minnehaha counties; thence through Lake County, and bearing a little west, through Wood County, near Lake Thompson, along the western edge of the Coteaus. From Wood County the route lies through Clark, Greeley, Stone, Ransom and Burbank (now Barnes), to the Northern Pacific Railroad, at a point about forty-five miles west of Fargo. The whole route is well watered with clear streams and beautiful lakes, interspersed with small groves of timber. The building of the road over the first 150 miles would require but little grading and but few bridges. I think that $60,000 would prepare the first 1,050 miles for the ties. The lay and quality of the land for twenty miles on either side of the line exceeds any tract of country of the same size I ever saw. It is not so level as to require drainage, nor too rough for farm purposes. I do not believe there is one acre in a thousand in all this scope of country, 40 miles in width by 150 miles long, but can readily be cultivated, and will grow a good crop of wheat, oats, corn, barley or potatoes.

Its incorporators were Horace J. Austin, Jefferson P. Kidder, Nelson Miner, Charles H. True, Andrew E. Lee, M. D. Thompson, D. M. Inman, Amos F. Shaw, John L. Jolley, B. F. Campbell, J. W. Turner, V. E. Prentice, Geo. Curliss, P. H. Turner, Samuel Lyon, Henry Newton, Samuel Jones, F. McKercher, R. J. Stanley, H. J. Austin, H. H. Rudd, Jesse L. Fisher, W. K. Hollenbeck, C. A. Maxon, E. W. Skinner.

A railway company was organized at Elk Point in February, 1872, for the purpose of constructing a railway from the Point to Brule Creek, thence up that stream fifteen miles, thence northwesterly to the Vermillion River at Turner, thence northerly to a terminus with the Northern Pacific. It was called the Elk Point and Dakota Central Railway. Its construction depended largely on getting a grant of land from the Government, which it was unable to procure, and subsequent railroad developments postponed the work of construction which was not undertaken.

The Springfield and Dakota Central Railway Company was organized in November, 1871, to build a railroad west and northwest from Springfield to the Northern Pacific. It never got beyond Springfield owing to the refusal of Congress to aid it with a land grant, a cause that lay at the root of many other contemporaneous railroad enterprises.

The Omaha & Northwestern Railroad was an enterprise that greatly interested Dakota people and was the subject of a number of public meetings. It was originally planned to build to a point on the Missouri River opposite Yankton, and to have the road completed in 1872. This line was to be aided by a donation of Nebraska State lands. The citizens of Dakota sent a representative, James S. Foster, to Lincoln, Nebraska, in January, 1871, while the Legislature was in session there to promote the interests of Dakota in the enterprise, who met with much encouragement, and who also filed articles of incorporation for a new enterprise called the Yankton, Columbus and Manhattan Railroad Company, having its southern terminus at Manhattan on the Kansas River, and on the line of the Kansas City Branch of the Union Pacific. This line was also to be aided by a grant of Nebraska State lands. The parties composing the company were H. J. Hudson, L. Gerard, and J. O. Shannon, of Columbus; William Ryan, of Omaha; and James S. Foster, Yankton. Both projects yet remain in the waiting column.

THE DAKOTA CENTRAL INCORPORATES

In 1870 the railway projecting circles of the territory were encouraged by the filing of articles of incorporation by the Dakota Central Railway Company, an organization composed of non-residents largely that designed to build a road from Yankton to connect with the Northern Pacific which had not then entered the territory but was hastening toward it across Minnesota. This company was incorporated by officers and directors of the Chicago and Northwestern, Mr. Keep at the time being the president of that company. Mr. Bordino was the only citizen of the territory in the list of incorporators. The following was submitted to the Legislature of 1870-71, as the company's annual report:

Office of Dakota Central Railway Company,
Yankton, D. T., January 10, 1871.

To the Honorable Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

Gentlemen: In reply to the joint resolution passed by your honorable bodies, requesting all railway companies now organized under the laws of this territory to report to the present ninth session of the Legislature, we herewith submit a full and complete statement of the condition and affairs of the Dakota Central Railway Company:

The following is a copy of the company's certificate of incorporation:

This certificate of incorporation certifies that the following articles of agreement, made and concluded this 25th day of January, A. D. 1870, in the City of Yankton, capital of Dakota Territory, by and between James Keep, Oscar Bidwell, Ezra A. Cook, William Bordino and G. D. Miller;

Witnesseth, That whereas, it is the intention of the above named parties to hereby and herein organize themselves into a legally incorporated railway company, under and by virtue of the provisions of the general incorporation act of Dakota Territory, approved January 6, 1868, entitled "An act to regulate incorporations," under the name and style of the "Dakota Central Railway Company," for the purpose of constructing and operating a line of railroad from the City of Yankton, on the Missouri River, northward up the Valley of the Dakota River, through the counties of Yankton, Jayne, Hutchinson, Buffalo, etc., to an intersection with the Northern Pacific Railroad above the 45th parallel of latitude. Therefore, this corporation, which is hereby and herein formed and established for the purpose of constructing the above line of road named and known as the "Dakota Central Railroad Company," and the said line proposed to be built shall be designated as the "Dakota Central Railroad," and the amount of capital stock necessary to construct and equip said road is hereby declared to be $5,000,000, which shall be divided into shares of $100 each, which shares shall be subscribed for as is provided in section 80 of the aforementioned incorporation law of the territory, work to be completed in ten years.

In accordance with the requirements of section 87 of the incorporation act aforesaid, the incorporators herein named do hereby "establish a place of business on the line of said road," which shall be located in the City of Yankton, at M. K. Armstrong's land office on Second Street; and the same is hereby declared to be the temporary office of the company "Dakota Central Railroad Company" until changed by the board of directors; and at said office of the company the first books for subscription of stock to the Dakota Central Railroad shall be opened to the public on the 28th day of February, 1870.

JAMES KEEP,
OSCAR BIDWELL,
EZRA A. COOK,
WILLIAM BORDINO,
G. D. MILLER.

Here follows the certificate of M. K. Armstrong, notary public, declaring that the above named parties had made an acknowledgment before him of the foregoing articles of incorporation.

The books of subscription were duly opened as above stated on the 28th of February, and $3,000,000 of the capital stock subscribed. On April 1st, the stockholders met and elected the following board of directors, to-wit: D. T. Bramble, A. W. Burrow, M. T. Woolley, William Bordeno, J. M. Stone, Geo. N. Propper, M. K. Armstrong. The directors then elected D. T. Bramble, president; J. M. Stone, vice president; M. T. Woolley, treasurer; M. K. Armstrong, secretary and engineer. The engineer was directed to make a preliminary survey of the line as early as practicable; and in accordance with this order, in the month of June following, a reconnaissance of the proposed line was commenced and prosecuted as far up the valley of the Dakota River as the 44th parallel of north latitude, and a map and report made to the company.

The country traversed was found to be one of the richest agricultural districts in the territory, and almost entirely destitute of timber, except a narrow belt along the banks of the Dakota River. Settlements were found to have advanced about sixty miles above up the Dakota River Valley, and in many places had spread out on the surrounding prairies. Excellent building stone was found along the valley in many places; at old Fort James and at Firesteel Creek the supply was apparently inexhaustible. The building of the road will develop a wonderfully rich region, and the Legislative Assembly was requested to give its encouragement and aid by memorial to Congress for a land grant.

It will be observed that all these railroad enterprises, taking their cue from what had been the earlier practice of the Government, depended for the construction of their lines upon a donation of the public land from the Government.

THE GRAND TRUNK

In 1872 there was general expectation that Congress would extend the favor of a grant of land to the Territory of Dakota to assist in the more rapid settlement of the public lands and the development of the interior of the territory. The Dakota Southern had been quite successful in securing county bonds and was in a fair way of being completed from Sioux City to Yankton, but it was felt the further settlement of the territory would be materially retarded unless transportation lines were speedily extended into the interior. With this object in view and with the expectation of securing a liberal donation of the public land, the organization known as the Grand Trunk Railway Company was formed at Yankton in the winter of 1871-2, and through the efforts of Hon. M. K. Armstrong, then delegate in Congress, a charter was secured from Congress which gave the company right-of-way through the public lands and necessary depot grounds. Its main line was projected from Yankton up the James River Valley to a connection with the Northern Pacific; one of its lateral branches was a line from Yankton to Sioux Falls with a branch from the Vermillion crossing to Canton, to connect with the McGregor and Western; another line extended from Yankton to Springfield, thence up the Missouri; and a survey was made of the main stem and the branches named.

The incorporators of this company were Gov. A. J. Smith, president of the Northern Pacific; Thos. A. Scott, of Pennsylvania, then a great railroad king; Gov. John A. Burbank; Secretary E. S. McCook, W. W. Brookings, M. K. Armstrong, G. W. French, William Pound, and J. R. Hanson.

The Dakota and Northwestern Company had already been merged with the Dakota Southern; but there were two or three companies, less ambitious than the Grand Trunk that had been organized with a view of building lines out from the Missouri River into the interior, and it was apparent that the Grand Trunk would seriously interfere with their plans, which had in view a Government land grant, hence there was considerable antagonism aroused in the territory growing out of this situation. The Yankton, Sioux Falls and Minnesota Railway Company had received subscriptions to its capital stock, and made a preliminary survey of its line. Its incorporators were Wm. H. H. Beadle, George H. Hand, Arthur Linn, John W. Turner, Joel A. Potter, M. K. Armstrong, W. W. Brookings, G. H. Wetmore, James S. Foster, Peter H. Turner, Geo. W. Kingsbury, C. H. McIntyre.

The Yankton & Niobrara Valley Railway was another vigorous organization, planned to extend from Yankton by way of Bon Homme to the Niobrara and thence west on the old projected line of the northern branch of the Union Pacific to a connection with the main trunk at some point east of the Rocky Mountains. Its incorporators were A. J. Faulk, J. Shaw Gregory, J. A. Lewis, J. M. Stone, Joel A. Potter, Wm. H. H. Beadle, Moses K. Armstrong, and Henry E. Gregory.

Realizing the wisdom of quieting all opposition at home among these lesser luminaries in the railway realm of the territory, because of the hurtful effect it would have in Washington where the campaign for a land grant was being energetically waged, the "Great Octopus" as the Grand Trunk was popularly known, at its annual meeting, passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Grand Trunk Railway Company hereby declare that it is now, as it has been heretofore, the intention of this company, to deal fairly with other railway companies over whose proposed lines the Grand Trunk extends, and that at the proper time this company is ready and willing to meet the companies for the purpose of arriving at an amicable settlement of all differences.

Resolved, That for the purpose of meeting other organizations for the object indicated above, this board when it adjourns will adjourn to meet at the office of the company in Yankton, on the 21st of September, at 10 o'clock A. M., and that a meeting of the stockholders be held at the same time and place.

An assessment upon the capital stock sufficient to realize the sum of $10,500, to meet the immediate expenses incident to survey, etc., was ordered to be paid by the 31st of October. John A. Burbank, Geo. W. French, J. R. Hanson, M. K. Armstrong, W. W. Brookings, Wm. Pound, and W. L. Woods were elected directors. Burbank was elected president; Armstrong, vice president; McCook, secretary; and Hanson, treasurer.

The company, though well supported in Congress in its efforts to secure a land grant was unable to break through the opposition in the House where the sentiment was decidedly hostile, and the Grand Trunk Company, which appears to have based its success entirely on the securing of this bonus was obliged to relinquish its project.

The assuring phraseology of these resolutions was presumed to have been justified from the personal connection of Governor Burbank who was president of the company, and had assisted by his influence in securing the charter from Congress. It was believed that he had been able to break down the opposition of Congress to land grants for Dakota railroads, and had assurances of support for such a grant from those who possessed the authority to give it. The governor's success in securing the early ratification and legalizing of the Dakota Southern Railroad and Yankton County bonds, formed the principal ground for the confidence felt in his ability to successfully prosecute a campaign for a land grant for his favorite railway.

The generous proposition for cooperation made in the first resolution will serve to show the magnanimous and anti-monopolistic disposition of Dakota's early railway kings. About the time this action was taken, the railway fever was at its height for a short season; leading railroad men East were known to be interested in some of the Dakota projects; and the general expectation apparently was that the territory was to be gridironed with railways in advance of settlement, even the welcome toot of the locomotive could be heard by people whose ears were close to the ground, and that Governor Burbank, Chief Justice French, and others, who could get close to the confidence of prominent congressmen were in charge of affairs.

A number of railroad lines were surveyed in Dakota Territory during the years from 1865 to 1869 but none of them went any farther than this preliminary work except the Dakota and Northwestern projected from Sioux City to Yankton. The cause of this activity in railroad projects may be found in the fact that Congress had up to 1868 been disposed to be liberal in granting land subsidies to the railroad organizations in the West, and our enterprising people proposed to get a donation to assist in the construction of several lines, one already much needed, and others that the settlement of the prairies and the production of grain and live stock would create a demand for at an early day. But unfortunately for our railway enterprises, Congress had, about this time, changed its policy and was averse to any more railway land grants. There were no more given. The Dakota and Northwestern had been carefully surveyed from Sioux City to Yankton by a competent engineer, and efforts were being made with good prospects of success in securing its construction, when in the winter of 1870-71 a new company was formed called the Dakota Southern, to build a line from Yankton to the Big Sioux River, leaving the point of crossing the Big Sioux unnamed, but LeMars was the objective point. This aroused a favorable sentiment in Sioux City for the Dakota and Northwestern, for a line to LeMars connecting with the Illinois Central would have been a serious blow to the commercial interests of Sioux City. The title of the new LeMars line was the Dakota Southern Railway Company, and it was almost unanimously backed by the Yankton people. After considerable negotiation the two lines were merged, Sioux City was agreed upon as the eastern terminal, the Dakota Southern took over the Dakota & Northwestern, and its surveyed line and franchise, and the Dakota Southern line was built, reaching Yankton in the winter of 1872-3. Wicker, Meckling & Company of Chicago, were the builders, and Yankton County voted $200,000 in bonds to aid its construction.

The only land grants given to aid the building of railroads in Dakota Territory was the munificent donation to the Northern Pacific, and the grant made, either by the State of Minnesota or by act of Congress to the Winona & St. Peter Railway Company of Minnesota, practically the same as the Chicago and Northwestern. Its line entered Dakota at Gary, in Deuel County, in 1871, and continued west to Lake Kampeska, near where the City of Watertown was built many years later. There was no demand for the railroad at the time, 1872, as the country was practically unsettled along its entire line, and the company did not equip and operate it till 1878; but the land grant was valuable and the road was built to secure it.

THE DAKOTA SOUTHERN RAILROAD

The special charter given to the Dakota & Northwestern Railway Company in 1867 was the last of the special charters granted by the Territorial Legislature, Congress having passed an act in 1868, taking from the territories that authority. The Dakota & Northwestern charter was passed and approved January 11, 1867. It was a very liberal charter, and upon reflection, the succeeding Legislature, deeming it too liberal, passed a bill to amend the charter, which was vetoed by the governor. The action of the Legislature had, however, tended to create an injurious impression of the company in portions of the territory; but it continued its organization, and as will be seen by its report made to the Legislature in 1871, had transferred its franchise to an Iowa company which had fixed upon Sioux City as its eastern terminus, and the new company had made a profile survey of the line, located it from Sioux City to Yankton; and as required by its charter had graded one mile of its roadbed in Union County in the year 1869, at a cost of $1,800. At this time, 1867, and for a few years later, Dakotans felt sanguine that Congress would be prevailed upon to make a donation of public lands to the territory to aid in building its first railways, and the Dakota & Northwestern and its successor, in Iowa, depended altogether upon such a grant for the success of their enterprise. There was a growing hostility in Congress to any further land grants to railroads, and as the years passed the prospect of Dakota railways receiving aid from that quarter grew more hopeless under repeated discouragement and defeat; while the transfer of the franchise of the Dakota & Northwestern to the Iowa company had created considerable prejudice against that corporation within the territory, and it was found difficult to combine the leading interests of a local nature in its favor. The Dakota & Northwestern Company, however, maintained its home organization and title, and held its annual meeting (which was its last) at Yankton, January 2, 1871, and elected its board of directors, to-wit: J. P. Kiddler, Clay County; George Stickney, Union County; W. A. Burleigh, William Tripp, J. B. S. Todd, W. P. Lyman, and M. K. Armstrong, Yankton County. This board elected J. P. Kidder, president; William Tripp, vice president; J. B. S. Todd, vice president; M. K. Armstrong, secretary; Nelson Miner, attorney; and George Stickney, chief engineer.

On the 17th of March following this annual meeting a number of citizens of Yankton met and organized a railway company under the title of the Dakota Southern Railway Company, and filed articles of incorporation at the same time. The incorporators were: J. M. Stone, J. Shaw Gregory, W. W. Brookings, J. R. Hanson, W. A. Burleigh, M. K. Armstrong, Charles F. Picotte, A. W. Burrows, E. D. Barker, S. V. Clevenger, A. P. Hammon, C. F. Harkins, E. P. Wilcox, G. W. Kingsbury, James S. Foster, C. E. Bramble, A. J. Faulk, J. B. S. Todd, Newton Edmunds, D. T. Bramble, C. H. McIntyre, J. R. Sanborn, Charles Eisman, F. J. Dewitt, G. C. Moody, W. N. Collamer, B. R. McIntyre, Joel A. Potter, G. H. Wetmore, S. S. Buckwalter and M. U. Hoyt.

On the 25th of March following public notice was given of the opening of stock subscription books, as follows:

Notice is hereby given that pursuant to the time fixed in the articles of incorporation of the Dakota Southern Railway Company, and in accordance with a resolution of the incorporators thereof, books for subscription to the capital stock of said railroad company, will be opened at the office of said company, being J. R. Hanson's Land Office on Capital Street, in Yankton on the 25th, 26th, 27th, 28th and 29th days of April, A. D. 1871; at Vermillion on the 3d, 4th, 5th and 6th days of May, A. D. 1871; at Elk Point on the 9th, 10th and 11th days of May, 1871.

YANKTON TO LEMARS

The articles of incorporation did not definitely fix the eastern terminus of the road, but left it to be located at any point between the mouth of the Big Sioux River and Rock River, Iowa, a tributary of the Big Sioux, which empties into the latter near the north line of Union County. This was done in order that the company might be free to locate the line to a connection with LeMars, or go to Sioux City, as might be determined later. LeMars was a prominent factor in the enterprise, and the following copy of a letter from the vice president of the Illinois Central Railroad Company shows the favorable sentiment of that organization toward the LeMars project in the earliest days of the enterprise:

Chicago, Ill., March 29, 1871

W. W. Brookings, Esq., Yankton, D. T.:

Dear Sir: I have received your favor of the 25th inst., addressed to Mr. Douglas, and am pleased to see that you are determined to help yourselves to a railway connection. By locating your line to LeMars you reduce your distance between Chicago and St. Paul and Yankton, some twenty-five miles under the distance via Sioux City, and by that location you would probably secure from this company, by a drawback on business from your line, material aid to meet your interest.

In the event you do not find a practicable route in a direct line between LeMars and the Big Sioux River, you may have to locate to Sioux City. At that point you would get the advantage of a direct line to Omaha and Kansas City, as well as the southwestern route to Chicago. I will lay this subject before our board, and be prepared at some future time to confer further with you as to the extent and manner in which our company can assist you.

With your road built to LeMars we could afford to do more in your aid than if built to Sioux City where the business would be somewhat divided.

Very truly yours,

JOHN NEWELL, V. P.

The above letter was read at a railroad meeting held in Yankton early in April, 1871.

At the time prescribed in the foregoing notice, the books of subscription to the capital stock of the company were opened at Yankton, and $181,000 of the one million capital stock subscribed. These stockholders met at the company's office in Yankton, June 3d, following, and elected a board of directors composed as follows: J. R. Hanson, N. Edmunds, G. H. Wetmore, W. A. Burleigh, W. W.

Brookings, J. M. Stone, and M. K. Armstrong; and on the 5th following the organization was completed by the election, by the directors, of James M. Stone, president; Newton Edmunds, vice president; G. H. Wetmore, treasurer and superintendent; J. R. Hanson, secretary; M. K. Armstrong, chief engineer.

During the latter part of June, Superintendent Wetmore and Chief Engineer Armstrong made a trip along the proposed line from Yankton to Richland, on the Big Sioux River, Armstrong taking a number of observations with his surveying instruments. These gentlemen found a route that was unobjectionable, crossing four streams that would need bridges. The distance from Yankton to the Big Sioux at the crossing point was found to be forty-one miles. For a natural railroad bed of easy grades, it seemed to have been formed by nature. It will be observed from this reconnaissance survey that the Yankton parties at that time were working with the view of building the Dakota Southern to LeMars to a connection with the powerful Illinois Central and leave Sioux City out of consideration.

The business men of LeMars, Iowa, organized the LeMars & Sioux River Railroad Company, in April, 1871, and took steps for the active promotion of their enterprise, which their company declared to be "the construction of a railroad from LeMars west to some point on the Big Sioux River to connect with the Dakota Southern projected from Yankton to the Big Sioux." The officers of the LeMars company were B. O. Foster, president; John C. Wellover, secretary; and P. Kent, treasurer. The capital stock was fixed at $1,000,000. On the 6th of May following a meeting was held at that place, when the president of the company was authorized to appoint a chief engineer and cause suitable surveys to be made of the contemplated route. John C. Flint was appointed right-of-way agent of the company and was authorized to secure the right-of-way as rapidly as the surveys indicated the route, and the agent was also authorized to solicit township aid on the line of the road. An installment of 1 per cent on the capital stock of the company was called payable on or before July 1st.

The citizens of LeMars were almost unanimous in support of the project, and willing to go to the extent of their financial ability to construct that portion of the line east of the Big Sioux. Representatives from LeMars, Messrs. J. C. Flint and B. O. Foster, visited Yankton and consulted with the Dakota Southern officials, and the parties agreed fully upon the importance of the line in promoting the prosperity of their respective localities, and it was agreed upon informally that the road should be constructed from Yankton to LeMars at the earliest day practicable. But contrary to the encouraging tone of the vice president's letter, already given, this project was not encouraged by the Illinois Central Company, which at that time was operating the Dubuque & Pacific to LeMars over leased property, and did not appear to look upon the Yankton extension as a move in their interest.

The Dakota Southern Company was the last one of the projected lines that had been organized at the capital of Dakota, beginning in 1867, nearly all of them having in view a terminus on the Missouri River at some point above Sioux City, and owing to its excellent natural steamboat landing and other advantages, Yankton appeared to be that favored point. In addition to the corporations formed within the territory, the McGregor & Western through Northern Iowa; the Southern Minnesota; the Yankton & Columbus, and the Dakota & Northwestern, were all projected toward the capital of the territory.

Sioux City received its first railroad gratis under the Union Pacific Railroad grant, from Missouri Valley, in 1867, and that point enjoyed much prosperity as a consequence of being the terminus, and found that its Dakota trade was one of the principal factors in contributing to its business growth; its influence was not therefore friendly to an extension of the railway into the territory; but it had observed the growing sentiment in favor of a road from LeMars through to Yankton, and rightly divining that such a line, backed by the Illinois Central, then the leading railroad corporation in the west, and already at LeMars, would prove exceedingly detrimental to their business interests. As the LeMars connection was much preferred to Sioux City by the Yankton people, and there appeared to be, at that time, at least, an equal chance of securing the cooperation of the Illinois Central and the certainty of the unanimous and enthusiastic support of LeMars as well as the moral support of the settlers in the northern portion of Union County, peopled at the time, however, very sparsely; the Sioux City opposition to an extension from that place underwent a surprising modification, and in place of opposing, the influences there set to work, through their railroad interests, including the Sioux City & Pacific, to dissuade the Illinois Central from cooperating with LeMars. The Sioux City & Pacific was vitally interested in the matter, perceiving that the LeMars line would be a material and permanent detriment to its traffic. The result of this combination of influences coupled with Yankton's feverish haste to secure railway facilities as early as possible, and a further factor not remotely connected which was found in Yankton's dependence on the friendship of the leading men in both Clay and Union counties in its political as well as railroad ambitions, finally forced the Dakota Southern to unite at the Big Sioux River with a new project called the Sioux City & Pembina, which was designed to build from Sioux City to the Big Sioux River and there to unite with the Dakota Southern, and then to continue up the Sioux and furnish a railway to Canton and Sioux Falls and Pembina.

While these preliminary movements were in progress and the indications were encouraging, nothing definite had been accomplished toward securing the funds to build and equip the road. Considerable commotion had been excited, but that which had been actually accomplished was about all on paper.

While much encouragement had been given by Nebraska parties who wanted a line from Columbus on the Union Pacific to Yankton, also by the Chicago & Milwaukee Company which now owned the line west from McGregor, Iowa, and one or more construction companies had visited the territory, by their representatives, and looked the ground over, no arrangements had been made or seemed probable of being made on any basis that did not include a land grant or a substantial money bonus. It would have been an impossibility to have raised a bonus by private subscription of sufficient amount to have attracted the favorable attention of railway builders, and Congress was averse to making a grant of land to aid an enterprise in the southern part of the territory, though a magnificent donation had been made to the Northern Pacific in the northern portion; but that was looked upon as a national highway. There seemed to be but one way by which an attractive bonus could be raised and this was by an issue of territorial or county bonds; but here again there was no law under which such a donation could be voted and made or that would permit the issue of bonds, or validate them if issued. The Legislature had adjourned when this phase of the question came to be seriously considered and would not meet again for nearly two years.

DAKOTA LEGISLATURE IN EXTRA SESSION

Committees were again sent out to Chicago and other points to interview railway builders. As a rule these returned with tentative propositions to build and equip a road if sufficient inducement was given. This meant in every instance a bonus far beyond the resources of the Dakota Southern or any other local company; though one or two parties were found who suggested that they might favorably consider a proposition to accept territorial or county bonds as a bonus. This was the nearest to a definite proposition that could be obtained; but under what authority could the territory or any county issue a valid bond? The Legislature only could give such authority, and as this promised the only way to secure the sinews of railway construction, it was determined, in a council of the Dakota railroad "magnates," to prevail upon the governor to call an extra session of the Legislature for the purpose of enacting the necessary law. This step was decided upon with many misgivings as to the authority of the governor to convocate the Legislature in extra session. The organic act was appealed to by many who had never before had occasion to examine it. It was found to contain no provision for the exercise of such a power, nor was there any provision prohibiting it, which was a grain of comfort; and therefore, under all the circumstances it was deemed best to make the effort. Governor Burbank was absent from the territory and had been for a number of weeks, and his early return was not expected. Secretary Batchelder, who was acting governor, was therefore appealed to, and was persuaded with little difficulty to reconvene the legislative body, though he was aware that he had no funds to pay the expenses of an extra session. It was decided, however, to "pass around the hat" to defray this item. Accordingly we find the following proclamation from his excellency, the acting governor, issued as per date given:

Yankton, D. T., March 30, 1871.

His Excellency, George A. Batchelder, Secretary and Acting Governor of Dakota Territory:

Sir: We, the undersigned, a committee appointed for the purpose at a meeting of the citizens of Yankton and vicinity would especially request that you call an extra session of the Legislature of the territory at an early day, for the purpose of considering the propriety of passing an act to authorize the people of the several counties to issue bonds to aid in the construction of railroads and for other purposes.

Signed by Newton Edmunds, S. L. Spink, J. M. Stone, W. W. Brookings, J. Shaw Gregory, Geo. W. Kingsbury, committee.

Readily responding to the request of these petitioners, Acting Governor Batchelder issued a proclamation convening the Legislature in words following:

Whereas, an emergency having arisen which, in my opinion, demands the consideration of the Legislature of this territory; and

Whereas, The above request of a committee of citizens meets the expressed wishes of the people of this territory that some immediate action shall be taken to provide the territory with railroad facilities and communication—

Now, therefore, the Legislative Assembly of the territory will assemble at the Capital Halls, Yankton, on Tuesday, the 18th day of April, 1871, at 12 o'clock, noon, to consider what legislation, if any, is necessary on this subject.

GEO. A. BATCHELDER,
Secretary and Acting Governor, Dakota Territory.

In obedience to this proclamation, the Legislative Assembly convened on the said Tuesday, at 12 o'clock noon, April 18, 1871, Governor Burbank in the meantime having returned. The following named members of each House were present:

COUNCIL MEMBERS

First District, Union, Lincoln, Minnehaha and Brookings counties—J. C. Kennedy, Emory Morris and W. M. Cuppett. Second District, Clay County—J. W. Turner, Nelson Miner, Silas W. Kidder. Third District, Yankton County—James M. Stone, C. H. McIntyre, Jacob Brauch. Fourth District, Bon Homme County—Hugh Fraley.

HOUSE MEMBERS

Minnehaha County—Charles Allen, O. B. Iverson. Lincoln County—H. A. Jerauld. Union County—S. L. Parker, S. C. Sinclair. Clay County—F. J. Cross, A. J. Mills, R. Mostow, Ames F. Shaw, Philip Sherman. Yankton County—George H. Hand, A. P. Hammond, Eph. Miner, N. Learned, Ole Sampson. Pembina County—John Hancock.

The presiding officers and clerks were the same as those who had served in such capacities at the last regular session. After the two Houses had disposed of the necessary preliminary exercises, the following message was received from the governor:

Gentlemen of the Council and House of Representatives.

You have assembled in extra session under the proclamation of the honorable secretary, and at the time acting governor of the territory, dated the 30th of March. On my return to the territory on the 1st instant, I found questions raised in regard to the legality of the proposed session, and with the view of obtaining the opinion of the proper authority of the United States, I addressed a letter to the attorney general on the 3d instant, enclosing a copy of the proclamation and reciting the time of holding and the length of the regular session recently closed; and asking whether or not authority existed for holding the special session as proposed. In response to this, I have this day received the following telegram:

April 18, 1871; by Telegraph from Washington.

To John A. Burbank, Governor of Dakota, Yankton, D. T.:

The attorney general is of opinion that the special session is authorized.

Signed, HAMILTON FISH, Secretary of State.

The object for which the special session is called is set forth in the proclamation. Believing that, as you are fresh from your constituents, and have not only the ability but the disposition to fully represent their wishes in regard to the matter proposed, I forbear making any recommendation on the subject, beyond the suggestion that you should, while you consider the wants of the territory, also remember that the ability of our constituents to bear heavy burdens is at this time by no means great, and that it would be a great misfortune to check or hamper our present vigorous growth by assuming responsibilities which may not readily be met. In any event, I trust no attempt will be made to bind the residents of the territory to any particular scheme for aiding private corporations, without giving them an opportunity to be heard directly upon the question.

JOHN A. BURBANK, GOVERNOR.

It will not be claimed that the purpose of this extra session was unanimously approved by the voters of the territory. There was quite a numerous element in Union and Clay counties opposed to any issue of bonds to aid railroads. At Elk Point, Union County, a well attended public meeting was held on the 8th of April, at which Emory Morris participated. D. M. Mills was chairman, and J. A. Wallace, secretary. After a long discussion of the object of the extra session, a committee composed of George Stickney, J. A. Wallace, H. W. McNiel, Cyrell Montague, and William Ohmstead reported the following resolution which was adopted without a dissenting vote:

Resolved, That the members of the Legislature from Union County be and are hereby instructed to oppose with all their influence and votes all acts and measures which may be brought forward in the extra session of the Legislature to be convened on the 15th instant, tending in any wise to induce the County of Union to lend aid in its corporate capacity for the construction of any railroad whatever.

Notwithstanding this declaration there was a very strong financial element at Elk Point that was willing to support an issue of bonds. A numerous body of Clay County people were not in favor of issuing bonds but were willing to help remove all lawful obstacles that would hinder other counties from using their corporate credit. It was apparent that the farming element and some politicians opposed the issue of bonds to aid in obtaining a railroad, while the inhabitants of the towns were in favor of it. A similar sentiment was prevalent in Yankton County as the sequel proved. After deliberating for three days the extra session of the Legislature passed a bill entitled:

An act to enable organized counties and townships to vote aid to any railroad, and to provide for the payment of the same, which was approved by the governor, April 21, 1871. Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota

Section 1. Whenever one hundred of the qualified voters, or a number equal to one-third of the voters, as indicated by the last general election, of any county or township in this territory, shall petition in writing, the board of county commissioners of such county, or the board of county commissioners of any county in which such township or townships may lie, to submit to the qualified voters of such county or township, a proposition to extend aid, either by donation, loan of credit, or subscription to capital stock of said railroad company, in the name of such county or township, to any railroad proposed to be constructed into or through such county or township, and shall in such petition designate the route of company and the amount and kind of aid proposed to be given or extended, and the mode and terms of payment of the same, together with the conditions of such aid, or shall lay it as the duty of the county commissioners to cause an election to be held of the qualified voters of such county or townships, to determine whether such aid shall be given or extended.

Sec. 2. The board of county commissioners shall make an order for the holding of the election contemplated in the preceding section, and specify the amount of bonds proposed to be issued either as a donation or in payment or subscription to the capital stock of such railroad company, the mode and terms of payment, the interest, if any; the extent of time said bonds shall run, the name of the railroad company, and all conditions pertaining to such proposed aid as may be named in such petition, the day of election, and shall also prescribe the form of the ballots to be used at such election for and against such aid; provided, that in case such bonds are taken in exchange for capital stock in such railroad, such bonds shall be taken at par, nor shall any such bonds be negotiated at less than 90 cents on the dollar either by such townships or counties, or by the said railroad companies; provided, further, that such bonds shall not be issued by the county commissioners or delivered to such railroad companies until said railroad is completed and in running order through said such county or township voting aid as aforesaid, or such assurances given that such railroad will be so completed as the county or township voting aid shall require; provided, the bonds shall not be given to any railroad company or individuals except in payment for the grading, tying, building or other necessary work for such railroad and then such an amount may be given as will cover the cost of the work performed, the time of holding the next general election, after work performed.

Sec. 3. If the time of holding the next general election, after the date of making the order in the last section provided, shall not be more than sixty days, the said election provided for in the two preceding sections shall be held on the day of said next general election, and notice shall thereof be given and the election held, and returns thereof made, and the result ascertained and proclaimed as provided by law for general elections.

Sec. 4. If the next general election is more than sixty days from the reception of such petition, then the board of county commissioners shall order a special election to be held within forty days, and make an order for the same, specifying in the order the preceding sections, and also specifying in the order how notice shall be given, which shall be by publication in some newspaper, if there be one published in the county or township, and also by a copy of the order posted up in three public places in each election precinct in the county or township twenty days before said election. In all other respects the said election shall be held, the returns thereof made, and the result ascertained and proclaimed as provided by law for general elections. And it shall be the duty of the clerk of the board of county commissioners, upon the reception of such petition, to call a special meeting of said board within five days.

Sec. 5. If the majority of electors voting at such election vote for the issue of bonds, the board of county commissioners shall cause such bonds as may be required by the terms of said vote, to be issued and delivered in accordance with section second of this act, in the name of such county or township, to be signed by the chairman of the board of county commissioners and attested by the register of deeds under the seal of the county.

Sec. 6. Whenever any bonds shall be issued in pursuance of the foregoing provisions, it shall be the duty of the board of county commissioners annually to proceed to levy and collect a tax on all the taxable property in the county or township voting such tax, sufficient to pay the interest on said bonds; provided, that not more than 2 per cent of the assessed valuation of the property in any county or township, shall be raised in any one year under the provisions of this law, either for the payment of interest or bonds.

Sec. 7. Said bonds shall not be made payable in less than ten years, neither shall they run more than twenty years, and after the expiration of five years from the date of issue, a sinking fund shall be provided which will redeem said bonds at maturity.

Sec. 8. Such tax as is provided in the foregoing section shall be collected in cash or the coupons of such bonds which may be due and such tax shall be collected as county taxes are collected, and paid out by the treasurer on presentation of the coupons or bonds when due, and all county officers acting under the provisions of this act, shall be entitled to the same fees as are allowed by law for similar services, and liable to the same fines and penalties for noncompliance. Before the treasurer, or any officer now, or who may be hereafter, authorized by this act, shall proceed to collect the taxes levied under this act or any portion thereof, he shall give a bond to the county commissioners in double the amount to be collected, for the faithful discharge of his duties; and any officer loaning, using, or failing to pay over any portion of the money collected under the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary not less than three and not more than ten years.

Sec. 9. If any county or township tax shall be assessed and collected from any railroad which may have been built in whole or in any part in any town or county which may have subscribed stock as provided in the foregoing sections, all such county or township tax arising from said railroad within said county or township, shall be set apart and held by the treasurer for the benefit of such county or township, and applied to the payment of the interest and principal of said bonds.

Sec. 10. Whenever any sum of the foregoing taxes, collected for interest or sinking fund, shall remain in the hands of the treasurer after paying all the interest due, if any, the board of county commissioners shall cause the treasurer to buy up the bonds at their market value, not exceeding par.

Sec. 11. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval by the governor.

JOHN A. BURBANK, Governor.

Approved, April 21, 1871.

This act had been drawn by a committee consisting of Judge W. W. Brookings, Bartlett Tripp, S. L. Spink, Judge Ara Bartlett, Col. G. C. Moody and Geo. P. Waldron, who had been appointed for that purpose at a railroad meeting held in Yankton prior to the convening of the extra session.

EXTRA SESSION NOT AUTHORIZED

Something in the nature of consternation was created on the fourth day of this extra session by the reception of a corrected telegram, which read:

Washington, D. C., April 18, 1871.

John A. Burbank, Governor of Dakota:

The attorney general is of opinion that the extra session is unauthorized.

HAMILTON FISH, Secretary of State.

The first two letters of the word "unauthorized" had been omitted in the first dispatch. The Legislature had finished its business, however, passed a railroad subsidy enabling act, and was on the point of final adjournment when this corrected message came. It was at first conjectured that the first dispatch had been "doctored," after it reached Yankton, and some mild indignation was expressed by some of the outside members based on ex parte evidence supported largely by suspicion only. It was well known that the railroad sentiment at Yankton was so earnest and general that a community less controlled by the moral code might have been unable to resist the temptation to behead the vital syllable in the attorney general's opinion. It may have been Yankton's proverbial good character that postponed the crystallization of an unfavorable public opinion, until the atrocity could be investigated. This the telegraph people set about doing, and were able to trace the first dispatch from Washington to Omaha, as it had been sent by the secretary of state, Fish. The next telegraph station after leaving Omaha was Missouri Valley, and here the message appeared shorn of its brief negative syllable. The files of that office disclosed that it was received "authorized." Either Omaha omitted that important prefix, or it went astray in the course of transmission. What had been done, however, could not then be undone. The railroad bill had been passed, and after a full and free ventilation of legislative opinion, in which the unknown parties to the outrage were subjected to a severe reprimand, while some consolation was derived from knowing that the guilty party was not a Dakotan, there was a return to calmness and deliberation, and it was finally concluded to pass a memorial to Congress requesting that body to legalize the unauthorized session and its proceedings, which it was presumed Congress would readily do when the facts stated in the memorial were laid before that body.

Leaving the work of the extra session in this condition, the unauthorized body adjourned late in the evening of Friday, the 21st, which occasion was mildly and good naturedly celebrated. The Yankton legislators and citizens joined with the visiting members in deploring the outrage committed by the unknown telegraph operator, but there was so little body to their expressions of regret, that they were accused of shedding "crocodile tears."

The promoters of the railway were now supplied with a law of questionable legality under which an election could be held and county or township bonds voted to aid in the building of a road; but notwithstanding this handicap of illegality, it was determined by the Dakota Southern Company to make an effort to secure the construction of the road with such aid as might be voted and with the probable favorable action of Congress in curing, by a special enactment, the disabilities of the territorial law. Influences had already been set at work to induce Congress to take such action, with the promise of a favorable result. In the meantime a committee consisting of Dr. W. A. Burleigh and Major Jas. M. Stone was dispatched to eastern railroad centers for the purpose of enlisting capital in the enterprise, which was looked upon at home as an investment that promised profitable returns independent of any aid granted in county bonds. This committee visited Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, Boston and Washington, interviewed a number of substantial railway building companies, and returned to Yankton early in August following. A public meeting was then held and a report made which stated that parties had been found who would build and operate the road, but demanded a substantial subsidy from the territory in the shape of county bonds, and the report advised the holding of an election under the new law passed by the unauthorized special session of the Legislature, and the voting of $200,000 of Yankton County bonds, to be used, if necessary, to secure the early construction of the road.

Judge Brookings subsequently stated that he was in favor of making the donation of bonds $150,000, and was satisfied the same results could have been secured, but he was overruled.

The fact that the territorial law was passed under circumstances that rendered its legality doubtful was not considered a fatal objection, it being confidently expected that Congress, at the approaching session, would enact a law validating the railroad bond bill. It was also confidently expected that both Clay and Union counties would take action in line with Yankton County.

VOTING COUNTY BONDS

A committee was selected at this meeting to prepare, circulate and present a petition to the Board of Commissioners of Yankton County requesting that body to call an election, as the law provided, for the purpose of voting upon the proposition to issue the $200,000 of county bonds. The petition was duly prepared and signed by the following named citizens:

In accordance with the petition the county commissioners met on the 7th day of August, and issued a call for a special election, as follows:

Whereas, more than sixty days intervenes between the filing of the petition and the next general election; now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the said board of commissioners of Yankton County, that a special election shall be, and is hereby ordered, to be held in said Yankton County, on Saturday, the 2d day of September, A. D. 1871, at which the question of donating aid to the said Dakota Southern Railroad Company to the amount of $200,000 in the bonds of said Yankton County, to run twenty years, bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, said interest to be paid semi-annually in the City of New York, and the said principal also payable in the City of New York. Said bonds shall not be given or donated to said railroad company, except in payment for the grading, tying, building, or other necessary work, on the said railroad, to be built by the said company; and that said bonds shall only be given or donated in payment for work actually performed on said railroad, and shall in no case be delivered faster than work on said railroad progresses; and provided that said bonds shall not be issued by the said county commissioners or delivered to said railroad company until said railroad is completed and in running order to and within the present limits of the City of Yankton, or such assurances (security) given that said railroad will be so completed as said Yankton County shall require.

Resolved, That the ballots at such special election shall have printed or written thereon—"Aid to the Dakota Southern Railroad Company, Yes" or "Aid to the Dakota Southern Railroad Company, No;" and the voting places for such election shall be the same as designated for the general election to be held in October, and the judges for such general election shall act as judges of the special election hereby ordered.

At the election, which was duly held as ordered, there was not a full vote, the total number cast being 668, while the vote of the county was very close to 1,000. The vote at the various precincts was as follows:

No.	Name	Yes	No
1.	Haggins's Bend	1	32
2.	Bagstad's	23	26
3.	Yankton	463	59
4.	Zeiner & Zinc	52	4
5.	Hughes	3	5
Total		542	126

The vote indicates that in the rural precincts there was a hostility to a bond subsidy. The farmers, though favoring the road which would greatly benefit them, held that the city would reap the largest benefit from it and ought to foot the bills. While this disposition was quite general among the rural populations, it was clearly apparent that they realized the advantages that would accrue as a result of success in bringing railway facilities to them. They thereafter disclosed greater energy in their farming operations, doubled their cultivated area, opened up and improved new roadways, improved their farm homes and buildings, established more schools, and manifested a most commendable public spirit in many ways. It must have been that they had been convinced that the railways would come just as certainly and as early without their assistance, therefore why should they extend donations?

CONTRACT TO BUILD THE DAKOTA SOUTHERN

The next step of prime importance was to find some company of railway builders who would build the road for the bonds. How would bonds issued with such a questionable paternity look to the unsympathetic worldly-minded people who made a business of constructing railways, when asked to receive them in exchange for a million dollar railway? This was considered more difficult of solution than any problem that had yet been confronted and disentangled, but it was not so serious as to deter the sanguine spirits that controlled the Dakota Southern Company from making a most determined effort and another embassy was sent forth for the purpose of enlisting the cooperation of some parties who would be willing to build and operate the railroad in consideration of the county bonds voted to the Dakota Southern corporation by Yankton County.

In August, 1871, Mr. Harry Hargis, of Chicago, visited Yankton, on a pleasure trip. He was one of the pioneer settlers of the Dakota country, employed for years by Major Gregory as clerk of the old Ponca Agency, and also at Yankton, and Gregory was now one of the incorporators of the Dakota Southern. Hargis was a good business man, and had been requested by a firm of railroad builders in Chicago, Messrs. Wicker, Meckling & Company, with whom he had long been acquainted, to inquire into the condition of our railroad affairs, and the sentiment of the people; and being well informed regarding the country through which the proposed road would pass, he was able to give a favorable report on his return to Chicago.

Mr. Hargis was followed, late in the same month, September, by Milton Weston, representing the firm of Wicker, Meckling & Co., who came prepared to make a preliminary agreement with the Dakota Southern Company, to build the road. Owing to the lack of certain data connected with the survey of the line, no agreement was reached, and the negotiations were adjourned to be resumed at Chicago a week later, to which point the Dakota Southern directors repaired, and shortly after during the early days of October, John Newell, president of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and Mr. Tilton, a director, reached Yankton for the purpose of investigating the situation and the Dakota Southern directors returned with them. This party made a reconnaissance survey of the country west into Bon Homme county, piloted by Dr. Burleigh; and a visit was then made to Sioux City, where a meeting was held at which, in addition to the Illinois Central officials and those of the Dakota Southern, there were present Horace Williams, of the Sioux City & Pacific, and W. W. Walker, of the Sioux City & Pembina. At this meeting the proposition appears to have been first introduced to build the road from Yankton to Sioux City and abandon the LeMars line. But no definite agreement was made; there was, however, a harmonious understanding among the railroad interests there represented, favorable to the early construction of the Dakota Southern road—an understanding that included the promise of the companies to make advantageous traffic arrangements with the proposed new highway.

About this time, October 7th-8th, occurred the great Chicago fire, an event so disastrous that for the time being it paralyzed all branches of business, and especially railroad building. It was feared that its effects would be so serious as to cause a breaking off of negotiations for the construction of the Dakota Southern, but this did not follow, though they were delayed, and the beginning of actual work on the line, for which Dakotans were impatient, was postponed.

However, an arrangement for the construction of the line was concluded, and articles of agreement were entered into between the Dakota Southern Railroad Company and Wicker, Meckling & Co., on Tuesday, October 24, 1871, and are here appended:

1st. The parties to this contract are J. M. Stone, W. W. Brookings, D. T. Bramble, J. R. Hanson, Geo. H. Wetmore, W. A. Burleigh and M. K. Armstrong, directors of the Dakota Southern Railroad Company, of the first part, and J. H. Wicker, C. G. Wicker, J. S. Meckling and Milton Weston, of Chicago, as construction company, parties of the second part.

2d. The parties of the second part contract to build, construct and equip, for the Dakota Southern Railroad Company, a railroad from the City of Yankton, Dakota Territory, to Sioux City or LeMars, Iowa, as the said construction company shall select. All the grading and bridging of the road through Yankton County to be completed and ready for the iron before the 15th day of May, 1872, and the whole road to be completed and the cars running to the City of Yankton by the last day of December, 1872, which road, when completed, shall be in all respects, equal to any newly constructed road in the West.

3d. In consideration of the foregoing, the directors of the Dakota Southern Railroad Company agree to procure the right of way for said road through Yankton County free of cost to said construction company; also all necessary depot grounds and lands for side tracks, turnouts and connections with the steamboats and Government warehouses on the levee in the City of Yankton.

4th. The Dakota Southern Railroad Company further agree to immediately pass over to the said construction company, one-half of all the capital stock of said railroad company, amounting to $750,000, and to give to said Wicker, Meckling & Co., the right to elect three of the seven directors constituting the board of said Dakota Southern Railroad Company.

5th. The directors of the Dakota Southern Railroad Company further agree that the $200,000 in bonds voted by Yankton County to said railroad company, and all further county and township bonds that may hereafter be voted to the company along the line of said road, shall be issued at the earliest moment compatible with law, and deposited with the president of the Manufacturers National Bank, of Chicago, who shall act as trustee of such fund, and shall pay out the same only upon the certificate of the chief engineer, and approved by the executive board of the Dakota Southern Railroad Company, to be used for construction purposes and purchase of material only.

6th. The Dakota Southern Railroad Company further agree to deliver to the construction company aforesaid, the first mortgage bond upon the Dakota Southern Railroad, in amount not exceeding twenty thousand dollars per mile, bearing 8 per cent semi-annual interest, and running not less than twenty years, whenever the process of construction shall require.

7th. The active management of all matters pertaining to the constructing shall be under the control of and superintendence of the constructing party aforesaid, and all donations of whatever character which may be subscribed or obtained for the benefit of said road, shall be passed over to the hands of said construction company.

8th. It is further and finally agreed that during the construction of said road, the books of the Dakota Southern Railroad Company shall be open at all times to the inspection of each member of the construction company aforesaid.

The agreement was regarded as extremely liberal on the part of the Dakota Southern Company, but inasmuch as it seemed to give assurance of the early construction of the long-desired commercial highway that was to connect the capital of Dakota with the outside world, and bring to Yankton the fleets of steamboats that were then making Sioux City their base of operations, there was no unfriendly voice raised against it.

On the 1st of November the stockholders of the Dakota Southern representing about one hundred and eighty-eight thousand dollars of the capital stock met and elected a new board of directors consisting of J. S. Meckling, Milton Weston, J. R. Hanson, J. M. Stone, W. W. Brookings, G. H. Wetmore and D. T. Bramble, who were elected by ballot. The stockholders participating and the number of votes cast by each were thus given:

J. S. Meckling, 13,601 votes; Milton Weston, 13,835; J. R. Hanson, 14,000; J. M. Stone, 6,435; W. W. Brookings, 6,435; Geo. H. Wetmore, 6,435; D. T. Bramble, 4,532; W. A. Everleigh, 1,803; Geo. N. Propper, 125; Geo. W. Kingsbury, 100. M. K. Armstrong and William Miner were present as stockholders, but did not vote. The directors so chosen as stated above elected the following officers: W. W. Brookings, president; D. T. Bramble, vice president; G. H. Wetmore, treasurer; J. R. Hanson, secretary; Milton Weston, superintendent; Chas. W. Allendorph, chief engineer.

DAKOTA SOUTHERN ABSORBS THE NORTHWESTERN

The Board of County Commissioners of Yankton County at that time was made up of Charles Eisman, George Hoffman and John J. Thompson, with Eric Iverson, clerk, and this board was heartily cooperating with the railroad enterprises. There does not appear to have been a day's delay in starting the preliminary work of construction. During November surveys were made, and the line located, but only partially on the old survey of the Dakota & Northwestern, which had been or was about to be merged with the Dakota Southern; and the contracts for the bridges over the James, Vermillion and Big Sioux were let, and arrangements were made for the furnishing of 180,000 ties, the number required for the entire line, with various parties owning timber tracts along the Missouri before the close of the year.

A railroad bond election was held in Clay County on the 11th of November, 1871, for the purpose of voting aid to the Dakota & Northwestern road; the intention being to merge that corporation with the Dakota Southern, and as the former company was supposed to have more supporters, for local reasons, in Clay County than the Dakota Southern, which was a Yankton enterprise, it was deemed best to submit the question of aid to the road that could poll the most votes, but the proposition was defeated by a heavy majority. The question was taken on donating $60,000 to the railroad. There were five voting precincts in the county, and the election was held on the same day as the regular election. The following gives the vote at each precinct:

	Yes	No
First Precinct	122	201
Second Precinct	1	38
Third Precinct	4	135
Fourth Precinct	15	77
Fifth Precinct	26	150
Total	168	601

Following this election and in order to secure harmony among the leading men of the Missouri slope on railroad matters within Dakota, there was a change in the directory of the Dakota Southern in December, 1871. J. S. Meckling and J. R. Hanson resigned and Walter A. Burleigh and Jefferson P. Kidder were elected in their stead. The Dakota Southern effected a perpetual lease of the franchises of the Dakota & Northwestern. The two last named directors represented the leased corporation. It was doubtless intended that the eastern connection of the leased company should be at Sioux City, though that had not been definitely settled. But by uniting the two corporations which were working practically for the same purpose, harmony among the interests to be affected was secured, and this united sentiment and interest was expected to bring Clay and Union counties to the substantial support of the enterprise. Mr. Burleigh had been closely identified with the Dakota & Northwestern from its inception, and had also contributed liberally of his time and money to secure the construction of the Dakota Southern, and besides this he was regarded as one of the strongest factors in the territory in the promotion and success of any public enterprise.

The proposition of a citizens' meeting held at Elk Point to vote a direct tax of 2½ per cent on the taxable property of Elk Point Township for the term of three years, to be donated toward the building of the Dakota Southern Railroad, was not endorsed by the people of the township outside the village. There was a divided sentiment in the town and throughout the county, and many heated arguments grew out of the zeal with which each party advocated its view of the matter. A number of Elk Point business men threatened to remove to Richland, five miles north, unless the people of the Point would vote to secure the location of a depot at that place. Among the removers were C. M. Northrup, E. S. Northrup, H. H. Blair, J. M. Talcott, J. Talcott, C. W. Beggs, E. W. Miller, J. A. Wallace, C. H. Freeman, Charles Mallahan, D. W. C. Smith and Alex Hughes, all leading citizens. It was finally determined at this meeting to ascertain the sentiment of the people of the township on the matter of voting aid under the new territorial law. A petition was circulated and signed as the law provided, and 130 names out of a total of 180 names of voters in the township secured. This looked very promising to the friends of affirmative action, as the vote of the township at the last election was 180, and over three-fourths that number had signed the petition. The petition was presented to the board of county commissioners and that body was requested to call an election. This the chairman of the board refused to do, claiming, it was understood, that many of the signers were not voters. The matter was appealed to Judge Kidder, of that judicial district, who, desiring to induce the official to act without resorting to legal measures, sent him an advisory letter, counselling the calling of the election as the law required. But the recalcitrant official was not to be influenced by friendly counsel, and would not consent to issue the call for the election unless compelled thereto by a writ of mandamus, which the judge finally issued. The election was called and held on the 1st of May, 1872. The question submitted was: "Shall the Township of Elk Point donate $15,000 in bonds to run ten years and draw interest at the rate of 10 per cent?" The election resulted in favor of the proposition by a majority of fifty-two.

Our local railway builders had now progressed so far that they had secured an unauthorized session of the Legislature, which passed a railroad law authorizing the issue of county and township bonds, and Yankton County and Elk Point Township, acting under that law, had voted $200,000 in county bonds and $15,000 in township bonds, for the purpose of building the Dakota Southern Railway from Yankton to some point on the Big Sioux River south of the mouth of Rock River, Iowa. This point had not been definitely located. Up to about this time the company had not definitely decided whether to unite its road with the Sioux City or LeMars interest, though the vote at Elk Point would indicate that Sioux City would be favored, which was the case. There was no sentiment supporting LeMars except at that point and at Yankton. The outside railroad interests, all of which were centered at Sioux City, and the Dakota Southern Construction Company, had concluded that Sioux City offered the best facilities to the Dakota enterprise; and accordingly the Sioux City and Pembina Railway Company was incorporated to build a line from that point to the Big Sioux River where it would form a junction with the Dakota Southern and would be leased and operated by that company. The Sioux City and Pembina was further projected to a point on the Big Sioux called Portlandville, about twenty-five miles from its initial point.

The survey and location of the Dakota Southern had already been made by the Dakota & Northwestern in 1868, and this company having been merged with the new organization, its survey was largely adopted, and grading began at Yankton just east of the Rhine Creek, on the 24th day of June, 1872; Hanson & McIntyre being the sub-contractors for a section reaching to the James River; the section east of the James extending to the Clay County line was graded by Maj. J. M. Stone, and east of that point to Vermillion by Messrs. Morgan & Gilfillan. While the country between the James and Vermillion rivers through which this railway passed is an unbroken level of the Missouri bottom, it was found necessary to construct five pile bridges along this stretch of railway, in order to cross running streams that were supposed to have their source in the overflow of Clay Creek. This section of country is now drained by a permanent canal dug through the bottom and having its outlet in the Vermillion River.

On the 5th of June, 1872, the directory of the Dakota Southern Company held a meeting and adopted resolutions declaring its purpose to issue $1,200,000 of first mortgage bonds secured by a mortgage on the railway as it will be when completed and in operation. The resolutions are given below:

Whereas, It is advisable to raise money by the sale of bonds secured by a deed of trust in the usual form, and to that end to divide the road of the company into divisions; therefore be it

Resolved, That the railroad of the company now being constructed at a point from or near Sioux City in the State of Iowa, to the City of Yankton, in the Territory of Dakota, shall be, and constitute the first division of the railroad of this company, and that an amount of money not exceeding twelve hundred thousand dollars be borrowed upon the said first division, to aid in its construction and equipment, and that the bonds of the company therefor, to the said amount, be executed and issued for the same, under the seal of the company, and signed on its behalf by its president and attested by its secretary, in sums of $1,000 each, and bearing date July 1, 1872, and having twenty years to run to maturity, and bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent per annum, free of Government tax, and payable semi-annually on the first days of January and July in each year, at the office of the Farmers Loan and Trust Company, of New York, in the State of New York, where both the principal and interest shall be made payable, all of which bonds shall bear the same date, and shall stand equally secured by the deed of trust, to be executed to secure them, and shall be duly stamped, and shall be numbered from number one (1) to number twelve hundred (1,200), all of which bonds to be authenticated by a certificate signed by the trustee aforesaid; and also that a deed of trust, in the usual form, be executed to the said Farmers Loan and Trust Company, as trustee therein, under the seal of the company, and signed by its president and attested by its secretary, by which shall be conveyed to said trustee in trust to secure the payment of the principal and interest of said bonds, all the present and future to be acquired property of the company in, and relating to the said first division of said railroad, and all its right, title, interest and equity of redemption therein, that is to say, all the railroad of said company now made and to be constructed, extending from, at or near Sioux City to said City of Yankton, including the right of way therefor, roadbed, superstructure, iron, ties, chairs, spikes, bolts, nuts, splces, and all the depot grounds, station houses, depots, viaducts, bridges, timber and materials, property, and property purchased or to be purchased, for the construction of the first division of said railroad, and all the engines, tenders, cars, and machinery, and all kinds of rolling stock now owned, or to be hereafter purchased by said company for, and to be used upon said first division of said railroad, and all the franchises and rights of said company relating thereto, and property acquired by virtue thereof now in possession, or hereafter to be acquired, including machine shops, tools, implements and personal property used therein or along the line of said first division of said railroad, to be held in trust as aforesaid; and

Whereas, A printed form of deed of trust is now submitted, dated May 21, 1872, and is hereby adopted as the one to be executed as above provided for; therefore be it further

Resolved, That the same be executed in manner as aforesaid, and duly acknowledged and delivered to said trustee, as the deed above provided for, to secure the said bonds in manner and form as in said deed expressed.

This action of the railway company was regarded as premature by the principal stockholder, which was Yankton County, and the county, it appeared, had not been consulted in regard to it. At this time the work of construction had barely commenced, and though there was general confidence that the work would be pushed to completion as early as practicable, it was thought too early to anticipate its completion by such an important step, which under the circumstances would be regarded as exceedingly presumptuous on the part of the company, whose railway was in an embryonic condition, and gave to the project the appearance of a speculative scheme instead of a substantial industry and important improvement such as Dakota was vitally interested in. Under the law of Congress Yankton County's interest in the railroad or rather its connection with the corporation had been radically changed from the original plan of a donator of the $200,000 of bonds voted, to that of a stockholder, the law requiring the railroad company to issue to the county $200,000 of paid up stock in return for its bonds. This gave Yankton County the right to be heard in the official proceedings of the company, and also made it its duty to participate, the position of stockholder carrying with it certain responsibilities as well as rights. There was such manifest dissent to this mortgage proceeding that no further steps were taken to carry it into effect during the time occupied in the construction of the road, and in fact until some time after the road had been completed to Yankton and opened for traffic.

On the 12th of June, 1872, the County Commissioners of Yankton County executed and delivered to Wicker, Meckling & Co., the first $100,000 of county-railroad bonds, requiring a bond of the construction company to secure the county against loss in case of failure on the part of the construction company to comply with its contract; James M. Stone, W. W. Brookings, J. R. Hanson and John J. Thompson became securities for the construction company.

In October, 1872, the railroad company applied for the remaining $100,000 of Yankton County bonds, submitting, with its application, the following statement of the amounts it had already expended in the construction of the road. At this time the line was practically completed as far as Elk Point and work was being energetically pushed on the unfinished portion, with a strong probability, if favored by good weather, of reaching Yankton with the track by the first of January, 1873. The statement of expenditures follows:

Railroad ties	$ 77,330
Twenty-two miles grading completed.....	22,000
Bridges and culverts	16,000
Right-of way Sioux City to Elk Point.....	10,000
One engine and ten cars	15,000
Eighteen miles road completed	216,000
Four hundred tons iron delivered in territory.....	10,000
Total	$300,330

The county board appears to have taken no action regarding the issue of bonds. The county attorney, O. B. Orton, filed a protest against a further issue at this time. The board, however, was not a unit on the proposition, and the difference must have been serious as it resulted in the tender of Commissioner Eiseman's resignation as a member, and the board adjourned, reconvening again on the 27th of November, when Commissioner Eiseman appeared as a member, and action was taken authorizing the issue of the second $100,000 of county bonds; stipulating, however, that the bonds should be deposited in the First National Bank of Sioux City; the company to receive $50,000 in case the road is completed to the Yankton County line by the 12th of December, and the remaining $50,000 in case the road is completed to the City of Yankton, by the 1st of January, 1873. The company declined to receive the bonds with the stipulation regarding completion, alleging that the uncertainty of having suitable weather for track laying during the remainder of 1872 made it hazardous to agree to the stipulations. There was further investigation made by the county authorities, the differences amicably adjusted, and the bonds were delivered during December.

On September 14, 1872, the voters of Clay County voted upon the proposition to aid the Dakota Southern Railroad by a subscription to the capital stock amounting to $30,000. The sentiment of the county was known to be strongly against the proposition, but the few friends of the plan who were made up of influential citizens and large taxpayers, prevailed upon the people to have a test vote. In the Bloomingdale Precinct there were 285 votes cast, and only two favored bonds, and in every precinct save Vermillion the vote was largely "No." The election was characterized by unusual bitterness against the proposition, the voters accompanying their negative votes by remarks indicating considerable feeling. The total vote in the county footed up 639; for bonds 168; and 471 against. It was supposed that every voter in the county cast a ballot.

There was finally an agreement made with Vermillion property owners under which the company was to locate a station at that point, in consideration of the citizens erecting a depot building to cost about four thousand dollars; procure the right-of-way through Clay County, and deed to the company 150 city lots.

The stockholders of the railroad company met at Yankton on the 12th of December, 1872, and elected a new board of directors, as follows:

C. G. Wicker, president; W. W. Brookings, vice president; J. S. Meckling, general superintendent; J. R. Hanson, secretary and treasurer; J. O. Rutter, L. M. Scudder, John A. Burbank, George B. Hoffman, county commissioner, representing Yankton County. Judge Kidder was tendered a place on the board, but peremptorily declined owing to the official position he occupied. Judge Brookings occupied a similar official position, and while he did not manifest the slightest disposition to use it in his official capacity as an officer of the road, the attitude of the judge of the First District was warmly approved by the people and aided materially in electing Mr. Kidder to Congress in 1874. Burbank, the governor, had also committed a grievous error in soliciting and accepting a place on the board. These proceedings aroused considerable discontent among the people, and greatly increased the unpopularity of Governor Burbank, who had not been very highly regarded.

The first Dakota Southern rail was laid at Sioux City, August 29, 1872. The line from Sioux City to the Big Sioux River was built by Wicker, Meckling & Co., under the organization incorporated under the laws of Iowa and entitled the Sioux City and Pembina Railroad.

The first locomotive to cross the Big Sioux River on the Dakota Southern Railroad was named the "Judge Brookings," which made the crossing safely on the 1st of October, 1872. The cars of the construction train reached Elk Point, October 23, 1872, and the road was opened for general traffic to that place November 13th, following. The daily stages that had been running to Sioux City connected with this train. The stages left Elk Point whenever the train arrived from Sioux City, and the train left for Sioux City whenever the daily stage arrived from Yankton. The construction train reached Vermillion November 25, 1872, and the road was opened to general traffic to that place December 10th, following.

The Sioux City and Pembina Railroad, projected on the Iowa side of the Big Sioux River, formed the eastern end of the Dakota Southern Railroad in 1872, was graded along the eastern shore of the Big Sioux River as far north as the Plymouth County line, and a town established called Portlandville. The road was designed by its promoters and builders to run north up the Big Sioux Valley, to cross the Big Sioux at Canton, and continue on to Sioux Falls. The enterprise soon passed into the control of the Dakota Southern Company, which a few years later abandoned the Iowa line and made Elk Point the initial point of the Sioux Falls branch, as it is to this day.

The road was completed to Yankton on Saturday, January 25, 1873. The first locomotive to reach Yankton was named the "C. G. Wicker." It crossed the Rhine Creek the first time on Sunday, the 26th. Regular passenger trains to and from Sioux City to Yankton began running February 3, 1873.

DAKOTA SOUTHERN OPENED FOR TRAFFIC

The railroad was opened for traffic from Sioux City to Yankton early in February, 1873, and an excursion from Yankton to Sioux City took place on Thursday and Friday, February 13 and 14, 1873. The officers of the excursion train were Superintendent J. S. Meckling; General Freight and Ticket Agent Geo. E. Merchants; Engineer Jim Whitney; Fireman Dan Gordon; Brakeman R. E. Guthrie and E. L. Gregg. The train left Yankton at 11.30 A. M. the 13th, and returned at 3.30 P. M. Friday. It was agreed at the time among the excursionists that the names of all those participating in the journey should be enrolled and published as a memorial of the first excursion on a Dakota railroad, and the first railway to reach the Missouri River in the Territory of Dakota. The following are the names of the excursionists:

From Yankton: Mr. Ingwerson and wife, Miss Nellie Brookings, Mr. M. M. Matthiesen, W. W. Brookings and wife, S. McCook and wife, Miss Fannie Parmer, L. D. Parmer and wife, J. M. Washburn and wife, W. G. Press and wife, G. W. Kingsbury and wife, Fannie L. Kingsbury (now Mrs. Grigsby), D. T. Bramble and wife, G. H. Wetmore and wife, Miss Julia Davidson, Mrs. John A. Weeks, Dr. J. B. VanVelsor, Miss Fannie Todd, Clarence Van Tassel, C. H. McIntyre, Miss Hannah McIntyre, J. M. Stone and wife, L. M. Griffith and wife, Geo. N. Jenkins, M. Grady, Miss Rose Grady, J. R. Sanborn and wife, Mrs. John Treadway, J. G. Edgar, Miss Dix, F. C. Herring, Wm. Tobin, Joe Sanborn, Benj. Hays, Miss Lizzie Hays, Will Vance, Mrs. S. Vance, Justus Schnell, Henry Meyer, Jas. Henne, Peter Fox, John Hartert, Thos. Hughes, J. V. Norton, A. P. Hammon, Jerry Walldron, J. J. Duffack, O. H. Platt and wife, Wm. Pound and wife, D. S. Warren and wife, Ed Highbee, John Cunningham, S. V. Clevenger, Mrs. Thwing, J. R. Hanson, E. H. Van Antwerp, John Lawrence, Belle Stanley, Herman Fuller, Judge L. Congleton, John Carey, James Stanage, Hugo Riemer, Herbert W. Pike, Zina Richey, Francis Delaney, J. F. McNamara, Wm. Gemmill, Dr. Luke Lavery, M. P. Ohlman, Miss A. Rossteuscher, Albert Zehncka, Theodore Schorregge, Wm. Leeper and wife, Judson LaMoure, Miss Belle Moore, Frank VanFassel, J. H. Burdick and wife, Geo. H. Hand and wife, Richard Dawson, Miss Josephine Dawson, Mrs. S. L. Spink, Miss Ada Cooley, Mrs. S. J. Morrow, Ole Sampson and wife, E. M. Ziebach, Alonzo Stone, George Stafford, Wm. Bause, O. H. Carney, John Cloudas, J. W. Albright, E. Dunlap, Frank Bronson, Louis Vele, Jas. Noonan, Lars Sampson, Chas. P. Edmunds, Emory R. Guild, C. A. Marshall and wife, G. A. Batchelder, Alex Daniels, Geo. W. Kimber, Geo. J. Foster, A. W. Howard, George Pike, L. M. Kee, J. C. Blanding, E. A. Edwards, J. W. Evans, John Kodylik, E. A. Olney, Geo. Bronson, Mex Daniels, W. C. Brown, E. C. Hayward, Charley Spink, Irving Spink, Henry Heard, Henry Clay.

Band boys: J. M. Faust, leader; John Buchman, Fred Schnauber, Ed Iverson, S. D. Presba, Felix Vinatieri, Christ Lutz, John F. Lenger, Emile Roth, Joseph Tyrack.

Additional excursionists: L. D. F. Poore and H. F. Bonesteel, Springfield; L. D. Pettit, Walled Lake, Minnehaha County; M. Grigsby, Sioux Falls.

From Vermillion: Ole Bottolfsen, Miles Russell and wife, G. B. Bigelow, H. P. Hanson, Capt. Nelson Miner, C. F. Rhodes and wife, Silas W. Kidder, C. F. Armington, Arlos Shaw, T. R. Jewell and wife, B. F. Bellows, T. A. Robinson, Chas. H. True and wife, Jas. Leital, Judge J. P. Kidder, L. Lewison and wife, John L. Taylor, James McNamce, Samuel

Bird, Knute Larson, N. V. Ross, Miss Freddie Miner, Miss Eva Rhodes, Col. B. F. Campbell, W. W. Deming.

From Canton: G. W. Harlan, B. H. Miller, N. C. Nash, I. N. Menor, W. W. Fowler, J. B. Bertrand, Jr., W. S. Reynolds, George Kellen.

From Eden: Capt. A. B. Wheelock, J. A. Fowler, C. F. Ball.

John Smith, Lincoln; M. B. Kent, Liberty; J. L. Fisher, Lodi; Rev. T. L. Riggs, Fort Sully; A. Baker and wife, Mattoon, Turner County; George Washington Kellogg, McCook; John Holverson, Henry Oleson, St. Helena, Neb.

From Elk Point: E. W. Miller, J. H. Thorne, U. H. Akers, J. E. Millett, A. C. Freeman, J. S. Talcott, R. H. Miller, Michael Flynn, Charles Miller, J. A. Wallace, D. W. Hassen, G. O. Vaughn, M. Hoffman, R. S. Collins, J. H. Brown, B. O. Reandeau, E. W. Laird, J. H. Shannard, E. B. Wixson, Alex. Hughes and wife, George Stickney and wife, Michael Curry and wife, John Gulwinski, John Coverdale, P. H. Sweeney, M. G. Laird, Charles Mallahan, John R. Wood.

The long agony was now said to be over, which was largely true as to the great majority of the people of the settled portion of the territory, who had been supplied with their most important material need at the time—ample transportation facilities for the shipment of their surplus agricultural products to a cash market on a basis of profit to the producer; commercial facilities that enabled the merchants to transact their business much more satisfactorily and economically; and not least a modern highway connecting the southern portion of the territory with the United States and its tens of thousands of people who were making preparations for founding new homes in the farther west, including the sturdy emigrants from foreign shores who were journeying to America as rapidly as the ocean fleets could carry them, and in constantly increasing numbers. To all Dakotans whose employment was identified with the legitimate purposes of the railroad, "the agony was over;" but in this instance, the novel methods which had attended the securing of the road, had left open opportunities not only for unfriendly criticism, but unprofitable and prolonged litigation, as the history of the time discloses.

NEW JUDGES APPOINTED—ASSIGNED BY GOVERNOR

In March and April, 1873, an important change occurred in the federal judiciary of the territory. Chief Justice French, who had been assigned to the Third or Red River of the North District, was succeeded by Peter C. Shannon, of Pennsylvania; and Associate Justice W. W. Brookings, who presided in the Second District at Yankton, was succeeded by Alanson H. Barnes, of Wisconsin. Judge Kidder had been reappointed, and presided in the First District at Vermillion.

Whereupon Governor Burbank, by virtue of the authority and power in him vested by the organic act, issued the following proclamation:

Whereas, section 15 of the organic act of the Territory of Dakota provides that "Temporarily and until otherwise provided by law the governor of said territory may define the judicial districts of said territory and assign the judges who may be appointed for said territory to the several districts, and also appoint the times and places for holding courts in the several counties or subdivisions in each of said judicial districts by proclamation to be issued by him; but the Legislative Assembly at their first, or any subsequent session, may organize, alter or modify such judicial districts, and assign the judges, and alter the time and place of holding courts, as to them shall seem proper and convenient."

And whereas, The Legislative Assembly has at various times defined the judicial districts of the territory, and fixed the times and places for holding courts therein, but has never assigned the judges who have been appointed for said territory to the districts thus defined by law;

And whereas, No existing proclamation of the governor clearly or definitely assigns the judges now holding office in the territory to the districts as they now exist;

And whereas, The opinion has been expressed by the attorney general of the United States that "in the absence of any legislation by the territory assigning the judges, the governor has the power to assign them." Now, therefore,

I, John A. Burbank, governor of the Territory of Dakota, do proclaim that until otherwise provided, by the Legislative Assembly, or in default of that by the executive of the territory, the several judges of the Supreme Court of the territory shall be and they are hereby assigned to the following districts, respectively:

J. P. Kidder, to the First Judicial District; A. H. Barnes, to the Second Judicial District; P. C. Shannon, to the Third Judicial District.

COLONEL MELVIN GRIGSBY
Sioux Falls, 1872

GENERAL CHARLES F. CAMPBELL
Founder of Scotland and veteran of the Mexican and Civil wars

In testimony whereof I have signed my name and have caused the great seal of the Territory of Dakota to be hereunto affixed.

Done at Yankton, the capital of said territory, this twelfth day of April, 1873.

(Seal)

By then governor, JOHN A. BURBANK.

EDWIN S. MCCOOK, Secretary.

RAILROAD MORTGAGE BONDS STIR UP A LAW-SUIT

The railway company had promised certain improvements incident to the operation of the road, involving the employment of a number of mechanics and others at Yankton, in the way of repair shops and their accessories, and in supplying these it may have been that the company failed to furnish all that was expected, or it may have been tardy in performance; whatever the cause it gave ground for some open complaint; and it was further charged that the company had concluded to, and had already bestowed these favors on Sioux City, where temporary arrangements had been made with the other roads centering at that point, to use their repair facilities. These reports, aggravated by sectional and personal rivalries, created an unfriendly sentiment at Yankton, which was shared by the county commissioners, who in their official capacity represented the county as a stockholder in the railroad company to the amount of $200,000, and now began to insist upon having a voice in the management of its affairs.

On the 11th of June, 1873, the directors of the railway company met, and by resolution cancelled the action had at a former meeting held in 1872, by which it was resolved to mortgage the railway property for $1,200,000; and in place of that resolution enacted a modified resolution for an issue of $600,000 first mortgage bonds, and $600,000 second mortgage bonds; and when in August following it took steps to carry out its bonding plan, it was met by the opposition of the commissioners of Yankton County who had applied to the District Court and had been granted an order temporarily restraining the company from further proceedings in that direction, until the case could be heard. The hearing followed the same month, resulting in the court's modifying the temporary injunction so far as to permit the company to go ahead with its bonding proceedings, but requiring it to give security, in the amount of $200,000, to indemnify Yankton County against the loss of its stock. Judge Barnes was the presiding judge.

This action of the court greatly incensed Governor Burbank, who was now one of the directors of the railroad company, and who very injudiciously if not scandalously, threatened to re-assign the judges and bring an official to the Second District who (doubtless erroneously) was supposed to be more favorably inclined toward the railroad company. The governor was said to have been so imprudent as to call upon the judge and threaten him with a re-assignment, but was informed that his threats would avail nothing in changing the judicial action, but if the governor persisted in his hostile declarations and unlawful course, he would subject himself to arrest and punishment for contempt of court.

Governor Burbank had been made a member of the Dakota Southern Board of Directors in recognition of his services at Washington in securing the passage of the curative act, and of the change made by the congressional enactment extending the western terminus from Yankton to Springfield, where the governor had acquired large interests. He had already, by proclamation, assigned the new judges, but this did not exhaust his authority in that direction. He had also secured the $15,000 of township bonds voted by Elk Point, as was publicly made known some years later.

The railway company did not favor a compliance with the modified order of the court; it held that Yankton County, though a stockholder under the curative act of Congress, had in fact offered its $200,000 in bonds and delivered them as a donation in consideration of having the road constructed and operated, and had no just claim upon the property of the road, notwithstanding its position as stockholder, which had been given to it since the agreement between the company and county was made. The company, deeming the local and judicial sentiment hostile, then applied to the court for a change of venue, which the court denied at this time, but subsequently granted for reasons then stated which will be found fully and entertainingly set forth in the following pages. Matters remained in this situation for some weeks, the railway people and the county commissioners, in the meantime, aided by mutual friends, endeavoring to get together and stop the litigation. And it was for the purpose of harmonizing these differences that the railroad meeting was called by the citizens of Yankton, on the 11th of September following, at which the fatal tragedy was enacted that resulted in the killing of Secretary McCook by Peter P. Wintermute; and here we have, apparently, a situation which in some of its features connects that deplorable event with the railway company; but this relationship does not appear to be justified in the narrative of the Wintermute case, elsewhere given.

During the day preceding the evening when McCook was shot, September 11th, the citizens of Yankton had engaged in entertaining the members of the St. Paul Chamber of Commerce, and the utmost good feeling prevailed. The affair had been a very successful one, and both McCook and Wintermute had been prominent in entertaining the visitors. It was because of this general amicable condition that the meeting was held, in hopes that it would result in some agreement or the adoption of resolutions, upon which the contending parties could get together and stop the litigation. The woeful tragedy put an end to the proceedings of the meetings, and but for one remark made by Wintermute who was in attendance, that "the people had no confidence in the railroad company," one would be at loss to find in the proceedings any marked hostility to the railroad people. But the bloody and deadly outcome of the assemblage had a sobering influence upon the public sentiment. There was a general desire for peace; and a horror of continuing any further litigation that might afford a pretext for further events of a kindred character, though from all the circumstances we conclude that the quarrel and the killing in this case would have been just as likely had the occasion been a political meeting.

But it will probably be generally recognized that the important events following this terrible crime and growing out of it, coupled with Governor Burbank's resentful and vindictive disposition, had a demoralizing influence in the legal proceedings instituted to punish the assassin.

Returning to the story of the differences between the railroad company and county, the court proceedings which followed are amply set forth in the following review of the case made by Associate Justice Barnes at the October term, 1873, of the District Court. The question before the court was a new motion on behalf of the railroad company for a change of venue. The attorneys were: Phil K. Faulk, district attorney, Moody & Cramer, and S. L. Spink, for the county; and John Currier, William Tripp, W. L. Joy, and H. A. Copeland, for the company. The case was ably presented. At the conclusion of the arguments, the judge reviewed the case, animadverting with some severity upon the conduct of the executive of the territory, and closed by granting the application. In reviewing the case, Judge Barnes said:

This case, although but recently commenced, has a history—a history geographically considered extending from the national capital to the northern international boundary line; a review of which I regard as proper on the disposition of this motion.

In June last, a bill in chancery was filed in this court by the County of Yankton, against the Dakota Southern Railroad Company, Wicker, Meckling & Co., the parties who built the railroad.

The bill alleges the formation of the railroad company with a capital stock of $1,000,000. It alleges the making of a contract by the railroad company with Wicker, Meckling & Co. for the building of the railroad. The bill further charges that Wicker, Meckling & Co. are subscribers to the capital stock of the railroad to the amount of $750,000; that Governor Burbank, Major Stone and W. W. Brookings are subscribers to a large amount—I believe something less than three hundred thousand dollars, in nearly equal amounts, or a little less than one hundred thousand dollars each; that the County of Yankton has subscribed, paid for, and owns $200,000; that the Town of Elk Point has subscribed and paid for some fifteen thousand dollars. The bill further charges that C. G. Wicker, J. H. Meckling, John A. Burbank, W. W. Brookings, J. M. Stone and J. R. Hanson are the directors of said railroad company; that a contract was made by the railroad company with Wicker, Meckling & Co., to build the road; that no fixed price was agreed upon by the terms of the contract, and allege that upon the contract Wicker, Meckling & Co. have been paid, I think, something like one million dollars, and more than the cost of constructing the road. The bill further charges that in fraud of the plaintiffs' rights, the directors of the railroad company, except one of them (Hoffman), who is one of the county commissioners, and Wicker, Meckling & Co., both Wicker and Meckling being directors of the railroad company, and Wicker being its president, in fraud of the plaintiffs' rights and intending to defraud the plaintiff, have caused to be issued $1,000,000 of mortgage bonds upon the railroad, and by a resolution have placed them in the hands of C. G. Wicker to be disposed of as he sees fit. The bill further charges that Wicker, Meckling & Co. have paid nothing for their stock. That Governor Burbank, Judge Brookings and Major Stone, with some others whose names do not now occur to me, have paid nothing for their stock; and in short, that the $200,000 paid by Yankton County, the $15,000 by Elk Point, and some other small amounts, are all that have been paid.

The bill then charges that the $1,200,000 of mortgage bonds are now in the hands of C. G. Wicker, with power to dispose of the same, charging the intent on the part of the said C. G. Wicker and his associates to dispose of them and thus encumber the road for more than its entire cost, and rendering the entire stock of the plaintiffs worthless.

The bill then asks for an injunction order, restraining the defendants, pending the suit, from disposing of the $1,000,000 of bonds and demands that the amount due from Wicker, Meckling & Co. be applied in payment for building the road; that the subscription of Stone, Burbank and Brookings, directors of the road, be paid and in like manner applied, and that the mortgage bonds be surrendered and canceled.

Upon the hearing of this application for a restraining order, the defendants appear and do not deny the main allegations in the bill; or rather, the defendants admit receiving the stock; but Wicker, Meckling & Co. allege that their $750,000 of stock was a donation, gift, or bonus, and that it was so understood, and that they were to pay nothing for it. I think no answer or explanation is given by the other defendants, or any pretense that they have paid for the large amount of stock held by them.

Upon the statement of facts, on the 28th of June last, I granted the temporary injunction and stated that as against stockholders who, like the plaintiffs, had subscribed and paid for their stock, the directors had no power or authority to give away any portion of the capital stock, and that a transaction of this kind could not be upheld. That it was the duty of the directors to husband the resources of the company, and protect the interests of the stockholders, and that the directors, having themselves subscribed for large amounts of stock, and with the stock thus subscribed electing themselves directors, paying nothing for the stock thus held by them, and then mortgaging the road for its entire value, placing the bonds in the hands of one of their own number with unlimited power to dispose of them as he sees fit, could not be allowed, and hence the injunction order was granted. Remarking further, that inasmuch as Wicker, Meckling & Co. had built the road, and inasmuch as they had a large interest in the road as stockholders, or builders, or both, and inasmuch as their interest could not be well made available except by mortgaging the road, on condition that they would deposit $200,000 of the bonds in the National Bank of Yankton, subject to the order of this court on final hearing, they should not be further adjoined from disposing of the remainder of the bonds, being $1,000,000, and about what they claimed was the cost of the building of the road. No appeal has been taken from this order, but two unsuccessful attempts were made before my associate, Judge Kidder, of the First District, to vacate it, he deciding not to entertain the motion.

Then commenced a systematic raid on the part of some of the defendants, by threats and intimidations, to compel this court to change its views, or at least its ruling; and among other things it was publicly asserted that unless the injunction was vacated the executive of this territory, and one of the defendants, would, by proclamation, depose or remove the offending judge, and bring to the district a judge more acceptable to the said defendants. A somewhat bold proposition, I confess, in a free government, and where any interference with the judiciary by the executive is viewed with just alarm and jealousy.

These threats not having the desired effect, on the 11th day of August, at a special term, a motion was made for a change of venue on the ground of prejudice on the part of the people of the county and the judge. On that occasion I held that I could not grant the order, as this was not necessarily a jury trial, and as there was no demand that the issues of fact be tried by a jury; but at the same time I requested the plaintiff's counsel, as a special favor to me, to make a stipulation that this case be tried by one of the other judges, which they agreed to call; but on consultation it is claimed that my associate judges declined to try the case, whether because of the wicked and unwarranted statements of the defendants, or some of them, that they were committed to their interests in advance, or for what reason I do not know; but immediately after the refusal of this court to grant a change of venue in August, an individual, employed as defendant's counsel, and residing in Chicago, and not now appearing in this case, made a most wanton attack on this court, in the columns of the Chicago Tribune, a statement so absolutely false that even the parties in whose interest it was made, are said to have denounced the writer with some bitterness.

It is hardly necessary for me to say that if there is at this time, on this renewed application for a change of venue, a sufficient showing to authorize this court to grant the order for the change of venue, and that granting the order will confer jurisdiction upon the court to which it might be sent, and would not have the effect to turn the plaintiff out of court, then clearly it is the duty of this court to grant the motion; and inasmuch as by the pleadings there is a question of fraud to be tried, as well as other issues of fact, I think the order for change of venue can now with safety be made, and it would be very inconsistent for this court, after requesting parties to stipulate to try the case before some other judge, now to decline to allow a change of place of trial to another court. That being so, it is my duty as well as pleasure to grant the motion, here remarking as I did on the former hearing, that where a defendant is willing to make affidavit of prejudice on the part of the court, I think, as a matter of right, he should have the change; but the Legislature not having clothed the court with the power to grant the change of venue upon such a showing, I could not grant the order on that ground alone.

The order will then be made to change the place of trial to Clay County.

BOND CASE SETTLED OUT OF COURT

Following this order of the court transferring the venue to Judge Kidder's court, the defendants appear to have looked upon the change as undesirable, which was followed by a consultation that brought about an amicable adjustment.

A serious grievance urged by the county authorities was the failure of the railroad company to make the improvements and establish the industries at Yankton which had been promised. At the conference between the parties it was agreed and settled that the railway company should forthwith proceed to carry out its agreements in these particulars, which included the erection of machine shops, depot and other improvements aggregating in cost about fifty thousand dollars. The county on its part agreed to withdraw its suit.

Another appearance was made before Judge Barnes on the last day of October, 1873, when the following decree was sanctioned and ordered by the court:

County of Yankton, D. T., vs. Wicker, Meckling & Co.

And now at this time, to-wit, the 31st day of October, 1873, it being the 16th day of the October term of the District Court of the Second Judicial District in and for Yankton County, D. T., this cause came on to be heard upon the pleadings heretofore filed, and by agreement of the parties to said action, the decree is hereby made and entered by the court, to-wit:

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the action and bill of the plaintiff be dismissed, and that in consideration of a certain bond of even date herewith, executed by said defendants, the Dakota Southern Railroad Company and Wicker, Meckling & Co., which bond the plaintiff hereby accepts in full accord and satisfaction of any and all actions and causes of action stated and set out in plaintiff's bill of complaint in this case, also for all relief prayed for and demanded in said bills of complaint.

That the injunction or restraining order heretofore granted in said case be and the same is hereby vacated and dissolved, and that the defendants and each and every one of them be absolved from any and all obligation to obey said injunction or restraining order.

That the said Dakota Southern Railroad Company, defendant herein, be allowed, ordered and adjudged to make, execute and deliver to its co-defendants, Wicker, Meckling & Co., said last named company being composed of Joel H. Wicker, Charles G. Wicker and Jonas S. Meckling, first mortgage bonds to the amount of $1,200,000, said bonds to be secured by a mortgage on the said railroad and on all the property, real and personal, of said railroad company.

It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said Wicker, Meckling & Co. may negotiate, sell, hypothecate, or in any manner dispose of such mortgage bonds in any amount, or in any manner as to them shall seem best, for their own use and benefit; but it is expressly decreed that no more than the above named amount of said bonds shall be delivered to or received by Wicker, Meckling & Co.

That the said Wicker, Meckling & Co. are hereby expressly allowed and permitted to surrender and return any or all of the bonds heretofore issued to them by said railroad company, and that in the event the said Wicker, Meckling & Co. surrender and return any or all of such bonds, then and in such case it shall be the duty of, and the said railroad company shall make, execute and deliver to the said Wicker, Meckling & Co., other bonds equal in amount to those surrendered, in conformity with, and as provided for in the resolution of the board of directors of said railroad company, adopted at a meeting of said board held June 7, 1872, a copy of which resolution is set out in full in plaintiff's bill of complaint.

That none of said bonds provided for as aforesaid shall draw a greater rate of interest than 8 per cent per annum, payable semi-annually, nor shall any of said bonds issued or which may be issued to Wicker, Meckling & Co. by said railroad company run or fall due in any less time than twenty years, and that upon the surrender of any bonds as heretofore provided and the executing of the bonds in place of those surrendered, such bonds so given up and surrendered shall be canceled and destroyed.

And be it further ordered that each of said parties pay their own costs in said case.

And it is further ordered and decreed by consent of parties aforesaid that the injunction bond of said plaintiff heretofore given in said case upon the preliminary injunction herein be and same is hereby canceled and annulled, and no claim or demand for damages by reason of a dissolution, or otherwise, shall be made by said defendant. By the court,

A. H. BARNES, Judge

This case closed the litigation between the county and the Dakota Southern Railroad Company, and the courts had no further occasion to adjudicate between these parties. Wicker, Meckling & Co., had disposed of their Yankton County bonds prior to this time. But two years later a suit was begun by a taxpayer of Yankton County to enjoin the county treasurer from collecting the railroad tax, which lingered in the courts for several years, and traversed the journey to the Supreme Court of the United States before it was finally terminated, and it was claimed that it finally kept the Dakotas out of the Union for several years.

At the October term of court the Grand Jury of Yankton County had returned an indictment against Wintermute for killing McCook, charging the crime of manslaughter, which was received by McCook's relatives and friends with much dissatisfaction. In the chapters reviewing the Wintermute case which follow, we have endeavored to give the legal proceedings fully, and to that account the reader is referred. Suffice it here to state that the father-in-law of McCook, Mr. Whitney, who had become secretary in his stead, took occasion, after the indictment of Wintermute, and during the temporary absence of Governor Burbank (who had already threatened Judge Barnes with a re-assignment), to issue his proclamation as acting governor, assigning Judge Barnes to the northern or Third District, and Judge Shannon to the Yankton or Second District. No trial of the Wintermute case had been entered upon at this time. A little later the Washington authorities directed the governor of Dakota Territory to cancel that proclamation, which had been productive of much comment, some of it of a scandalous character, and restore the judges to their former positions. This was done. Here the matter rested until December. In the meantime the effort to give Judge Shannon, the chief justice, the Yankton District, was taken up by Senator Quay, of Pennsylvania, a friend of Shannon's, who was able to convince the authorities at Washington that the Chief Justice of Dakota Territory had been assigned to the Second District in which the capital was located, from the organization of the territory, interrupted only by an agreement between the judges and sanctioned by the governor, in 1860, to transfer the chief justice to the Northern District for the benefit of his wife's health, and it appearing after considering the question on its merits that the proper seat for the chief justice was at the capital where the Supreme Court held its sessions, the authorities at Washington directed the issuance of a third proclamation in accordance with this view assigning the chief justice to the Second District and Associate Justice Barnes to the Northern District. Therefore the further proceedings in the Second Judicial District were under Chief Justice Shannon.

At the session of the Legislature held in 1875, a bill was passed repealing the railroad aid law enacted at the extra session of 1871; but met the veto of Governor Pennington. The purpose of this bill was to deprive the county treasurer of Yankton County of authority to collect the railroad bond tax, which had been collected for the past two years, and the funds applied to paying the semi-annual interest on the railroad bonds.

CHAPTER LII

RAILROAD MATTERS SUBJECT OF LONG LAWSUIT

1875

LEGAL PROCEEDINGS TO RESTRAIN COLLECTION OF THE RAILROAD BOND TAX—JOHN TREADWAY, COMPLAINANT—YANKTON COUNTY DEMURS—COURT REFUSES RESTRAINING ORDER—YANKTON COUNTY THEN APPEALS TO UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT WHICH REVERSES THE LATTER DECISION 1881, AND SUSTAINS THE DISTRICT COURT—YANKTON COUNTY MUST PAY THE BONDS—TERRITORIAL LEGISLATURE OF 1881 ENACTS A SETTLEMENT LAW THAT PROVIDES FOR PARTIAL PAYMENT AND IN 1883 ANOTHER LAW IS ENACTED THAT RESULTS IN AN EQUITABLE ARRANGEMENT WITH BONDHOLDERS.

The next step in legal proceedings, growing out of the railroad matter, was the commencement of an action before Chief Justice Shannon, in the District Court of Yankton County, to permanently restrain and enjoin the treasurer of said county from collecting the railroad tax levied for the purpose of paying the interest on the bonds given or subscribed by the County of Yankton to aid in building the road. This action was begun in January, 1876, Judge P. C. Shannon then being the presiding judge of the Second District, and the complaint fully set forth the ground for such action, and was filed in the clerk's office on the 20th of September, 1875.

Yankton County was frequently accused of trying to repudiate its bonded debt in connection with this railway project. The accusation is not justly founded as will be seen by an unprejudiced reading of the legal proceedings which was initiated independent of any public sentiment, by a citizen and property holder who had from the beginning been earnestly hostile to bonding the county. Mr. John Treadway was the complainant. His complaint recites that he is the owner of certain land in Yankton County upon which the tax for paying the interest on the railroad bonds has been assessed. That he has refused to pay the railroad bond tax but is willing to, and desirous of paying all his other taxes. The county treasurer, however, has refused to receive a partial payment of his tax, and has advertised, or is about to advertise his property for sale at tax sale, and he asks the court for an order restraining the treasurer from such procedure. Moody and Cramer were his attorneys. The complaint was verified and filed January 19, 1876.

Mr. Treadway, the complainant, was in many respects an eccentric and self-willed man. He was exceptionally resolute, determined, independent, and would not yield his position or opinion though opposed by every man in the county. He had stood out against the railroad bonds from the beginning, and was acting consistently with his course by initiating this suit. He was a heavy taxpayer for that day, and was willing to pay all his tax except the railroad tax, and tendered such payment to the treasurer who had no authority to issue a receipt in the form demanded by the taxpayer.

Answering the complaint, the defendants demur to the complaint herein for the ground that it appears upon the face of the complaint that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

J. R. GAMBLE, District Attorney.

Dated at Yankton, D. T., October 18, 1875.

Treadway v. Schnauber et al. Demurrer sustained.

And now, the 20th day of January, 1876, the issue of law in this action having duly come on for hearing and trial, and the same having been argued by the counsel of the parties, and on consideration thereof, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the demurrer herein of the said defendants to the said complaint be and the same is sustained; and the said complaint is dismissed at the costs of the plaintiff; and that judgment be entered accordingly.

By the court,

P. C. SHANNON, Judge.

To which judgment of the court the plaintiff excepts.

STIPULATION.—It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between the parties herein that the above entitled action may be and is hereby allowed to be appealed to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Dakota, the same as though notice of appeal was served upon the defendants' attorneys, as required by law, and the undertaking and deposit as required by law are hereby waived; the appeal is by consent to be taken into, and such case heard, at the adjourned term of said Supreme Court to be held on the 1st of February, 1876, or at the day to which said adjourned term shall be continued by the said Supreme Court. The intention being to prosecute this appeal to effect at the earliest time.

Signed by attorneys January 20, 1876.

MOODY & CRAMER, for Plaintiff.

J. R. GAMBLE, County Attorney, for Defendant.

The majority opinion of the Territorial Supreme Court dealt in great part with the utter invalidity of the entire proceedings under which the bonds were issued. The special session of the Legislature being held without warrant or authority, there could be no legal life in any of its pretended enactments—hence there was no lawful warrant for holding the railroad bond election; no legal method for preventing or punishing fraud at such election; no authority for canvassing or declaring the vote. All this being without the sanction of law, there was no validity to the bonds issued, and therefore nothing whatever to form a basis for Congress to act upon; hence it went beyond its constitutional authority in declaring, in effect, that a portion of the law should be considered valid and the remainder ignored. It was even denied by the majority opinion that Congress was invested with any authority to pass a law granting to the counties of the territory the right to vote bonds to aid railroads—that the constitutional powers of Congress did not cover this class of legislation.

Judge Shannon dissented from the majority of the court, and filed a written opinion of some length, quoting numerous authorities and constructing a strong argument. In concluding the judge takes occasion to strengthen his opinion by bringing into the record the sentiment of Yankton county taxpayers, as follows:

From the issuing of these bonds in 1872 until the bringing of this action in 1875 the county commissioners have annually levied a tax, designated as a railroad tax, for the purpose of paying the interest, and in none of these years has the levy exceeded 2 per cent of the assessed valuation of the property. It would seem, therefore, that there has been acquiescence until this suit, which is one brought by a single taxpayer.

The plaintiff asks that the railroad tax levied on his property to pay the interest may be declared illegal and void, and that the county and its agents may be perpetually enjoined from proceeding to collect such tax. The defendants, namely, the county itself and its treasurer, demurred to the complaint, for that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. In other words, the county resists, by its pleading, the prayer of the plaintiff, and thereby, on this record, impliedly admits that the tax is lawful and valid, and consequently opposes the granting of the injunction. I fully concur with the county and its financial agent in their view thus presented in their demurrer, and I hold, in accordance therewith, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to give the plaintiff a cause of action.

An important change had occurred in the judiciary of the territory about the first of January, 1875, when Judge Kidder, of the First District, residing at Vermillion, having been elected delegate to Congress, resigned his judgeship, and was succeeded by Granville G. Bennett, of Washington, Iowa.

This decision of the court put a stop to the collection of the railroad tax in Yankton County for the time being, and also prevented the payment of the semi-annual interest on the bonds; which led to a suit undertaken by the National Bank of Brunswick, Maine, against Yankton County—the plaintiff suing for the recovery of defaulted interest on $10,000 of Yankton County railroad bonds. Suit was commenced in the United States Court at Yankton at the March term, 1870, and as the case involved exactly the same points as those involved in the case of Treadway vs. Schnauber, judgment was rendered by the lower court for the defendant. The case was then appealed to the Territorial Supreme Court, where the judgment of the District Court was reversed. The case was then taken on error to the Supreme Court of the United States, and rested in the archives of that tribunal until 1880, a period of about four years, when it was taken up, and the decision of the Supreme Court of Dakota Territory reversed.

The attorneys appearing in the case before the United States Supreme Court were S. W. Packard and James Grant for the plaintiff in error; and Hon. Matt. H. Carpenter, United States senator from Wisconsin, and James Coleman for the defendant in error. Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivered the opinion of the court, as follows:

By section 4 of the act to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Dakota no one session of the Legislature shall exceed forty days, and in 1869 Congress declared that all sessions of all Territorial Legislative Assemblies should be biennial. The members of the Legislative Assembly of Dakota met on the 5th of December, 1870, and continued in regular session on all days except Sundays, until January 13, 1871, when they adjourned without day. The day of the adjournment was called on the journal the fortieth day of the session, although there had been but thirty-five days of actual session for the transaction of business. On the 18th of April, 1871, the members of the Legislature elected the preceding fall again assembled at the call of the acting governor of the territory. After organizing themselves as a Legislature and proceeding to legislate for the territory, they passed among other acts one entitled: "An act to enable organized counties and townships to vote aid to any railroad, and to provide for the payment of the same." Under this act the voters of Yankton County, on the 2d of September, 1871, voted to donate to the Dakota Southern Railroad Company $200,000 in the bonds of the county. All the proceedings under which this vote was taken were conducted strictly according to the requirements of law.

On the 27th day of May, 1872, the following act of Congress was approved and went into effect:

An Act in Relation to the Dakota Southern Railroad Company.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that the act passed by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota and approved by the governor on the 21st day of April, 1871, entitled, "An act to enable organized counties and townships to vote aid to any railroad, and to provide for the payment of the same," be and the same is hereby disapproved and annulled, except in so far as herein otherwise provided. But the passage of this act shall not impair or invalidate the organization of the company heretofore organized for the construction of the Dakota Southern Railroad leading from Sioux City, Iowa, by way of Yankton, the capital of said territory, to the west line of Bon Homme County, or any vote that has been or may be given by the counties of Union, Clay, Yankton, or Bon Homme, or any township granting aid to said railroad, or any subscription thereto, or anything authorized by and that may have been done in pursuance of the provisions of the aforesaid act of the Legislative Assembly of said territory towards the construction and completion of said railroad, and the said Dakota Southern Railroad Company, as organized under and in conformity to the acts of the Legislative Assembly of said territory, is hereby recognized and declared to be a legal and valid incorporation; and the provisions of the act of the Legislative Assembly first aforesaid, so far as the same authorize, and for the purpose of validating any vote of aid or subscriptions to said company for the construction, completion and equipment of the main stem of said railroad, between the termini aforesaid, are hereby declared to be and remain in full force, but no further, and for no other purpose whatsoever.

Section 2. That for the purpose of enabling the said Dakota Southern Railroad Company to construct its road through the public lands between the termini aforesaid, the right of way through the public lands is hereby granted to said company to the extent of 100 feet in width on each side of said road; Provided, That nothing in this act shall relieve said Dakota Southern Railroad Company from constructing and completing said railroad in accordance with the conditions and stipulations under which the citizens of the counties therein named voted aid to said railroad in accordance with the laws of said territory, approved April 21, 1871. Provided further, That said Dakota Southern Railroad Company shall issue to the respective counties and townships voting aid to said railroad paid-up certificates of stock in the same in amounts equal to the sums voted by the respective counties and townships.

After the passage of this act the bonds voted were delivered by the county commissioners to the railroad company and stock in the company for an equal amount was issued to the county. The First National Bank of Brunswick, Maine, the bona fide holder and owner of ten of these bonds, amounting in the aggregate to $10,000, brought this suit against the county to recover three installments of interest. The defense was that there was no law authorizing the issue of the bonds, and as a consequence that the county was not bound for the payment of either principal or interest. Upon the trial of the cause the facts were found substantially as already stated, and a judgment was rendered by the District Court of the territory in favor of the county. This judgment was afterwards affirmed by the Supreme Court, and thereupon the bank brought the case here by writ of error.

We do not consider it necessary to decide whether the governor of Dakota had authority to call an extra session of the Legislative Assembly, nor whether a law passed at such a session or after the limited term of forty days had expired would be valid, because, as we think, the act of May 27, 1872, is equivalent to a direct grant of power by Congress to the county to issue the bonds in dispute. It is certainly now too late to doubt the power of Congress to govern the territories. There have been some differences of opinion as to the particular clause of the Constitution from which the power is derived, but that it exists has always been conceded. The act to adapt the ordinance to provide for the government of the territory northwest of the River Ohio to the requirements of the Constitution is chapter 8 of the first session of the first Congress, and the ordinance itself was in force under the confederation when the Constitution went into effect. All territory within the jurisdiction of the United States not included in any state must necessarily be governed by or under the authority of Congress. The territories are but political subdivisions of the outlying dominion of the United States. Their relation to the general Government is much the same as that which counties bear to the respective states and Congress may legislate for them as a state does for its municipal organizations. The organic law of a territory takes the place of the Constitution as the fundamental law of the local government. It is obligatory on and binds the territorial authorities; but Congress is supreme, and for the purposes of this department of its governmental authority has all the powers of the people of the United States, except such as have been expressly or by implication reserved in the prohibitions of the Constitution.

In the organic act of Dakota there was not an express reservation of power in Congress to amend the acts of the Territorial Legislature, nor was it necessary. Such a power is an incident of sovereignty and continues until granted away. Congress may not only abrogate laws of the Territorial Legislatures, but it may itself legislate directly for the local government. It may make a void act of the Territorial Legislature valid and a valid act void. In other words, it has full and complete legislative authority over the people of the territories and all departments of the territorial governments. It may do for the territories what the people, under the Constitution of the United States, may do for the states.

Turning, then, to the particular act of Congress now under consideration, we find that the attention of that body was in some way brought to the fact that the Legislative Assembly of Dakota had, on the 21st of April, 1871, passed an act to enable organized counties and townships to vote aid to railroads. In addition to this, it was known that the Dakota Southern Railroad Company has been organized as a corporation under certain acts of the Territorial Legislative Assembly, and that votes had been taken under the said act in some of the counties and townships granting aid to or authorizing subscriptions of stock in this corporation. It is clear that Congress disapproved the policy of the aid act, and was unwilling to have it go into general operation; but to the extent it could be made available for the construction and completion of the main stem of the Dakota Southern Railroad, the contrary is directly manifested. The act as a whole was "disapproved and annulled," but in substance reenacted by Congress "for the purpose of validating any vote of aid or subscription" to that company, but "for no other purpose whatever." A careful examination of the statute leaves no doubt in our minds on this subject. To make it sure that the organization of the company was complete, the "Dakota Southern Railroad Company, as organized under and in conformity to the acts of the Legislative Assembly of said territory," was "recognized and declared to be a legal and valid corporation." It is then in terms enacted that the provisions of the said act, "so far as the same authorize, and for the purpose of validating any vote of aid and subscriptions to said company, for the construction, completion, and equipment of the main stem of said railroad, * * * are hereby declared to be and remain in full force." And again: "That said Dakota Southern Railroad Company shall issue to the respective counties and townships voting aid to said railroad, paid up certificates of stock in the same in amounts equal to the sums voted by the respective counties and townships." In the light of these distinct and positive declarations and enactments of Congress, it is impossible to bring our minds to any other conclusion than that, when the bonds now in controversy were put out, there existed full and complete legislative authority to bind the people of the county for their payment. No complaint is made of any irregularity in the proceedings under the law. The question in the case is one of power only. As we think, the vote of the people of the county was "validated" by Congress, and express authority given to issue the bonds for the purpose originally intended. The only change which Congress saw fit to make was to require the company to give stock in return for the donation voted. The judgment of the Supreme Court of the territory will be reversed, and the cause remanded with instructions to reverse the judgment of the District Court, and direct a judgment for the plaintiff on the facts found, for such amount as shall appear due on the coupons sued for; and it is so ordered.

Yankton County was not prepared for this sweeping adverse decision. While there had been apparently no general sentiment in favor of Mr. Treadway's suit during its pendency in the territorial courts, the progress of legal proceedings which included the argument of attorneys and the decisions of a majority of the members of the Territorial Supreme Court which sustained Mr. Treadway's contention had brought out some points that were encouraging to the expectation that the county would be freed from its liability to pay the bonds mainly because of the action of Congress, taken after the bonds were voted, which changed the character of the aid voted to a subscription to the capital stock of the company in place of a donation and the further and more unpopular and radical change which struck out Yankton as the terminus of the railroad, extending that important point to the west line of Bon Homme County, presumably to the new Town of Springfield, also on the Missouri River, whereas the bonds were voted to a road terminating at Yankton. It is not reasonable to suppose Yankton County would have favored donating even one-fourth of $200,000 to build a road to a river point over twenty miles west, and thus defeat the important purpose the voters had in view, which was to make Yankton the terminal, and the starting point for the steamboat traffic then enjoyed by Sioux City. The act of Congress would make Yankton a way-station on the road, and the extension of the line as contemplated by that act, to construct which a company had been formed, would have destroyed the prosperity the city then enjoyed, and blighted its prospects for the future. As was said in the opinion of Associate Justice Bennett, of the Territorial Supreme Court:

If the county (Yankton) can be bound at all it must be in manner provided by the act of the special session of the Territorial Legislature of April 21, 1871, and the only method therein pointed out is by the voice of the people expressed through the ballot box; and after it has made its contract as therein directed, I know of no earthly power that can change it against the will of the county." Justice Bennett said further: "There is no way of escaping the logical conclusion to which we are driven, and that is by holding that the people of a county are entitled to no voice in the nature, character, and amount of the pecuniary liabilities with which they are to be burdened. When that point is reached, despotism will have displaced law, and arbitrary power will make and construe its own decrees.

The main portion of the arguments of the majority of the court were directed against the validity of the act of Congress, which it was contended would impose a liability against the will and without the consent of the party to be charged thereby. "This the law-making power cannot do. It can only act retrospectively for the purpose of furnishing a remedy for the removing of an impediment in the way of the enforcement of some pre-existing legal or equitable right or duty, and not for the purpose of creating such right or duty." It was by many thought that Congress did not understand the situation, and this was referred to by the attorneys in their arguments in the lower court. It was thought quite probable that the measure passed by Congress was taken already prepared, and without much inquiry. It was true and was so represented to Congress and by a memorial of the Legislature, that the people desired Congress to confirm and ratify what had been done at the extra session, but there was no authority given for making such radical changes in the laws under which action had been taken. In view of the new features engrafted upon the congressional act, it would at least have been more fair and just to require that the new law of Congress be submitted to a vote of the people interested, for ratification or rejection.

In the written opinion of Justice Barnes, who also took the position denying the validity of the law of Congress, he says:

Congress has made frequent grants of public lands, and in various ways aided in the construction of railroads through public lands in the territories, thus benefiting citizens settling upon these lands; but in this instance Congress is attempting to place this burden upon private parties, and thus enhance the value of these same public lands in these same counties. By this process, and if this kind of taxation can be sustained, a burden before unheard of can be forced upon the pioneers who happen to be so unfortunate as to have purchased Government lands. The evils resulting from this kind of legislation in the states have been so great that I regard it fortunate that Congress has not the power to repeat it in the territories. It requires very little discernment to see that long before the new states could be admitted into the Union, almost every organized county would be bonded to such an extent, in their efforts to procure the building of railroads, that the payment of their bonds would be an utter impossibility.

And the fact that Congress had refused to donate lands to aid the building of a railway in the territory led to the supposition that the burden of this bonded debt, under all the circumstances, would eventually be assumed by the general government.

It is a long distance from the national capital to the old capital of Dakota, and official communication between the parent political metropolis and its humble prototype in Dakota, in 1880, and for several months thereafter, was beset by vexatious hindrances; hence the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States, though anxiously looked for by Mr. Packard, the bondholders' attorney, was slow in reaching the tribunals of Dakota. It was known, however, that the decision had been rendered and was adverse to the county.

Dakota was, at this time, making strenuous efforts to secure a division of the territory, and statehood for the southern half had been suggested, and Mr. Packard visited Washington, with the view of securing the assistance of Congress as a collecting agency in behalf of the bondholders. Subsequently Senator Hale, of Maine, became an ardent opponent of division, basing his antagonism on the alleged efforts of Yankton County to repudiate its honest indebtedness. It was one of this senator's corporate constituents, the First National Bank of Brunswick, Maine, which had sued the county and won its case before the Supreme Court.

Action to Restrain Collection of Railroad Bond Tax.

District Court in and for Yankton County.

Treadway v. Schnauber.

Comes now E. G. Smith, district attorney of the Second Judicial District, and moves the court for an order setting aside and vacating the order of injunction heretofore entered in the above entitled action restraining and enjoining the county treasurer of said Yankton County from collecting certain taxes levied for the purpose of paying the interest on certain bonds of Yankton County in aid of the Dakota Southern Railway, as the same appears and stands on file and of record in this court.

E. G. SMITH, District Attorney.

And now, August 18, 1883, the above motion coming on to be heard, and the court being fully advised in the premises, it is ordered and adjudged that the injunction entered in the above entitled action in this court on the day of A. D. 1870, restraining the defendant, treasurer of said county, from collecting the tax mentioned and described in the complaint in this action, be and the same is hereby set aside, canceled and annulled, and the county treasurer, defendant, is released and freed from such injunction.

August 18, 1883.

By the court, A. J. EDGERTON, Judge.

With this close of the litigation, Yankton County proceeded to make the best arrangement within its power, with the holders of the railroad bonds, the interest on which had now accumulated until considerably over $300,000 was due, principal and interest.

No steps looking toward a settlement with the bondholders were taken during 1880; and in 1881, the Legislature of the Territory came to the relief of the county by passing an act to authorize the funding of bonds and coupons, provided it could be done at a discount of 50 cents on the dollar. The county commissioners were authorized to issue new bonds bearing six per cent interest per annum, and with the proceeds purchase the old bonds, or exchange for the old bonds on the terms of one dollar of new bonds for two dollars of old bonds. But it was further provided by the law, that in case the county commissioners were unable to "amicably fund the outstanding bonds at the rate named [50 per cent discount], they had authority to agree upon a higher rate on the dollar; but such agreement must first be submitted to a vote of the people of the county, and by them ratified."

No headway was made under this act toward effecting a settlement, and it is probable that nothing more was expected from the law than to provide for delay until the county would be in better condition to agree upon terms of settlement. It was estimated that the debt had by this time just about doubled, if incidental expenses were included, and it was piling up at the rate of $1,333 a month. The bondholders, or rather their attorney, who appeared to have complete control of their interests, was inflexible in his determination to exact every dollar that was due, and threats were freely made of applying for a mandamus to compel the county officers to levy and collect a tax sufficient to discharge the entire indebtedness.

Under the stress of these circumstances the wits of the lawyers were sharpened. The bondholders' attorney, Mr. S. W. Packard, was vigilant and resourceful; but for the next two years he "found a foeman worthy of his steel," in the representatives of the county. The county commissioners of the county became like the Irishman's flea, "when you put your hand upon him he isn't there." Sheriffs and constables led by Mr. Packard, were untiring in their efforts to find a county official upon whom they could serve process, and when they had discovered one, it was to learn that he had resigned. And in this way nearly two years was passed before an agreement for settlement was reached. It was finally brought about that the county should pay the face of the old bonds and the eight per cent interest by an issue of new bonds bearing four per cent interest for ten years and four and a half per cent thereafter for a term of thirty years. The county had by this time amassed a surplus of about fifty thousand dollars which it was proposed to apply to the reduction of the debt.

When this agreement was reached a committee of citizens of the county, in company with the bondholders' attorney, visited Washington and made an effort to secure the passage of a law by Congress authorizing the settlement on the terms stated, and which were subsequently embodied in the act of the Territorial Legislature of 1883. The movement to secure the legislation from Congress was not in view of any favor it would be to the county, unless Congress had been disposed to shoulder the debt; but the case had become notorious through the efforts of Mr. Packard, previously exerted, to secure some action from Congress that would compel the county to pay the original bonds, and so ardently did he press the matter that he secured the aid of Senator Hale, of Maine, to oppose the division of the territory or the admission of the State of Dakota, until the "Territory had wiped from its escutcheon the foul stain of repudiation." Thus the contest was taken into the halls of Congress, and as it happened to be a constituent of Senator Hale's—the First National Bank of Brunswick, Maine—which had prosecuted the suit before the Supreme Court of the United States, Mr. Hale dignified the affair with considerable eloquent denunciation of the repudiators. And inasmuch as the subject had assumed such threatening proportions, it became an affair which interested the people of the entire territory, and they were anxious that it should be amicably and justly terminated. This was finally consummated under an act passed by the Territorial Legislature, approved February 23, 1883, under the provisions of which the county was authorized to fund the indebtedness by an issue of new bonds bearing four per cent interest for the first ten years, the bonds to run thirty years, and to draw four and a half per cent interest after ten years until paid. Said refunding proposition to be first submitted to a vote of the legal voters of the county for their approval.

There must have been nearly a complete demolition of the Yankton County government during the year or two preceding the settlement of the matter, for it appears at the first meeting of the board of county commissioners in 1883, after the new funding act had become a law, that the three commissioners were all new officers who had been "appointed to fill existing vacancies, according to law." They were A. W. Lavender, Wm. H. Edmunds and Haldo Sater, a competent and satisfactory body, and they proceeded without delay at their first meeting held April 6th, to put in operation the funding law. Peter Royem was the county clerk. A special election was called to be held April 25th following to vote upon the new bond proposition. Ten election precincts were established, and so sanguine were the commissioners that the voters would ratify the new law that Captain Lavender was authorized to procure, without unnecessary delay, 250 one thousand dollar blank county refunding bonds and 1,000 one hundred dollar bonds, making $350,000 in all, that being the estimated aggregate of the amount that would be refunded.

Captain C. E. Brooks and Anton Pfeiffer were added to the board as provided by a new enactment increasing the membership of the county board to five members.

At the election held April 25th, to authorize the bonds there were 821 votes cast—804 in the affirmative and seventeen against. The vote was unanimous in the City of Yankton (precincts 9 and 10), and also in precincts Nos. 2, 5, 6, 7, and 8. Precinct No. 1 cast four votes against the new proposition; precinct No. 3, six votes, and No. 4, seven votes, making seventeen in all. The work of exchanging the new bonds began about May 3d and continued until all were paid or exchanged.

The law provided for the payment of the new bonds in thirty years, redemption to begin at the option of the county any time after ten years from date of issue. So judiciously have the financial affairs of the county been conducted, that at the lapse of thirty years the indications are that the debt will be fully paid and the last bond redeemed within a twelve month. The letter and spirit of the last agreement and the law have been fulfilled, and no stain of repudiation rests upon the old territory or its eldest county subdivision.

An unfavorable criticism may be made of the action of the pioneers of Yankton County in bonding the county for such a large sum in order to secure a railroad; but it should be remembered that the time had then come when a railroad was absolutely necessary to the further settlement and progress of the country. The alternative that faced the people was a railroad or a stop to further increase of settlement and production. The unfriendly criticism should be upon the action of the general Government in refusing to give the pioneers of Dakota a grant of land to aid their first railroad enterprises; for up to that time aid of this kind had not been withheld from the people of the newly settled western states and territories, and the pioneers of Dakota were certainly justified in believing that the Government would favor them in like manner, inasmuch as the Government was the greater beneficiary from the building of these transportation lines through the public domain; and it had been upon this ground that all the land grants to railroads had been made by Congress. Without a railroad it would have been practically impossible, within any reasonable time, to have settled and developed these woodless prairies, and the Government, it would seem, could not do less than donate its wild unproductive land, that cost it only twelve cents an acre, to an enterprise that made a ready market for the same land at $1.25 an acre.

There was no justifiable reason for the abrupt change in the policy of Congress from an overgenerous and often times unwise grant of the public domain, to an absolute refusal to donate an acre to Dakota for similar purposes.

CHAPTER LIII
NORTHWESTERN AND MILWAUKEE CONTEST FOR CONTROL
1879-80
(Railroads—Concluded)

JOHN I. BLAIR PURCHASES A CONTROLLING INTEREST IN THE DAKOTA SOUTHERN—PRESIDENT WICKER LEASES THE ROAD TO A RIVAL COMPANY, THE CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL—MR. BLAIR TAKES STEPS TO PREVENT TRANSFER OF THE PROPERTY—FINAL SETTLEMENT—MR. BLAIR SELLS TO THE MILWAUKEE, AND THE DAKOTA SOUTHERN FROM SIOUX CITY TO YANKTON AND TO SIOUX FALLS BECOMES A PART OF THE MILWAUKEE SYSTEM—MILWAUKEE RAILROAD COMPANY IN VIRTUAL CONTROL OF THE TRANSPORTATION INTERESTS OF SOUTHEASTERN DAKOTA.

Inasmuch as the Dakota Southern Railway enterprise, a weakling compared with the giants of later years, had an important bearing upon the future of railway building in Dakota, it is deemed necessary and also interesting to follow its career after it became disconnected with all legal proceedings and controversies with the County of Yankton. So far as the railway company was concerned the controversy with the county terminated when the injunction was dissolved by Judge Barnes in 1873. Thenceforward the company was a free agent, and early in its career Mr. Meckling sold his interest in the road to the Messrs. Wicker, and not long after Mr. Charles G. Wicker was the sole owner and manager of the Dakota Southern and the old Sioux City and Pembina, which had become a part of the Dakota Southern system and had been extended twenty miles above Sioux City to a point called Portlandville, Iowa, on the Iowa side of the Big Sioux. The Dakota Southern was now, as it had been since its construction, operated in connection with the Chicago and Northwestern interests centering at Sioux City. At this time the Chicago and Northwestern possessed the Dakota field and it appears might have held it had it been watchful of its interests. Mr. John I. Blair, of New Jersey, then the railway leader of the Northwest, and owner of the Chicago and Northwestern in great part, and also owner of the roadbed of the Illinois Central, now enters the Dakota field only to be beaten and baffled and out-generated by the young giant of Milwaukee, a new comer.

On the 24th of May, 1879, Mr. John I. Blair and C. E. Vail, of Blairstown, New Jersey; D. C. Blair, of Belden, New Jersey; James Bain, of Scranton, Pennsylvania; W. C. Larned, of Chicago; C. G. Wicker and George E. Merchant, of the Dakota Southern R. R. Co., and F. C. Hills, of the Sioux City and Pacific; N. H. Briggs, son-in-law of Mr. Wicker, and his daughter, accompanied by Miss Hunter of Sioux City, reached Yankton. Mr Blair was at this time the railroad king of the Northwest, so regarded. He practically controlled the Chicago and Northwestern, the Sioux City and Pacific, and the St. Paul and Sioux City, which comprised all the lines centering at Sioux City except the Dakota Southern and its Big Sioux branch, the Sioux City and Pembina, which had been completed to Beloit, Iowa, opposite the City of Canton, D. T.

The purpose of this visit, as explained by Mr. Blair, was to look at the country and the railroad situation. There had already been some tentative proposition made to Mr. Blair, looking to the purchase of all or part of the Dakota Southern.

Blair said that the Illinois Central and Chicago and Northwestern roads realized the necessity of extending the feeders of their lines in Dakota, and prevent the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul from monopolizing the profitable traffic of this territory, which now passes over the lines first named. Mr. Blair and his party were here as the representatives of the Illinois Central and Northwestern, whose lines were owned by him and were operated on a lease.

Messrs. Blair and Wicker, and Merchant, and the New Jersey and Pennsylvania gentlemen, then made an overland trip to Firesteel, up the James River valley, eighty miles away, for the purpose of viewing the country, and were gone several days. The result of this trip was the purchase by Mr. Blair of a trifle over a one-half interest in the Dakota Southern and Sioux City and Pembina; and a proposition was made to the people of Yankton at a public meeting held for the purpose, to extend the Dakota Southern up the James River forthwith, provided Yankton would donate the right of way through the county, furnish depot grounds, and build a depot north of the Rhine Creek. Mr. Blair said the extension would be a great benefit to Yankton in view of the line of the Milwaukee already about constructed to Running Water which would cut off Yankton's trade. The Pembina was to be extended from Beloit to Sioux Falls, by way of Canton, forthwith. This was the beginning of Mr. Blair's connection with Dakota's railroad interests. Yankton agreed to the proposition made for the construction of the James River line and forthwith set about accomplishing its part of the agreement. The title of the "Dakota Southern" and the "Sioux City and Pembina," was then changed to the "Sioux City and Dakota Railway Company."

During the following summer and fall Mr. Wicker came to Yankton occasionally, and at each visit protested that he was anxious to begin work on the James River extension, giving various reasons as the cause of the delay and among these that Yankton had not fulfilled its part of the contract. This, however, was not the case, Yankton having performed all that it could do until the construction was started. Mr. Wicker's reasons for delay were not substantial reasons, and a sentiment grew up that the active and aggressive movements of the Milwaukee company in the James River valley and its Running Water line had dampened the ardor of the Dakota Southern people; and it transpired in January following that this was a correct conclusion. It was then announced on unquestioned authority that Mr. Wicker had determined to sell his remaining interest. He had sold to Mr. Blair fifty-two per cent of his lines, retaining forty-eight per cent. He now announced that the Milwaukee company had made a bid for the entire property, but Mr. Blair was not willing to sell and allow the Milwaukee company to obtain control of the northwestern outlet for his Iowa lines. Mr. Wicker insisted, however, that Mr. Blair must either join in the sale, or must purchase his interest.

The issue between Mr. Blair and Mr. Wicker was stated by the latter in these words:

Mr. Blair and myself differ as to the proper policy to be pursued by our Dakota lines. I think the Milwaukee should be allowed to come to Sioux City over our road from Beloit. Mr. Blair thinks otherwise. I have therefore proposed to him to buy or sell. When I sold Mr. Blair an interest in the road, it was contracted that I was to remain president for three years, and the road should be under my control. Now I think it for the best interests of our company to allow the Milwaukee to compete for Sioux City freight, and if I remain at the head of the affairs of the road, this will be its policy.

Sioux City's business interests were supposed to be friendly to the Milwaukee and to Mr. Wicker's policy, for the transportation business there was under the control of the Northwestern, hence there was a strong anti-monopoly sentiment among the business men.

Yankton's interests, though not clearly perceived at the time, were with the Northwestern controlling the Dakota Southern, for the Milwaukee had already entered upon the construction of its branch from Rock Rapids, Iowa, to Yankton, the right of way was all procured and grading going forward.

In February, 1880, it was given out that the Dakota Southern had been compelled to refuse the use of its line to the Milwaukee. At Sioux City, the Dakota Southern and Pembina had been using the yards of the Sioux City and Pacific—Blair's road—and Mr. Blair gave orders that no cars of the Milwaukee should be given further privilege. This action rendered nugatory Wicker's efforts to accommodate the Milwaukee, now a powerful rival of the lines at Sioux City. There was no avoiding the disastrous effects of this order, which made it plain that the Milwaukee company had no rights in Sioux City which the other lines were disposed to respect; therefore it might have been expected that rather desperate measures would have been resorted to to obtain relief. Hence the next step was one that brought matters to a focus. Mr. Wicker had not played his best card and it was now forthcoming.

On the 20th of June a number of railroad men happened to meet at Yankton. Their coming had not been publicly announced and they had apparently come from different points and by different routes, some by rail and others by democratic wagon. They apparently had no common purpose, but it transpired that they assembled at the office of the Dakota Southern, at Yankton, that day or evening. The parties there present were C. G. Wicker and Geo. E. Merchant, superintendent of the Sioux City and Dakota, and S. S. Merrill, general manager of the Milwaukee, General Carey, the solicitor, and other Milwaukee officials. At this meeting a lease was consummated which gave to the Milwaukee control of the Dakota lines of the Sioux City and Dakota, and at the conclusion of the meeting the following general orders were issued:

Office of the President of the Sioux City and Dakota Railroad Company,

Yankton, D. T., March 20, 1880.

To the officers, agents and employees of the Sioux City and Dakota Railroad Company:

The property of this company having been, by order of the board of directors, leased to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul R. R. Co., you are hereby notified that all orders and instructions for the running and operation of the road, will from this day be given by or through S. S. Merrill, general manager of the C. M. & St. Paul Railroad Company.

CHARLES G. WICKER, President.

Office of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company,

Yankton, D. T., March 20, 1880.

NOTICE. Mr. George E. Merchant has been duly appointed superintendent of the Sioux City and Dakota Division of the C. M. & St. P. R. R., extending from Yankton to Sioux City and from Sioux City to Sioux Falls. S. S. MERRILL, General Manager.

Mr. Wicker, with the view probably of justifying himself in the minds of his Dakota friends, with whom his business and social relations had been quite intimate for a number of years, gave out the following statement:

It has been generally known for a long time that I have been anxious to dispose of my interest in the lines of the Sioux City and Dakota Company. Short lines, independent of the protection and advantages afforded by connection with trunk lines, are not profitable, and I am $175,000 poorer than when I commenced the construction of the old Dakota Southern. Finally I sold a little more than a majority of the stock to John I. Blair, but fortunately retained control of the management. Last December I ascertained that the Milwaukee would buy the lines, and made overtures to Mr. Blair to either buy or sell so that the transfer could be made; so I could make a transfer. The Milwaukee first offered $8,750 per mile, but finally raised their bid to $9,000. Mr. Blair first agreed to sell at the latter price, but then changed his mind and refused to do so. I then insisted that if he would not sell he should buy, and Blair at last said he would give $8,750 per mile. I objected to this as we had an offer of $9,000. Thus the matter hung fire for a few days when Mr. Blair said he would take my interest rated at $9,000 per mile, and complete the trade January 1st. I wanted a memoranda to this effect, drawn up and signed, but Mr. Blair thought it so trifling a transaction, his word ought to be good for thirty days. The 1st of January came and Mr. Blair was not ready to close the bargain. He sent out here his attorney, Mr. Larned, who examined the books and papers of the company, and in a lengthy written opinion decided that the articles of incorporation of the Dakota Southern, of the Sioux City & Pembina, of the consolidation of the two, and the issue of preferred stock, were full of irregularities and of no binding force. Mr. Blair then informed me that the trade was off.

I then asked Mr. Blair what he would give me for my interest. Mr. B. replied that he would give nothing—that he did not consider my interest worth anything. I then became convinced that it was Blair's intention to freeze me out, that Larned's opinion was drawn to suit a purpose, and so I determined to save myself if I could. During this time Blair was negotiating to sell the whole thing out to the Sioux City & Pacific at $7,000 a mile. I ascertained that the Milwaukee folks were willing to take the lines, and in consultation with them and other railroad men, my course was blocked out. I had control of the board of directors, and all I wanted, to be master of the situation, was a majority of the stock, so that I could give the purchaser controlling interest. Mr. Blair had 52 per cent interest against my 48 per cent, with the Pembina branch completed to Beloit. With the extension of the line from the latter place to Sioux Falls the company was entitled to issue additional stock and bonds. A meeting was called and this was done. The additional stock issued on the extension added to what I already had, just over-sized Mr. Blair's interest, and this was transferred to the Milwaukee, leaving Blair in the minority, or just in the position I had been up to the time of the new issue. The board of directors then leased the Sioux City & Dakota to the Milwaukee for five years, though it is understood that practically the lease is a perpetual one, or at least may become such if the Milwaukee wills it, as the company now own a majority of the stock. On the 21st a dispatch was sent Mr. Blair informing him that the Sioux City & Dakota lines had been leased to the Milwaukee for five years for 40 per cent of their gross earnings, and that the bonds issued on the extension from Beloit to Sioux Falls had also been sold to the same company for 90 per cent of their par value. The same night a letter was sent him containing a draft for $698,276.47, payable to his order, and representing his entire investment in the lines, including interest to date. This indicates that there has been no intention to defraud Mr. Blair out of any money he may have put in these enterprises, but as he would neither buy nor sell, he has just been forced to take his own and step down and out.

This is probably the first time in his long and successful career that Mr. Blair had been outwitted. It was expected he would test the legality of the transfer in the courts. The Milwaukee company felt secure; having thoroughly examined the situation previous to the transaction, under the direction of General Carey, their general solicitor and then eminent as a railroad attorney and authority.

On Saturday evening, March 27th, just a week following the Wicker Merrill meeting, John I. Blair reached Yankton, and his manner betrayed that a matter of importance burdened his mind, while his countenance and his few words expressed unfeigned indignation. He was accompanied by Dewitt C. Blair and Walter C. Larned, all of whom were directors of the Dakota Southern Railroad Company. The object of their visit was to investigate the method by which they had been divested of their majority ownership in the Sioux City and Dakota Railroad, and that thoroughfare transferred to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company. Mr. Blair first learned of the transaction last named on the 22d, while in New York, from an Associated Press dispatch in a New York paper. Mr. Wicker had previously notified Mr. Blair that a meeting of the board of directors had been ordered for the purpose of arranging for the payment of taxes, but made no allusion whatever to the leasing or sale of the property. Mr. Blair claimed that the action taken was nothing less than a conspiracy to defraud him of his rights. On the same evening a meeting was held at the office of the company in Yankton, called at the request of stockholders holding a majority of the stock in the Sioux City and Dakota company, at which meeting there were present John I. Blair, Dewitt C. Blair and Walter C. Larned, of Chicago, Illinois, all directors and stockholders of said company. At this meeting the following proceedings were had:

On motion it was unanimously resolved to adjourn to the Merchants Hotel, Yankton and upon meeting at the Merchants Hotel, it was unanimously resolved to adjourn to the law office of Gamble Brothers, at said Yankton. On meeting pursuant to adjournment it was moved and thereupon resolved that S. P. Winsner be and is hereby appointed secretary pro tem. On motion, D. C. Blair, vice president of the company, was nominated appointed chairman of the meeting. The following preamble and resolutions were then presented and upon motion of Walter C. Larned, were unanimously adopted:

Whereas, At a meeting of four of the directors of the Sioux City & Dakota Railroad Company, held at Yankton, Dakota, on the 20th day of March, A. D. 1880, it was resolved, that the entire property, real and personal, of the Sioux City & Dakota Railroad Company, should be leased to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, for the term of five years at a yearly rental of 40 per cent of the gross earnings of said Sioux City & Dakota Railroad;

And, Whereas, It was at said meeting further resolved that a mortgage or trust deed should be made upon that portion of said railroad extending from Beloit to Sioux Falls, a distance of about twenty-two and one-half miles, to secure bonds to the amount of $170,000, and that said stock should immediately be sold at not less than twenty-five cents on the dollar; and

Whereas, In pursuance of such resolutions such mortgage was immediately executed and such bonds and stock issued and sold; the bonds at ninety cents on the dollar and the stock at twenty-five cents on the dollar, to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, or some party acting on behalf of said corporation, and the said lease was immediately executed and the possession of all the property, real and personal, of the Sioux City & Dakota Railroad Company was immediately surrendered and turned over to the said Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company; and

Whereas, That said mortgage and the said issue of said bonds and stock, and said lease have never been authorized by the stockholders of the said Sioux City & Dakota Railroad Company, nor have the said stockholders been connseled in reference to any of said acts and doings; and all of said proceedings are fraudulent and void as against said stockholders; and

Whereas, a meeting of said company has been called to meet at the office of said company at Yankton, on Saturday evening, March 27th, by request of the holders of the majority of the stock of said Sioux City & Dakota Railroad Company; and

Whereas, The directors now present at said meeting, that is to say, John I. Blair, Dewitt C. Blair, and Walter C. Larned, represent and themselves hold, a majority of the stock of said company, that is, 776 and 710, the shares out of the 1,500 shares issued by the said company at the time said meeting was held on the said March 20th, said shares having been allotted to said parties as their stock in the said Sioux City & Dakota Railroad Company in exchange for 310 shares of the preferred stock of the Dakota Southern Railroad Company out of a total issue of 600 shares; and 760 shares out of a total issue of 1,500 shares of common stock of said Dakota Southern Railroad Company; and 160 shares out of a total issue of 300 shares of the Sioux City and Pembina Railroad Company, said two last named companies having been consolidated or attempted so to be, into Sioux City & Dakota Railroad Company. Now therefore, be it

Resolved, That the said lease so executed as aforesaid, is fraudulent and void, and that the said issue of bonds is fraudulent and void, and that we, directors of said company and the holders of a majority of its stock as aforesaid, do hereby rescind the said action of the said four directors and do declare the same to be unauthorized, fraudulent and void, and we do hereby declare all the acts and doings to be unauthorized, fraudulent, void, and of no effect, and we do wholly and utterly repudiate the said lease and mortgage and issue of bonds and stock, and declare the same to be of no binding force or effect upon said company.

And be it further resolved, That we, three of the directors of said company, here present and representing a majority of the stock of said company, do hereby protest against the action of the said four directors, and declare the said action to have been taken in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme on the part of said four directors, representing a small minority of said stock, to defraud the majority of the said stockholders, and to depreciate the value of their said stock, and to fraudulently dispose of, alienate and transfer the said railroad property in fraud of the rights of the majority of said stockholders.

And be it further Resolved, That we, three directors of said road and representatives of a majority of its stock as aforesaid, do protest against the action of Charles G. Wicker, the president of said railroad company, in calling said directors' meeting to be held on said March 20th, without giving any notice of the nature of the business to be transacted at said meeting, and do further protest against the action of said Charles G. Wicker, president of said company, in notifying the said three directors here present and representing and holding a majority of the said stock that no action of importance was to be taken at said meeting, but on the contrary said meeting was to be merely formal, and to carry out certain formal requisitions of the laws of Dakota; and we do declare said action to be grossly fraudulent, and a breach of trust on the part of said Charles G. Wicker.

And be it further Resolved, That the secretary pro tem of this meeting, prepare or cause to be prepared, a copy of these resolutions, and that the same be presented to one Milligan, now in possession of the books of said company, and calling himself the secretary thereof, accompanied by a demand that he spread the same upon the records of said company, and that a copy of these resolutions be prepared or caused to be prepared by said secretary pro tem, and served upon Mr. Van Horn, general superintendent, and Mr. S. S. Merrill, general manager, of said Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, accompanied with a formal demand upon the said Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company, to deliver up possession forthwith of the said Sioux City & Dakota Railroad and its property to the said directors owning and controlling, holding a majority of the said stock, as aforesaid.

D. C. BLAIR,
Director and Vice President of the Sioux City & Dakota Railroad.
JOHN I. BLAIR AND WALTER C. LARNED, Directors.
S. P. WISNER, Secretary, pro tem.

On the 17th of April, 1880, an action was begun in the District Court of Yankton County by Mr. Blair in his own behalf and in behalf of all the stockholders interested with him, asking an injunction to restrain the Milwaukee company from exercising the function of manager of the road, and requesting the appointment of a receiver. Gamble Brothers, of Yankton, represented Mr. Blair as attorneys. At the same time Mr. Blair's complaint was filed, setting forth mainly:

That negotiations had been pending last November, in which the Milwaukee Company had endeavored to purchase of Mr. Blair the Dakota & Sioux City lines, but were not successful for the reason that Mr. Blair refused to sell.

That in the summer of 1879 a contract was made between the Sioux City & Dakota Railroad Company of the first part; and the Chicago & Northwestern; the Illinois Central, and the Sioux City & Pacific, of the second part, by which the Dakota lines were to receive a 10 per cent drawback or profit on all freight shipped on either of the three roads; further, that the three roads agreed to ship iron for the Dakota lines at a very low rate.

That Blair and Wicker had agreed for an extension of the Dakota Southern branch for a distance of 150 miles north or northeast of Yankton, which would bring increased business.

That Blair had built the extension of the Pembina line from Beloit to Sioux Falls, a distance of 22½ miles; no other person furnishing any money, at a cost of about two hundred thousand dollars.

That in order to defraud Blair of his interest, a secret understanding was entered into between Wicker and Milwaukee officials, that a directors' meeting of the Sioux City & Dakota Company should be called on March 20, 1880, and that control of the road should be passed over to the Milwaukee; that a mortgage should be given on the Beloit extension to Sioux Falls for about one hundred and ninety eight thousand dollars; and that shares amounting to about one hundred and seventy-six thousand dollars should be issued to Alexander Mitchell, or someone in the interest of the Milwaukee Company; the mortgage to contain a provision that if interest was defaulted for thirty days, the entire mortgage to become due and be foreclosed.

That Blair was not informed that such proceedings were intended at such meeting. That four directors of the company met at such meeting, to wit: C. G. Wicker, W. W. Brookings, George E. Merchant, and N. B. Briggs; and that S. S. Merrill, manager of the Milwaukee, and John W. Carey, solicitor, were present, and came with the bonds printed and prepared and a trust deed prepared and acknowledged by John Johnson, a person in the interest of the Milwaukee, two days prior, in Milwaukee. That resolutions were passed; bonds executed that night, and mortgage recorded the same night; and Mr. Wicker transferred to Mitchell all his stock; and the road was fraudulently turned over and taken possession of by the Milwaukee.

That the lease provides for a rental of 40 per cent of the gross earnings.

That the Milwaukee Company has entire control of the freight passing over the road, and it is for their interest to ship nearly all of it on a competing line running to Running Water, owned by the Milwaukee, and to turn all freight coming by way of Sioux Falls east from Canton. That as there is no guarantee that there will be any freight on the Dakota lines—it being in the interest of the Milwaukee to ship on their own lines—the 40 per cent rental may be reduced by the Milwaukee to a mere nominal sum, rendering the stock of Blair and others, practically worthless.

That the real object of the Milwaukee in securing this control, was to defeat the extension north from Yankton, of the Sioux City & Dakota line, and give the Milwaukee entire monopoly of the railroad business in Southern Dakota.

The Supreme Court of the territory was in session at the time this complaint was entered, and a decision on its application was not expected until its adjournment. In the meantime the Dakota lines were operated by the Milwaukee management.

The case of Mr. John I. Blair against the directors of the Sioux City and Dakota Railroad Company was heard by Judge Peter C. Shannon, chief justice, on the 10th of June, 1880. Mr. Blair asks the court to enjoin the Milwaukee company from operating the road, and also for an order setting aside the lease to the latter company. The demand for a receiver had been withdrawn by Blair at the hearing in May.

The proceedings at this hearing were interesting as showing some of the details of prior transactions. When Mr. Blair secured an interest in the Dakota Southern and Pembina roads he purchased 3,100 shares of preferred stock for 15 cents on the dollar, and 4,776 shares of common stock for 7½ mills on the dollar, making his total investment by which he secured 52 per cent of the stock on the two roads named for $50,000. He afterwards furnished the money for the construction of the road from Beloit to Sioux Falls, about two hundred thousand dollars, a distance of 22½ miles. Mr. Blair had presented the draft for $198,000, sent him by Mr. Wicker, which had been paid.

At a meeting of the board of directors of the Sioux City and Dakota Company held June 12th, it was ordered that the president, Mr. Wicker, proceed to construct what is known as the Elk Point cut-off, and also a line from Yankton to Scotland, and to issue stock and mortgage bonds upon said extensions to the amount of $8,000 per mile, and directing that the bonds shall not be sold for less than 90 cents, or the stock for less than 25 cents on the dollar. At this stage J. R. Gamble, attorney for Mr. Blair, served upon the directors an order from the District Court enjoining them from the issue of the proposed stock. Mr. Blair still had $50,000 interest in the road represented by his 52 per cent of the stock.

In this hearing Mr. Blair asks for a restraining order upon the ground that the directors of the Sioux City and Dakota Railroad Company and the Milwaukee company, by the proposed issue of stock are actuated by a motive to fraudulently deprive him of the control of the former road to which he is lawfully entitled by the ownership of the 52 per cent of its stock. The defendants on the other hand deny any such intention. They aver that their only desire is to add to its facilities and value, and to enable them to do this they propose to follow the policy practiced by railroad corporations—issue stocks and bonds upon which to raise the money required. Bartlett Tripp and General Carey in their argument, stated that they would agree to a stipulation that the proposed issue of stock should be put up at auction and so sold to the highest bidder. If this was not satisfactory then they would agree—and they made a written proposition to this effect—that the court should make an order that the stock on the Elk Point cut-off on the line from Yankton to Scotland, should not be sold for less than 100 cents on the dollar; that Mr. Blair should have an opportunity of taking it at that price, and if he did not choose to do so, then the Milwaukee company would take it dollar for dollar, furnish the money, and cause the immediate construction of the line from Yankton to Scotland.

The closing arguments indicated that the whole matter depended on the validity of the lease, and the roads and the court took the whole matter under consideration.

As a counter-proposition for the building of the Yankton-Scotland line, Mr. Blair authorized the statement from him that if the Milwaukee line desires to build that line, he (Blair) will furnish one-half the money required, without the issue of stock or bonds, and when the questions now in court are decided, if they are decided against him then the Milwaukee company is to refund to him the money he puts in and own the road; but if the decision is in his favor he will pay to the Milwaukee company the money it has advanced and he will own the road. The Milwaukee company declined to accept this proposition.

As there was substantial sentiment among the citizens of Yankton in favor of the speedy completion of the Scotland line, these propositions for building the road from each of the litigants, were doubtless intended to throw the responsibility for the delay on the "other fellow."

In July following Judge Shannon rendered his decision on the application of Mr. Blair for an order restraining the Sioux City and Dakota from building the line to Scotland and issuing bonds and stock for that purpose. The judge denied the order, and left the company free to proceed with their plans for the construction of that line.

This decision of the court was followed a month later by a sale of Mr. Blair's interest in the Sioux City and Dakota lines and the abandonment of litigation. The Milwaukee company became sole owners of the lines, and sole monarch of the railway transportation interests of Southeastern Dakota a position it has not since relinquished.

A reorganization meeting was held at Yankton, about the 27th of July, in the directors car of the Milwaukee road (having adjourned from the depot), at which the resignations of the old board of directors of the lines were received and accepted, Mr. Blair and Mr. Wicker included. A new board of directors was chosen consisting of Alexander Mitchell, M. Meyers, S. S. Merrill, J. W. Carey and W. C. VanHorn, to which were added W. W. Brookings and Geo. E. Merchant, representing Dakota. Mitchell was elected president of the road and Carey vice president. P. M. Meyers was elected secretary. The matter of extending the line to Scotland was favorably considered, but nothing definite was done. The termination of this contest was not advantageous to Yankton; it would have been vastly better served had Blair been successful, for in that case Yankton would have gained the Milwaukee which at that time was under construction from the Big Sioux; which would have given it a competing line to Chicago. When the Milwaukee absorbed Mr. Blair's Dakota Southern interest it dropped this extension leaving the road bed partially graded.

Mr. Blair did not handle his advantage in Southeastern Dakota with his accustomed shrewdness and ability. He had the entire territory south of Sioux Falls and a line extending west from that point, in his own hands at the opening of 1870, and doubtless this advantage was apparent to him when he secured the majority ownership in the Wicker properties. He had also the entire transportation interests of Sioux City, except the steamboat lines, under his control, and yet his competitor was able to wrest all his Dakota holdings and exclude him from the field in a little more than a twelvemonth after it entered the territory. The Milwaukee was aggressive and adventurous—Mr. Blair was timid and uncertain. He apparently failed to realize even partially what the development of this country would do for the transportation interest. He had also passed the age when ambition seeks for aggrandizement; he had been a great force in the railway development of Iowa where he was given a clear field and little opposition; but when he came against uncompromising competition in his own field he lacked the combative qualities essential to success.

Our history has followed the legal steps of this famous case through the courts to the highest tribunal in the Government, in order to clear away any erroneous opinions that may linger in the minds of any portion of our people regarding Yankton County's responsibility for the delay in paying the interest on the bonded debt; and also to show that the people of the county had no part in instituting any legal proceedings that might have resulted in invalidating the bonds. In other words the people had never harbored any purpose, even remotely, of repudiating the debt. The most that can be urged in favor of such a charge is, that long after the collection of the interest payable on the railroad bonds had been enjoined by the court, and in the new light which the litigation had furnished, there were many who saw a probability of relief from the debt through Congress providing for its payment, inasmuch as the territory had been denied the aid of a grant of land to any of her territorial railroad enterprises, while such favors had not been withheld from other territories and states contiguous to Dakota.

INDIAN AGENCIES AND INDIANS

A journey by way of the Missouri River to the Indian agencies and military posts bordering that stream in 1872, which at that time was a great commercial artery sustaining a fleet of seventy-five steamboats, was undertaken by a party composed of those desirous of getting some information at first hands concerning the condition of the Sioux Indians, who were then officially located along the river, but the great majority of each tribe was off in the interior on their summer hunt. These Indians, at this time, were presumed to be taking their initial steps in learning something of the white man's ways of living and making a living. The Government was exerting its authority to make successful the new "peace policy," but had not made much progress in inducing the Indians to adopt the industrial features of the new plan and the Spotted Tail and Red Cloud Indian agencies had not yet been settled in a permanent locality, but were being located satisfactorily during this season. Entering upon their errand at the Santee agency, opposite Springfield, Dakota, the scribe selected by the party of journeying inquisitors, made notes, as follows:

On the Nebraska side we come to the first Indian agency, that of the Santee Sioux. This is a portion of the tribes which were engaged in the massacre of whites in Minnesota several years ago. (Little Crow's, 1862.) They give the most promise of civilization at present of any portion of the great Sioux family. They number about one thousand, and are in charge of the Friends, though the Presbyterians and Episcopalians have missions there with schools and churches.

A. M. Janney, agent of the Santee Sioux Indians, resigned that position in June, 1871, and J. P. Webster, another Quaker brother from Pennsylvania, succeeded him. The Quakers had been conceded, under the new peace policy of President Grant, the care and instruction of all the Santee Sioux, together with the management of their intercourse with the Government; and their administration during the two years' incumbency of Mr. Janney, had disclosed their fitness for governing the savage people successfully. The Santees had made surprising advancement in the brief time they had been under the tutelage and direction of the peace loving sect that, under William Penn, had rescued Pennsylvania's tribes from barbarism without resort to war, and the practical adaptation of the Penn policy among the Santees had been crowned with a success as complete as it was gratifying, especially to the Quaker brotherhood.

The Indians dress to a considerable extent in citizen's clothes—are quite industrious—for Indians, and many of them live in log houses instead of tepees. A large portion of their lands have been allotted to them in severalty. Some three years ago a number of families of this tribe, dissatisfied with the delay in allotting their lands, left their reservation and took homesteads on the Sioux River in Moody County. In doing so they renounced all tribal relations, and considering the obstacles they had overcome have succeeded wonderfully. They had nothing but their bare hands, with a few axes and agricultural implements to begin with, but they have built houses, and have raised enough to sustain themselves. The settlement now comprises about fifty families; they have schools and churches, and are good sober citizens. They certainly deserve encouragement. This is the first and so far as we are aware, the only instance where Indians have voluntarily left their reservation, where they were furnished food and clothing, and have in so short a time become entirely self-sustaining.

A few miles above the Santee Agency is the mouth of the Niobrara River, which enters the Missouri from the west and formed the southern boundary of Dakota for some two hundred miles. (This was an error. The Niobrara formed the southern boundary as far west as where it received the waters of the Keba Paha, thence up that stream to the 43d parallel and thence west along that parallel.) Lying north of the Niobrara and west of the Missouri the Ponca Indians have a reservation of 75,000 acres. As they number but about 750 persons this gives them about 100 acres each. They have 400 acres under cultivation, and last year raised 600 bushels of wheat and about 6,000 bushels of corn. The agency is in charge of the Episcopal Mission, with Maj. A. J. Carrier as agent, and the Indians are well advanced toward civilization. They are not Sioux and bear no relation to them but one of unremitting enmity. Hemmed in as they are by their natural enemies, they are liable to raids from hostile bands west of them and neither their ponies or scalps are safe if they get away many miles from their agency. They were once a powerful tribe, and are yet large and well built, and the superior, both in strength and courage, to the Sioux. They are very nearly self-sustaining and live almost exclusively in log houses, receiving less assistance than any tribe on the river. Living in constant fear of the Sioux, however, and being so few in number, they have not much ambition for the future, and the tribe has seen its best days.

Directly across the Missouri, on the eastern shore, is the reservation of the Yankton Sioux. It extends thirty miles up the river to a point opposite Fort Randall, and contains 400,000 acres. The tribe numbers nearly two thousand and is entirely peaceable and advancing toward civilization. The Episcopalians and Presbyterians both have churches at Greenwood, the agency, and schools at several places on the reservation. Many of the Indians live in log houses, but they only take moderately well to farming.

The first military post is that of Fort Randall. It is 100 miles by river and seventy-five by land from Yankton, the capital. It is in command of Col. Elmer S. Otis, and is situated on the west bank of the river. Twenty miles above the fort is the Whetstone Agency, which was one of the most important on the river until last year, when the main agency, with all of Spotted Tail's Indians, was removed about one hundred and twenty-five miles west to a new location on the Rosebud Creek, a tributary of White River. Some few Indians remain at the old agency. We doubt if the transfer of this agency was really a good one. It certainly was not for the Government, which has now to transport the Indian goods so far overland; and the Indians, who had shown strong indications of civilization, and had many advantages which they are now deprived of, are now located so near the hostile tribes that it will be hard for them to behave themselves, even if they want to be good. But the removal was made at the urgent demand of a very large majority of the Indians with Spotted Tail, its insistent advocate.

We are now coming to the Indian country where white men are regarded as intruders, and where their scalps are at a premium.

White River empties into the Missouri at about latitude 43 degrees and 30 minutes, and is one of the most important tributary streams of this section. Spotted Tail's Indians are known as Brules of the Platte. Closely allied to these are the Lower Brules, who crop out along the Missouri above the mouth of the White River. They have a sub-agency on the west side of the Missouri eight miles below Crow Creek or Fort Thompson, the main agency being at the latter place. The Lower Brules are not nice Indians by a good deal and do not civilize very fast.

At the main agency at Crow Creek, or Fort Thompson, which is on the east side of the river, the lower Yanktonnais band is located. These Indians are much better disposed than the Lower Brules, and considering surrounding discouragements they promise exceedingly well. They are fortunate in having a model agent—Maj. H. E. Livingston—who has charge. He has been among them several years, at first as their physician, and has their entire confidence and respect. He is painstaking, ready to listen to them, and has reached that point where they know that his "No" is the end of the matter. He has demonstrated most satisfactorily the true theory of managing Indians by his own course towards some of the worst on the river. He has made them but few promises, but these he has kept, and while holding them just as scrupulously to their work, none of their requests have been too insignificant to receive his attention. A good Indian agent is a very difficult thing to find. Between the eastern theorist, who has no real knowledge of Indian character, and the western man, who "knows all about him" and believes him a scoundrel through and through, the redskins are being treated to a great variety of training, and are having a pretty good chance to study white men.

Two hundred miles above Fort Randall by stage road, and about three hundred by river, is Fort Sully, Crow Creek being about half way between the two. Fort Sully is the finest and best built military post on the river, and is headquarters of the military division. General Stanley, who is in command, is now absent in charge of the exploration party which left Fort Rice recently. The military escort comprises a force 1,200 strong, well armed and equipped, the object being to furnish safe conduct to General Rosser and his party of engineers in search of a route for the Northern Pacific Railroad west of the Missouri. The Indians feel intensely hostile towards them and would do them serious damage if they dared to. Fort Sully is in communication with Sioux City by telegraph, and keeps pretty well posted regarding the affairs of the world at large. They have the press reports telegraphed through from Yankton every morning. The officers indulge in fine horses and hunting dogs, and have a decidedly active world of their own.

Fifteen miles above Sully, on the west bank, we come to the "worst agency on the river"—Cheyenne. The Indians here have never been anything else than hostile; but they have been going backward rather than forward of late. They have had for a year or more an agent from New York City, a theorist, who promises well but performs wretchedly. He was soon at loggerheads with the military and with all the white men there. When we left, the arrival of his successor on the boat behind us was anxiously looked for. I do not imagine he was a bad man at heart, but he was made up of theories which would not work, and he was incensed and provoked because they would not. Matters had reached that condition when two soldiers had been waylaid and shot within a week before our arrival, and the Indians had engaged in a genuine war dance on last ration day. When it is considered that some seven thousand Indians draw rations here, the situation cannot but be regarded as serious. For some miles below, the villages, composed of canvas tents and tepees, dotted the hillsides, while their horses could be numbered by thousands. It is in these horses or ponies that the wealth of these wild Indians is counted. They do not pretend to plant anything, and they raise no other kind of stock except dogs. Many of their ponies are small, trim and neatly formed, but most of their horses are "American" ones. They are not anxious to sell them but a fair one can be bought for from forty to fifty dollars, the money afterward going to the post trader for about half its value in beads and blankets. A motley crowd of five or six hundred gathered at the landing place of the boat, and we had an opportunity of witnessing a bit of tomahawking done scientifically. Two squaws were standing with the crowd quite near the boat, when one suddenly drew her tomahawk and attacked the other. The first blow cut a piece out of the side of her head, and the second was still better aimed, but her weapon caught in her blanket and the blow fell short. By this time the warrior squaw was secured, and the wounded one taken away to be treated. We afterwards learned that the cause of the quarrel was the old story of jealousy. An old chief, Lone Horn, had one old squaw and took another not so old. He seemed to like the younger one best. The older one grew jealous, concluded to kill her rival, and undertook to do this in as public a manner as possible. We learned some time later that Lone Horn, in order to get rid of his domestic troubles, abandoned both and made a new alliance.

These wild Indians look much healthier and stronger than those who are more civilized and are cultivating the arts of civilization. All these wild Indians retain their custom of burying their dead on scaffolds, and in the upper country these scaffolds are always in sight, perched upon the highest point of land. The dead are never buried in the ground, but are wrapped in their blanket or robe and laid upon poles some ten feet high. A favorite horse is usually killed also and laid under the scaffold to bear his master away to the "happy hunting grounds." These scaffolds are guarded with the greatest care. They appear so frail, and located as they are in the most exposed places, one would suppose they could not remain standing long. The captain pointed out one that he had himself known as a landmark for the past sixteen years.

Big Cheyenne River, above the Cheyenne Agency, rises in the region of the Black Hills in the western portion of the territory, the two main branches almost completely encircling them. These hills take their name from the immense pine forests which cover the upper part of them, making them appear quite black in the distance. They are known to be rich in gold, silver, lead, and other minerals. A great excitement was raised last spring in regard to them, and several expeditions were planned at Yankton and other points, for the purpose of exploring them despite the opposition of the Indians. The Government stepped in, however, and proclaimed, through the military, that no such expedition would be permitted. The expedition furore then subsided. The hills are located at the very heart of the hostile Indian country, and any invasion of them at this time would meet with their determined and violent opposition. It is evident, however, that their full exploration cannot be much longer delayed, as the stories which have been told concerning them have aroused the old spirit among miners and adventurers who act upon the principle that no man, especially no "bloody redskin," who cares nothing about gold and silver, and to whom it is of no value, shall act the dog in the manger, and prevent people from getting it who want it and can make use of it.

Antoine LeBeaux, the little French wood-chopper, whom we took on board a few miles above Cheyenne Agency, at his woodyard on the east or "peaceable" side of the Missouri, has been a resident of the West for many years, and had enough of exciting adventure in the Platte Region in Nebraska, to satisfy even a frontier-man. He is as familiar with all this section of the West as a school boy is with his own township, having tramped over it when the Indians had a much wider range, and when they did not think it necessary to watch their possessions with so jealous an eye. Antoine talks English fairly, is modest and unassuming, and imparts his information without evincing any spirit of exaggeration. He has one squaw wife, I know, but I will not say he has two. He is quite fond of his family and a genuine affection for his children, who he says shall have anything they want that is good for them so long as they are obedient and industrious. He keeps a herd of cows, has plenty of chickens, and can get an antelope whenever he wants one. In this respect he is quite above the average wood-chopper found along the river, who live in a log hut called a "shack," unless he prepares for feeding and lodging the way-farer, when his domicile is called a "chuck-house." His usual diet is short-cake and molasses, with bacon and whiskey to give him the proper nerve, and his favorite amusements are playing poker and firing at a mark. When a number of these fellows are met together by chance, with perhaps a cattle contractor and herder or two, this latter propensity is manifested in a lively way. Pistol balls fly around the room pretty thickly, a favorite trick being to snuff a candle held on the head or in the hand of another. When it is considered that they are somewhat inebriated, it is a wonder that more are not killed in these jollifications. But this seldom occurs. The sober, quiet man, who declines to join in these festivities, is in more actual danger at such a time, as somebody usually finds it necessary to force a quarrel upon him. These men have also good traits. They are generous, hospitable, and thoroughly honest in their dealings with each other. If the shack is graced with a female, it is always a squaw, of course. No other woman would go there to live; and the woodman has another motive in marrying a squaw, for he thereby expects to secure himself from molestation from her tribe, and he can learn through her of any hostile designs upon him or his neighbors. But this matrimonial connection has its drawbacks also, for the squaw is found to have any number of "cousins" who are glad to visit their fortunate relative and who must be fed, otherwise he is put down as a "seche pale face."

At Grand River Agency at the mouth of Grand River, about half way between Forts Sully and Rice, about seven thousand Indians belonging to five bands of Sioux are subsisted. They are not all there all the time, especially during the summer, when many of them prefer the hostile camps, but there is a good sized delegation to be fed, and their tepees and ponies dot the hills for several miles above and below the agency. One band, the Lower Yanktonais, under Two Bears, are located on the east side of the river, and are giving their attention quite zealously to farming. Col. J. C. O'Connor is the agent and an excellent official. His Indians are inclined to be hostile, but he keeps them well under the curb and let. These Indians are opposed to the extension of the Northern Pacific Railroad west of the river, and will fight it if they are not kept in subjection by a good force of soldiers and a wise and alert agent. A healthy effect was produced upon these Indians, July 4th, '90, on exhibition of the power of cannon, the commander of the post desiring to show them that they could not get out of his reach in a minute. The distance at which he was able to throw the shells and their explosion after they "got there" was a source of profound astonishment to the chiefs and braves. They were still more at loss to understand the Galing gun, which "takes in the bullets like a coffee-mill and scatters them like a hail storm." Here at Grand River is the finest collection of Indian curiosities on the river. All the war implements have seen much service.

Fort Rice is found to be finely located on an elevated plateau, on the west bank of the river, and in command of Gen. T. J. Crittenden. The North Pacific crossing is about fifty miles above Fort Rice by land, but twice that distance by river. We reached there at an early hour in the morning. The place is infested by mosquitoes to such an extent that they are regarded as dangerous. Mosquito bars are used extravagantly. We were wrapped up in them laid on three or four deep, and yet these did not protect. The insects have long sharp bills, that penetrate thick clothing; while sleeping, unless covered from head to foot with thick blankets, is out of the question. It is not impossible to eat, but we sat at table with our heads swathed in mosquito netting and handled our food with gloved hands. The country about the proposed crossing is much better than I had expected to find from the information I had. There is a good supply of timber and straggling poplar, tall mesquite, cottonwood is harder and much better than that further south.

The new military fort, "Fort McKean," was definitely located August 24th. It is three miles south of the mouth of Heart River on the west bank of the Missouri. It occupies a very high point, commanding a view of forty or sixty miles in every direction.

The railroad town, called Edwinton, is on the east side of and about twenty miles back from the Missouri River. It is handsomely located and already has a population of about seven hundred. The railroad will not be completed to the Missouri until some time next year. Surveys are being prosecuted west of the river under the protection of 1,200 troops commanded by General Stanley, this being considered necessary to keep the Indians from preventing the surveys, which they declare they are determined to do, and have already made some harmless attacks. As it will not be practicable to keep this military guard and probably a much larger one, as work on the road progresses, it is being arranged to take a large delegation of the different recalcitrant tribes to Washington for the purpose of amicably adjusting the difficulty. This would have been done earlier, but the Indians are slow to move, doubtless expecting to gain advantage by delay. Their leading men realize that the road will be built, but they are desirous of making the Government pay them well for being good.

Our trip west and north must terminate here as our cargo belongs to the military stationed here at Fort McKean, with some shipments of merchandise to individuals at and around Edwinton, who are preparing to become the pioneer merchants of the town that will grow up at the railroad terminus.

Fort McKean was found too exposed to the elements and too inaccessible on the high point on which it had been built, and was abandoned and a new fort constructed on the lowland and named Fort Abraham Lincoln.

During the latter part of 1872 a military post was erected at Cheyenne Agency and called Fort Bennett, and garrisoned by United States troops. The step was deemed necessary to protect the agency and control the insolent and unruly classes among the Indians. Fort Sully was fifteen miles away, on the east bank of the river, and in case of emergency could not extend assistance.

WILLIAM WELCH'S VISIT

William Welch, Doctor Paddock and Colonel Kemble, composing the executive committee on Indian affairs of the Episcopal Church, accompanied by Mrs. Rumney, a devoted missionary woman who desired to inform herself regarding the conditions of the Indians, made an official visit to the various Indian agencies in Dakota in the summer of 1872, which had been placed by the Government in their charge. These agencies included the Yankton, Lower Brule, Crow Creek and Cheyenne on the Missouri River, and the Rosebud or Spotted Trail west of the river. They reported, after their visit and investigation, that the material condition of the Indians was better than they expected to find it. The Indians generally were contented, and, for Indians, quite industrious, and thoroughly peaceable. A number of missionaries from this church were placed in the Indian field at this time. The Cheyenne agency provided for about 7,000 Sioux—many of them—in fact most of them not yet weaned from the chase and the wild ways of Indians, though apparently disposed toward peace with the whites, but omitting no opportunity to battle with other nations of their race, including the Crows, Mandans, Gros Ventres and Rees. It was furthermore charged and well supported that the Cheyenne agency, owing to the great numbers of Indians who were provided for at that point under treaties, furnished an asylum for thousands of hostile Indians, many of whom were at this time making trouble under the direction of the crafty Sitting Bull, along the proposed route of the Northern Pacific Railroad west of the Missouri River. These savages could aid Sitting Bull in his predatory warfare and then could return to this agency and draw their rations without being detected, and in this way the Government was feeding and supporting a large contingency of the force that was opposing the troops sent out to protect the engineers who were engaged in running the lines for the future railway to the Pacific. While this was known to be practiced, the utmost vigilance failed to discover the individual Indians who were guilty. The friendly Indians who, it was morally certain, knew these hostile parties, could not be induced to betray them. The absence of such parties from the agency did not necessarily mean that they had gone to assist the hostiles, it being a custom of the Indians to go out for a hunt or for other peaceable purposes and remain away for weeks. It seemed they were free to go and come, though not permitted to go beyond their own reservation, but there was no one to watch them and ascertain whether they violated their privileges. The military people repeatedly charged that the agency Indians furnished Sitting Bull with much of his best equipped army. Major Bingham, a very worthy and competent man as his subsequent career proved, was installed as agent here in 1872, superseding the military agent, Major Kues, who returned to the army.

The winter of 1871-72 had been severe west of the Missouri. The Indians lost hundreds of ponies, and a number of their women and children perished. Thousands of buffalo, in various herds, unable to paw through deep snow for grass, perished of starvation. Snow fell on fifty-six days between the 1st of December, 1871, and February 28, 1872, and a number of blizzardy storms, lasting from two to three days, were experienced within the snowy period.

TERRITORIAL POLITICAL SITUATION

The settlements made by white people at various points in the northern part of the territory, notably on the line of the Northern Pacific, introduced a new factor into the political arena of the territory, and gave to those new communities, properly enough, considerable importance in the eyes of the politicians of the older settled sections south.

The year 1872 was an important one politically. A President of the United States was to be elected, and General Ulysses S. Grant, with Hon. Henry Wilson, of Massachusetts, as his running mate, was the candidate of the republican party for a second term; opposed on the democratic side by Horace Greeley and E. Gratz Brown, of Missouri, who were the candidates in fact of the liberal republican party, but had been tacitly endorsed by a convention of the democratic party, which made no nominations, though subsequently a special democratic convention was held and nominated a straight democratic ticket composed of Charles O'Connor and John Quincy Adams. This liberal republican movement was well represented in the territory.

In the new northern sections which had recently been occupied, and had grown to numerous bodies of voters, the regular old line republicans were largely in the majority, but there was considerable dissatisfaction apparent regarding the apportionment of legislative representatives in 1871, also in the number of delegates apportioned to that section by the territorial committees of the leading parties, which resulted in the organization of a separate party and a separate ticket by the republicans of Cass County, where it was claimed a large number of voters resided. The claim was made that in the Red River Valley there were nearly two thousand legal voters, and as many more along the line of the Northern Pacific road to Bismarck, the latter place claiming 1,000.

These claimed voters were not all of one party. The democratic element had the like list of grievances against their southern party brethren as those alleged by the republicans. The outcome of this situation was the candidacy of Henry S. Back, of Fargo, for delegate to Congress, who was supported by the members of both parties. He appears to have been placed in the field by popular consent as one of the earliest settlers and a public spirited and able man. In the southern portion of the territory the republicans had divided, as usual, and presented two candidates, W. W. Brookings, and Gideon C. Moody, while the democrats and liberal republicans had united and nominated Moses K. Armstrong, the then incumbent of the office.

There was another, and the most powerful, factor behind this independent political movement in the north; which was no less than the securing of a division of the territory on the line of the forty-sixth parallel.

At the time the preliminary steps were taken to inaugurate the political campaign of 1872 in Dakota, there was a promise that the Burleigh and Spink wings of the republican party would coalesce and form a united party. Neither Mr. Burleigh or Mr. Spink were candidates at this time and would not become candidates unless unforeseen favorable contingencies occurred. The way seemed clear for holding one republican convention only. The most prominent candidates before the people were Judge W. W. Brookings and Col. Gideon C. Moody, both Yankton men; and others not so prominent as candidates but leading men of the territory whose claims for the nomination were advocated, were Gen. W. H. H. Beadle, surveyor general; ex-Chief Justice Ara Bartlett; Col. John L. Jolley, of Clay County; Capt. A. B. Wheelock, of Lincoln County; and Alexander Hughes, of Union County. While Messrs. Burleigh and Spink were not personally in the field, it was apparent early in the season that the Burleigh faction were supporting Colonel Moody, and the Spink faction sustaining the claims of Judge Brookings. Mention has heretofore been made of the schism existing at Yankton, the capital of the territory, growing out of the rivalry between Broadway and Capital Street. This rivalry had begun in 1869, when the lower town interests united for the purpose of making Capital Street one of the business centers of Yankton. While it was customary with some to attribute the origin of the political factions which made up the leading political party, to a rivalry between Broadway and Capital Street, it is more probable that the factional spirit grew out of the ambitions of two of the most prominent leaders at that time, both residents of Yankton; Moody residing in the Broadway territory but having no speculative real estate interest in either section, while Brookings was one of the promoters of improvements on Capital Street. Mr. Armstrong, however, the democratic candidate, was more zealous and more directly interested than any in building up Capital Street, and he was cordially supported by the democrats of the city, many of whom were largely interested in the prosperity of Broadway. It was not Yankton County alone that was divided in support of these two Yankton County men, but every organized county in the territory, and there were but few, save Union but was discovered to be in the same condition, with its Brookings and Moody faction.

The election of two years before, when Burleigh and Spink divided between them the vote of the republicans for delegate to Congress, had bequeathed to the party two organizations with two territorial central committees; George H. Hand, as chairman of one, representing the Spink element; and Labam H. Litchfield as chairman of the other, representing the Burleigh faction. These gentlemen, for the purpose of uniting the party and to promote harmony, joined in calling the two committees together in April, 1872, at which meeting it was unanimously agreed to "bury the hatchet." At the same meeting the two committees united in issuing a call for a territorial convention in words following:

Office Territorial Central Committee.

Yankton, D. T., April 10, 1872.

A territorial convention of the republican party of Dakota Territory will be held at Canton, on Tuesday, May 21st, 1872, at 2 o'clock P. M., for the purpose of selecting two delegates to the National Union Convention, to be held at Philadelphia, on the 5th day of June, 1872; and also to nominate a candidate for delegate to Congress; territorial auditor; treasurer, superintendent of public instruction, and commissioner of immigration, and for the transaction of such other business as may properly come before it. The ratio of representation will be one delegate from each county in the territory, and in addition thereto, one for every fifty republican votes or fraction over twenty, cast for delegate to Congress at the general election in 1870, as follows:

Union County, 11; Clay County, 10; Yankton County, 12; Bon Homme County, 4; Lincoln, 6; Minnehaha, 4; Pembina, 1; Charles Mix, 3; Buffalo, 2; Hutchinson and Hanson, 1; Brookings and Deuel, 1; Turner County, 1.

Geo. H. HAND, Chairman.

J. Q. FITZGERALD,

G. P. BENNETT,

F. J. CROSS,

O. B. JENSEN,

Territorial Committee

Spink faction.

L. H. LITCHFIELD, Chairman.

H. J. AUSTIN,

W. H. HOBROUGH,

JOHN W. OWENS,

E. L. GRO,

Territorial Committee,

Burleigh faction.

Accordingly the territorial convention was held at Canton pursuant to the call. The preliminary contest for delegates in the various counties had been spirited, and as a sequence to the acrimonious and bitter feelings entertained by many members of the party, bequeathed by the contest of 1870 there were a number of what were known as "double-headed" delegations at Canton, on the morning set for the convention. The proceedings of the various county conventions show the relentless factional feeling entertained.

Prior to the assembling of the convention at Canton either the evening previous or on the morning of the convention, the united territorial committees held a meeting for the purpose of settling upon a plan of organizing the convention, and the admission of delegates to the preliminary organization. At this committee meeting, H. J. Austin, of Clay, was made chairman, and Nye E. Phillips, of Minnehaha, secretary. There were present H. J. Austin, L. H. Litchfield, J. Q. Fitzgerald, G. P. Bennett, F. J. Cross, O. B. Iverson, C. L. Gardner, E. LeGro, N. E. Phillips, Geo. H. Hand, represented by proxy. A motion by L. H. Litchfield that the committee issue tickets to the delegates entitled to seats, was carried by a vote of eight to two. In regular order and on motion the committee voted to issue tickets to the delegation from Clay County of which F. J. Cross was a member; to the Union County delegation of which E. LeGro, was a member; to the Lincoln County delegation of which A. B. Wheelock was a member; of the delegation from Minnehaha County of which John Thompson was a member; that John Bippus be admitted as a delegate from Brookings County; that Vale P. Thielmann be admitted from Turner County which was changed to admit Edward Laird; that the delegation from Bon Homme County of which L. D. F. Poore was a member, be admitted; from Charles Mix County, Wm. McKay be admitted; that L. H. Litchfield be admitted as proxy from Pembina County; and J. Viboring from Hutchinson County. It was decided to hear the contest from Yankton County. After the hearing in the Yankton case it was decided to admit the delegation of which J. M. Stone and L. H. Litchfield were members; J. H. Bernard was admitted from Buffalo County. This closed the list, the committee then announced that the convention would be held at Stafford's storeroom, and then adjourned.

After the adjournment the delegates repaired to Stafford's storeroom to hold the convention, when it was learned that a portion of the delegates to whom the committee had given seats, had decided not to attend, but would hold a separate convention at the schoolhouse. The delegates that repaired to the schoolhouse were in favor of Colonel Moody's nomination, and it was known that the convention as made up by the central committee would not favor the colonel but would probably nominate Brookings. The Moody convention took one from Charles Mix, the entire delegation from Union, and from Minnehaha, and five of the six delegates from Lincoln and the contesting delegation from Yankton County. Thus two conventions were held without the formality or informality of a bolt. Judge Brookings was duly nominated for delegate by the convention at Stafford's, while Colonel Moody received the nomination at the schoolhouse. Here follows the proceedings of the convention at Stafford's:

Pursuant to call of the joint territorial committees, the territorial republican convention convened at the store of S. H. Stafford, Jr., in the Town of Canton, Lincoln County, Dakota Territory, on Tuesday, May 21, 1872, at 2 o'clock P. M.

The convention was called to order by L. H. Litchfield, chairman of the territorial central committee, and on motion of L. D. F. Poore, Col. B. F. Campbell, of Clay County was chosen temporary chairman. On motion of Capt. Nelson Miner, of Clay County, L. D. F. Poore, of Bon Homme County, was chosen temporary secretary. C. H. McIntyre, of Yankton, moved that one member from each county be appointed a committee on credentials, carried and the chair appointed E. H. Laird, Turner; Nelson Miner, Clay; John G. Mead, Bon Homme; Charles H. McIntyre, Yankton; Kerwin Wilson, Charles Mix; C. H. Brookes, Union; John Bippus, Brookings; P. C. Parke, Lincoln; George Stover, Buffalo;

L. H. Litchfield, Pembina; Joseph Viborney, Hutchinson; C. H. Graham, Hanson; John Thompson, Minnehaha.

The committee after a brief absence made the following report:

We, the committee on credentials, beg leave to submit the following list of delegates entitled to seats in this republican territorial convention:

Buffalo County—J. M. Benard, Wm. Bennett, proxy to L. H. Roberts; Charles Mix County—W. T. McKay, Bruno Conover, Kerwin Wilson; Bon Homme—L. D. F. Poore, Bligh E. Wood, J. G. Mead, J. W. Garland; Yankton County—S. L. Spink, G. W. Kingsbury, A. Litchfield, G. W. Galbraith, Charles Wamble, W. W. Brookings proxy to J. R. Hanson, O. C. Peterson, C. H. McIntyre, C. F. Rossteuscher, J. M. Stone, C. W. Batchelder, J. W. Evans; Clay County—J. P. Kidder proxy to Nelson Miner, B. F. Campbell, Amos F. Shaw, F. J. Cross, Jas. A. Vail, proxy to A. F. Shaw, Randolph Mostow, E. W. Robbins, Nelson Miner, Jerome B. Tucker, Dana M. Noyse; Union County—E. LeGro, Alexander Hughes, J. A. Wallace, Archie Christie, Barney McGraw, L. H. Collins, Ole Holt, Mr. Scott, John Clemens, S. Collins, J. E. Doty; Lincoln County—P. C. Parke, A. B. Wheelock, John Falde, G. W. Harlan, William Dunlap, B. S. Gillespie; Minnehaha County—Newton Clark, Henry Lewis, Wm. Holt, John Thompson; Brookings and Deuel counties—John Bippus; Turner County—E. W. Laird; Hutchinson County—John E. Maxwell, proxy to J. Viborney; Hanson County—C. H. Graham; Pembina County—Charles Cavileer, proxy to L. H. Litchfield, Judson LaMoure. (There were no Northern Dakota counties, except Pembina and Buffalo, organized in 1872.)

The committee also reported that they had by special messenger, duly notified all delegations not then present, that were found entitled to seats in the convention.

(Note.) What was known as the Moody faction had, possibly from the force of habit, assembled at the schoolhouse in Canton and organized another republican convention, with the Union County delegation complete, five of the six delegates from Lincoln County, three from Minnehaha County, and one from Charles Mix County. The names of these delegates are given the foregoing report of the committee on credentials in the Brookings convention which includes all the delegates elected except the contesting delegation from Yankton County. The proceedings here given were those of the regular convention, but it was known as the Brookings faction. The two conventions assembled at the same hour in different halls and no attempt was made to unite them. The schoolhouse convention nominated Col. G. C. Moody for delegate to Congress.

Mr. Litchfield, on behalf of Pembina County, presented a report of the proceedings of the republican convention of Pembina County, embodying a request that the number of delegates allotted to that district be increased, owing to the fact that the population had largely increased since the election of 1870, and on motion the County of Pembina was allowed five votes in the convention.

The temporary officers of the convention were then elected the permanent officers.

The following committee on resolutions was then appointed:

Geo. W. Kingsbury, Yankton; L. D. F. Poore, Bon Homme; P. C. Parke, Lincoln; Nelson Miner, Clay; John Bippus, Brookings; E. W. Laird, Turner, and L. H. Litchfield, Pembina; which committee after a brief deliberation reported the following:

1st. That in common with the republican party of the nation we heartily rejoice in the growing prosperity and rapid development of our entire country; in the peace and good order which prevails throughout the land; and in the increase of our institutions of popular education; firmly believing that under the direction of Divine Providence, the wise and liberal policy of republicanism, as connected with our public affairs has given the people these and many kindred favors now so generally enjoyed.

2d. That to the republican party are the people indebted for the inauguration of that policy which insures to the poor and rich alike, free homes on the public domain, and the suppression of that pernicious policy, so tenaciously adhered to for many years by the democratic party, through which our fertile lands were passed into the hands of mercenary speculators, instead of going to the honest and industrious yeomanry of our country.

3rd. That while we condemn as impolitic and unjust extravagant and unconditional grants of the public domain to railroad corporations, we at the same time recognize the necessity of granting such conditional aid to the construction of railways over the treeless prairies of our great west, as will secure the lands so granted to actual settlers at a uniform price, thus promoting the development of a vast area which must otherwise lie tenantless for years.

4th. That the administration of President Grant has been characterized by that practical statesmanship which has won for our republican form of government the warmest encomiums from the liberal and enlightened nations of the world, and tended to strengthen the cause of liberty in every land. Our finances have been wisely and honestly managed, and the credit of the nation maintained both at home and abroad; the public debt has been month by month reduced, while the burdens of taxation have been continually lessened; that as Washington, Jefferson, Jackson and others were not deemed in their day unfitted to preside over the destinies of the nation a second term, because of having been faithful stewards of the trust committed to their hands, so we in common with the great mass of our people, believe the renomination and reelection of President Grant is demanded by every consideration of security and sound policy. That we, therefore, in convention assembled, instruct our delegates to the National Republican Convention, to be held at Philadelphia on the 5th day of June, 1872, to cast the vote of Dakota for U. S. Grant for the nomination for President of the United States.

5th. That we pledge our united efforts to promote the best interests of Dakota Territory; to encourage immigration and the development of our valuable resources; to labor for union and harmony in the republican party, deeming the prosperity of the territory closely connected therewith; and that discord and division among its members is productive of great and lasting evils to our material interests; and we therefore pledge ourselves to ignore personal interests and prejudices, and act together for the welfare of all sections of our adopted home.

6th. That we deem it of the utmost importance that a vigorous liberal policy be inaugurated by our territorial government, that shall encourage the growth and cultivation of forests on our fertile plains; and also foster and assist immigration to our productive lands, and we call upon our law makers to give their earnest attention to the promotion of these measures.

The foregoing resolutions were then adopted as the platform of the republican party of the Territory of Dakota.

The convention then proceeded to take an informal ballot for a candidate for delegate to Congress, with the following result:

Whole number of votes cast, 41. W. W. Brookings received 28; W. H. H. Beadle, 1; J. P. Kidder, 5; N. J. Wallace, 1; John L. Jolley, 6.

A formal ballot was then taken which resulted in giving Brookings forty-three votes, the unanimous vote of the convention, and he was declared duly nominated.

Ole Thorson, of Lincoln, was then nominated for territorial auditor; and Ole Bottolfson, of Clay, for territorial treasurer; and E. W. Laird, of Turner County, for territorial superintendent of public instruction; W. G. Press, of Yankton, was nominated for commissioner of immigration.

For delegates to the national republican convention, the first ballot resulted: L. H. Litchfield, 31 votes; John G. Mead, Bon Homme, 17 votes; Nye E. Phillips, Minnehaha, 12; Charles Wambole, Yankton, 9 votes; John L. Jolley, Clay, 3 votes. Litchfield and Mead were declared elected, and J. P. Kidder and Nye E. Phillips were chosen alternates.

The following territorial central committee was then appointed: C. H. McIntyre, Yankton; G. P. Bennett, Union; John L. Jolley, Clay; L. D. F. Poore, Bon Homme; Kerwin Wilson, Charles Mix; John C. Reeves, Buffalo; C. H. Graham, Hanson County; P. C. Parks, Lincoln; N. E. Phillips, Minnehaha; John Bippus, Brookings; Enos Stutsman, Pembina; Emory Morris, Turner County.

The following resolution was then adopted:

Resolved, That we pledge ourselves to support the nominees of this convention, and commend them to the republican party of Dakota as worthy of their suffrages, and having been properly nominated by the regular republican convention, convened at the time and place designated by the territorial republican committee, and nominated by delegates properly chosen by the several primary conventions throughout the territory.

Judge Brookings then made a brief address of acceptance; whereupon the convention adjourned.

The Moody convention assembled at the schoolhouse. There was no bolt—no unseemly conflict. Of the delegates named as entitled to seats in the Brookings convention, the following did not appear but joined the Moody forces: One from Charles Mix County; one from Union County; five from Lincoln County; four from Minnehaha County; and also delegates from Yankton County.

Judge Moody was nominated for delegate to Congress, but the proceedings which were orderly and harmonious have not been available for insertion in this work. The campaign progressed and was energetically prosecuted, the contest as presented to the voters being almost altogether that between the rival republican candidates, neither of whom apparently regarded the democratic candidate, Mr. Armstrong, as a formidable rival.

DEMOCRATS AND LIBERAL REPUBLICANS

The democratic territorial convention met at Bon Homme, Dakota Territory, on Thursday, July 18, 1872, at 2 o'clock P. M., and was called to order by Gen. C. T. Campbell, of Bon Homme County. Dr. O. F. Stevens, of Union County, was chosen temporary chairman, and T. J. Sloan, of Clay, temporary secretary.

(In 1872 Horace Greeley, one of the founders of the republican party had been nominated for president by a liberal republican convention while the democrats made no nomination and virtually endorsed Mr. Greeley, who was opposed by General Grant. A liberal republican convention convened at Bon Homme at this time, the proceedings of which are given following these proceedings. The two conventions worked in harmony.)

The chair then appointed the following committees:

On Credentials—J. L. Fisher, of Clay County; A. Baker, of Turner; Michael Ryan, of Union; S. H. Morrow, of Hutchinson; S. A. Bentley, of Yankton; H. C. Green, of Hanson; J. D. Flick, of Charles Mix; W. H. Corson, of Minnehaha; S. Simpson, of Bon Homme.

On Resolutions—M. D. Weston, of Union; A. Baker, of Turner; Dr. J. B. VanVelsor, of Yankton; S. H. Morrow, of Hutchinson; Dr. C. D. Owens, of Clay; Charles Marshall, of Charles Mix; J. G. Bottsford, of Minnehaha; Barney Cole, of Bon Homme; H. C. Breen, of Hanson.

The convention then took a recess to await the action of the credentials committee, who after a brief absence reported the following named delegates entitled to seats:

Minnehaha County—C. K. Howard, W. H. Corson, J. G. Bottsford.

Union County—E. W. Miller, R. R. Green, Geo. W. Kellogg, U. H. Akers, Joseph Walters, Wm. Hamilton, Henry Smith.

Lincoln County not represented.

Clay County—C. D. Owens, Richard Jewell, T. J. Sloan, George Curtis, G. S. Matthews.

Yankton County—John Walsh, Peter Anderson, Charles Stanage, L. D. Parmer, Charles Eiseman, J. B. VanVelsor, Frank Wixson, John Lenger, S. A. Bentley.

Bon Homme County—Gen. C. T. Campbell, S. S. Simpson, Barney Cole, James Fraser.

Charles Mix County—J. D. Flick, C. H. Marshall.

Hutchinson County—Samuel H. Morrow.

The report was adopted; whereupon John W. Turner, of Turner County, was elected permanent president; T. J. Sloan, of Clay, secretary; and H. C. Green, of Davison, assistant secretary.

The president briefly addressed the convention, in acknowledgment of the compliment paid him; whereupon, on motion of Geo. W. Kellogg, the convention, by acclamation, nominated Moses K. Armstrong, as candidate for delegate to Congress.

L. D. Parmer, of Yankton, then stated that he had a communication to present from the liberal republican convention, asking that a committee be appointed by the democratic convention to confer with a like committee of liberals, to agree upon a joint ticket and platform, and recommended that one member from each delegation be appointed on such committee. The recommendation was adopted, and Messrs. Parmer, Howard, Flick, Cole, Morrow, Weston, Green, Owens and Baker were appointed such conference committee and repaired to the conference room.

Upon the return of the committee Mr. Parmer reported that they had been met by the liberal republicans in a cordial spirit, and the following joint ticket had been agreed upon for territorial officers: Commissioner of immigration, James S. Foster, of Yankton; superintendent of public instruction, E. W. Miller, of Union; auditor, T. J. Sloan, of Clay; treasurer, G. E. Maynard, of Clay.

The report being unanimously adopted, the candidates were nominated by acclamation.

The committee on resolutions then submitted the following report:

Resolved, That we earnestly endorse not only the platform enunciated at Cincinnati, but their nominees, Horace Greeley and B. Gratz Brown.

Resolved, That we are in favor of the just and necessary reform in the administration of territorial affairs, and the election to office of men who will command the confidence and respect of the people.

Resolved, That federal appointments by the President should be made from resident citizens of the territory, and the distribution of federal patronage given so as to promote the welfare of the people.

Resolved, That we are in favor of the proposed national system of reclaiming our interior plains by forest planting and utilizing streams, and opening Government highways for the trade and commerce of the West.

Resolved, That a division of the Territory of Dakota should be made giving to the northern settlements of Dakota a separate and distinct territorial government north of the 46th degree of north latitude.

Resolved, That there should be a broad and liberal homestead law for the benefit of the soldiers and sailors of the country.

Resolved, That for the promotion and success of these principles, and the success of the candidates nominated by this convention, we invite and cordially welcome the cooperation of all patriotic citizens, without regard to previous political affiliations.

Resolved, That the private and public conduct of Hon. M. K. Armstrong, our delegate in Congress, both as a citizen of Dakota and as the representative at Washington, has been such as entitles him to our confidence and support, and that he is the choice of this convention for reelection.

Which resolution was adopted.

The following Democratic Territorial Central Committee was then appointed: F. B. Foster, of Hanson County; J. D. Flick, of Charles Mix; S. Simpson, of Bon Homme; S. H. Morrow, of Hutchinson; G. S. Matthews, of Clay; M. Ryan, of Union; L. D. Parmer, of Yankton, and J. W. Turner, of Turner.

Messrs. Bentley, Matthews and Campbell were appointed a committee to escort the members of the liberal republican convention to meet the democrats in joint convention. The committee performed the duty; whereupon two democrats and two liberal republicans were appointed to wait on Hon. M. K. Armstrong, notify him of his nomination, and request his presence before the joint convention. Responding thereto, Mr. Armstrong appeared and spoke as follows:

Gentlemen of the Democratic and Liberal Republican Conventions:—I esteem it as one of the highest privileges of my life to thank you for my nomination at your hands. I will not detain you by a lengthy discussion of territorial or national affairs, for I shall from time to time, at different points in the territory, discuss those questions. As I said two years ago, I esteemed it my duty to do what was best for the whole people. I went to Washington as a plain business man to attend to business in a plain business way. It is not the duty of a delegate to make spread-eagle speeches, or put on style. It matters not what his politics are, he goes as the agent of the people. I was there three months before a single head of a department asked me what my political opinions were. I will not enlarge, as my opponents have, upon what might or ought to be done. The only thing that I regret is that since my return, certain republican papers and leading republicans, in the territory, are trying to deprive me of the honor due me by attributing the credit to a certain governor. You know a delegate has no right to vote. It is simply straightforward work with the committees, and only in this way can he accomplish anything for the territories. I consider this as one of the proudest moments of my life. I am proud of the territory; proud of my constituents, and I promise, if elected, I will serve the people as faithfully as I can. I have endeavored to serve the people as well as I could, even when a contest was on my hands, and not till after that contest was decided, did I succeed in securing the passage of a single bill for the welfare of Dakota.

When Greeley is elected, then will be our harvest, instead of the republican who has ruled so bitterly over us; and it will be my whole aim to have such men appointed to office as will be an honor to the country. I might enlarge upon the action of the Baltimore Convention, but will only say that before I left Washington, the unanimous feeling was for the democrats and liberal republicans to unite and put their heels upon the power that has so long usurped our rights. I will only say in conclusion that if elected I will be the servant of the people.

With three rousing cheers, the convention adjourned.

THE LIBERAL REPUBLICAN PARTY

The liberal republican party was an outgrowth of an independent movement in 1872 of certain leading republicans who were opposed to the reelection of President Grant. Prominent among them and leaders were Carl Schurz, Henry Winter Davis, Horace Greeley, Charles Francis Adams, and others. A convention was called to meet in Cincinnati, prior to the meeting of the democratic national convention in Baltimore, and Charles Francis Adams was understood to be the one who would be nominated for President, he being the great-grandson of President John Adams, who succeeded Washington. The program was changed, however, and Horace Greeley received the nomination, with B. Gratz Brown, of Missouri, for vice president. The democratic national convention subsequently ratified the nomination.

In Dakota the two organizations united at Bon Homme to support the democratic ticket, save the nomination of James S. Foster for commissioner of immigration, which was a concession to the liberal republicans.

In Dakota the liberal convention, pursuant to call, assembled at Bon Homme on the same day and hour that the democratic convention met, and was called to order by Dr. Joel A. Potter, of Yankton County, chairman of the territorial committee. Maj. J. Shaw Gregory, of Yankton, was elected temporary chairman, and H. C. Burr, of Yankton, secretary.

Messrs. R. I. Thomas, of Yankton; G. C. Maynard, of Clay; J. Pierce, of Turner, and H. A. James, of Bon Homme, were appointed a Committee on Organization, and reported as follows:

For president—A. J. Sweetser, of Yankton.

For vice presidents—LeRoy Wood, Bon Homme; P. H. Turner, Turner; Sam Jones, Clay; M. M. Rich, Union; M. U. Hoyt, Yankton; William Cox, Charles Mix; D. W. Reynolds, Minnehaha; John Head, Hanson; Lewis Hulett, Brookings; I. N. Martin, Lincoln; John Maxwell, Hutchinson.

Secretary—H. C. Burr, Yankton.

The report was adopted. A credentials committee was then appointed, consisting of P. K. Faulk, Yankton; LeRoy Woods, Bon Homme, and Jud Pierce, of Turner, who reported in brief that the counties of Yankton, Clay, Turner, Bon Homme and Charles Mix were fully represented.

The Clay County delegation consisted of C. H. Kieker, C. Prentis, John O. Ford, G. C. Maynard, W. W. Deming, G. C. Bigelow, Samuel Jones, James Whitehorn, Amos Hampton and D. W. Hodgins.

Yankton County—Joel A. Potter, J. Shaw Gregory, M. U. Hoyt, James S. Foster, P. K. Faulk, Horace Burr, R. I. Thomas and Frank Schnauber.

The names of the other delegates appear among the officers and committees.

The first business in order was the appointment of a committee.

WILLIAMS COUNTY COAL MINE

STEAMSHIP CO. B.

STEAMSHIPS "WASHINGTON" AND "WESTON" COMING FROM THE MINE, NORTHERN DAKOTA

RIVER BANK NEAR MANHATTEN, NORTHERN DAKOTA, SHOWING COAL

A committee of conference from the democratic convention was then announced, and on motion of Mr. Schnauber, of Yankton, a committee, consisting of Messrs. Thomas, Pierce, Gregory, James and Maynard, was appointed to meet the democratic committee, and a recess was taken to permit the conference committee to deliberate. On being called to order the conference committee reported that an agreement had been made upon a ticket and platform, and recommended its adoption. (This ticket was identical with the territorial ticket nominated by the democrats, and was duly ratified.)

The convention then, by acclamation, nominated M. K. Armstrong as the liberal republican candidate for delegate to Congress.

The following central committee was then appointed: Dr. R. I. Thomas, Yankton, chairman; William Cox, Charles Mix; Samuel Jones, Clay; P. H. Turner, Turner; D. W. Reynolds, Minnehaha; John Head, Hanson; H. A. Jones, Bon Homme; John Maxwell, Hutchinson; William Frisbie, Union; I. N. Martin, Lincoln; Louis Hulett, Brookings. At large—Fred Schnauber and M. C. Hoyt, Yankton.

Dr. Joel A. Potter was recommended as a member of the national committee. The members of the convention then proceeded to the hall of the democratic convention, and at the conclusion of Mr. Armstrong's address, adjourned.

THE CAMPAIGN

There had never been a united republican party in Dakota Territory when the Legislative Assembly of 1872-73 met at the capital in Yankton in December, 1872. It met, contested, intrigued, deliberated and adjourned. Even as far back as 1862, when the republican organization was first formed, there was a faction led by federal officials, who refused to act with the regular organization; in 1864 there were the Burleigh and Bliss factions, which finally united, leaving the handle of the hatchet protruding. In 1866 it was Burleigh with the Johnson republican wing, and Brookings with the congressional republicans, the new organization; in 1868 it was Spink, Kidder, Todd, Toohey and Burleigh, and though but one republican nominee—Spink—Mr. Kidder was nominated and supported by republicans largely. In 1870 it was Burleigh and Spink, and in 1872 it was Brookings and Moody. It would seem that through this decade of factional squabbling, that a change of leaders did not affect the antagonism inherent in the so-called party, for new leaders sprang up to take the place of those deposed on either side. Mr. Burleigh does not appear to have been personally engaged in the conflict of 1872. He was, during that summer, employed with a fifty-mile contract of grading on the Northern Pacific Railroad, east of the Missouri River, and was very busy in pushing that work. The election of 1872 was hotly contested between the republican factions, and for the first time citizens of the northern part of the territory who had come in along the line of the Northern Pacific, which was then in course of construction between Fargo and Bismarck, participated in the voting. Precincts had been established at Fargo, then in Pembina County, and at Jamestown and Edwinton, in Buffalo County, and possibly at Fort Berthold, in the same county; and also at Wahpeton, or Chinkapa, in Richland County.

The election was held on the 8th of October, and the table given here, with the total vote cast, both the portion which was accepted by the board of territorial canvassers as valid, and the portion which was rejected as illegal and also because of various damaging informalities.

THE OFFICIAL VOTE

The canvass of the returns made to the secretary of the territory took place on November 27th. The board of canvassers was composed of Governor Burleigh, Chief Justice French, and Secretary Ed S. McCook. Prior to the canvass opportunity was given for argument in behalf of the several candidates regarding the questionable character of a portion of the returns from various precincts, after which the board proceeded with the canvass, the result being given herewith for delegate to Congress:

The canvass of the returns for the other officers on the different tickets resulted substantially the same as the canvass for delegate, and elected the democratic and liberal republican ticket, made up of M. K. Armstrong, for delegate in Congress; James S. Foster, of Yankton County, for commissioner of immigration; E. W. Miller, of Union County, for superintendent of public instruction; Thomas J. Sloan, of Clay County, for auditor; and G. C. Maynard, of Clay, for treasurer. The votes rejected were largely the votes cast by the railroad laborers along the line of the Northern Pacific and the same element in Deuel County, where the branch line from Marshall, Minnesota, to Lake Kampeska, Dakota Territory, was being graded. These voters were not citizens of Dakota, and it was a question whether all the votes so returned were cast by individual voters. It was, however, generally believed that there were legal voters who voted at Fargo, Jamestown, the Missouri crossing, afterwards named Bismarck, and at Richville in Richland County. In the contests for seats in the succeeding Legislature, E. A. Williams, of Bismarck, was admitted, also Mr. Kelleher, of Jamestown, at first, but the contest was finally decided in favor of J. Q. Burbank, of Richland.

The election had been hotly contested between the republican factions led by Brookings and Moody, and not much attention was paid by the voters to the legitimacy of either's nomination. Mr. Moody's friends claimed that he had been fairly elected and lost possibly through the prejudiced action of the board of canvassers, all of whom probably supported Judge Brookings at the election; and a contest for the seat of delegate was suggested.

The presidential candidates in 1872 were:

Delegates from Dakota to the democratic national convention, at Cincinnati, in 1872, were Bartlett Tripp, of Yankton, and H. C. Davidson, of Bon Homme.

Delegates from the Moody republican convention of 1872, to the national republican convention at Philadelphia, J. H. Burdick and Alexander Hughes.

Delegates from the Brookings republican convention were Laban H. Litchfield, of Pembina County, and John G. Mead, of Bon Homme County. Alternates, Jefferson P. Kidder, of Clay County, and Nye E. Phillips, of Minnehaha County.

Gen. W. H. H. Beadle, was appointed national committeeman for Dakota, by the national republican convention of 1872. The general was a compromise candidate, as both the Moody and Brookings delegations were admitted to seats in the national convention.

WHEAT AND FLOUR

The quantity of wheat produced in the Territory of Dakota in 1872, was set down at 2,275,000 bushels, divided among nine counties, as follows:

Union County, 700,000 bushels; Clay County, 650,000; Yankton County, 400,000; Lincoln County, 150,000; Bon Homme County, 100,000; Turner County, 50,000; Minnehaha, 50,000; Pembina, 150,000; and Hutchinson, 25,000. No estimate was made of the production on the Yankton and Ponca Indian reservations, nor at Flandreau where the Santee Indians had a settlement of fifty families and raised wheat and other farm products.

The number of flour mills completed in the territory in the white settlements was ten at that time, Clay County leading with four, one at Vermillion, at Bloomingdale, Lodi and Liberty. Bakers; Union County had two, one at Liberty and one on the Big Sioux near the mouth of Brule Creek. Turner County, one at Turner. Yankton, one at Yankton, completed that year; and two in Minnehaha, one of which was located at Sioux Falls, and the other at Dell Rapids, or Dell City, as it was called. McHenry & Maynard were building a mill at Maxwell, in Hutchinson County. Another mill was being constructed at Fairview, eight miles south of Canton, on the Big Sioux, by Thomas Sargent. The Excelsior Mills at Yankton was a very complete plant and had been erected by a company composed of Bramble & Miner, merchants; William Borden, and John O. Bates.

CHAPTER LV

THE LEGISLATURE OF 1872-73—DEUEL COUNTY

IRISH IMMIGRATION CONVENTION—DELEGATES ON COMMITTEES IN CONGRESS—PREPARATIONS FOR THE CENTENNIAL—YANKTON LAND OFFICE—FORT BENNETT BUILT—LEGISLATURE OF 1872-73—DEUEL COUNTY VOTE—PETTIGREW OF MINNEHAHA—LEGISLATIVE ENACTMENTS—DAKOTA HERALD ESTABLISHED—LAND SURVEYS IN NORTHERN DAKOTA—GENERALS SHERIDAN AND HANCOCK VISIT DAKOTA.

IRISH IMMIGRATION

The proportion of Irish immigration to the Territory of Dakota had been, from the earliest days of settlement, equal to that of other foreign nationalities, except possibly the Scandinavians, up to the year 1872, notwithstanding which a number of public-spirited sons of the Green Isle resident in Clay, Union and Yankton counties, impressed with advantages Dakota offered to the industrious classes of all nations, conceived a plan for an organized effort to induce their countrymen to make their homes in the new Northwest, Dakota preferred. Accordingly, pursuant to a published call, a convention of northwestern Irish-American citizens assembled at Vermillion, Dakota, on Thursday, September 19, 1872, for the purpose of devising the best means to promote, aid and encourage Irish immigration to the Northwest. Delegations were present from Northwestern Iowa, Northwestern Nebraska, and from nearly every organized county in the territory, though the number of organized counties at the time was limited to twelve.

Hon. John Stanage, of Yankton County, was elected chairman, and T. J. Sloan, of Clay, secretary.

No detailed report of the proceedings has been preserved. The reports of the committees, however, found its way into the public prints of that day, and show the spirit and commendable aims of the convention. The Committee on Resolutions reported as follows:

Whereas, It has pleased God that the pressure of bad government, and the force of circumstances and of choice, has transplanted one-half of the Irish race from their own soil to this free land;

And Whereas, Many of our brother Irishmen, through poverty, negligence and apathy, have located in the densely populated districts of the East, where if they remain, many of them must remain poor, indigent, and subject to the contaminating influences of city life;

And Whereas, Our experience has taught us that life in the West is conducive to the independence, wealth, dignity, health, honor and purity of Irishmen and their families; wherefore, be it resolved:

First, That we earnestly invite and beseech our people in Ireland, Canada and the East to seek new homes in this free, independent, healthy and productive land;

Second, That we appeal to our wealthy, powerful and educated countrymen in the East to foster, promote and encourage Irish emigration to the Northwest;

Third, That we, the Irish-American and cosmopolitan citizens of this convention, pledge our experience, sympathy and aid to such of them as may come.

The Committee on Experience and Addresses, submitted the following:

We, the Committee on Experience and Address, recommend that the chairman call upon the citizens of this convention, residents of the Northwest, to write their individual experience in the West, and place it in comparison with the East, and that such experience be published for the information of emigrants.

Accordingly the chairman selected the following named for this work:

Hon. James McHenry, miller, merchant and farmer, Clay County, D. T.; C. D. Owens, physician and surgeon, Clay County, D. T.; Judge Smith, attorney-at-law, Vermillion, Clay County, Dakota; T. J. Sloan, territorial treasurer, Vermillion, Dakota; T. F. Singiser, editor, Yankton, Dakota; L. McCarthy, wholesale grocer, Sioux City, Iowa; Michel Ryan, Barney Mohan, Mick Keevil, and Mike Curry, farmers, Union County, Dakota.

Mr. L. McCarthy, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, made a very detailed verbal report, in which he gave some very practical suggestions, and promised to embody in his written report the salient points as embodied in his verbal statement.

The convention then adjourned subject to the call of the chairman.

The result of the subsequent efforts made by the members of this commendable movement may be best told by the Irish American citizens who have, in goodly numbers, since made their homes in Dakota.

DELEGATES TO CONGRESS ON COMMITTEES

Until the year 1872, delegates to Congress from the territories were not given a place on any of the committees, but were occasionally called before a committee, for the purpose of giving information upon some obscure point connected with territorial vassalage. In 1872, Hon. Samuel Randall, of Pennsylvania, reported a resolution authorizing the speaker to appoint the delegate from the District of Columbia to the Committee on the District, and one delegate to the Committee on Territories. The resolution was strongly opposed, on the ground that the delegate not being a member of Congress, could not exercise the function of a committeeman. The resolution, however, finally passed, having a saving clause, that the delegate should have no authority or privilege beyond that given him on the floor of the House. The territories at that time, particularly the Territory of Dakota, were sending men of superior ability and tact to represent them in the National Legislature, and the average congressman from the states may have apprehended that they would try to run the whole Government if given enlarged privileges—the if given “an inch they would take an ell,” which they would at times have been fully justified in doing.

But it is probable that this dependent and indigent condition was not to their disadvantage, for the delegate without exception, found always some strong, influential senators and congressmen, who took his part manfully and usually carried his measures through, exacting as his reward the advice and aid of the delegate to secure for his own constituents some lucrative appointment in the territory concerning which the delegate was qualified to furnish all the information desired. Dakota Territory occupied quite a prominent position in the legislation of Congress during its entire twenty-eight years of wardship under the Organic Act. It was the most important district under the Department of War because of its large Indian population and its Indian wars, requiring the erection of expensive forts; and it was also the most important division of the work of the Interior Department for the same reason, and for the further reason that the political government of the territory devolved on the Interior Department. From 1870 to 1880 the Indian question was the paramount subject before Congress, reaching its turning point or crisis in 1870, and to some extent modifying the popular regard for the Centennial Exposition.

CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION

As early as 1872 preparations were begun for the celebration of the one hundredth Anniversary of the Independence of the United States, the subject observance of which was appointed by Congress to be held in the City of Philadelphia, where the Declaration of Independence was signed and proclaimed on the 4th day of July, 1776. The finances necessary to pay the expenses of preparing for the grand event, which was to be a World's Fair, and known as the Centennial Exhibition, were raised by stock subscriptions. The capital stock was placed at $10,000,000, and was apportioned among the several states and territories, according to the population as ascertained by the Decennial census of 1870. Dakota Territory, having at that time a population of 14,111, was given the opportunity to subscribe for 368 shares of this stock at $10 per share, and the whole amount was taken, realizing $3,680. Hon. Solomon L. Spink, ex-secretary of the territory, and George Alexander Batchelder, also ex-secretary, successor to Mr. Spink, were the first Centennial commissioners on the part of the territory. Mr. Spink had also served a term as delegate to Congress.

THE LEGISLATURE OF 1872-73

The session of the Legislature of 1872-73 was remarkable for its contested seat cases, and also for an alliance between one faction of the republican party known at the time as the Moody faction and the democratic members. The other faction of the republican party was known as the Brookings faction. They had these names from the leaders of the divided party in the late delegate election. This alliance had been formed immediately preceding the meeting of the Legislature, though it did not involve the organization of the two Houses which was effected by the republicans acting together. But immediately after the organization the allied forces passed a public printing bill and elected a public printer, the intention being that this patronage should be given to the Moody newspaper and the profits to be shared by the democratic or Armstrong newspaper, at Yankton. This public printing was left by the Government entirely to the discretion of secretary of the territory, as the Government provided for and paid for it, and that official had made a contract for this work at the opening of the Legislature with the Yankton Press, the Brookings organ at the capital, and under this contract the Press went forward and did the work, which was duplicated for a time by the public printer elected by the Legislature, who had given a bond, however, that he would make no claim against the territory for the work he performed, but would look to the Government for his remuneration. As Mr. Moody was contemplating a contest for the seat in Congress which had been awarded to Armstrong, the democrat, on a small plurality, it was confidently expected that he would be able to secure the payment for this work as soon as he took his seat. This novel situation induced the territorial secretary to report the peculiar state of affairs to the interior department at Washington, and he received a prompt response confirming the contract he had made and stating that no allowance would be permitted for any printing performed unless it had the said secretary's approval. This letter was laid before the legislative bodies. By this time the democratic members awoke to the danger to Armstrong, if Moody should prosecute his contest, and they readily agreed to reconsider their share in the public printing matter, the former action was annulled, and all matter requiring to be printed was ordered sent to the secretary of the territory. There was no further trouble over that phase of the question, but a new danger now confronted the democrats, who supposed that they had elected Armstrong as delegate at the preceding election, the same election that had elected this tri-party Legislature; but it was now evident that the delegate question was to a large extent involved in the disputed seat contests, which were a part of the original combination, and if the democrats held to the alliance and gave to the Moody contestants the seats that were in contest between the two republican factions, they would be compelled to go behind the returns upon which the board of territorial canvassers had acted in awarding the election to Armstrong; giving that gentleman the certificate, and admit the validity of a vote which Candidate Moody could base a contest upon, with considerable promise of throwing Armstrong out; and it was unofficially stated that Mr. Moody could go before Congress as a claimant for the seat, basing his action upon some 2,000 votes that were cast for him mainly in the northern part of the territory, in which section a gentleman named Stone, a Moody democrat had been a candidate for the Council, and was contesting for the seat held by Stutsman of Pembina. The Big Sioux Valley from Lincoln County to the northern limit was also involved in contests that evoked much bitterness and occupied more or less of the time and attention of the Legislature to near the end of the session, the leading party in these contests being Hon. R. E. Pettigrew, of Minnehaha County, who at that time was trying his earliest "pinions" in politics in Dakota; and in the particular contest in which Mr. Pettigrew's seat was involved, it so happened that both contestants and contestees were Moody men, so in that instance the House was divided against itself should the democrats continue the alliance. This contest had to do with the election in Deuel County where the Northwestern Railroad had a force of graders at work in 1872, and it was alleged they did the voting, but were not voters in the territory. The proceedings of the Legislature tell the story of this contest.

When the Legislative Assembly assembled in December, the members-elect who had supported Colonel Moody were more numerous than those who had supported Judge Brookings, but as all claimed to be republicans, and in order to organize the assembly with republican officers the factions united by giving to Mr. Moody's friends the president of the Council and the speaker of the House, and many of the minor offices. Moody was the lion; Brookings was the lamb. The twain laid down together, the lion on the outside of the lamb.

An important contest came up from the Sixth Legislative District which embraced all the organized and unorganized counties in the Sioux Valley beginning at Lincoln County and extending through Minnehaha, Brookings and Deuel to the 46th parallel of north latitude, and included also the County of Turner. This district elected a councilman and four representatives. The vote of Deuel County decided the election and was alleged to be fraudulent. There were comparatively but very few actual settlers in the county, but the Winona & St. Peter Railway was being graded and workmen had begun grading west of the Minnesota line on the route to Lake Kampeska, a few weeks before the election. The contest in the House was between J. M. Wahl, of Lincoln, and R. E. Pettigrew, of Minnehaha, on one side, who had been given the seats on the face of the returns; and A. B. Wheelock, of Lincoln County, and G. R. Roberts, of Minnehaha County, on the other. All had been supporters of Colonel Moody, which made it decidedly unpleasant for that faction; and as it hung along from day to day for nearly two weeks entangled with other factional interests, it became quite a celebrated case. There was also a seat in the Council held by Mr. G. W. Harkam, of Lincoln County, a Moody republican that would be given to a democrat, Mr. Jeremiah Geelon, of the same county, in case the alleged fraudulent vote was thrown out. This factor had the effect of weakening the alliance of the Moody republicans with the democrats, and in fact became the controlling point that resulted in destroying the alliance and practically allying the democrats with the Brookings republicans.

On the face of the returns made to the office of the secretary of the territory, the vote of the entire district for Wahl was 619; for Pettigrew, 502. The contestants Wheelock had 392, and Roberts, 392. By excluding Brookings and Deuel counties it would stand—Wahl, 341; Pettigrew, 302. Wheelock, 378; Roberts, 378.

The tenth session of the Territorial Legislature convened at the legislative halls, in Stone's Block, Yankton, on Monday, December 2, 1872.

The House was called to order by George L. Foster, chief clerk of the House in 1870-71, who called the roll of members-elect, as follows:

First District, Union County—Silas Rohr, Michael Glynn, Cyrus Knapp, William Hamilton, Samuel Ashmore. Second District, Clay County—Ole Bartholson, James Hyde, A. J. M. Mills, George Norbeck, Jens Petersen. Third District, Yankton County—Ephraim Miner, John Becker, Theodore A. Kingsbury, Jacob Brauch, O. C. Peterson. Fourth District, Bon Homme and Hutchinson counties—Bligh E. Wood, J. W. Garland. Fifth District, Charles Mix and Buffalo counties—Foster T. Wheeler, Joseph Langlois. Sixth District, Lincoln, Minnehaha, Turner, Brookings and Deuel counties—John Thompson, Newton Clark, Martin Trygstad, R. F. Pettigrew, John W. Turner, J. M. Wahl. Seventh District, Pembina and Hanson counties—Judson LaMoure.

Judge W. W. Brookings, of the Supreme Court, administered the oath of office to the members. Prayer was offered by Rev. Joseph Ward, of Yankton. The House then proceeded to the election of officers, as follows:

Speaker, A. J. Mills, of Clay County; chief clerk, Charles F. Mallahan, of Union; assistant clerk, John Q. Burbank, of Pembina; sergeant-at-arms, Byron E. Pay, of Brookings; enrolling clerk, Bucklin H. Wood, of Bon Homme; messenger, Adolph Mauxsch, of Yankton; fireman, David Thompson, Lincoln; chaplain, Rev. Joseph Ward, Yankton.

The House after installing its officers, adjourned until 10 o'clock the following day.

The members-elect of the Council assembled at their chamber at 12 o'clock, M., Monday, December 2, 1872. George T. Rea, ex-secretary, called the roll of members when the following councilmen answered to their names: First District, Union County—Alexander Hughes, O. F. Stevens, Henry Smith. Second District, Clay County—Nelson Miner, Joseph Mason, E. B. Crew. Third District, Yankton County—C. H. McIntyre, D. T. Bramble, John Lawrence. Fourth District, Bon Homme and Hutchinson counties—H. P. Cooley. Fifth District, Charles Mix and Buffalo counties—W. T. McKay. Sixth District, Lincoln, Turner, Minnehaha, Deuel and Brookings counties—G. W. Harlan, of Lincoln. Seventh District, Pembina and Hanson counties—Enos Stutsman.

The oath of office was then administered by Chief Justice French.

The Council then elected E. B. Crew, temporary president.

Prayer by Rev. J. T. Walker, of Yankton. The permanent organization was then effected by the election of the following officers:

President, Alexander Hughes, Union; secretary, George I. Foster, Pembina; assistant secretary, W. H. Ball, Lincoln; enrolling clerk, R. Mostow, Clay; sergeant-at-arms, Thomas Reed, Yankton; messenger, Knud Simonsen, Clay; fireman, C. Bensen, Union; chaplain, Rev. J. T. Walker, Yankton.

The officers were sworn in by the chief justice when the body adjourned until 10 o'clock, the third.

On the second day the only business transacted by the House was the appointment of committees to notify the Council and the governor of the organization. On the third day in the House, Joseph Roberts, of Minnehaha, filed a notice claiming the seat occupied by R. F. Pettigrew, of Minnehaha County. A. B. Wheelock, of Lincoln County, also gave notice that he would contest the seat occupied by J. M. Wahl, of Lincoln County. E. A. Williams, of Edwinton, Buffalo County, gave notice that he would contest the seat of Foster T. Wheeler, of Charles Mix County. A resolution was also presented by Mr. Turner asking that Norman B. Campbell, of Bon Homme County, be admitted to the seat occupied by J. W. Garland.

The foregoing contest cases were all referred to the Committee on Elections, composed of Representatives Jacob Brauch, Ole Bottolfson, J. W. Turner, Martin Trygstad, and Silas Rohr.

In the Council, on the second day, Mr. Bramble presented notice of contest on behalf of Jeremiah D. Flick, of Hanson County, against W. T. McKay, of Charles Mix and Buffalo counties. Also a notice of contest by Jeremiah Geehon, of Lincoln, against G. W. Harlan, of the same county. These contest cases were referred to the Council Committee on Elections composed of Messrs. Lawrence, Smith and Mason.

THE MESSAGE

The governor's message was delivered to the assembly in joint convention on the third day. John A. Burbank was governor. The governor prefaced his recommendations by a reference to the abundance of the year's harvest; and said:

"Let us be thankful to Almighty God for the lavish abundance which has crowned the energies of our people, awarding full value to honest labor." Concerning education he said: "I have to urge upon your most searching attention, the laws already upon our statute books, with a view to their thorough revision, and to further enactments, which are required to place Dakota, if possible, on a footing with those states which are so justly celebrated for the perfect organization of their system of common schools. Educate the masses, and the masses will take care of the nation. Neglect their education and the liberties of the whole people will be endangered." Concerning immigration he said: "Our best immigrant agents are the homestead and preemption laws, and these more than all other causes and instrumentalities are inducing immigrants to people our broad and fertile acres. Our territory, with its natural advantages for comfortable homes, easy cultivation of the soil and prolific crops, has become so well known to the people of our immigrant-producing states, and in Europe, especially to those wishing to better their condition in life by a permanent settlement in a free and productive country, that the filling up and development of our territory by a thrifty population, seems to be but a little way in the future; if we may judge by the significant promises of the present in the steady tide of settlers who are quietly and surely extending over our fertile prairies."

Regarding Indian affairs: "Our borders have been uninterrupted by Indian outrages or any acts of violence worthy of official mention. So far, the present policy of the Government in dealing with the Indians has been generally successful. Civilization, restless and aggressive, is knocking at the barriers of our Indian reservations, and thrift and the plowshare are urgently demanding that idle savagery and the scalping knife shall surrender uncultivated lands to be dedicated forever to agriculture and material development; yet peace with the Indians has been maintained. * * * I am anxiously looking to the front of this 'old and vexed question,' with the hope that your best consideration may assist in anticipating the wants of the future in regard to the final disposition of the Indian tribes."

Regarding a division of the territory: "There is a bill before Congress looking to a division of the territory along the forty-sixth degree of north latitude, and providing a territorial government for the division north of that line. Dakota embraces 150,932 square miles, with sufficient territory for three states of average size. Our present population is not less than thirty thousand and is increasing rapidly. In its present condition and with its extensive boundaries, it is unwieldy and impracticable for the ordinary established machinery of territorial government. The diversity of local interests in so vast a territory has a tendency to fulminate sectional jealousies and provoke political conflicts. These would not be so liable to occur in a smaller area where the whole community would be brought together in an almost daily contact, and where our interchange of ideas and opinions in regard to their wants would be uninterrupted. Should the proposed division be authorized by Congress at the present session, allowing Dakota to retain the present established government, the contemplated Territory of Pembina, north of the forty-sixth degree, will show a much larger population than any of the territories at the date of their organization prior to the establishment of Arizona, and since 1876."

Speaking of finance, the message said: "The finances of the territory are in a healthful state, and we have reason to be proud of their condition and management. There has been no debt incurred during my administration for which bonds have had to be issued, and there have been but few instances, if any, where warrants have been issued when public funds were not in the hands of the treasurer ready to pay them. Not having received the report of the auditor and treasurer, I am not able to give a detailed statement of the exact condition of financial affairs, but am assured that there are ample funds in the treasury to meet all legal demands which are liable to fall due and be presented for liquidation. In this connection I call your attention to the fact that the law has established an assessment of not to exceed two mills on the dollar for territorial purposes; however, it was found that one mill upon the dollar was sufficient to meet all demands upon the treasury for the year 1872, and I trust you will not find any legislation necessary to increase the rate of assessment as now fixed by law."

Concerning the important subject of railroads and the past year's heavy losses of the construction of the first lines in the territory, the message said: "Through the enterprise and munificence of our people, which was promptly recognized by Congress at its last session, confirming the action of the late called session of our Legislature in relation to the Northern Southern Railroad, that much needed thoroughfare has been almost completed to the coast, and is now a channel of busy commerce. We cannot too highly value its importance to our growing community, so creditable to its promoters and the energies and patriotism of the people who backed the road with their money and their votes. The end will be made by other means. The Northern Pacific Railroad will soon be completed over the north side of the river our territory, from east to west. It will be of the greatest value to that region of the territory, and will be a potent agent in peopling and developing the country which it grasps and dedicates to progress and civilization. It is one of our greatest public works and cost the Nation a great price. I hope the end will justify the means."

His excellency appears to have been somewhat doubtful about the means employed receiving justification; but as time passes the trend of events is favorable. Speaking of other railroad enterprises, and there were a number, the message notes particularly one that the governor was personally identified with, having, with the delegate, been altogether instrumental in getting the charter from Congress without any previous consultation with the people of the territory. His favorite line was named the "Grand Trunk Railroad." He says: "Congress granted a charter at its last session for the construction of a system of roads in Dakota, which will furnish complete railroad privileges for the southern portion of the territory for many years to come. The trust has been confided to able agents who are property holders in Dakota, and who are actively alive to the settlement and development of the territory. I have full confidence that they are equal to the undertaking and that they have at command the power and the resources commensurate with the work to be done under the charter granted by Congress. The greater portion of the surveys of the road and its branches have been completed, and this work will be renewed with great activity early in the spring of 1873. This franchise granted by Congress for the building of over one thousand miles of railroad, does not extend assistance equal to that given the Northern Pacific Railroad for building three miles of railroad in the same territory."

"The Winona & St. Peter's Railroad is in rapid construction in the direction of the Sioux Valley, and will soon be finished to the extent granted by its charter. It will be a natural feeder to our system of roads from the Northwest. I have great faith in our prosperity which will grow out of these great works. They are the means which the Spirit of Progress has placed in our hands for the perfect development of our territory, and while I believe no man is able to estimate our future from the standpoint of the present, I feel it my duty to call your attention to the consequent changes that must take place in our country by means of these powerful agencies (vague and anticipatory as these changes may now present themselves), that you may be able to shape your legislation to suit the enlarged state of affairs that will inevitably follow."

Many other recommendations are made, such as a codification of the laws, regarding the territorial library and its care; to provide for the safe keeping of the territorial arms and ammunition; recommending that the territorial officers be required to keep their offices at the capital, instead of their homes, as had been and was the custom. Commending the reelection of Pres. Ulysses S. Grant, the message perceives great benefits to follow to the whole country, and—"to a people so rapidly developing as we are, and engaged in so many enterprises requiring the aid of capital from abroad, such a policy (the financial policy), is not only beneficial but absolutely necessary to our continued prosperity." In conclusion the governor says: "In the performance of the constitutional duties of my office, I have endeavored to promote an honest and economical administration of affairs, and in all cases have endeavored to be more mindful of my duty and the strict letter of the law, than of disarming criticism or seeking an ephemeral popularity."

Yankton, D. T., Dec. 2, 1872.

JOHN A. BURBANK.

On the sixth day a resolution was presented by Councilman Bramble, democrat, that W. T. McKay, Moody republican from Charles Mix County, was not entitled to the seat he occupied, and that J. D. Flick, democrat, is entitled to such seat. The resolution was adopted with the aid of the Brookings republican votes, and Mr. Flick was seated. McKay gave notice of a contest.

In the House, on the eleventh day, Mr. Garland, Brookings republican from Bon Homme County, was summarily unseated, and Norman B. Campbell, democrat, seated. This Mr. Campbell was a son of Gen. C. T. Campbell, later of Scotland.

Mr. Pettigrew presented a resolution providing for the appointment of a special committee of one from each county to whom all bills and matters relating to apportionment be referred. The resolution was adopted.

On the eleventh day, the House Committee on Elections reported on the case of E. A. Williams vs. Mr. Langlois, sitting member from the Fifth Representative District, Buffalo County, including the Missouri crossing of the Northern Pacific Railway where Williams resided. The report gave Williams 164 votes; and Langlois 51 votes. Mr. Williams was seated; he had not been identified with either faction of the republican party, but he was a republican. The contest was decided on its merits. The same committee reported the case of William P. Lyman vs. Foster T. Wheeler, Charles Mix County, giving Lyman 158 votes and Wheeler, 55. Wheeler was the sitting member, and a republican; Lyman was a democrat. Lyman was awarded the seat.

Considering the state of party and factional feeling prevalent in legislative bodies, it is possible that action on these contests was influenced more by partisanship than justice. The combination of one faction of republicans with the democrats, and the programme evidently arranged for legislation during the session may have required a two-thirds majority in the Legislature in both houses, in order to override the veto of the governor, which it was probably apprehended would be occasionally interposed.

The great journalist, Horace Greeley, died at Tarrytown, New York, during the last of November, 1872. He had been the candidate of the liberal republican and democratic parties for President at the late election, held a few weeks before he died. It was currently reported that the campaign and its results had worried him grievously and brought on his fatal illness. The Dakota Legislature adopted resolutions of respect and condolence at this session.

In the contested election cases before the House of Roberts vs. Pettigrew, and Wheelock against Wahl, in the Sixth Legislative District, composed of Turner, Lincoln, Minnehaha, Brookings and Deuel counties, two reports were submitted on the eleventh day by the Committee on Elections composed of Jacob Brauch, Yankton County; Silas Rohr, Union County; Martin Trygstad, Brookings County; John W. Turner, Turner County; and Bligh E. Wood, Bon Homme County. The three first named were members of the Moody faction; Turner was the democratic member, and Wood the Brookings member. The following is the majority report:

Mr. Speaker: Your Committee on Elections, to whom was referred the contested election cases of Roberts against Pettigrew and Wheelock against Wahl, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to report that after taking a large amount of testimony on behalf of the contestants, and listening patiently to the arguments of counsel, they have arrived at the following conclusions:

The number of votes as returned and canvassed for Mr. Pettigrew by the registers of deeds of the different counties composing the Sixth Legislative District, was 501; and for Mr. Roberts, 392; for Mr. Wahl, 610; and for Mr. Wheelock, 392. This number of votes must be taken as the starting point, and unless the evidence overcomes the presumption in favor of the returns, they must stand as the relative number cast for each party. The committee has permitted the greatest latitude to the contestants in the presentation of their testimony, and while some of the evidence tends to throw some doubt upon a portion of the vote of Deuel County, still we have the positive testimony, introduced by the contestants themselves, that there were at least eighty voters residing in Deuel County, and there was no positive testimony that any one person, not qualified, voted in Deuel County. By counting only the number of legal votes shown by the testimony of the contestants, including the testimony of the governor, and not counting any other vote, it still elects both of the sitting members. The testimony of the contestants was not of that clear and positive character with reference to the illegality of the Deuel County vote, which would authorize your committee to take action to that extent to say that the returns made by the sworn officers of the law were fraudulent and void, and that those men were guilty of a violation of their sworn duties. What testimony might have been produced your committee is unable to say, ample opportunity, all that was asked, has been afforded the contestants, and they have failed to produce the name of one person who voted upon that occasion, or to specify by name one person, who so voting was disqualified by reason of not residing in the territory. Therefore, the return must be taken as true, the contrary not being shown, your committee, in accordance therewith, recommends the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That R. F. Pettigrew is entitled to his seat.

Resolved, That J. M. Wahl is entitled to his seat.

(Signed) JACOB BRAUCH, Chairman,
SILAS ROHR,
MARTIN TRYGSTAD.

Mr. Turner from the same committee submitted the following minority report:

Mr. Speaker: A minority of the Committee on Elections to whom was referred the two cases of Wheelock against Wahl and Roberts against Pettigrew, claiming that the returns made in this House by said Pettigrew and Wahl, would respectfully report that carefully examined the voluminous amount of evidence submitted for their consideration, as time would allow them to do. It appears by examining the abstract of votes cast and returned to the secretary's office, including Brookings and Deuel counties with Lincoln, Minnehaha and Turner, that the case would stand as follows: Wahl, 619; Wheelock, 302; Pettigrew, 502; Roberts, 302. And by excluding Brookings and Deuel counties, it would stand thus: Wahl, 341; Wheelock, 378; Roberts, 378; Pettigrew, 302.

That the evidence submitted is such that your committee is impressed with the belief that many illegal votes were cast which were included in the abstract of votes as returned to the secretary and now in the hands of your committee, which together with the testimony of the parties litigant introduced, is too voluminous to be embraced in this report, but all of which is herewith submitted for the consideration of the House. Your committee is of opinion that some fifty odd votes might properly have been cast in Deuel County if the organization was such as to entitle it to participate in the election in accordance with law. Your committee would further report that they have been unable to find any provisions of law attaching Deuel County to Brookings except for judicial purposes, and are at a loss to determine where Brookings County found authority for canvassing Deuel County votes and certifying them to the secretary with the Brookings County canvass. Your committee would therefore submit the foregoing with the accompanying resolutions and recommend that the House fill the blanks with the names of the persons entitled to the seats now occupied by Pettigrew and Wahl.

J. W. TURNER,
B. E. WOOD,

Resolved, That _____ is entitled to a seat in the Legislative Assembly as a representative from the Sixth Representative District.

Resolved, That _____ is entitled to a seat in the Legislative Assembly as a representative from the Sixth Representative District.

There was considerable skirmishing over these reports, and it seems that there had been considerable change in the sentiment of some of the members. A motion to adopt the majority report was lost. The House then resolved to make a special order for both reports at the afternoon session. The result of the special order in Committee of the Whole was a return of both reports to the House without recommendation. Five or six members absented themselves and on call of the House were brought in by the sergeant-at-arms. No further action was taken on the committee reports at the time, but a motion was made that Messrs. Roberts and Wheelock be admitted to the seats occupied by Pettigrew and Wahl. The motion prevailed by the following vote:

Affirmative—Ashmore, Becker, Bottolfson, Glynn, Hyde, Hamilton, Kingsbury, Knapp, LaMoure, Miner, O. C. Peterson, Turner, Williams Wood, and Mr. Speaker—fifteen.

Negative—Brauch, Clark, Campbell, Lyman, Norbeck, J. Peterson, Rohr, Thomson, and Trygstad, nine.

Pettigrew and Wahl not voting. Wheelock and Roberts were sworn in, and a motion to reconsider the vote by which they had been admitted and that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table was adopted, and it seemed that the vexed question was settled; but the next morning the committee reports were brought up as unfinished business, on a motion to insert the names of Pettigrew and Wahl in the blanks in the minority report, and that report be adopted. It looked as though there was "a cat in the meal-bag." The chair ruled the motion out of order. On appeal, the House overruled the speaker. Members kept withdrawing from the House, a call was ordered, and the sergeant-at-arms was kept busy bringing in the absentees; and finally the House adjourned without disposing of the case.

The friends of Wheelock and Roberts evidently secured a safe majority for their case during the time following adjournment, for the first business at the following morning session was a motion by one of their supporters that the committee reports in the case be taken up and disposed of. The motion carried by a vote of fifteen to nine, which was followed by a motion by Representative LaMoure, of Pembina County, that the consideration of the reports be indefinitely postponed, which carried, and the matter was finally settled.

The contest in the Council from the same district, between Jerry Gechon, democrat and contestant, against G. W. Harlan, sitting member, both from Lincoln County, came up in that body on the same day, and Mr. Gechon was seated. In order to figure Mr. Gechon ahead in the district, the vote of Brookings County had to be taken into the count, for Gechon had carried that county and needed the votes. Brookings County was a new county, organized only a few months prior to election. It then embraced both the counties of Moody and Lake; and Flandreau was one of the voting precincts in Brookings County, and Medary was the other. Flandreau cast 5 votes for Harlan, and 47 for Gechon; and Medary cast 9 for Harlan, and 14 for Gechon. But the register of deeds, a young man named Packard, who had been appointed, had taken the liberty of throwing out the Flandreau vote because of "gross informalities and inaccuracies," and it was alleged that it had another mark of gross invalidity in that it was sufficient if allowed to overturn the register of deeds' majority. The Council however, had no such scruples, counted the vote, and admitted Gechon and excluded Harlan. There were 75 votes cast in Brookings County including the "Flandreau" vote, and 269 in Deuel County which had no organization. Evidently Deuel County had been slow to recognize its voting strength, for it required only 50 voters under the law to entitle a county to an organization.

On the seventeenth day of the session, a party named J. H. Stone, of Fargo, through Councilman Bramble, presented notice that he would contest the seat of Enos Stutsman, of Pembina. This was a surprise, as no inkling of a contest from that quarter had been given out. It does not appear that any action, except to fix a time to hear the report of a committee was taken by the Council, and before this report was made Mr. Stone sent a communication to the Council that "business complications in the East demanded his immediate attention, on account of which he was compelled to withdraw from the contest." Mr. Stone disappeared and was not afterward heard from. Mr. Stone claimed to be a democrat elected on the Moody republican ticket, and his success meant an endorsement of the vote cast at Fargo which was rejected by the territorial board of canvassers, and would have elected Moody to Congress over Armstrong had it been counted. When Mr. Bramble and other democrats discovered this they hastened to notify Mr. Stone that his case was hopeless. Then followed the "business complications" mentioned above which urgently demanded that gentleman's immediate attention elsewhere.

The Legislature adjourned on Friday, January 10, 1873, after a session of forty days, characterized a portion of the time by proceedings bordering on the scandalous, growing out of the large number of illegal votes cast at precincts along the line of the North Pacific Railway, and also on the Winona and St. Peter's in Deuel County. The objective point was to get recognition of this alleged fraudulent vote by the admission of legislators who would have been elected if it was allowed, and with this for groundwork, institute a contest before Congress, against Armstrong, for the seat of delegate. The surprising feature of the plan was that the democrats aided in the scheme for several weeks without discovering its ultimate purport.

Although this situation did not materially change before the final adjournment and for possibly a year after, the year 1872 was the last of the open conflicts at the polls between the factions of the republican party.

Prominent among the laws enacted at this session were the following: To prevent accidents at railroad crossings; to punish adultery; relative to paupers; for taking a census of Dakota for the year 1874 (the prime object of this law was to furnish a census of the newly settled counties in the north particularly, that would greatly aid the next Legislature in making an apportionment, and in various matters); creating new counties and defining their boundaries (it was at this session that the entire territory was carved into counties for the first time and named after the names of the members of the Legislature largely); to appoint deputy county surveyors; to provide for a synoptical index to all laws enacted in Dakota; to encourage the growth of timber; to organize a system of township government; to provide for the revision of the general laws of Dakota.

prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors on election days; defining boundaries and naming counties west of the Missouri River; defining the boundaries of Pembina County and naming new counties; to provide against the evils resulting from the sale of intoxicating liquors in the territory; to divide the Sixth Council and Representative District and create two new council and representative districts; to pay the officers and members of the called session of the Legislature of 1870-71, amount, $735.00; repealing the civil code of 1862, and amending the act to simplify and abridge the practice, pleadings and proceedings of the courts of this territory passed at the seventh session.

There were forty-three memorials to Congress, most of them relating to mail routes and mail service; one for a land office in the Big Sioux Valley; one for opening up the Black Hills Region; for a grant of land to the Dakota Central Railway, and also to the Vermillion Valley and North Pacific Railway; and also to the Dakota, Black Hills and Eden Railway; also to the Eden, Sioux Falls and Kampeska Railroad; also to the Dakota, Pacific and Missouri River Railroad; also to the Grand Trunk Railroad; also to the Sioux City, Richland and Northern Pacific Railway; also to the Dakota and Northwestern Railroad; also for bridges over the Sioux, Vermillion, Dakota and Red rivers; to construct a wagon road in the valley of Red River; to remove obstructions in the Red River; asking that Yankton be made a port of entry, and a marine hospital be established there.

MAJOR GENERAL HANCOCK—FORT BENNETT BUILT

Major General Hancock, commanding the Military District of Nebraska, Minnesota and Dakota, accompanied by ex-Governor Magoffin, of Kentucky; Colonel Merriam, of St. Paul, and Colonel Russell and Captain Heath, of Hancock's staff, made a tour of inspection of the Upper Missouri forts in the fall of 1872, after the return of the Sheridan party. As the steamboat Western, upon which the party was traveling, put into Yankton and remained a part of the day, a number of the citizens, including Gen. Edwin S. McCook, Mayor F. J. Dewitt, Banker P. P. Wintermute and Hon. Charles H. McIntyre, entertained the visitors with a carriage ride, and gave them an opportunity to meet the people. In a brief interview General Hancock stated that he had no apprehensions of serious trouble with the Indians, and the only formidable disturber of peaceful relations was the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad west of the Missouri; but a war could be easily avoided by approaching the unruly tribes in a proper spirit, letting them see that their opposition cannot prevent, or even delay the building of the road; but by their help and peaceful disposition it would be easier and cheaper, and much more profitable to the Indians who should be liberally treated from the outset, it being a hundred-fold better and more economical to purchase the good-will and peace of the Indians than to fight with them, and chase them and slaughter them; for then they would be a constant irritation even after the road is completed and trains running; for they could then do much more harm and cause greater destruction to life and property than at present. No pains were to be spared to make a satisfactory arrangement with the natives.

In 1872 a military post was erected at Cheyenne Agency, called Fort Bennett. It was not far from Fort Sully but on the opposite or west side of the river. The situation in the Indian country was of that threatening character that emergencies were apprehended in the vicinity of the Cheyenne Agency calling for summary action by the military which would not admit of the delay incident to obtaining relief from Fort Sully. The Cheyenne Agency supplied rations to about five thousand Indians who made that their supply depot, and many of these were known to have "bad hearts" toward the whites. The Sioux, at this time, all through the upper country, manifested many hostile symptoms, growing out of the construction of the North Pacific Railroad, and military men freely predicted an Indian war, in which the Indians would have to be severely broken in spirit before the Upper Missouri would be free from the menace of Indian depredations and whites could with safety travel through the country, or steamboats could navigate the Missouri free from molestation. Of the nearly five thousand Indians at Cheyenne, 1,800 were counted as hostile, though they visited the agency on issue days and drew their rations. Nearly three thousand who belonged at this agency were inclined to practice the arts of peace and civilization, and obey their treaty. The Government built about two hundred frame houses on the reservation for this peaceable class, which were all occupied by the more advanced and industrious families, and were furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, and stoves.

Gen. Philip H. Sheridan, commanding the military Department of Missouri; Maj.-Gen. D. H. Rucker, chief quartermaster Department of Missouri; Colonel McPheely, chief of the commissary department; Col. Mike Sheridan, a brother of the general's; Colonel Tahrar and Gen. Frank Sherman, of Chicago, with Lieut. Fred Grant, son of the President, paid a brief visit to the capital of Dakota on Sunday, September 22, 1872. The party had been up the river on a tour of inspection as far as the Northern Pacific Crossing, and were returning. Yankton citizens entertained them with a band of music, a carriage ride, and a reception at the home of P. P. Winternute, which stood on the northwest corner of Eighth and Green streets. The party was traveling on the steamboat Western, Capt. Sanford B. Coulson.

While the fur trade of the Upper Missouri had steadily declined from about 1864, it continued for many years after that date to be of such importance as to engage the attention of enterprising business men. One of the last parties that carried on the traffic on an important scale was the firm of Durfee & Peck—Geo. H. Durfee and C. K. Peck, both of Iowa, and men of superior business ability. They owned a line of steamboats and a number of trading posts in the Upper Missouri country, the best known being Fort Peck above Fort Buford. Their business in 1872 amounted to about a quarter million dollars. They took in 24,000 antelope skins; 8,000 deer; 10,000 buffalo; 500 elk; 2,000 wolf; 600 beaver; and 1,000 fox. The fur business rapidly diminished as a consequence of building the Northern Pacific Railroad west of the Missouri; the country it traversed being one of the most prolific fur producing sections in the Northwest.

UNITED STATES LAND OFFICE AT YANKTON

The Fourth United States Land District in Dakota Territory was defined and named by act of Congress in 1872, while Mr. Armstrong was delegate, and the land office of the district was located at Yankton. During the summer, Hon. George H. Hand, of Dakota, was appointed register, and Hon. Lott S. Bayless, of Terre Haute, Indiana, was appointed receiver, and the office was opened for business on Wednesday, July 24, 1872. The district was bounded as follows: "Beginning at a point on the north bank of the Missouri River at the intersection of the line between ranges 52 and 53; thence north along said range line to the 46th parallel of north latitude; thence west along said parallel to the line between ranges 57 and 58; thence south along said range line to the Missouri River; thence easterly along the north bank of said stream to the place of beginning." The district was officially designated as the "Dakota Land District," and the office was located at Yankton, then capital of said territory.

Mr. Bayless had quite an experience in endeavoring to get a federal position in Dakota with the aid of Governor Burbank. He was nominated by the President to be surveyor general of Dakota in place of General Beadle, who being apprised of the matter succeeded in checkmating the proposed change. This was in 1871. Mr. Bayless was subsequently appointed assessor of Dakota in place of G. W. Kingsbury, whose term had not expired, and who also visited Washington and was reinstated by President Grant. He was next appointed receiver of the new land office at Yankton, where he did not come in contact with an unwilling predecessor, and he was duly confirmed. He was about eighty years old when appointed, but was quite vigorous—a hale old gentleman, born during the closing years of the eighteenth century; fond of relating his experiences in the political field which covered a half century of active participation. He was an enthusiastic and successful gardener, and never failed to have an attractive exhibit from his ample garden, cultivated by himself, at the county fairs.

FIRST DEMOCRATIC NEWSPAPER—LAND SURVEYS IN THE NORTH

The Dakota Herald was established at Yankton in 1872. Maris Taylor, of Yankton, and T. F. Singiser, late of Shippensburg, Pennsylvania, were the editors and proprietors. It was a weekly publication and the first democratic paper published in the territory after its organization, with the purpose of making it a permanent enterprise. The Herald had purchased a very complete and entirely new plant. Prior to this Joseph H. Taylor, an elder brother of Taylor of the Herald firm, had published the Dakota Democrat at Yankton for a few months during the campaign of 1868, when there were five candidates for Congress in the field, renting the material used from the Union and Dakotian office.

Twenty thousand dollars were expended for land surveys in Dakota Territory in 1872, one half of which sum were expenses for the surveys in the Valley of the Red River of the North. The total amount of land in the territory surveyed up to the close of the year was a little over six and a half million acres, leaving over ninety million acres to be surveyed. In 1872 the work of surveys along the line of the Northern Pacific was begun. Here the railway company had been given every odd numbered section for twenty miles on either side of their road, and it became necessary to make the surveys in order that settlers might be able to select their claims on Government land. The railroad company did not place its land on the market during this year.

The Excelsior Flour Mills were built at Yankton in 1872 by D. T. Bramble, and William Miner, of the firm of Bramble & Miner and William Bordino and John O. Bates. The building was constructed of chalk-rock, and after over forty years of use is apparently as sound and durable as when first constructed.

The officers of the Vermillion Valley and Northern Pacific Railway elected in 1872 were J. W. Turner, president; M. D. Thompson, vice president; F. McKercher, secretary; V. E. Prentiss, treasurer; E. W. Skinner, general superintendent; H. J. Austin, chief engineer; and Dryden Smith, attorney. James McHenry, Henry Newton, Jesse L. Fish, Chas. H. True, and the president, vice president and secretary composed the board of directors.

The final settlement of the Frost-Todd suit in 1872 involved about seventy-five thousand dollars, all in real property. It consisted of ninety lots in the City of Yankton; twenty-four blocks in an addition adjoining the city on the north; 476 acres of land in Smutty Bear Bottom; 325 acres at the James River Bridge, east side, and forty acres in Union County near the Government bridge over the Big Sioux. There had been a suit in court for some years concerning a division of the property, but this settlement was between the heirs of General Todd and Colonel Frost out of court. Judge Brookings is credited with bringing about the settlement.

MINOR NOTES OF IMPORTANCE

At this session of the Legislature the time for holding the general election was changed from the second Tuesday of October to the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November. The time of the meeting of the Legislature was also changed from the first Monday in December to the first Monday of January following the election.

In 1873 Congress enacted a law increasing the pay of members of the territorial legislatures to $6 a day and mileage—the president of the Council and speaker of the House to have $10 per day. The officers allowed were a chief clerk at $8 per day; assistant clerk, sergeant-at-arms, doorkeeper, messenger and watchman, $5 per day. Governors, $3,500 per annum, and secretaries, $2,500. Territories were prohibited from enacting any law by which this compensation could be increased.

By executive order the United States Land Office at Vermillion, the first land office established in the territory, was removed to Sioux Falls, June 1, 1873. B. F. Campbell was register, and J. M. Washburne, receiver.

Senator Hitchcock, of Nebraska, was the author of what was known as the "Timber Culture Act," which passed Congress in 1872.

The southern portion of Dakota was visited by a slight earthquake at 11 o'clock on the morning of October 9, 1872. It was felt quite sensibly in all the towns and at the military posts but no damage resulted.

A Territorial Teachers' Institute was held at Yankton during the first week in December, 1872, under the direction of Prof. Nathan Ford, superintendent of the city schools.

The Sioux Falls Pantagraph, by W. F. Kiter, late of Council Bluffs, Iowa, where he had conducted the first book-binding in Western Iowa for about fifteen years, was first issued April 11, 1872. It was the first newspaper published in the Big Sioux Valley after the organization of the Territory of Dakota.

Warren Cowles, United States district attorney for Dakota, died at his home in Vermillion on Wednesday, August 28, 1872. Mr. Cowles was appointed to the office from Pennsylvania by President Grant and moved to Dakota in 1870.

In the year A. D. 1819 during the administration of President James Monroe, an expedition was sent up the Missouri River to determine or to acquire fuller information regarding the great water course, and also to explore the Yellowstone and the sources of that river which was regarded as the largest tributary of the Missouri. The expedition performed its mission with the aid of mackinaw boats, steamboats not having come into use on the Missouri at that time. The conclusion of the explorers was, substantially, that the Yellowstone appeared to present fewer obstacles to navigation than did the Missouri above the mouth of its principal tributary. The exploring party also made note of the natural resources of the country, particularly its soil, timber, and grasses, and its various streams, all of which received favorable mention.

The fur trade, however, and the protection of American traders from the illicit traffic conducted by the agents of the Hudson's Bay and Northwestern companies, which had virtually controlled the Upper Missouri fur industry from the beginning was the probable ulterior and most important purpose of the expedition. The Yellowstone Valley could be more securely and economically controlled in the interest of the licensed American traders than the Missouri country beyond which owing to its location and the natural surface or topography of the intervening country could be easily reached by foreign traders from the Assiniboine River in British America.

Since the close of the War of 1812, American traders backed by the officers of the army and Indian superintendents had made frequent complaints to the authorities at Washington of the lawless aggressions of the British Company, affirming also that they took advantage of their intercourse with the American Indians to poison their minds against the young republic of the United States.

NORTHERN PACIFIC BRIDGE, MISSOURI RIVER, BISMARCK

This exploration with others that followed were of the greatest value in determining the shortest route across the continent, when the building of a railway to unite the Atlantic and Pacific coasts came to be considered many years later. No sectional rivalry existed at the time of these earliest explorations. There was no basis for sectional interests such as existed a quarter of a century later, and the substantial information obtained largely favored a northern route to the Pacific from the western coast of Lake Superior, or a route up the Missouri Valley from the mouth of the stream. Each of these routes had its friends; but the Lake Superior proposition had the greater number of able advocates. It was believed to be many hundred miles shorter than any rival route that could be suggested, and would cross the Rocky Mountains by a more favorable pass; while the character of the country bordering it was discovered to be as desirable, in great part, for agricultural purposes as that of the middle and eastern states. Prior to the enactment of the Union Pacific charter, the northern route was a powerful candidate for the favor of the Government, and might have been selected but for the strong commercial lead and political influence then held by San Francisco and the great commercial emporiums east of the Mississippi; at the time the measure was being considered by Congress the great Civil war was pending; there was a feverish anxiety to hurry the construction of the road in order to favorably influence the union sentiment on the Pacific coast; and not least of the obstacles encountered by the advocates of the northern route was the lack of any reliable information regarding the sea ports of Oregon and Washington.

The route via Central Nebraska was looked upon as accommodating the country south as well as north much more amply than would a road built along the 45th or 46th parallel of latitude. Looked upon from this viewpoint at a time when this vast northwest of our country was not only unpeopled, but only partially explored, and its resources largely conjectural, it is not difficult to account for the decision of Congress, under all the circumstances, favoring the more southern route for the Union Pacific. But that the northern route had grown in public favor as the result of the agitation and further information obtained, especially in the northern states is sufficiently attested by the action of Congress, two years later in granting a charter to the Northern Pacific.

As early as 1853 Congress authorized the survey of three routes to the Pacific, the work to be performed by army engineers. The purpose of the surveys was declared to be "to ascertain the most practicable route from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean." The three routes proposed were one terminating at San Diego, California; this was the southern route. The second or middle route terminating at San Francisco; and the third or northern route at the straits of San Juan le Fuca, on Puget Sound. Jefferson Davis was at that time secretary of war, and selected the engineers to make the surveys, and probably named the initial points on the Mississippi River. The result of the surveys so far as they were completed are said to have favored the northern route, though the secretary of war, being a radical southern man, was presumably prejudiced against it and did not permit the execution of the survey from St. Paul, Minnesota, to the Rocky Mountains, although the surveyors of the western end of the proposed route, among whom were Capt. George B. McClellan and Capt. John Pope, afterwards famous generals, reported an excellent route from the head of the Missouri River across the Rockies to Puget Sound. The result of these surveys was to add largely to the general stock of information respecting the western portion of the country, and enough had been learned of a semi-official character to satisfy well-informed people that the northern route was the shortest and most practical, and not inferior in valuable natural resources.

The continental railway agitation was kept up in a desultory manner until the breaking out of the Civil war—the slavery question, and the Kansas troubles, as political questions overshadowing all other questions in the councils of our National Legislature. Finally, in 1864, two years after the Union Pacific had been authorized, Congress granted a charter to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company authorizing the construction of a railroad and telegraph line, beginning at a point on Lake Superior in the State of Minnesota, thence westerly by the most feasible route within the Territory of the United States, on a line north of the 45th degree of north latitude to some point on Puget Sound. The charter granted right-of-way and every other section of land for twenty miles on each side of the road except mineral lands. The charter named a board of incorporators, consisting of two members from each state and two from the Territory of Dakota, to wit: Hon. John B. S. Todd, of Fort Randall, and Hon. M. K. Armstrong, of Yankton, representing the territory as members of the board. This board met in Boston in September, 1864, organized, and elected Josiah Perham, of Maine, its first president. Mr. Perham had been foremost as an advocate of the enterprise for many years, and prior to the present organization had obtained a charter for a Northern Pacific Railroad from the State of Maine, and had gone before Congress with a memorial for a land grant in aid of his proposed continental highway. Willard Sears was elected vice president at the same meeting; Abel Abbott, secretary; and J. S. Worthington, treasurer. Stock subscription books were opened at this meeting, over twenty thousand shares of stock subscribed, and the first assessment of $10 per share paid down by the subscribers, placing over two hundred thousand dollars in the treasury. A meeting was then called of the stockholders and was held the following December also in Boston, when the following named thirteen directors were chosen: Josiah Perham, J. S. Worthington, A. W. Banfield, Philander Reed, Ogden Holt, Richard B. Sewall, Willard Sears, Abel Abbott, Nathaniel Greene, Jr., P. J. Forristall, John A. Bass, James M. Beckett, and Oliver Frost. Mr. Perham was elected president of the directorate and of the company.

Following these proceedings there was a period of five years during which no progress was made in the actual construction work of the road. The directors and stockholders were all wealthy men and leaders in great enterprises; but the construction of the Northern Pacific would need many millions of money more than they could supply from their personal resources. It was confidently expected at the time that Congress would extend the same substantial assistance to the Northern Pacific that the Government had already given to the Union Pacific; but Congress, when appealed to for aid, declined to do more than it had already done. The aid extended to the Union Pacific was represented as an emergency case wherein the Government and the whole people of the country were vitally interested, and to such an extent that the Government itself would have built the road had it not been that a private company was willing to undertake it. Congress further discovered that public opinion had become greatly modified respecting the policy of land grants and other subsidies to railways, and had set its face irrevocably against the policy; from that time no further aid, even that of land grants, was extended to any railway enterprise.

The friends of the great project, however, did not despair. They continued their efforts, though amid many discouragements. In 1866 J. Gregory Smith, of Vermont, was elected president of the company, and Edwin T. Johnson, of Connecticut, an early and enthusiastic advocate of the road, appointed engineer-in-chief. But the "sinews of war" were not forthcoming. It was estimated that the land grant to the company amounted to over fifty million acres, covering an area, if compact, greater than one-half the Territory of Dakota. But the entire West was at that time a vast empire of public lands, free to all who would take advantage of the liberal land laws; and the men of wealth, both in our own and foreign countries seemed disposed to look with distrust upon the value of the Northern Pacific land grant as an inducement for investment that promised any returns to the generation of people then inhabiting the civilized portions of the world.

In the summer of 1869 a reconnoissance survey of the proposed line of the road through the Territory of Dakota was made by Governor Marshall, of Minnesota; Dr. Philip Holmes, A. B. Taylor, Jr., and George A. Brackett, with Pierre Bottineau as guide. The report does not state at what point the party crossed the Red River of the North coming from Minnesota, but it was probably near the mouth of the Cheyenne River. Their route through the territory was up the north side of the Cheyenne, over a country of good fertility to Fort Totten at Devil's Lake. From Totten a good route was found to Fort Stevenson, twenty miles south of the old trading post of Fort Berthold, on the Missouri River, where the party found a suitable terminal point. This survey, which was prosecuted on horseback was for the purpose of examining the country with the view of securing a feasible route through the most promising agricultural portion. When the road was finally located, however, it took a more direct line further south, striking the Missouri about opposite the mouth of Heart River.

The western party consisting of Thomas H. Canfield, general agent; W. M. Roberts and Wm. H. Johnson, topographical engineers; Mr. James Moorhead of the famous Jay Cooke & Co., banking firm, and Samuel E. Wilkenson, traversed the country east from Walla Walla, Oregon, on the Columbia River to the Yellowstone, crossing the Rocky Mountain Divide not knowing it was the main range, so gradual was the ascent and descent. This party made a very encouraging report.

Finally and apparently as a last resort to secure the funds to build the road, the company, in 1867, tendered to Jay Cooke & Company, bankers of Philadelphia, the financial agency of the company. This firm had stood with the secretary of the treasury, Salmon P. Chase, during the Civil war, and successfully managed the sale of hundreds of millions of United States bonds. Cooke, before accepting, caused a thorough inspection of the country through which the line was projected. Meanwhile Congress had authorized the company to place a mortgage on all its property including its land grant; and the house of Cooke, upon concluding to take up the enterprise, secured this mortgage, and work was then begun, Jay Cooke & Company advancing the money for this purpose.

The principal advantages held by the Northern Pacific Railway and peculiar to the route were these: It lessened the distance by water and rail between New York and the Pacific coast about six hundred miles. It lessened the distance between London and Chinese ports, by the trans-continental route, 1,500 miles. Its elevation in the mountain region is 3,000 feet less than that of other lines, resulting in diminished snow fall, a milder climate, and far easier gradients.

On the 15th day of February, 1870, ground was first broken at Thomson Junction, near Duluth, Minnesota, and at the close of the year 1871 the Northern Pacific Railroad had been constructed to the east bank of the Red River of the North, where the Town of Moorhead had been founded by the Puget Sound Land Company, an organization in charge of townsites along the line of road.

The Northern Pacific track was laid to the east bank of the Red River of the North, early on Wednesday, January 3, 1872, and on Thursday, the 4th, the first train arrived at Moorhead on the Minnesota side. The officers of the train were C. W. Block, conductor; W. Snyder, engineer; E. Cameron, fireman; and Capt. R. H. Emerson, engineer of the snow plow. Several deep cuts had been filled with snow. It was a winter remarkable for its heavy snows and cold weather.

The bridge for the Red River of the North crossing from Moorhead to Fargo was shipped on this train already framed and ready to be put in place. It was a single span 100 feet in length. This bridge was put in place and completed, and on the 8th of June, 1872, the iron was laid and the first locomotive crossed to the Dakota side.

The railroad line was located across the territory from Fargo, a Centerville, nearly to the James River crossing in 1871. The directors of the company held a meeting in New York in September of that year, and awarded a contract to Payson, Canda & Company for the construction of the line through the Territory from the Red River to the Missouri, a distance of 200 miles, at the

to be completed by the 1st of July, 1873, and at the same time another contract was let to DeGraff & Company of St. Paul, to construct a road from St. Cloud, Minnesota, to Pembina, a distance of 350 miles to be completed by January 1, 1874.

An engineer's camp was established in November, 1871, on James River, 110 miles west of the Red River, and fifty miles west of the second crossing of the Cheyenne; and the Puget Sound Land Company located a town there in 1872, naming it Jamestown, in honor of Jamestown, Virginia. It had a motley population of settlers, including many Sioux half-breeds. The Indians annoyed the surveyors in the field, and troops were ordered to the James Crossing by General Hancock, then in command of the Dakota department, and barracks were erected, named Fort Cross, and afterward called Fort Seward, in memory of the famous New York statesman. The name first given was in memory of Colonel Cross, of the Fifth New Hampshire Volunteers who fell at the battle of Gettysburg. Two companies of troops under General Thomas were stationed at Fort Seward in 1872. The engineers had not definitely located the route for a portion of the line west of the James at this time, grading, however, had been completed to the James and for some distance west. General Rosser, the chief engineer and B. C. Lindsley, assistant chief, were at the camp on the James, while Gen. George A. Brackett, of Indian war fame had charge of the construction work. During the year the work of construction was prosecuted with great energy. One of the grading contracts, covering, it was said, about fifty miles on the western end had been taken by Hon. W. A. Burleigh, who had been identified with the preliminary negotiations for the Dakota Southern Railroad. Thus he became associated with the construction of the two first and most important railroad lines in the territory.

The opposition of the Indians was strongly manifested during 1872, not only west of the Missouri where the engineers were looking over the proposed routes beyond, but also between the James and Missouri; the surveyors and construction parties found it necessary in the prosecution of their work to be attended by troops, in order that they might be free from the annoyances of small war parties whose evident purpose was to disturb and hinder the work by threats and intimidating conduct, which might have been made more serious but for the fort at James River and the two companies of soldiers that patrolled the unfinished line. The season of 1872 that permitted of grading closed in the early winter, owing to rigorous weather, with about fifteen miles of the grade on the western end unfinished.

Surveying parties west of the Missouri were under the escort of a strong force of troops under able and experienced commanders. While the peace treaties were observed by a majority of the Sioux, there were many strong bands in open warfare against the extension of the railroad through the country west of the river on the ground, as they claimed, that it would frighten the game away upon which they largely depended for subsistence. About this time the notorious Sitting Bull came into prominence as a leader of this hostile element and as one of the most incorrigible; and for several years he continued as the hostile leader in what was known generally as the Yellowstone country, through which the Northern Pacific was projected.

To protect the railroad surveyors the commander of the department gave orders for the organization of a strong military force. Six companies of cavalry were detailed from Forts Randall, Sully and Rice as an escort for the railroad parties, with Gen. John G. Whistler, then at Fort Sully, in command. An artillery detachment was connected with the expedition, a train of mule teams carrying provisions, camp equipage and ammunition, and a company of Indian scouts from Forts Abercrombie, Ransom and Wadsworth. Whistler's rendezvous was at Fort Rice, in September, and an enumeration of his force gave him about eight hundred effective men. The enemy he expected to meet was made up of Sitting Bull's incorrigibles, composed of fragments of the Unepapas, Black-feet and Minneconjoux, the tribes who had already left their agency at Grand River, prepared for war, for the purpose of resisting the military and destroying the railroad surveyors. Whistler's expedition does not appear to have met the hostiles in any considerable force, the Indians pursuing a stealthy policy, in small parties, more intent on securing plunder, in the shape of horses, rather than exposing their combined forces to battle. It is probable, however, that had Whistler been poorly equipped with a smaller force, he might have met an overwhelming force and been destroyed. His enemy was undoubtedly well informed regarding his force and equipment, especially his artillery which they dreaded, and discreetly left him alone.

General Stanley, who was in command of the District of Dakota with headquarters at Fort Sully, also headed a northwest expedition in 1872, said to have been 1,400 strong, whose purpose was to study the Indian situation generally in the hostile region, for the purpose of ascertaining the strength of the refractory element, what tribes were represented in the obstructive work, their numbers and their grievances. He also gathered much valuable information regarding the Yellowstone and tributary country and made observations at certain points with a view to the establishment of military posts.

Hostilities and the attitude of Sitting Bull had already assumed a phase so serious that military men freely predicted an Indian war before the differences could be settled; and General Sheridan, who commanded the department of the Missouri at the time, asked for the construction of two military posts between the Missouri and Fort Ellis, Montana, the estimated cost of which would be a quarter million dollars. Two thousand troops, it was estimated, would be required to give effectual protection to the parties employed in building the road.

Fort McKean had been built in 1871 near the mouth of Heart River on an eminence overlooking the country, mainly for the purpose of affording protection to the railroad people. Two skirmish fights during the fall took place not far from the post with fatalities on both sides. Lieutenant Crosby, of the Seventeenth Infantry, in command of an engineer's camp on Heart River was killed and badly mutilated within a few hundred feet of the camp. He had wounded an antelope and followed it over a near-by hill out of sight of the camp. He did not return and his comrades went in search and found him very near the place where he had disappeared over the hill. The Indians had been on the lookout for an opportunity of this kind. Two or three days later, Lieut. Lewis Dent S. Adair, of the Twenty-second Infantry was riding by the side of General Rosser, division engineer, when the two men were attacked by Indians not far from the camp, and the lieutenant shot through the body. Adair returned the fire after receiving his fatal wound, and killed the Indian who shot him. Adair was a relative of President Grant.

It was currently reported during the year 1872 that Jay Cooke had become convinced that without the aid of foreign capital the further construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad west of the Missouri River would have to be for the time relinquished. The financial centers of the United States could not be depended upon for further loans, and there was an unrest and anxiety in all the great financial centers of Europe. It was only the year before, 1871, that the great war between France and United Germany was concluded, the event that marked the advent of Bismarck to a position among the world's greatest statesmen; the permanent consolidation of the German states, and the wresting of Alsace and Lorraine from France. It also marked the dethronement and downfall of Napoleon III, the French Emperor, and the establishment of the French Republic which has since been the ruling power of France. This momentous event alone added to the heavy money indemnity exacted of Paris by the victorious Germans, precluded all possibility of obtaining financial aid from that quarter which before had been relied upon as able at most any time to meet the debt of nations. Moved by a sentiment of admiration for the German Chancellor, possibly mingled with a purpose to pave the way to the financial center of the German capitalists of the patriotic class, the authorities of the Northern Pacific Railroad called the name of the town at the Missouri terminal, Bismarck. A map of the road and townsite was sent to the distinguished Prince Otto von Bismarck, who acknowledged the compliment paid him in an autograph letter.

There existed an unusual stringency in all the great financial centers of Europe at this time. The distinguished American statesman, John Sherman, who represented Ohio in the United States Senate and was regarded as one of this country's leading financial authorities, made a tour of the leading capitals of Europe studying the financial systems and the financial situation. Very soon after his return a bill was quietly introduced by him in the Senate to amend the coinage laws of the United States, which, however, attracted little attention at the time, the United States financially working under the law suspending specie payments enacted early in 1861 as a war measure.

As the country had been for eleven years on a paper basis, using no metallic money whatever in the ordinary business of the people, the change did not attract attention for a number of years, but in the course of time it was discovered that the value of silver, measured by gold, had lost heavily, and as this was the period when our great silver mines were being developed in Montana, Colorado, Dakota, and the other districts where the mining of precious metals formed a leading industry, the difference in value was found to be such a burden to the silver industry that mining the metal became unprofitable, and the matter became a national political issue, and stirred the country as no question, save secession, had before affected the public mind.

Mr. Sherman's bill became a law without opposition, and without its purpose and effect being understood by many members of Congress who voted for its adoption, nor was its vital point discovered by the President who approved it. Later it transpired that this bill had demonetized silver; had abolished the double-standard under which the Government had conducted its financial operations from the beginning, and erected the single gold standard in its stead. Mr. Sherman, however, did not direct particular attention to the change during the pendency of the bill, and if he referred to it must have treated it as a matter of small importance, so that a large number of Mr. Sherman's contemporaries, who voted for the measure, afterwards declared they did not know that it interfered with the bi-metallic system.

It was presumed that the motive of Mr. Sherman was to align the United States in its financial policy with the other leading powers of the world having become convinced during his tour of Europe of its wisdom—and thus aid our enterprising and public spirited men to obtain the co-operation of foreign capitalists in promoting and prosecuting our expensive internal improvements. Whatever effect the adoption of the measure had in the old world, it did not relax the purse strings of its moneyed people in favor of the Northern Pacific Railroad.

Owing to the unsettled conditions on the frontier caused by the hostility of the Indians as the ostensible reason, it was given out that no work on the line of the Northern Pacific, west of the Missouri River would be attempted during the year 1873, unless it should be favorable for surveying operations. The engineers who prosecuted the surveys under military protection during 1872 had not been successful in finding a satisfactory practicable route to the Yellowstone, and further preliminary surveying would be necessary. It was unofficially decided, however, to place a line of steamboats on the Missouri River to ply between Bismarck and Fort Benton, Montana, and also for a few hundred miles south to a number of forts and Indian agencies. In this way it was presumed the road could control the bulk of the Montana carrying trade and practically all of the Government business to the forts and agencies. It was not publicly known at this time that the railway company was financially embarrassed; but a few months later, in September, the great banking house of Jay Cooke & Company, of Philadelphia, closed, and the failure of the financial head of the Northern Pacific Railway was known to the world. Various causes, which the reader can gather from the course of events in the then recent years, led to this momentous disaster; but probably the most direct injury came from the depreciation of American Railway securities in European markets brought on by the failure of the St. Paul & Pacific Road to meet the interest on its bonds. This would naturally reflect injuriously upon Northern Pacific interests, which at that time were regarded as more intimately connected with Minnesota than any other state. But whatever the causes, the great financier of the enterprise was "on his back," financially speaking, and practically retired from the field.

No further forward movement was made in road construction on the Northern Pacific for the following six years. Something like 110 miles of the road on the Pacific slope, from a point called Kalama, on the Columbia River to Tacoma on Puget Sound had been completed and was in operation, and the company continued the operation of its completed line and branches, from Duluth to Bismarck, which enjoyed a profitable and growing traffic during the interval that lapsed before re-construction commenced in 1879.

It was understood in the fall of 1873, that the work of construction would be suspended, west of the Missouri, for a year or two, just how long could not be determined. The line had been partially surveyed from the Missouri to the Pacific, and construction could be taken up at any time when the finances of the company were in a condition to warrant it. The lines already completed through Minnesota and Dakota, amounting to 453 miles, and 105 miles on the western end including the terminus, were all doing a paying business. The most reliable opinion concerning the resumption of construction work, fixed the date not later than 1875, and this was based on the action of Congress in granting the company an extension of two years in which to complete the road.

Chief Engineer Rosser, who had been directing the surveys for the extension west from Bismarck through the hostile Indian country, reported to the directors, in August, 1873, that he had found a new and final route from the Missouri to the Yellowstone, distant 205 miles, which was twenty-one miles shorter than the survey of 1871. "At this point the road will cross the Yellowstone and continue up the northwest bank to Pompey's Pillar, some distance above the mouth of the Big Horn, where it will join the survey made from the Pacific end in 1872, and this will complete the surveyed line across the Continent."

The names of the officers and directors of the company in 1873 were as follows:

George W. Cass, New York; Chas. B. Wright, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; Richard D. Rice, Augusta, Maine; Frederick Billings, Woodstock, Vermont; William G. Moorhead, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; J. Gregory Smith, St. Albans, Vermont; William B. Ogden, New York; William Windom, Windom, Minnesota; A. H. Barney, New York; R. P. Cheney, Boston, Massachusetts; William G. Fargo, Buffalo, New York; James Stinson, Chicago, Illinois; Albert H. Catlin, Burlington, Vermont—directors.

The stock and franchises of the Lake Superior and Puget Sound Land Company were sold to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company in November, 1873, and thereafter the railroad company controlled and managed its own townsites including Bismarck. The stockholders of the Puget Sound Land Company were paid the first cost of their stock with interest at 6 per cent to October 1, 1873, and a bonus of 50 per cent. Payments were made in North Pacific stock at 60 cents.

At a meeting of the Northern Pacific Railroad directors held in St. Paul, about the first of May, 1873, the name of the town which had been as the terminus of the railroad on the Missouri, was changed from Edwinton to Bismarck, in honor of the great Prussian statesman who had recently won world-wide fame by his success in the Franco-Prussian war, and united the German states in one confederacy. There may also have been a financial reason coupled with the compliment.

Buffalo County had been organized and its county seat was at Gann Valley, but the large majority of the invaders near the North Pacific crossing, had not been informed. C. H. McCarthy, recommended for county commissioner, had been a member of the Dakota Legislature of 1866-67. He was elected one of the early sheriffs of Burleigh County, and was drowned in the Missouri River while engaged in some official duty. Buffalo County took in about one-half of the territory east of the Missouri, its eastern boundary being as far east as Devil's Lake in the north. An important territorial election (1872) was pending at this time (Moody and Brookings, both republicans, running for delegate to Congress, and M. K. Armstrong, for the same office, heading the democratic ticket), and Edwinton had been made a voting precinct and had a candidate for the legislative house in the person of Lawyer E. A. Williams. Another precinct had been established at Gann Valley in the southern part of the county. The result of the election was disputed, which threw a contest for the legislative seat before the house, in which Williams was successful.

This election was participated in quite generally through the northern portion of the territory in Buffalo and Pembina counties, at a number of points where no precincts had been established by the constituted authorities. The vote of such precincts was not recognized nor canvassed by the territorial board of canvassers. The vote at Edwinton, however, was polled at an authorized precinct and was duly canvassed, and was the vote which gave Mr. Williams his seat.

The situation in the vicinity of the point where the Northern Pacific was to cross the Missouri, during the year 1872, was one of uncertainty, and because thereof a number of towns or trading points were located and some improvements made in each. For reasons presumed to be for the best interests of the railroad company, the line had not been located in 1872 to the Missouri River. The final location terminated about ten miles east of the river, and Doctor Burleigh, who had the contract for grading fifty miles, was obliged to begin his work at that terminus. The Puget Sound Land Company, an organization that had charge of the townsites for the railroad company, located its headquarters two miles back from the river, and named their location Edwinton out of regard for Mr. Johnson, consulting engineer of the railroad company who was associated with a gentleman named Edwinton. The land company erected several large log buildings at Edwinton, and placed a tract of town property on the market, selling lots for $150 for corners and $100 for inside lots, with the privilege of a lot in the permanent town, when it was located, free. In Edwinton and surroundings, the earliest settlers were Shaw, Cathcart and Patten, of St. Paul, with a large stock of general merchandise, who opened and transacted their business in a large tent 100 feet in length by 25 feet wide. Marsh & Marsh, of Sioux City, were another firm near by, who kept an eating house and hotel, and Stocking & Co., of Montana, kept a saloon. Devay & Co., of Sioux City, had a shed near the boat landing on the Missouri, in which they kept a stock of groceries, and close by was a Montanian with the pioneer bakery, coining money. The P. S. L. Company had a large log structure near by on the landing, and two or three saloons had been temporarily domiciled there. This point on the river was supposed to be Carleton. Burleigh City, another point, was thought by quite a number, to occupy the prospective railroad terminus. It was about two miles south of Edwinton and contained about a dozen log buildings. Its site was in a conspicuous and eligible position on the bluff overlooking the bottom, and contained a hotel, store, barber shop, and saloon, all owned by John McCarthy and a syndicate from Grand River. Ed S. Comings, of Sioux City, was among the pioneers, and though he had a stock of goods on one of the steamboats, did not decide where to locate. Messrs. Bly and Prescott, of Brainerd, Minnesota, had a sawmill near the mouth of Apple Creek, about seven miles below Edwinton. Edwinton was called the "railroad town" by many.

It was estimated that there were about two hundred persons in all these embryonic settlements, and all who were lawfully entitled to and desired to take a claim, had made a squatter's settlement, and as this sort of settlement was regarded as precarious, and only to be defended against "claim jumpers" by physical force, a large number of the better class of settlers entered into an organization called the "Apple Creek Settlers Association," as the claims taken were largely in the magnificent fertile valley of that name, and elected as officers, John J. Jackman, president; John H. Richards, secretary; and Fred W. Edgar, recorder, and for an executive committee, Judge Charles H. McCarthy, J. M. Gilman, and Charles Anderson. This association a little later, acting through Jackman, McCarthy and Edgar, petitioned the governor to organize the county, and Chas. H. McCarthy, J. H. Richards, and Ed Donahue, were recommended for appointment as county commissioners. These settlements were at that time in Buffalo County, one of the largest counties in the territory, extending from the northern line of Charles Mix County up the channel of the Missouri River to the western boundary of Dakota, thence up said boundary to the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude; thence east along said northern boundary to the ninth guide meridian; thence south to the northern boundary of Charles Mix; thence west to the point of beginning. Gann Valley had been made the county seat of Buffalo County in 1871, and the county duly organized by the governor. This appears to have been unknown to the members of the Apple Creek organization, until their petition was replied to by the governor. The association adopted a memorial for the survey of the public lands, which had not yet reached so far into the wilderness as Edwinton. The grass crop, in that region was luxuriant, and considerable land would have been broken and sod-crops planted, but there had been no seed shipped in; there was but one plow in all the settlements, and nothing in the nature of seed but potatoes. These were bought at Fort Rice at $6 a bushel, and only a small number of half acre patches were planted.

The Indians did not trouble the whites on the east side of the river, but gave warning that none must venture to the western bank for the purpose of "squattling."

At this time the government was engaged in building a military post on the west bank of the river a couple of miles below Edwinton. It was named Fort McKean, in memory of Col. H. Boyd McKean, of the Pennsylvania volunteers, who fell at Cold Harbor during the Civil war. Two companies of troops were stationed there.

General Sheridan, who had been on a tour up the Missouri during the summer and fall of 1872, was very much dissatisfied with the location of Fort McKean. The site for the fort had been selected on the peak of a barren bluff, where the winds, the general claimed, "perpetually blew with a hurricane's strength," so that men could hardly keep their feet without some strong support; beside being cold, almost constantly uncomfortable, and infested by myriads of bloodthirsty mosquitoes in season. Water could not be had unless hauled a mile and a half up-hill. The commanding general concluded that the selection had been made without due consideration; safety or the ease of defense being the only feature that had been given weight, and decided that no further improvements should be made there. A less objectionable locality near by was resolved upon for the erection of the permanent fort. This led to the erection of Fort Abraham Lincoln in 1873, and Fort McKean was abandoned.

As early in the season of 1873 as the condition of the ground would permit, work was resumed on the unfinished portion of the railway line terminating at the Missouri River.

The track reached Bismarck on the 4th of June, 1873, and the road was opened for traffic the 15th of July following; Bismarck was 450 miles from Duluth, the eastern terminus of the railway.

An early description of Bismarck before the townsite was overgrown with improvements, gave its situation two miles from the Missouri River. In front of the town was a flat that was annually inundated by the rise in the river. The main street was on a terrace about four feet higher than the flat but high enough to be immune from submersion; this first terrace extended back about six hundred feet to a second terrace, rising fifteen feet above the first, and reaching back about a mile where it joined with the undulations of the rich rolling prairie characteristic of a large portion of Dakota. South about eight miles, where the high prairie terminates in a bluff, probably fifty feet high, facing the village, is the Valley of Apple Creek about eight feet above the level of the river.

Apple Creek is somewhat famous as the stream along which General Sibley chased the Indians on their retreat from east of the Missouri, in 1863. It is about seventy-five miles in length, its course nearly east and west, heading not far from James River. The valley was claimed to be one of the finest agricultural tracts in the territory, and was heavily timbered in the days of the early settlement of that portion of Dakota.

The County of Burleigh, located on the east bank of the Missouri River, north of the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude, was originally taken from the County of Buffalo by the Legislature of 1872-73, and given the following boundaries; act approved January 4th:

Beginning at the intersection of the range line dividing ranges 75 and 76 with the eleventh standard parallel; thence west on said standard parallel to its intersection with the Missouri River; thence down said river on the main channel to the intersection of the township line between townships 129 and 130; thence east on said township line to its intersection with the tenth guide meridian; thence north on said last named guide to its intersection with the ninth standard parallel; thence west to the line between ranges 75 and 76; thence north on said last mentioned range to the point of beginning; shall be, and the same is hereby, constituted and made the County of Burleigh.

It has its name from Hon. Walter A. Burleigh, the second delegate to Congress from the territory, who removed from Pennsylvania to Dakota, with his family in 1861.

Mr. Burleigh at that time held the office of United States agent of the Yankton tribe of Sioux Indians, located on a reservation in Charles Mix County, Dakota.

Burleigh County was organized July 9, 1873. Governor Burbank appointing James A. Emmons, John P. Dunn, and William Mercer. There was considerable rivalry in the county as to who should be appointed to these important positions, growing out of diverse real estate interests, and the parties finally compromised by an arrangement that gave to each interest a commissioner, and when this was done the governor was prevailed upon to start the machinery of county government in motion. Prior to this he had received petitions and also remonstrances, showing much factional or sectional strife among the voters of the county.

The commissioners so appointed met at Bismarck on the 9th of July following and completed the county organization by appointing Daniel Williams register of deeds and county clerk; J. S. Caville, probate judge and county treasurer; John E. Wesson, county attorney; William Woods, sheriff. Bismarck was made the temporary county seat.

At the annual election held in November following, the county elected its county officers, choosing for county commissioners, T. P. Davis, John P. Dunn, and W. H. Mercer; register of deeds, J. H. Richards; sheriff, John White; judge of probate, E. N. Corey; county treasurer, W. B. Watson.

The law defining the boundaries of Burleigh County provided that "the county should have jurisdiction for all purposes as far south as the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude, over the strip of country south of its defined limits."

The extension of the Northern Pacific Railway west of Bismarck was long delayed, due chiefly to lack of funds; but seriously hindered by the hostility of the Indians under Sitting Bull; and it may be fairly claimed that this latter obstruction would not of itself have been of sufficient importance to have delayed the construction of the line across Western Dakota and Eastern Montana; though in the event that the railway authorities had been prepared to proceed it is presumed the Government would have cleared the way of Indian opposition by a much more determined war policy than was pursued. The terminus of the road remained at Bismarck until 1881, nearly seven years, during which period the city enjoyed much prosperity from its river business, as nearly all the Indian agencies and military posts together with a large share of the Montana traffic was supplied by steamboats during the season of navigation, from Bismarck. And in the meantime immigration was active and the agricultural lands of Burleigh and adjoining counties received thousands of settlers.

An Old Settlers Association was organized at Bismarck January 15, 1874. The names of charter members whose settlement was prior to the coming of the railroad was 168. John J. Jackman was elected president of the society, and H. M. Davis corresponding secretary.

Burleigh County is embraced in, and in the vicinity of many sections and points of historical interest. Its Apple River, east of the Missouri, is seventy-five miles long, heading almost due east and near the James River. It was down this valley in 1803, that the Sioux Indians retreated, pursued by Sibley's forces, and made their way in canoes across the Missouri and out of harm's way. Heart River, on the west, opposite Bismarck, is 100 miles long. It heads near the Bad Lands and the Little Missouri, a fine stream, well timbered; and near its headwaters was fought the battle of Killdeer Mountain between General Sully's forces and the Sioux, in 1804. Burnt Creek, the scene of the slaughter in 1862 of a boat load of returning miners from Montana, numbering about twenty, is an east side tributary of the Missouri, ten miles above Bismarck. The stream is twenty miles long. Opposite Burnt Creek is Square Butte Creek, fifty miles in length. A few miles above the Square Buttes (old name), commence the celebrated Painted Woods. Here was found a large body of timber on both sides of the Missouri, including in its variety, oak, ash, elm, and cottonwood. The woods were famous for their herds of elk, deer, antelope, and were the winter home of thousands of buffalo. Wild fruits abound in the timber. At the north end of Painted Woods Valley, on the east side of the Missouri, is Medicine Lodge Lake, covering 7,000 acres, a beautiful sheet of water, fed by creeks. Oak and cottonwood lined its pebbled shores. It was a favorite resort for the Indians, and in the vicinity a battle ground where the Arickarees dared to meet the Sioux in battle. Twenty miles above this lake on the west side, are the ruins of old Fort Clark, named for Captain Clark, of Lewis and Clark, and built for a trading post about 1812, by a company of which Clark was a member. Mandan Lake is a few miles below the ruined fortress. Seven miles above Fort Clark, on the west side, comes in Great Knife River, a clear water stream, 125 miles long, heading near the Little Missouri. Fort Stevenson was on the east side of the Missouri above the mouth of the Knife, about ten miles, and twelve miles below Old Fort Berthold, the famous trading post of the Upper Missouri. Snake Creek, on the east side, is the only eastern tributary of the Missouri, for a long distance.

During the preceding year of 1872 there had been much uncertainty in the public mind of that settlement as to the precise locality on the Missouri River where the railroad company would fix its terminal point, and hundreds of people desirous of establishing some line of business or desirous of making an investment, had reached the vicinity with the intention of locating. This uncertainty gave an opportunity for much speculation in townsite properties, and places named Carbon, Zebra, and Burleigh City, were laid out, and eligible locations sold at speculative prices. Tents, and some small frame or log structures, were put up at each of these points had its cluster of improvements and business connections.

and saloons were opened and considerable business transacted. The steamboats had brought up a large amount of building material and merchandise from Sioux City and Omaha, so that these places were abundantly supplied with articles for traffic.

General Rosser, chief engineer of the eastern division of the Northern Pacific, which embraced the country between Bismarck and the point on the Yellowstone where it was designed to strike that stream, had not been able to secure a practicable route through the country west of the Missouri, and presuming that the construction of the road would be continued west the following year, he felt compelled to find a route during the season of 1873, so that the work of construction might go forward. He was successful in doing this under the protection of the troops, and reported to the company that he had not only found a perfectly practicable route, but had shortened the distance made by previous surveys, twenty-one miles.

The Northern Pacific, however, was doomed to several years delay—a delay not due to Indian opposition at all, but to the misfortunes that had overtaken its financial agent who, being unable to negotiate his securities was obliged to relinquish the work, financially ruined, but with unstained integrity.

During the summer of 1878 a party of Northern Pacific Railroad officials including Dorrillus Morrison, John Ross, General Rosser, chief engineer, and others, accompanied by a military escort to protect the party against Indian raids, made an inspection trip along the line of the Northern Pacific west of Bismarck as far as the point where the survey of the railroad line struck the Yellowstone River returning without meeting with any Indian hostilities, and arriving at Bismarck about the middle of August. The authorities of the Northern Pacific were at the time contemplating resuming work on the line west of the Missouri, and this reconnoitering and inspection partly reported that they found the country superior to that between Bismarck and Fargo. The so-called Bad Lands they found covered with the most nutritious grasses, and the whole stretch of country, for a distance of 200 miles, well watered, with plenty of good coal and considerable timber. Over one hundred and fifty miles of the line lay in Dakota, coal prospects were, apparently inexhaustible. The plan under contemplation at this time by the Northern Pacific officials was one to utilize the land grant west of the Missouri reaching to the Yellowstone, aggregating about five million acres, for the purpose of raising funds to build that portion of the road.

Grading west of the river was started during the fall of 1878, and there was no further interruption of the work until the line was completed.

The annual meeting of the company was held in September when the following named directors were elected: Charles B. Wright, Pennsylvania; Frederick Billings, Vermont; George W. Cass, New York; Charlemagne Tower, Pennsylvania; J. C. Ainsworth, Oregon; George Stark, New Hampshire; Joseph Dilworth, Pennsylvania; Alexander Mitchell, Wisconsin; Johnston Livingstone, New York; J. Fraley Smith, Pennsylvania; John D. Dennison, Maryland; Benjamin P. Chaney, Massachusetts; Richard L. Ashhurst, Pennsylvania. Mr. Wright was re-elected president of the company.

A contract had been let for grading 200 miles west of Bismarck.

In 1879, just prior to the resumption of work on the Northern Pacific west from Bismarck, the Dakota Legislature was prevailed upon to re-define the boundaries of Burleigh County in order to extend its jurisdiction to the west side of the Missouri, and on February 10th of that year an act was approved giving new boundaries to the county, as follows:

Beginning at the southeast corner of township 137, between ranges 73 and 74; thence north to the eleventh standard parallel; thence west along said parallel to the west bank of the Missouri River; thence south along the west bank of said river to a point where the range line between 83 and 84 produced would intersect said river; thence south to the southwest corner of township 137, range 83; thence east along the ninth standard parallel to the place of beginning.

FORT ABRAHAM LINCOLN, OPPOSITE BISMARCK, 1871

HOLDING DOWN A CLAIM

Third Floor 1876, Grand Forks, N. Dak.

GRAND FORKS, NORTHERN DAKOTA, 1876

As there was no lawful organization on the west side at the time, the purpose of this act, probably, was to furnish the law-abiding element at Mandan and surroundings such protection as the laws of the territory afforded, which could be easily accomplished by extending the jurisdiction of Burleigh County.

Track laying across the ice on the Missouri River, at Bismarek, was completed and the first train crossed on the 18th of February, 1879. The track started below the steamboat landing at Bismarek, and ran northwest across the Missouri to the mouth of Heart River, a distance of nearly three miles, to the new Town of Mandan, the starting point of the Pacific extension.

Mandan was laid out on land claimed by F. F. Girard, an old pioneer and Indian trader who had secured the land from an Indian called Strong Bear or Posey, who settled on the land before the land surveys and, as he claimed, before the land grant was made to the railroad company. But when the land surveys were made it was found that the Girard claim was in an odd numbered section, and was taken possession of by the railroad company and the Town of Mandan was laid out. Girard's claim was too precarious to risk a law suit to defend it.

BRIDGING THE MISSOURI

The first effort for the construction of a railroad bridge over the Missouri River at Bismarek, on the Northern Pacific Railroad, was made in the spring of 1880, and surveys were made of the Missouri River and its approaches at that point. Gen. Adna Anderson, chief engineer, who was directing these surveys, intended to submit the proposition of bridging or tunneling the Missouri to the directors of the company, and the indications at that time, May, 1880, were favorable to the tunnel.

Mr. Frederick Billings, who had become president of the company—a man of great wealth and enterprise, informed the public later that his engineers had reported in favor of a high bridge, to be constructed near the river warehouse of the company. It was proposed first to narrow the channel of the river to 1,200 feet by constructing a dyke from the west side. The engineer had been instructed to build the dyke during the season of low water and during the fall of that year. The bridge was to be seventy feet above low water; to be built in five sections, three of 400 feet, and two of 100 feet. The dyke which was built that fall, was 1,700 feet long. The Eads scheme of mattresses were used in its construction. The foundation for the abutments of the bridge was a solid blue clay forty feet below the low water mark. The cost of the structure completed was estimated at over one million dollars, and it was claimed that it would rank among the great bridges of the world.

The practical work of building the bridge went forward from that time. It was built upon the truss system of bridge architecture, three main truss spans resting on four ample piers, two of these founded on bed rock in the main channel of the river, the other two located on the east and west shore, the mainland connections made by two inverted truss spans each 150 feet in length. The main spans are 400 feet long each, and the total length of the bridge is 1,500 feet. The bridge was completed and opened for traffic in October, 1882.

The length of the bridge from bank to bank was 2,000 feet or nearly half a mile. The material of the bridge structure is steel and iron. It was estimated that it would sustain a weight of 1,000 tons. Work was begun on the bridge proper in August, 1881, and it was completed in the early fall of 1882. The stone work was all completed in June, 1882. Four piers were sunk in the channel of the river by pressure, fifty-six feet below the low water level, where a bed of hard clay was reached. In the construction of these piers, 8,000 yards of granite and the best western Portland cement was used. The caisson employed in the work was 70 feet long and 25 feet wide. From the bottom of the stone work to the summit is 100 feet with a finish of ten feet solid. On the east shore of the river is an abutment from which the bridge swings to the first pier. On the west there is also another similar abutment. The spaces between the abutments and the nearest pier are about two hundred feet in length, and between the center piers 400 feet. The piers were said to be the best and most substantial of any on the Missouri River. The work was done under the direction of George S. Morrison, engineer in chief, and H. W. Parkhurst, resident engineer.

Prior to the construction of the bridge, the cars were crossed in the season of open water on flat boats, and in the winter, when the ice became strong enough to support the immense weight, a railway track was laid over the ice, a distance of about three miles, and trains crossed with little delay. These methods were expensive, involved an enormous amount of labor which had to be repeated each year, and the traffic of the road had increased to such an extent that it was difficult to accommodate it by these methods of crossing the stream.

In November, 1880, the directors closed an arrangement with a syndicate of American and European bankers, under which the syndicate furnished forty million dollars for the completion of the road. The rails were laid to the Yellowstone, at Glendive, about December 1, 1880, and up that stream to Fort Keogh or Miles City at the mouth of Tongue River during the winter following which was favorable for outdoor work. There were then about eight hundred miles of road to be built; 600 miles in crossing the great Territory of Montana.

The workmen on the line, in 1880, west of Bismarek, were escorted by the Seventh U. S. Cavalry, ten companies, under command of Maj. Lewis Morrill.

The Northern Pacific reached the boundary line between Dakota and Montana, November 1, 1880, and the event was celebrated by a gathering of notables from both territories and the chief officers of the company. The division line was marked by the driving of two silver spikes—one marked Dakota and the other Montana. Appropriate addresses closed the exercises. Ex-President Grant was a guest of the railway people on this occasion.

The grand highway to its western terminus at Portland, Oregon, was completed and opened about the time that the Bismarek bridge became a part of the line, October, 1882, and the two events gave occasion for great rejoicing and the driving of the golden spike.

The mileage of the road was as follows: Duluth to Red River of North, 250 miles; Red River to Missouri River, 200 miles; Missouri to Yellowstone, 250 miles; Yellowstone to Helena, 400 miles; Helena to Lake Pend d'Oreille, 320 miles; Lake Pend d'Oreille to Crossing of Columbia River, 210 miles; along Columbia River to Koloma, 250 miles; Koloma to Puget Sound, 90 miles; total, 2,000 miles.

FARGO AND CASS COUNTY

Fargo, or Centralia, was founded early in the year 1872. Its supposed site had been occupied during the winter and early spring by a motley collection of tents, shanties, and an occasional frame structure. A party who visited the place in February, 1872, from Moorhead, described it as follows:

It consisted of an avenue, street, lane or alley, either name applicable, extending from the Red River westward through the timber, some 80 or 100 rods. The river was frozen over but the ferryman's tent stood on the river bank occupied by the ferryman, who was impatiently waiting for the ice to move, which it may not do before the 1st of May. A little further on was tent No. 2, bearing the sign, "Ells-worth House, by Mrs. Church." Opposite is a small wooden building, labelled "Pacific Hall." Passing tents on either side one comes upon another small frame edifice occupied by "Gordon J. Keeney Esq., Attorney at Law, Notary Public, and Land Agent." A little further, after passing a number of tents, one finds the blacksmith shop of "Ross & McCherny," and a little further on the left, hotels Nos. 1 and 2, i. e., the Fargo Hotel, and the Provincial House. Arriving at this latter hostelry, the head of "Fargo Avenue," is reached, after passing sixteen tents and a few small frame buildings. To the right of the Provincial are three tents where Mr. George Bricknell, superintendent and engineer, has his headquarters. Walking west from "Fargo Avenue," about one hundred rods, Canvas Town No. 2 is reached, which is locally known as "Headquarters." On the right is a tent occupied by the agent, J. H. Stone; on the left the "Mess House," adjoining which is the telegraph office, W. G. Collins, operator, and Mr. H. C. Davis, storekeeper. Opposite the telegraph office is the tent of General Rosser, of Confederate war fame, who is division engineer of the Dakota Division of the Northern Pacific and is private secretary. J. G. Winston, Adjutant-General, is located nearby. There is also an acting division engineer, and a corps of draughtsmen. An interesting tent was occupied by M. H. Smith, his wife and daughter; and opposite the Smith tent is the store kept in charge of Mr. Davis. There are here a number of tents and small buildings occupied by employees of the engineer department, and still a few more scattered about. Pashley & Martin in a frame building, and a little further a field, Mr. G. H. M. And this terminated the visible Fargo of that day; but with the coming of spring, no vestige of domicile described, will have disappeared; for it will then be the time when the Red, which submerge these bottoms with the spring break-up, will sweep into the Red, and the occupants so understand it. This is not the site of the Fargo of the early days. This place is now called Centrahia, and Gordon J. Keeney is postmaster. The new town will be above high-water mark, and will be named Fargo in memory of A. A. Fargo, president of the great express company of Wells, Fargo & Company.

Religious services were held with much regularity at Fargo, during the early months of 1872. Rev. Mr. Ehmer, a Methodist clergyman, conducted services at the Fargo Hotel, and also organized a Bible class. Rev. Father Guinness, a Catholic clergyman, held occasional services. The latter's work had been largely among the Chippewa Indians for a number of years.

CASS COUNTY ORGANIZED

When the Northern Pacific Railroad was graded across Northern Dakota which began late in the fall of 1871, possibly as late as December the line ran through Pembina County to the James River; thence through Buffalo County to the Missouri. This first grading which was prosecuted that winter was between the crossing of the Red River and the first Crossing of the Cheyenne, seven miles distant. There was no settlement on the Dakota side at the crossing of the Red when this grading was started. During the winter following, 1872-73, by an act approved January 15, 1873, the Legislature carved Cass County from Pembina County, with the following boundaries:

Beginning at the southeast corner of Grand Forks County on the Red River of the North, at the point where the eleventh standard parallel intersects the river, thence west on the eleventh standard parallel; to its intersection with the west line of range fifty-six; thence south on said range line to its intersection with the ninth standard parallel; thence east on said ninth standard parallel to the western boundary line of Minnesota; and thence north on said Minnesota boundary line to the place of beginning, shall be, and the same is hereby constituted and made the County of Cass; the county seat of which shall be, and is hereby located at Fargo, on the west bank of the Red River of the North, where said river is crossed by the Northern Pacific Railroad, and so soon as it shall be lawfully of the Indian title to the lands in said county shall have been liquidated, then the elected voters of said county, not less than fifty in number, may petition the governor of the territory for an organization of said county, whereupon the governor shall be authorized, and he hereby made his duty to appoint from the lawful voters of said county, three county commissioners, a register of deeds, a sheriff, a judge of probate, a county attorney, a county surveyor, a county assessor, a county superintendent of public schools, and a coroner; and such officers, after receiving their appointment shall hold office until their successors are elected by law in case of such officers; and they shall hold their respective offices until their successors shall be elected and qualified. The county commissioners shall appoint two members of the peace, and two constables each, for one or more of whom precincts may be by said commissioners established; and the justices and constables so appointed shall qualify and give bond as provided by law in case of such officers; and they shall hold their respective offices until their successors shall be elected and qualified.

Cass County subsequently lost its northern tier of townships which were given to Traill and Steele counties. The county was organized in October, 1873, Governor Burbank appointing the first officers on the 6th of that month, to wit: County commissioners, William H. Leverett, Jacob Lowell, Sr., and N. W. White; register of deeds, Terrence Martin; sheriff, J. H. Pashley; judge of probate, Henry S. Back; county attorney, Jacob Lowell, Jr.; county assessor, C. H. McHenry; superintendent of public instruction, Alex. McHendry; coroner, A. J. G. Smith.

The president of the Northern Pacific Railroad at that time, George W. Cass, gave the name to the county.

The first actual settlements made in this county, were at Fargo, or Centralia, as it was first known, in 1872. This was prior to the establishment of Cass County, and while the country was under the jurisdiction of Pembina; and during the same year a large number of homestead and pre-emption claims were taken up in the county, chiefly along the line of the Northern Pacific and in the immediate vicinity of Red River.

CHAPTER LXII

THE COMING OF THE GERMAN-RUSSIANS

1873

The winter of 1872-73 was unusually severe and caused many fatalities in the newer sections of the Northwest where immigration had been active during the previous summer and fall, and improvements meager. A letter from Fort Abercrombie, on the Red River, written by Ben F. Estes, a well known and reliable citizen of Charles Mix County, who had been required to go there on business, told a sorrowful story. The letter was dated January 28, 1873:

I was fifteen days on the road from Bon Homme to this point. The snow in Northern Iowa and Minnesota, I was told by men who had lived there for thirty years, was the worst they had ever known, and they had never seen a storm as severe as the one on the 7th of this month (January). They never knew so much suffering among the people, and live stock, as there was in that storm. I saw enough to satisfy me that there is a great many worse places to live in than Southern Dakota. There is not as much snow here as in Northern Iowa and Minnesota, but there is much more than is demanded by comfort. When I was at Waterloo, Iowa, I commenced keeping an account of all the deaths by freezing that I could get from persons, who were personally acquainted with the circumstances, and when I got to this place I had 253, besides a great many that are missing. I saw a carpenter from a small town called Beaver Falls, and he said he had made coffins for twenty-five persons who had frozen to death. I have not seen anything of the country and I don't believe I will before the 1st of May. It is very cold here, from twenty to thirty degrees below zero all the time and a good heavy north wind with it. The mails are very irregular, caused by snow blowing into the cuts on the St. Paul & Pacific Railroad, and stopping trains for two weeks at a time. The mail from here to Fort Totten is carried by Indians on foot. They say the snow is so deep a horse cannot get through. They use here, for traveling on foot, what they call "Norway Snow Shoes," a board about five feet long, three to four inches wide, and in the shape of a sleigh runner. A man that understands them can make good headway over deep snow.

Mr. Estes was a well-known frontiersman, and his statements are entitled to the utmost credit.

The only fatality resulting from the blizzard of January 7th occurred in the settled portion of Clay County, fifteen miles north of Vermillion. Mr. Hemstock and his wife with two young children resided there, and observing the approaching storm, Mrs. Hemstock left the house and went out into a cornfield to look for the cattle into the stable but before she had time to do this the storm burst upon the place with much fury. Mr. Hemstock, who was working near, is supposed to have gone to his wife's assistance. He evidently found her, for both perished in the storm, their dead bodies being discovered not far apart after the storm ceased, both frozen to the ground. They were a young couple.

LAKE KAMPESKA AND THE LAND GRANT

Lake Kampeska, in Codington County, formerly Deuel County, is one of the famous lakes of Dakota. A railroad was built to this point by the Winona & St. Peter's Railroad Company, of Minnesota, which was completed to the lake in July, 1873. The company was a subordinate organization of the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad Company, and left the main line of that road at Marshall, Minnesota, forty-eight miles east of the western boundary line of Minnesota, and eighty miles distant from Lake Kampeska and nearly due east. There were very few, if any settlers along the line in Dakota or in the country adjacent for some time following the completion of the road.

Congress passed a land grant bill March 3, 1857, which gave a certain amount of land for a railroad from Winona, Minnesota via St. Peter to a point on the Big Sioux River south of the 45th parallel of north latitude. At this time Minnesota was a territory and all of Dakota east of the Missouri River was a part of that territory. This act required the completion of the road to the Big Sioux River within ten years, which time expired March 3, 1867; but by a subsequent act of Congress, approved July 13, 1866, the time was extended seven years from the passage of the act. The seven years would expire on the 13th of July, 1873, which explains the motive of the Northwestern Company, which owned the franchise for building the road through Deuel County to Lake Kampeska, completing it in that year.

This grant of land extended no farther than the Big Sioux River which the railroad crossed three miles south of the lake, and built their road up to Kampeska on the west side of the Big Sioux. The company claimed that its land grant covered this three miles, but the land department of the Government held that as the grant extended to the river, and not across it, it had no franchise or grant on the west side. The matter was in litigation several years. In the meantime the Government, pending the suit, had withdrawn all the disputed land from market. About this time, in the fall of 1873, a party of young men of an adventurous and enterprising disposition from Yankton, some of whom had been employed on the public surveys of land made a journey overland to Lake Kampeska, and took up land immediately surrounding a portion of the lake prior to its withdrawal from entry, and were enabled to hold it. The names of these parties were Calvin J. B. Harris, David B. Keeler, Joel B. Montgomery, D. C. Thomas, Ben Stafford or Stoddard, and James C. Blanding, and probably others. At the time these parties settled in proximity to the lake it was the presumed if not the announced design of the company to locate one of its principal towns there, but subsequently, about 1873 the company reconsidered the matter of town location, and fixed upon a section of their own, three miles east of the lake as the terminus of the line, upon which the new metropolis of Codington County was located and named Watertown.

The lake and adjacent streams were found populated with a variety of the finest food fishes in surprising abundance. It had been a favorite resort for the Sioux Indians for scores of years, and a fruitful field thereabouts for valuable fur bearing animals; but the Indians had, previous to this time, destroyed the beaver, which had been abundant, and had stripped the country of its other varieties of game; but these would have recuperated in a few seasons had not the settlement of the country by the whites prevented.

It was claimed by these early settlers that the inlet and outlet of the lake was at the same point; where it furnished the Big Sioux River with its head waters, and in time of low water in the lake received the waters from the head of the Sioux, which at times were much higher than those in the lake.

For serene beauty, Lake Kampeska compares favorably with any of the small lakes of the Northwest. It is 6 miles long by 2 miles in width. The water is clear and cold. The shore, generally low, but in places bold, had but little timber. At one or two promontories the waves break against the low walls of rock; everywhere else they roll in upon a clean shingle of six rods width. There is no sand. The pebbles near the water's edge are quite uniformly the size of white beans. Further back they are larger, but nowhere larger than walnuts. The absence of sand is a peculiarity of this drift, as also is the presence of numerous specimens of petrified wood, which were discovered by Keeler and Montgomery, who remained in their cabins at the waterside for a number of years, and until Watertown was established. Then low ground at the head of the lake was thickly overgrown with a small shrub bearing a palatable fruit called sand cherry. The Big Sioux River, here a sluggish stream, twenty-five feet wide, is at once the inlet and outlet of the lake. A bend of the river came within a hundred yards of the lake, and floods wrought a channel about one hundred feet in width between the two. Or it might be considered possible, since the lake is deeper than the river that the latter formed the lake, breaking through the slight barrier and filling the low ground. The lake is now the reservoir of the stream. The lake was in Deuel County at this time.

GERMAN-RUSSIAN IMMIGRATION

Among the most important historical incidents connected with Dakota under its territorial organization was the immigration of thousands of people from the Empire of Russia, known as German-Russians. Though classed under this general title they were essentially Germans though emigrating from the soil of Russia where as a rule they were born, reared and educated; and cultivated thousands of farms for generations, and participated in the general industries of their colonies as merchants and manufacturers. But all this occurred in a section of Russia which during the many years of its occupation by these people was to them, and their language, and their schools, their religious institutions and their domestic and social life, another Germany. They left Russia as thoroughly German in every particular as were their ancestors when they occupied, under an agreement with the Russian sovereign, a fraction of Russian territory. And while, for some reason, this sketch will be unable to explain, the American people among whom their lot in this country was first cast, classed them as Mennonites; they were not members of that peculiar religious sect except as a small minority who then and afterward settled in small communities called brotherhoods and were segregated not only from their own countrymen but from their neighbors of all nationalities.

The appended historical account of these most excellent people will inform the reader regarding the origin of the colonies which emigrated to Russia and the reasons or causes which actuated them in removing from their fatherland. Also the causes which led them to abandon Russia for America. This account, substantially, is accredited to Mr. Lathrop Motley, historian of the Netherlands.

The founder of the religious sect now called Mennonites was John Dutter, an Austrian. It has a religious history reaching back more than three hundred and fifty years, or some time about A. D., 1535. It was based on a mysticistic line. It sprang under great much from the persecutions of the parent church, and was first formed at the stake in Tyrol, Austria. His followers in time grew in numbers and spread through Switzerland and Germany, notwithstanding they were subjected to most every description of persecution including ostracism, but they remained steadfast to the tenets and in 1535 a martyred leader, and in memory of him we have the Brotherhood of the Church of the German Russian Colonists who emigrated to America. This people arrived in Russia, Austria about the year 1775, and emigrated to Russia under the reign of Catherine the Great, a devout adherent of the Greek Church, who gave them freedom of religion.

exemption from military duty, and a home on the fertile wastes bordering the Black Sea in the vicinity of the Germans, who had gone into the same country a century earlier under a like promise of immunity from the military duties of Russian citizenship assured by Czar Nicholas. About that year Menno Simons, of the Northern Netherlands (Holland), concerning whom and the colonies or religious sect which are called in his name, appears to have begun his important ministry a century later than Hutter, and it is not improbable that he had become acquainted with Hutter's cult, which would account for the blending of the name of Hutter and Menno, as is frequently done in this country when referring to a Hutterische Brotherhood as a colony of Mennonites. The tenets and religious creed of Hutter and Menno Simons seem to be closely related, and may be substantially the same. But the marked distinction between them was that the Hutterische followers all practised associating together in community settlement numbering a score or two of families, holding their land and products of their labor in common, while the followers of Menno Simons are found in individual families, adhering to the Baptist faith, with the additional articles engrafted thereon by the founder of the sect, and are not communists.

Menno Simons was a Baptist minister, a native of Friesland. He became prominent about the year 1683.

Friesland is now one of the provinces contained in the present Kingdom of the Netherlands. It was then one of the provinces constituting the Republic of the United Netherlands. That republic was formed by a union of the northern Netherlands, commonly called Holland, of which Friesland was one. All the Netherlands, southern as well as northern, were at one time separate independent principalities, unconnected with each other. Through inheritance and by conquest did all the crowns of these various principalities (duchies and earldoms) become united on one and the same head; and in the year 1568, that head also wore the crown of Spain. Spain at that time was the strongest power in Europe. With extensive possessions in both the Indies, and great wealth pouring in from these outlying dominions, it was claimed that the sun never set within its limits.

The Netherlands are situate between France, Germany and the North Sea. The northern Netherlands were chiefly commercial; the southern Netherlands, manufacturing or industrial, and so it is now. The geographical area covered by the Netherlands is small; but the population was even then dense, very industrious, frugal, thrifty and wealthy. Two elements constitute it, the Saxon in the northern, and the Frandok, a species of Celtic, in the southern Netherlands, which elements are blended together, or found in juxtaposition, in the south of the north and in the north of the south.

The reformation took hold of the Netherlands, especially in the north. They became the principal battleground between the papacy and modern society. The sovereign, usually called the King of Spain, after his most important crown, was a zealous champion of Rome. From hatred of the reformation he undertook to destroy the political rights, privileges and liberties of his subjects in the Netherlands, and to force them back under the papal yoke. They refused to submit, whereupon, with the aid of his Spanish forces, he commenced a crusade of extermination, scarcely paralleled in history by any former or subsequent war as to blood-thirstiness, cruelty and devastation. The southern Netherlands were forced back into obedience. The northern Netherlands formed a confederacy; maintained the war during eighty years, and, after having been more than once on the verge of destruction, came out victorious with their independence acknowledged.

The war commenced in 1569. It closed in 1649, with the peace of Westphalen concluded. That war left the small young republic not only one of the first powers of Europe, but first among the first, and Spain financially ruined and demoralized; reduced from a leading and commanding position unto that of a second rate power, soon to rank lower yet.

During that eighty years' war there was an armistice of twelve years, from 1612 to 1624. At the commencement of this armistice the scales had already turned in favor of the United Netherlands. Unfortunately it was a period of continual strife. The reformation assumed a sectarian character, strongly Calvinistic. Domestic politics became mixed up with religion. There remained more liberty of conscience and worship than was enjoyed elsewhere; but a state or dominant church was established, and dissenters or nonconformists were subjected to political disabilities, and not only disfranchised, but also—in the humbler walks of life—struck with a social ban, though their life and property was not put in jeopardy.

This is now all past. Since the close of the eighteenth century there is no longer any established church in the Netherlands; and the formerly established church is now far more Arminian than Calvinistic. In northern Germany also these last years political disabilities have been removed.

Baptists were of the number of the dissenters or nonconformists. Menno Simons grafted upon the Baptist creed the tenets of the nonjuror and nonresistant. He made many converts in the Netherlands, especially in Friesland, though Baptists were never very numerous there at any time; and he also labored successfully in Germany.

The Mennonites in the Netherlands, surrounded by Calvinistic Presbyterian influences, strongly opposed to anything approaching the prelacy, never had an episcopate or higher order of clergy. But those in Germany, surrounded by Lutherans, adopted a system of supervision, approaching to what our Methodists have under the name of presiding elders. As the Lutherans in Germany were even less tolerant than the Calvinists in the Netherlands, the Mennonites were, in the first named country, even less conformable than in the latter.

About the close of the seventeenth century and the commencement of the eighteenth, the Emperor Paul of Russia was struck by the backwardness of agriculture among his Muscovite subjects between the Black Sea and the Caspian Sea. He became anxious that German farmers should settle in that region, hoping that the better cultivation of the soil expected from them should be followed as a stimulating example. He therefore offered liberal inducements in the shape of grants of lands from the crown and exemption from military service to such as might be willing to come and settle. Among the German farmers inclined to accept the emperor's invitation were quite a proportion of Mennonites. Naturally so. In addition to the usual motive for emigration, the desire to improve one's material prospects, they had the wish to secure a home in a country which might prove more of a fatherland to them than that where they were born. For the special benefit of the Mennonites another privilege, that of exemption from the necessity of swearing any oath, was granted. They came in considerable numbers. They settled in large bodies, scattered all the way between the Black Sea and the Caspian Sea, which bodies were called "colonies," a name they still wear. To each of these colonies a large tract of public land was granted. The grant was to the colony as a corporation. The members were tenants in common, and the property was administered and portioned out by trustees or stewards elected by them. The first colonies settled as early as 1783, when a number of thousands of Prussian Mennonites emigrated from Prussia because Frederick the Great would not give them religious privileges, and they were further liable to be drafted into the military service. These first emigrants settled on the east bank of the River Dnieper.

Queen Catherine II gave a warm and sincere welcome to the sturdy Christian people, partly because of her antipathy to the Prussian king; but more to secure the great benefit to be derived from their industry in farming in the unsettled regions of her kingdom; also to gain the moral effect and influence of their orderly lives upon her own native subjects. A good character of lands were set apart for these settlers, and they were not taxed for ten years; they were also given the fullest religious liberty, and were declared immune from military service. Upon such inviting terms a large number followed their example. The Mennonites, who numbered many thousands in Prussia, emigrated, as also did other religious denominations, including many Saxon Lutherans. From 1803 to 1807 the colonies received important accessions, and a great portion of these later removals settled on the east bank of the River Moloscha, north of the Black Sea. The Russian government kept all their agreements, and the Germans, because of their own diligence, temperance and intelligence, were rewarded with substantial prosperity.

We see, therefore, that the situation among the Germans, with reference to their own government, was one brought about by a century or more of intolerance in which religion was the principal disturber, therefore the claim that the German-Russian emigrants to America, over a century later than the emigration from Germany and other German provinces to Russia, was easily presumed to be a Mennonite emigration to a large extent, and had it occurred a century earlier it might have been proportionately much greater of that element. But three generations had passed. These had been born and reared in Russo-Germany, completely removed from all religious intolerant influence, undisturbed by any government authority to control their religious beliefs, and it was quite in accordance with world precedents the hand of tyranny having been withdrawn, these new generations should study the subject of religion with a conscience unbiased by government restraint, being a very intelligent people, found themselves more in accord with other religious denominations than those holding the austere tenets of either Hutter or Memo Simons.

These colonies fulfilled all that was expected of them. They set the desired example, and it has been followed. Thanks to them, what up to the time of their advent was a desert now blossoms like the rose. Some of the colonies have become commercial and industrial centers. Hence the German population is no longer exclusively agricultural.

As the German and Muscovite races differ widely in characteristics and are almost uncongenial to each other, they have failed to blend. The Germans transferred to Russia or bred there, are as German as if they or their progenitors had never left Germany. Some can speak Russian, but all speak German, and consider the last named language as their vernacular tongue. Likewise in the matter of creed, the Greek Church being that of the Muscovites and very unlike theirs, they have steadfastly adhered to their distinctive tenets, through the agencies of their position, scattered as they are in various groups, has caused their church organizations to become somewhat modified by a further development of the element of ecclesiastical supervision.

About the fortieth year after these colonies had become established, a change was observed in the attitude of the Russian government. The land had by this time become occupied, and the native Russians in the vicinity of the German settlements endeavored to introduce Russian customs among the colonists. This caused uneasiness and dissatisfaction. The prosperous Germans seemed to be "a thorn in the flesh" of the native Russians. The government quietly aided its own subjects in their work of interference, and endeavored to impose restrictions regarding their exemption from military duty, and to further abridge their freedom in matters of religion. The most obnoxious requirement came to the Mennonites, who are non-combatants, similar to the American Quakers, when an edict was proclaimed making the German-Russians, in common with the native inhabitants, subject to military draft. In thus abrogating the original compact under which the Germans had settled in Russia, the Czar graciously stipulated that the new edict would not be immediately enforced; that the Germans would be given ample time to decide whether to accept the new order of things, and become citizens of Russia in fact, or remove from the country. The religious element among the Germans, as well as many who did not act solely from that motive, took early advantage of the privilege, and resolved to sell their farms, live stock, etc., and emigrate.

The German-Russian population at that time, 1871, was estimated to number two hundred thousand.

So soon as the question of emigration presented itself to the Russo-Germans, a farther question naturally arose, which was, whither to go? Whosoever throughout almost the civilized world thinks of emigration, also thinks of our United States; and thither the thoughts of the Russo-German turned themselves. Thither, since over half a century, co-religionists of theirs from the Netherlands, Germany, and other countries had gone, as well as other people. There other German-Russians, including Mennonites had either scattered themselves or aggregated in particular localities, for example at Lancaster, Pennsylvania; Elkhart, Indiana; Decatur, Illinois; and Lima, Ohio.

Organizations were perfected among them for the purpose of obtaining reliable information concerning the United States, and the sections presenting the most substantial inducements to large colonies of an agricultural people. The information they obtained was of a satisfactory character, though no pledge could be given to exempt them from military duty, but it was represented to them that in case the United States should be engaged in war, which was extremely unlikely, they would be permitted to employ substitutes in case they should be drafted. The next practical step taken was the raising of a fund of $20,000 which was appropriated to defray the expenses of a committee of twelve which was sent to America to look the field over and recommend the most eligible regions for settlements. This committee reached this country early in the summer of 1871. There was a Mennonite organization on a small scale then in Pennsylvania to which the committee was accredited, and through this organization and the advice of other friends the committee made a journey through Minnesota, Michigan, Dakota, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri and Texas, and returned after three months absence to Russia, where they reported the results of their journey of investigation, which being highly favorable, stimulated the desire to emigrate, but the Russian government though apparently desirous of permitting their departure, at the same time imposed conditions upon the sale of their land that were difficult to satisfy. For instance, a large number had received their landed estates from their parents who had been granted it from the throne and who were not allowed to sell or exchange it except to members of their own sect. There were also many discouragements placed in the way of those desiring to emigrate by the petty officers of the government and passports or permits to emigrate were so difficult to procure that many were dissuaded from leaving by these obstacles alone. During all this time while preparations were making for a movement on a large scale, small parties of these people who could do so without much sacrifice were leaving for the United States.

In 1871 several colonies without concert of action between them, sent deputations. These deputations chanced to meet each other in New York. They were combined under the leadership of Rev. Mr. Sudermann, of Berdjanske, the head of one of the deputations. Together they visited various portions of the West; and some of the party also went to Manitoba. After a tour of inspection, which lasted all summer and part of the fall, they returned to Russia, in order to report to their constituents.

There was a good deal of wealth among the German-Russians in general. They are, as a rule, people of deep religious feeling, strict morals, and very frugal and industrious. Thus they cannot well fail to acquire material prosperity. As a religious motive, in addition to the usual considerations partly impelled those who contemplated leaving Russia, or did impel those who had already left, persons of means were more numerous among them than is customary among emigrants. It would, however, be absurd to suppose that every Russo-German who landed on our shores was well off.

Two facts have to be borne in mind. First—excellent people as they generally are, they are human, and human nature varies but little with time and space, race and creed. Power is everywhere liable to be abused; and even in those German-Russian colonies in Russia, there is such a thing as oppression of the poor by the rich, though it is not general. Several of the poorer class emigrated in order to get out from between the upper and the nether grindstone. Sometimes the wealthier ones paid the passage of the poorer. Mostly, this was done from benevolent motives, but occasionally also in order to get hold of their share in the common land. Second—in Russia like elsewhere, it took time to dispose of one's property; and, when it was known of someone that he wanted to leave, a ring was liable to be formed for buying his property at a discount. Hence it takes the wealthy longer than poor ones to get ready.

There was a period in the growth of Dakota in early days when difficulty was found in inducing newcomers into the James River Valley on the west side and it required more than ordinary efforts to secure rural settlers for that region during the first ten years of Dakota's settlement. In the early '60s emigrants journeying through Iowa were informed that the country west of the James River was unfit for farming operations; and the anxiety of the Iowans at that time to secure settlers for the vacant domain in that state will explain the source and the reason of these statements. The misrepresentations then made in behalf of the wide uninhabitable plains of the Hawkeyes were later repeated by those who sought to profit by halting the immigrant in their own community, and it finally became necessary for those interested in the development of the country west of the James River to put forth extra efforts in order to people the fertile acres of that valley, or rather to secure the beginning of settlement along the valley of that famous stream.

Every section of the West from Texas to Manitoba was making efforts to secure settlers in 1872-73-74 and for that matter were "in the market" for immigrants many years before that time, and are yet laboring to people their vacant places; so that Dakota Territory was obliged to meet competition of a strenuous sort in its efforts to people its plains. Finally the enterprising old settlers west of the James found a valuable friend and coadjutor in the Czar of all the Russias who had practically driven from his shores a hundred or two thousand German-Russian farmers, and the advance agents of these people were at the time of which we write (1873), journeying through the western part of the United States looking for the most advantageous localities for planting some of their people who were coming away from the Czar's domains in search of new homes in America.

These people had from the peculiar position they held come to be known as German-Russians; but they had rigidly retained their German language, and as a rule had abstained from marriage with the native inhabitants. It was largely due to this social and educational isolation from their Russian neighbors and Russian association, and the disaffection this created among the native subjects, that induced the Czar to abrogate the original agreement under which their forefathers accepted an asylum on Russian soil. None wished to return to Germany, but many thousand accepted the situation and declared allegiance to the Czar.

As a rule these German farmers were an exceptionally intelligent class of people, and conducted their farming operations under better methods than the average agriculturists of America. The reason for this is found in their life-long training to the cultivation of the ground, having been taught by their predecessors, and by their own careful experience, to know a fruitful soil, and a good land, and a salubrious climate.

These people had all been made acquainted with the fact that they were overwhelmingly welcome to the shores of America on their way from the seaboard to their prairie homes; and in fact they had some difficulty in making their way through the United States because of the rivalry then existing between various sections of the West (all sparsely settled at that time), to secure settlers for their vacant lands. At Chicago this rivalry exhibited itself more intensely than at any other intermediate point, and sometimes led to personal encounters, owing to the large number of emigrants who passed through that city. Immigration agents from several western states were stationed to turn the immigrant toward the section they represented; and in the instance of these German-Russian colonies, composed as they were of a large number of people of the most desirable character, this rivalry would manifest itself in efforts to break the colony into small parties, even before the strangers had an opportunity to secure a stopping place during their brief sojourn in the city, which usually lasted for a couple of days. An instance is recorded of the experience of Dakota's representative, Hon. Jacob Brauch, who was conveying a party of German-Russians from New York to Dakota. Mr. Brauch was a most genial gentleman, good natured, and all that, but naturally combative if unreasonably provoked; and it was believed among his intimate friends that he enjoyed knocking a troublesome individual down to any other form of exercise. In Chicago he was assailed on every side by immigration agents from our neighboring states and territories, and he had a most strenuous time in keeping his large party together, beset as they were by the immigration agents of other sections and the hotel men who were also sub-agents. On one occasion Brauch and one of his German-Russian aids were finally arrested for acting as immigration agents in Chicago without a license, a charge that was unfounded as the colony were ticketed through to Dakota from New York. But Dakota's representatives were haled before a judge, required to furnish bail for their appearance the following day, when their case was heard and Mr. Brauch's assistant was fined $3 for "acting as immigrant runner without a license." The judge evidently believed that he must make an example, to show that the court had the interests of Chicago at heart; though had the case been carried further it must have resulted in an acquittal, for neither Mr. Brauch or his assistants had done more than to protect the members of the colony from the determined horde that swarmed around them as they left the cars for their temporary stopping place. The colony reached Dakota with their numbers intact, satisfied that the people among whom their future homes would be made were as pleased with their coming as they could have been had they been to the manor born.

The public press learned of the movement and its magnitude, and the result was a strong immigrant organization in all of the great public land states and territories of the United States for the purpose of securing these people. During the following three years it is estimated that over one hundred thousand arrived in New York, and finally settled in the different western sections where they found the most desirable locations. The Union Pacific Railroad Company secured some large colonies for its lands in Nebraska. Dakota received in the neighborhood of a thousand families during the ensuing four or five years, and in small parties they continued to come in for several years, the latest arrivals going into the northern part of the territory, and some large settlements exist west of the Missouri in the rich coal regions.

While detracting nothing from the debt due to the earliest pioneers of Dakota for their efforts in demonstrating the fruitfulness of the soil, it is but fair to assign to the German-Russians a large portion of the credit for bringing Dakota as an agricultural region of exceptional value into a favorable position before the world. It may be stated that these earliest American pioneers, while convinced that the lands bordering the Missouri were fertile and productive, they did not hesitate to question the like quality in the lands in the interior, and many of the early land surveyors shared this opinion. The German-Russians plunged right into this unfavored and questioned region, built their sod shanties, broke up the sod, and in two and three years were raising wheat and oats and even corn and vegetables that fully equalled in quality and quantity per acre the average of the well-tested Missouri bottom lands.

The fact that so many of these people, already among the best farmers in the world, and always on the alert to improve even upon their own methods, and having no ambition to seek another industry for the employment of their time and talent, selected, after thorough investigation, for their permanent homes and for their farming operations the domain of Dakota, was one of the best evidences of the excellence of this country as a general agricultural region—a fact that was not readily accepted by the American people in the older states, whose hesitancy in taking up these Dakota lands brought about the efforts on the part of the Dakota pioneers to secure a people from the old world who were to prove by the best evidence, the priceless value of Dakota as a food-producing region. That has been so well accomplished that at the close of the territorial era, the territory had reached a place near the head of the list of agricultural states in the per capita of agricultural wealth produced. And it should not be overlooked as a significant fact that the choice of Dakota was made by these people at a time when they were strongly beset by the opportunities afforded by the public land states of Minnesota, Nebraska and Kansas, all somewhat celebrated as promising fields for the agriculturist.

An interesting incident in connection with the German-Russian immigration was the effort made by a deputation made up of representative men to obtain a concession in their favor by which large tracts of the public lands in the northern part of Dakota could be withdrawn from market for a stipulated period and held for the occupation of colonies made up of their immigrants. Their memorial to Congress is here given; and the action of that body, particularly the Senate, is proof of the high favor in which the German-Russians were held by that branch of the United States Government:

MENNONITE MEMORIAL.

Memorial sent to Congress by a committee of Mennonites at the pending of that body in December, 1873:

To the Honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned, belonging to the Christian denomination styled the Mennonites of South Russia and Prussia, in our own behalf, and that of our brethren, respectfully address the following to you:

For three generations our denomination has lived in South Russia under their own control, free to enjoy, as a separate colony, our own religion, language, lands and customs, the Russian government only interfering to punish crimes and collect its revenues. Now, by a recent edict of the Russian government, passed the 4th of June, 1871, we are deprived of all those rights, liberties and privileges, which had been granted to us a few years ago.

choice is presented to us of leaving Russia within ten years from the above mentioned date, or after that become Russianized in language and religion. In Prussia, where we lived for more than two hundred years in the liberty of conscience, the government acted the same. We have therefore determined to emigrate to some country where we can enjoy civil, social and religious liberty. By examining your constitution and country, we find the full assurance that, under your constitution and laws, we shall find the liberty we so earnestly desire, and the sentiments expressed by President Grant, in his message of March 3, 1873, give us great encouragement.

Desirous of settling in your country as colonists, there is, however, one obstacle in the way. The unimproved lands, which we would be likely to select for our future homes, being owned, in alternate sections, by railroads and the Government; if we should purchase from the railroad companies some of the sections belonging to the Government would be taken up by persons who do not belong to our colonies, and who are not in sympathy with us. Besides this, our mode of farming is for fifteen or twenty families to join together on a large tract of land, and to have portions of it set aside for common pasture, where all the horses and cattle may graze together, kept by one herder. This saves much expense in fencing.

It will require time, no doubt the eight years yet open for emigration, before all property in Russia can be disposed of, business finally settled, and the last of our brethren brought to their new home. In behalf, therefore, of our brethren, numbering between forty and fifty thousand, we would respectfully ask:

1. That if we select portions of railroad lands in different places, suitable to our different wants as cattle raisers, agriculturists, etc., that we be allowed to take up and secure the sections of lands, Government lands lying adjacent thereto, either by purchase or under the homestead laws, and to reserve the same until the year 1881.

2. If we find unoccupied bodies of land belonging to the Government suited to our purpose, that we be allowed the same privilege of taking up and securing a sufficient quantity of land protected from the interference of outside parties.

The Canadian government has offered to present us as much land as we would occupy, within the before mentioned time, but a part of us would prefer to settle in the United States; if the opportunity is given us to locate in colonies. Our only object being to care for those in distress, should there be anything in our petition looking like speculation, we beg you will prevent it.

"Justice exalts a nation," says the Word of God, and if you will use your great influence to promote this mission, and assist the emigration of those who are persecuted for conscience sake, you will have the deepest thanks of the sorrow-stricken Mennonites of Russia and Prussia, and what is much more, the blessings of Him who says, that even a drink of cold water shall not be without its reward.

We are,

With high estimation,

Some of the Emigrants from Russia and Prussia, called Mennonites.

P. S. Our mission being transitory, if any reference should be required, we beg to address our brethren, Rev. Amos Herr, Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and John M. Funk, Elkhart, Indiana, who are in sympathy with us and conversant with our movements.

These Mennonites numbered about eighty thousand souls, said a most reliable account given out at the time, and they were represented to the United States as well as to the Canadian government, as a highly industrious, educated and prosperous people who had annually exported from Russia large quantities of wheat. Their original settlement in Russia was said to be on a treeless steppe, but their skill and industry soon transformed it into a country of fine homes, fruitful orchards, and grain fields, and herds of valuable domestic animals. At first it was probably the opinion of the leaders among them that because of their exceptional moral standing, intelligence, wealth and numbers, there would be some valuable privileges accorded them in America, either by the United States or Canada, or both, owing to the fact that in order to secure freedom for the exercise of their religious faith, they had resolved to abandon Russia, carrying with them every dollar of their property if possible. It was claimed that it was the most notable emigration of such a multitude of people during the modern era, and it was pointed out that in the case of communities numbering so many thousands, faith and religious liberty were as potent as in the sixteenth century, when the Mayflower brought its liberty seeking people to Plymouth and planted the tree of religious liberty in the American colonies.

This memorial was respectfully considered by the United States Senate, where it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. This committee invited a delegation of Mennonites to attend its sittings, and listened with much interest to these delegates who claimed to represent no less than forty thousand of their people. The Northern Pacific Railway was at this time under construction and had reached Bismarck on the Missouri River, and it so happened that these Mennonite representatives had formed a very favorable opinion of the Dakota country traversed by the Northern Pacific. The Committee on Public Lands therefore authorized Senator Windom, of Minnesota, himself an ardent friend of Dakota and the Northern Pacific, to prepare and report to the Senate a bill authorizing the secretary of the interior to withdraw from public sale such large tracts of land as the German Russians desired to occupy during the coming two years, the lands to be taken by them under either the preemption or homestead laws.

It does not appear that the bill was ever reported owing to the decided and clamorous opposition of rival interests. The representatives of the public land states and territories outside of and surrounding Dakota insisted that the offering of such inducements in Dakota would virtually deprive their sections—all clamorous for immigration—of all opportunity to contest for these desirable settlers. The sentiment of the opposition held that the object of such a grant of land in aid of immigration to a particular locality could not be justified by the policy of granting lands to continental railroads, the latter being, as a rule, for the general benefit of the people as a whole. The Union Pacific corporation, which had never been friendly to its northern competitor, felt that such a valuable special favor to its rival was not treating their pioneer enterprise fairly and justly; and the project, so far as the Government taking any part to promote it, was abandoned. The emigrants, however, continued to pour into the country by thousands, and found homes not alone in Dakota, south and north, but in Minnesota, Nebraska and Kansas.

Had the bill, ordered to be reported by the public lands committee, granting to the German colonists the special privilege asked for, for two years, been enacted, it may be safely affirmed that the northern part of Dakota Territory would have been set off into a new territory and probably named Pembina. Windom's measure would have been the means of adding at least ten thousand population to that part of the territory, and this would have satisfied the objection of the House of Representatives as to population, which at the time was the only serious obstacle urged against a division of the territory. Had this occurred and division been accomplished it would have resulted in a State of Dakota and a State of Pembina, the latter a perpetual memorial of the coming to America of a people induced hither neither by avarice or material gain, but purely that they might enjoy the liberty of conscience to worship God according to its dictates.

THE FIRST TO COME

The emigration to America in large volume began in 1873, induced at least in part by a German from Ohio, who had left the German-Russian colony in Russia many years before, and settled near Sandusky, Ohio. His name was Betty or Bedy. He returned to Russia about the time of the Czar's edict cancelling the agreement with the German-Russians, in 1870. He chanced to be an old-time acquaintance and friend of Mr. Jacob Max, who was one of the leading men of the German-Russian people. The Ohio gentleman visited with Mr. Max during his sojourn, and gave him a very flattering account of America and particularly of Ohio.

The van-guard of German colonists from Russia to reach Dakota came in the spring of 1873 when Philip Jassmann, George L. Jassmann, John Engel, Jacob Kusler, Henry Sieler, Dominick Stoller, Fred Mutchelknaus, Jacob Auch, Christian Jassmann, George L. Jassmann, George W. Jassmann, Jacob Mutchelknaus, John Engel, Michael Serr, Henry Sieler, Gottfried Mehrer, Sr., Karl Bender, Michael Diede, Peter Weber, Gottfried Mehrer, Andrew Frank, Michael Gall, Alexander Herman, Eberhard Max, John Maag, Jacob Huber, Jacob Schmaidt, Peter Seydel, Jacob Redman, Andrew Schempp, Sr., Henry Schorzman, Henry Schatz, Henry Schenck, Matthias Ullmer, Henry Weidenbach, John Weidenbach, Karl Ziegel, Jacob Kusler, Dominick Stoller, Daniel Unruh, Joseph Miller, Martin Schamber, Peter Schamber, J. C. Wenzlaff and family, including two sons, Solomon and Gustave, Henry Baisch and family, Peter Keel and family, Emanuel Jose and family, two members of the Maag family, four members of the Eberhard family, Michael Stoller, George Mundt, Johann Kusler, Fred Moos, Peter Moos, Gottlieb Sayer, Balthe Kurz, Philip Hertz, Peter Bietz, George Gall, Johannes Bender, Nick Serr, Christ Serr, Jacob Ulrich, H. Schaffer, Philip Bender, Jacob Kost, Peter Orth, Anton Orth, Henry Gall, Michael Taiede, Wilhelm Bledssing, Wilhelm Ziegel, Matthew Sayler, Frederick Hertz, Ludwig Sayler, with others arrived direct from the old country, and settled in Yankton, Hutchinson and Turner counties. A second party, under the leadership of Mr. Jacob Max, arrived later the same season and went direct to Omaha, where the party established headquarters, and sent out committees to spy out the land. One committee was sent to Dakota, another into Southern Nebraska, and in due time returned to Omaha, and reported. The committee that came to Dakota were accompanied on their return to Omaha by Philip Jassmann, a member of the first colony who had reached Yankton in the spring, and by Hon. Jacob Brauch, a prominent German citizen. The report of the Dakota committee proved more satisfactory than the others; and Mr. Max's colony decided to act upon it, and forthwith removed to Yankton, arriving on the 1st of August, 1873. The colony numbered twenty-seven families, and among them were Jacob Max and his wife, and three sons, Martin, John and Emanuel, and two daughters, Paulina and Amelia; Eberhard Max and wife and son; Jacob Schnaidt and wife and two children; Paul Landmann.

The number of individual adult immigrants belonging to the German-Russian parties who came in during 1873 was about five hundred, and it was claimed they brought with them not less than two million dollars in gold, the proceeds of the property they had disposed of before leaving the realm of the Czar. It was given out in a public way at the time that the moneyed wealth of many of the heads of families ranged from $10,000 to $100,000. The men were for the most part farmers, experienced, well educated, exceptionally orderly in their conduct. There was a greater proportion of children in the various families than was the case with the American families who came West. For instance, one family numbered 12; another 10; another 9; two families had 8 children each; one 7; and three 6. Twenty families would make a large colony when they settled together, and their disposition was to settle as neighbors and build up communities of their own people. They were not all members of the religious sect called Mennonites—in fact a majority belonged to other religious denominations much the same as other nationalities, and it is probable that few comparatively were not allied with any denomination.

About one and a half miles southeast of the old Village of Bon Homme, and fronting along the bank of the Missouri River, was the local home of one of the earliest Hutterische Brotherhoods to locate in the territory. They were German-Russians, and the early settlers of the vicinity were accustomed to speak of them as German Quakers, claiming that the creed which united them in one brotherhood resembled that of the Quakers of our country. They were non-combatants, dressed quite plainly, avoiding showy garments that were made up without consulting the modern fashion plates. The members of the association owned all property in common, and each adult labored for the general welfare. They had a village, a number of large tenement houses so arranged that each family had its separate apartments, but they took their meals in a common dining hall. This colony numbered thirty-five families, and its wealth, counted in dollars, was estimated at three hundred thousand dollars. They have in operation a good flour mill, a sawmill, tannery, besides extensive orchards, and a large number of horses, mules, cows and domestic fowls. They are a contented and industrious people, devoted to their religion and to the education of their children. Peace and harmony abide in the community.

It is apparent from a more thorough acquaintance with the history and long career of these most excellent people, that while religious persecutions alone had little to do with the original settlement of the great body of Germans who emigrated to Russia during the reign of Catherine, or about the close of the eighteenth century, religion had nevertheless performed a very important part in impelling that emigration, while the immunities granted by the Russian sovereign as well as the large privileges associated with their citizenship had been due, in great part, to the favorable moral and industrial reputation won for the German agriculturists by the sect called Mennonites which at that period were, practically, all farmers, and it was due to the superiority of the Germans as farmers (not as traders or manufacturers), that induced the Russian sovereign to grant them extraordinary immunities and privileges.

Therefore it would seem just that history should give a large moiety of the credit won for the Germans as successful agriculturists to these people called Mennonites, who were, at that day, all tillers of the soil, and whose excellent reputation was shared by the German farmers generally, and who were particularly desired by the Czar, as is evident by the generous terms he made them, which covered all their demands, religious as well as secular, which may have embraced more, but not less, than the German emigrants of other religious bodies demanded, and including those not connected with any sectarian organization.

But it should be understood that the Mennonites are not necessarily communists. It was no part of their creed or practice except to the minor portion who adopted the Hutterische Brotherhood plan.

A gentleman, thoroughly competent to treat of this subject in all its phases, possessing in addition a liberal education, a birthright in German-Russia, who came as a youth, with his parents, from Russia to Dakota, in 1873, has, by special request, furnished for this history a sketch, which he has prefaced with the brief statement that he is "only too glad to be able to state the facts regarding the German colonists in Russia, who finally came to the United States, as I see them."

The writer of the sketch is a member of one of the prominent families who led the emigration from Russia, and settled in the southern part of the Territory of Dakota, and who have been known personally to the historian of this work, for more than forty years. The contribution referred to is given in words following:

As far as the religion is concerned, all the German colonists in South Russia were preponderating Lutheran, secondly Reformed, and thirdly Mennonite. As to the relation of Lutherans, Reformed and Mennonites, there is absolutely none, except that each is a branch of the great Protestant belief. As far as there being any relation I wish to call your attention to the fact that the Lutheran and Reformed Germans located in Russia regarded with quiet disdain the Mennonites because the latter had been in disfavor with the governments of the German states owing to their refusal to defend their country. Many of the German colonists in Russia continued to send their sons to Germany for military service, thus showing clearly that they were not averse to carrying of arms.

What induced the Germans from Germany to emigrate to Russia was the great opportunities offered them in a new country. The German colonists in South Russia had to do pioneering. The land had never been tilled, but was inhabited by nomadic Tartar races, such as the Calmucks.

Catherine the Great, empress of Russia, as well as her husband Peter, was German herself, born in Germany, scarcely capable of making themselves understood in the Russian language. Catherine wished to develop that country around the Black Sea. She knew that the Germans could do this, thus the invitation to go and settle the land. Sixty dessiatins (about one hundred and sixty acres) were given as a free gift to every head of a family. A loan of nearly one thousand dollars at a low rate of interest was likewise advanced to each family. They were promised that the government would not interfere with their language, religion, nor social institutions. They would not need to defend the country by giving their sons to the army. They could inaugurate local self government. They could establish their own courts and settle their own disputes, except in matters of capital crime.

You will readily see that this would appeal to any person of Europe, especially when you consider the great sacrifice the families had to make by giving their sons up for three or five years for military service in their native country. Not to have to serve in the army was an economic asset as well as an exemption from a great burden. Now this charter, which Catherine granted, appealed to various classes: Lutherans, Reformed, Germans, Swiss, and even French. Hence there was a great immigration to this new country near the Black Sea. Great caravans from Germany moved into Russia, and the country which they finally occupied was as wild and unattractive as the raw prairies of the West in the United States. The first winter that the first settlers spent in Russia was spent in suffering, and thousands succumbed to hardships and disease. Then they built better homes, and finally they were in a thriving condition. New colonists came from Germany, which movement never stopped. Among this great wave of immigration to Russia were the Mennonites.

You, therefore, see that according to this version, which I believe can easily be substantiated by records, you have altogether made too much of the Mennonite. In fact, if I were to write a history of the German colonists from Russia, I should no more mention the Mennonites than the Reformed, or the Lutheran. I should class them all as Germans from Russia.

As to the designation "Mennonite" and "Hutterische," I would say that the Mennonites are believers of Menno, who believed in immersion, nonresistance, freedom from a clerical body and the simple life. The followers of Hutter became the Hutterische Brothers, who were essentially Mennonites in the cardinal doctrines, but they believed in a communistic life in addition. The Communists are few in number, as compared with the Mennonites.

As to the Germans in Russia who came to America, the vast majority were Protestants, a few Catholics, and some Mennonites and Hutterische Brothers. Some were born in Russia, very few in Germany; some although born in Russia still maintained their citizenship in some German state, but a great majority allowed their citizenship in Germany to lapse, thus making it necessary in the United States to renounce allegiance to the Czar of Russia. So you see they were Germans without anything in common with the Russians, neither in language, religion, or any social practices. They regarded themselves as aliens and strangers in Russia, in spite of the fact that the country which they had developed was a sort of a new Germany.

Why did the Germans leave Russia? Because of the policy of the Russian government to endeavor to Russianize them, this by terminating their charter, which was written in letters of gold, and which was to be in force "forever;" and second, because of the policy demanding that the Russian language should be taught in their schools, and that their sons should have to serve in the army together with the Russian himself. A German could not well put up with the privations that a Russian soldier had to put up with. Why should they care to serve a government that they knew to be essentially corrupt, and not German?

Attention was called to the United States of America in the sixties through the great struggle between the North and South for the liberation of the slaves. Some few of the Germans had emigrated to the United States many years before the Civil war. Some of the relatives of the German colonists in Russia had emigrated to America at the time that they themselves had emigrated to Russia. More and more the German colonists had begun to learn of the opportunities of the great free republic of North America. And finally, just as they pioneered in that land that was the land of the Scythian, so they finally decided to come to the land of greater opportunity. The climate of Nebraska and Dakota they found was not much unlike that of the country of the Black Sea, and thus the emigration from South Russia.

The thing that the Germans in Russia dreaded above all was to become Russianized. The German's language, religion and institutions were sacred to him. He regarded the Russian as half barbarian. His dread of military service in Russia was not from principle, but because he did not wish to bunk in with the unattractive Russian and then probably fight for a country that was not his own. The only persons that shunned military service because of principle were the small number of Mennonites, including the members of the Hutterische brotherhoods.

I am very much interested in this chapter of your history, and I am interested to have it written as you are trying to do it—right. I have been interested in this subject for a good many years. I have urged Hon. Henry Stoller, of Lester ville, to furnish me a paper on the immigration to the Dakotas written by one of their ministers. He promised to procure it for me, but doubtless he has forgotten the matter. For a vivid picture of the German colonists in Russia, I would refer you to the little work, published in Switzerland, written by the ministers I spoke of in the first part of my letter. It is called "Immanuel! Eine Huette Gottes bei den Menschen," Pilgermissions Buchdruckerei auf St. Chrischona, Basel, Switzerland.

UNITED STATES, THE ASYLUM OF THE OPPRESSED

No better exemplification has been afforded of the pardonable boast of our people that the United States of America is the asylum and the home of the oppressed of all nations, than the coming to this country of these thousands of German-Russians, beginning in the year 1873, and increasing rapidly during the following decade. The cause of their voluntary exile from their old country home was the avowed intention of the Russian government to deprive them of their freedom to worship God, and impose upon them military burdens that were abhorrent to their consciences; not only in conflict with their life-long principles, but in violation of a solemn agreement voluntarily undertaken by the Emperor of Russia in order to induce their ancestors to make their homes in his uncultivated and unproductive country, and by their labor and skill make it fruitful, and desirable for civilized mankind to inhabit and develop. These people had faithfully fulfilled their part of the compact, and had become so prosperous, and had so transformed the barren wastes allotted to them into productive farms, dotted with happy villages and business marts as to excite the envy and cupidity of the original population, and of the Czar himself. The reigning monarch, however, at the time, was not the one who made the original agreement but possibly a degenerate son of a noble sire. But the German-Russians, rather than bow in acquiescence to the tyranny of the ruler, disposed of their worldly effects as well as they could, hampered by unjust restrictions, and following the path of empire, in the wake of the Mayflower, sought that country whose government had its foundation in religious freedom and civil liberty. It was claimed that about one hundred thousand of these people sought the shores of America during the decade beginning in 1871, and of this number many thousands found homes on the virgin prairies of Dakota Territory, apparently beginning an era of immigration to the territory then sparsely occupied along its eastern and southern borders, which has never relaxed, but has steadily augmented. From 14,188 white population in 1870, the territory grew to 135,177 in 1880; (and to 415,610 in 1886, the last year of its territorial career; and the territory as a whole, outside of the large tracts reserved for the abode of our Indian population, has become fairly well settled and improved).

It was apparent before the lapse of many years that Dakota had been greatly favored in securing these foreign born people to occupy a portion of its public land and become a part of the citizenship of the territory. Their intelligence, industry and thrift were a distinguishing mark wherever they had made their homes, and in addition to these qualities were the exemplification and practice of all important civic virtues in matters of local government, in education, in obedience to and enforcement of the law. Educational and religious institutions flourished with their support, prudent economy marked their supervision of public affairs, and their commendable example of wholesome conduct and the honorable discharge of private as well as public duties, contributed a large share of the general prosperity which has marked the progress of Dakota during many years of its territorial career.

CHAPTER LVIII

THE MCCOOK-WINTERMUTE TRAGEDY

1873 WAS A NOTABLE YEAR FOR DAKOTA—THE ADVENT OF RAILROADS—EARLY IMMIGRATION AGENTS—ELECTING TERRITORIAL OFFICERS—SECRETARY EDWIN S. MCCOOK SHOT AND KILLED BY PETER P. WINTERMUTE—SKETCH OF WINTERMUTE—INDICTMENT OF WINTERMUTE FOR MANSLAUGHTER—THE GOVERNOR REASSIGNS THE JUDGES—THE FIRST INDICTMENT AND PROCEEDINGS QUASHED AND NEW INDICTMENT FOUND CHARGING MURDER—THE TRIAL AND THE TESTIMONY—WINTERMUTE CONVICTED OF MANSLAUGHTER—SENTENCED—RETRIAL ORDERED BY SUPREME COURT—THE DEFENDANT TRIED AT VERMILION AND ACQUITTED—FULL PROCEEDINGS IN THE CASE—DEATH OF WINTERMUTE.

The year A. D. 1873 was a memorable year in the progress of Dakota. The events which emphasized its advancement were the completion of the Dakota Southern Railway along the Missouri Valley from Sioux City to Yankton, bringing within reach of a dependable market an area of fertile lands many miles in extent that had hitherto been avoided by the producing classes as too remote from market. The year also witnessed the completion of the Northern Pacific to Bismarek and the Missouri River. These highways furnished a market for the surplus agricultural products which had been a burden to the agricultural classes in the southern portion of the territory, and opened to settlement the millions of fertile acres in the central and southern portions of the territory which were being rapidly occupied before the close of the year.

Three important towns had been founded along the line of the Northern Pacific—Fargo, Jamestown and Bismarek—and preparations had been initiated for opening up a number of wheat farms in the railroad territory the following year—the beginning of a wonderful career of progress and development in the northern portion of Dakota. Another line of railroad was in course of construction from Sioux City to Sioux Falls, called the Sioux City and Pembina, which was built to a point named Portlandville, on the Iowa side of the Big Sioux River, distant twenty miles from Sioux City. The Kampeska branch of the Northwestern Railroad was completed to Lake Kampeska, then in Deuel County, but trains were not operated on the line until five years later. There was, however, considerable settlement in the county, adjacent to the line, during the year and following.

The financial condition of the Territory of Dakota as represented by the territorial treasury had greatly improved during the two years preceding 1873; and in the latter year the treasurer of the territory was able to pay off all outstanding warrants; and there was a sum due from two or three of the counties that would be paid in before another spring, leaving a balance to the credit of the territory. The territorial officials who were in charge of the territorial finances at the time were George W. Kellogg, of Union County, auditor; and Thomas J. Sloan, of Clay County, treasurer. As the reader may have overlooked the important lesson conveyed in the result of the last election, it is well to state that these officials were both democrats. The territorial superintendent of public instruction was Hon. John W. Turner, who had fought the battles of democracy under Jackson in the Empire State.

IMMIGRATION AGENTS

Dakota's early immigration agents were diligent in their duties, and met with fair success, though working on a weak financial footing. Mr. James S. Foster, the pioneer educator, turned his attention almost wholly to immigration in 1870, and worked in Illinois, Wisconsin and Missouri, holding public meetings, distributing advertising literature, and visiting farmers at home. During his career in that capacity he was compelled to meet a number of rivals from Western Iowa, Minnesota and Nebraska, all of whom were in much better position financially than Dakota's representative, who received a meager salary and small appropriations for work, and would probably have been unable to make any sort of campaign outside the territory had not public spirit moved a number of individuals to contribute for that purpose.

Hon. Jacob Brauch was quite successful in securing a number of the German-Russian colonies. Being a German, and a very intelligent, forceful and tactful man, he was able to compete in a measure with the strong rivalry of Nebraska and the Union Pacific Railroad, whose agents were very active in securing foreign emigration, and who did not scruple to misrepresent the Dakota country with stories of hostile Indians, drouths, grasshopper raids, mosquitoes, not neglecting to mention blizzards and alkaline water as among the principal inducements Dakota had to offer. Notwithstanding these discouragements, Commissioner Brauch was able to bring in and locate a large number of families who came from the Czar's German dominions, and on one occasion, learning of the deceit practiced upon a party of one hundred or more intending to settle in Dakota who had been lured into our neighboring state, he buckled on his armor and single-handed invaded the district where the mis-directed colony had located, and succeeded in bringing every man, woman and child to Dakota where they settled and have since prospered.

Dakota, for nearly a score of its earlier years, was seriously handicapped in its work for immigration by the prejudices which had been instilled in the public mind through these rival agencies, in circulating reports that the drawbacks enumerated were permanent, natural, climatic, and could never be outgrown, basing their stories upon the exaggerated events of the Indian war of 1802-05, which, though originating outside the territory, had its field of conflict within our borders, and but for Dakota's defense, Nebraska would doubtless have been overrun with savages. The extreme drouth of 1803 when low water in the Missouri from spring until the close of navigation retarded the steamboats and prevented the carrying out, as designed, of Sully's campaign, called public attention to the event and left a prejudice toward Dakota. The grasshopper raids were a serious scourge, but half a dozen or more territories and states shared in similar afflictions. And as for the blizzards, while they were the most dangerous of storms, Dakota could truthfully claim a greater immunity from their perils and ravages than a number of northern states, including those fronting on the Atlantic coast.

Nevertheless Dakota gained encouragingly in population in 1873, and fortunately the season was favorable to the farmers. Immigration was very equally distributed—the population of the Sioux Valley increasing about 300 per cent, and the Vermillion Valley and the intervening country to the James, about the same. The Red River Valley and along the line of the Northern Pacific secured a larger proportion. It was the initial year of the German-Russian immigration, nearly all of which settled along the valley of the James River in Yankton, Hutchinson, Bon Homme and Turner counties.

ELECTING TERRITORIAL OFFICERS

In order to gratify a general demand among the people of Dakota who were dissatisfied with the method pursued by the general government in providing the executive officers of the territory from non-residents, Delegate Armstrong introduced in the House of Representatives the following bill in February, 1873:

A bill to enable the people of the territories to elect their governors and all other territorial officers in the manner provided for the election of a delegate to Congress.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that at the next general election for delegate to Congress, in each of the territories of the United States, there shall be chosen by the qualified electors thereof, the following named territorial officers, in addition to that of delegate to Congress, namely: One governor, one secretary, three judges, one prosecuting attorney, one marshal, one surveyor general, one auditor, one treasurer, one superintendent of public instruction and one commissioner of immigration.

Sec. 2. That the Legislatures of each of the several territories shall, at the next session after the passage of this act, provide a law for carrying the provisions of this act into effect. And after the officers herein enumerated shall have been elected and qualified, they shall continue to report to, and be held accountable, by the proper departments of the Government, in all disbursements of public moneys, as is now provided by law. Provided, that the salaries of all officers mentioned in this act, shall be limited as heretofore by Congress, and paid out of the United States treasury.

The author of this measure could not have been at all sanguine of its favorable reception by Congress; but he knew enough of the sentiment of the people of the territory to know that it would not injure his political standing at home, and this is probably what he had in mind, and all he expected to accomplish. The bill was referred to the Committee on Territories, and nothing more was heard from it.

HOMICIDE OF SECRETARY M'COOK

The killing of Edwin Stanton McCook, secretary of the Territory of Dakota, by Peter P. Wintermute, a banker, September 11, 1873, at Yankton, was a tragic event that awakened widespread interest from the prominence of the parties, and aroused a feeling of great indignation against the perpetrator of the crime.

It was alleged at the time the deed was committed that the trouble between the men grew out of the long-time rivalries between Broadway and Capital street, two separate business districts in Yankton. It was also alleged that animosities arising out of the legal proceedings connected with the building of the Dakota Southern Railroad furnished an incentive for the atrocity, and while these sectional rivalries and personal animosities doubtless existed, it would seem more probable that the estrangement arose from McCook's loyalty to Governor Burbank, between whom and Wintermute and his political friends there existed a strong and open antagonism. There existed only a formal acquaintance between McCook and Wintermute.

As the tragedy became connected subsequently with the railroad proceedings, through intrigues to shift the judges from one district to another, the history of the lamentable and scandalous affair is here given following the railroad chapters.

Governor Burbank was appointed in 1869 when General Grant became President, and was supported by his brother-in-law, Senator Morton, of Indiana, then one of the strongest personal influences with the President. It is not claimed that the selection of Burbank was a judicious one, and but for the prominence and influence of the Indiana senator, in all probability would not have been made. Burbank's most notable work during his term had been the building up of the town of Springfield in Bon Homme County, in which he had acquired a large interest after coming to the territory. He procured the establishment of a United States land office at his town and made it a prominent mail route center, all of which tended to the detriment of the old town of Bon Homme, county seat of the county which was owned by Yankton parties of influence. Burbank had also been instrumental in changing the terminus of the Dakota Southern Railroad from Yankton to the west line of Bon Homme County in the curative act of Congress validating the railroad bond election in 1871, and had been given a place in the directory of that company; and had taken the Elk Point Township bonds voted to aid the Dakota Southern, amounting to $15,000. For these causes and an apparent personal dislike, Wintermute as one of the leaders of the faction determined to prevent his reappointment, which was due to be made in 1873; and for the purpose of making it appear that the Dakota communities were strongly opposed to him, Wintermute and a half dozen or a dozen others held what they termed an indignation meeting in an out-of-the-way room, one evening, shortly before Burbank's term expired in the spring of 1873, at which Wintermute took the leading part.

Secretary McCook was a political friend of Burbank's. Their official relationship was calculated to make them friendly, and McCook would naturally feel like assisting his friend in this matter of a reappointment. McCook learned of the indignation meeting through some source, and with a few friends, attended it, notwithstanding the lack of an invitation. Wintermute was in charge, and it was evident from the dim light and novel arrangement of the room, and the paucity of attendance, that it was not designed for a public meeting for more than a select few. McCook may have made a motion to thwart the purpose of the quiet gathering. In that, or some way, he and Wintermute exchanged some unpleasant and unfriendly words of a character sufficient to cause an estrangement and doubtless led to the termination of any social intercourse between them, at least for the time being.

Burbank was reappointed, and the events of the following summer were of a character that made matters no better. The county commissioners and the railroad company were engaged in a controversy growing out of the effort of the company to mortgage the road. The county authorities, the county being a stockholder, procured an order from the court, temporarily restraining the company from issuing the mortgage bonds. The commissioners alleged that such mortgage would seriously impair the value of the stock held by the county, and that the company had failed to make the improvements at Yankton that had been promised. A portion of the community sided with the commissioners, and another portion took the ground that the county had agreed to donate the $200,000 in bonds for the railroad; that the road had been built and was in operation, and that to demand anything more was a violation of the original agreement, and Governor Burbank, though not a tax-payer, was more conspicuously a defender of the claims of the railroad company than others because of his efforts to induce the judge of the District Court to dissolve the temporary injunction against the issue of the mortgage bonds.

This much is offered as an explanation of the social relationship that existed between McCook and Wintermute. It afforded a basis for the quarrel that preceded the shooting; and as there appeared such a divergence of opinion among the people as to the nature of the crime committed, the entire testimony given at the trials is produced in this chapter, without prejudicial comment.

Edwin Stanton McCook was appointed secretary of Dakota Territory by President Grant, January 8, 1872. He had attained a national fame, and was a historic character, prior to coming to Dakota.

He was a member of the famous Ohio family of "fighting McCooks" whose record during the Civil war gave them a distinguished and honorable place in the annals of that great conflict. The secretary, while a boy, had enlisted in the Union army as a private soldier, and was afterwards commissioned captain of the Thirty-first Illinois Volunteers. He retired from the service with the rank of brevet brigadier general, and settled at Canton, Ill., where he residing when he received his Dakota appointment. He was fairly well off in this world's goods. He reached Yankton, the capital of the territory, March 8, 1872, with his wife and a son, his only child, a lad of ten years, accompanied by the parents of Mrs. McCook, Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Whitney.

Concerning Peter P. Wintermute, prior to his removal to Dakota. He was born in the State of New York. He removed with his family to Yankton in 1871. After the tragedy which gave him notoriety, a sketch of a portion of his career appeared in a western newspaper.

The Milwaukee News gave the following:

Mr. Wintermute, who is, unfortunately, a party to this calamity, is well known to many gentlemen of this city and other parts of the state. He is a civil engineer by profession, and was in the employ of Selah Chamberlain and of the old LaCrosse & Milwaukee Railway while that road was in process of construction. He figured extensively at Madison in the railroad legislation of 1869, and formed the Wintermute-Stinson combination to which the state granted its title to the St. Croix land grant. Wintermute & Stinson (who were brothers-in-law) afterwards sold their charter and franchise to Jay Cooke, by whom the same were forfeited, and the act conferring the same on the Wintermute-Stinson Company was afterwards repealed. Wintermute was also a large property holder at Superior City, Wisconsin, and resided for some years at St. Paul. Mr. Wintermute removed to Yankton in 1871, and established a bank there. He was, so far as his many acquaintances in this vicinity understood his character, a most amiable and genial gentleman, shrewd in business operations, accomplished and refined in his habits, and the farthest possible from an assassin in his disposition and manners.

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press furnished the following:

Mr. Wintermute was for years a resident of St. Paul, and has many friends in this city who will be deeply pained by the intelligence of the rash and criminal act which, if the law is not unjustly diverted from its course, has probably ended his career. Mr. Wintermute is a brother-in-law of James Stinson, a wealthy citizen of Chicago, who has large real estate interests in this city. He has figured somewhat more ambitiously than successfully in various railroad and real estate speculations at Superior in connection with the St. Croix & Bayfield Railroad. It was he and others who obtained possession of the charter of that road, with a conditional grant from the Wisconsin Legislature, which he sold out to Jay Cooke. He has lived for two or three years past at Yankton, where he has kept a small bank, has aspired to become a political leader, and was alleged to have aspirations for an election as delegate to Congress.

That Wintermute had premeditated the killing of McCook prior to the row in the saloon is not probable. It is more probable that he had entertained, since the indignation meeting, a personal dislike of McCook, who was not disposed to show him more than ordinary courtesies and did not court his companionship. The disturbance in the saloon stung him and he, "influenced by wine," conceived hastily the part he enacted, designing, probably, to frighten McCook into hiding, thus showing indications of cowardice, and expected to vindicate his own bravery at the same time. When he first fired toward McCook he was not more than twenty feet from him; he failed to hit him, whether designedly or not, and the ball passing through the open doorway in which McCook was standing, lodged in the wall outside. His first shot may have been designed to scare McCook into seeking safety in the hallway, which Wintermute expecting, he was not prepared for the serious affray he brought upon himself; and when seized by McCook, apprehensive of his own safety, fired at random several times, and fired a fatal shot. This story was advanced by men who knew Wintermute quite intimately, and a story was current following the tragedy that he had admitted as much to his intimate friends. It was also indirectly referred to by his counsel at the trial, who argued that it was McCook's duty, after discovering that he was a target for Wintermute, to have sought safety by removing to a safer place.

Wintermute, it seems, emboldened by liquor, was desirous of making a public exhibition of his prowess, and possibly thinking to wipe out whatever of stain had been made upon his reputation as a fighting man from the conflict in the saloon, hastily conceived the plan of shooting, and procured a pistol from some friend during the brief interval between the saloon brawl and the tragedy in the courtroom.

The circumstances up to the firing of the first shot point more to an exhibition of bravado than anything else.

The fact that Wintermute was not armed when the fracas occurred in the saloon, but upon leaving that place procured a loaded pistol and a few minutes later appeared in the courtroom, indicated that he had not premeditated any serious trouble prior to the saloon fracas.

At the October term of the Territorial District Court following, Judge A. H. Barnes, presiding, the grand jury returned an indictment against Wintermute charging the crime of manslaughter. This being a bailable offense the defendant was released from custody upon giving bail in the sum of $50,000. Court then adjourned.

During the following month, Acting Governor Whitney, father-in-law of the late secretary, who had been appointed to succeed Secretary McCook, issued a proclamation during the temporary absence of Governor Burbank, re-assigning the judges, which brought Judge Peter C. Shannon from the Third Judicial District in the northern part of the territory to the Second District at Yankton, and assigned Judge Barnes to the Northern District.

Application for a change of venue in the case was made by the defendant, and was heard by Judge Shannon, at a special term of court held in January, 1874. The motion was denied.

A motion was now made by the prosecution to quash the indictment for manslaughter returned by the grand jury in October, 1873, which the court took under consideration.

At the adjourned session held in March following, the judge ruled that the law of 1862-63 under which the indictment was found, was not in force; that the grand jury had been improperly empanelled, and the motion to nolle pros was allowed by the court. Defendant Wintermute was ordered into custody; and on motion he was admitted to bail in the sum of $35,000.

On April 15th, court convened in regular session for the trial of the case. District Attorney Phil K. Faulk, who had charge for the prosecution, secured the admission of Jason B. Brown, secretary of Wyoming Territory, to assist himself and George H. Hand in the prosecution. The counsel for defense were Moody and Cramer, William Tripp, Bartlett Tripp, and Hon. S. L. Spink, of Yankton, and Leonard B. Sweet, of Chicago. A grand jury having been summoned for the purpose of a new inquisition of the case, the former indictment having been quashed, the following persons were finally empanelled as a grand jury, after being duly examined by counsel regarding their qualifications: John Fitch, M. D. Gardner, J. M. Burk, George H. Miner, Franklin Wixson, Nathaniel Preshe, G. W. Delamater, Henry Luebke, James Hendershott, John Gill, Sr., Robert Cox, Daniel Parkhurst, William P. Lyman, Luke Lavery, and H. Ellerman. The following day the judge charged the jury concerning their duties as grand jurors as follows:

Gentlemen: You have been duly sworn and empaneled as a grand jury, and it now becomes the duty of this court to duly instruct you in your true duties, that you may avoid all errors in their performance. You hold an important position as an auxiliary branch of this court, an aid to render certain assistance in administering justice. But I must endeavor to correct one grave misapprehension of a juror's duty that has crept into the minds of many people, by saying that you are not hereby to try any one. A trial implies an appearance on both sides before some tribunal. You gentlemen are required to hear only the evidence on the side of the people. You are a secret tribunal to accuse of crime. You have no right to hear evidence in favor of an accused person, or produced by him. It is absolutely unlawful for you to hear him or anyone for him.

It is all a mistaken idea prevailing in some parts that the grand jury room is a place for the trial of criminals. From its first origin, six or seven hundred years ago, to the Anglo-Saxon founders down through the ages to near the end of the nineteenth century, it was never held that a grand jury could try or defend a prisoner. The great object ever sought was to maintain it as a place to hear the witnesses of the Government and the people, and to exclude from their presence the accused and all his witnesses.

Before entering on such important duty, it is best to think for a moment upon the solemn oath you have taken; for I will not suppose that any man intends to violate it; to seize the bit in his mouth and trample on the laws of his country. You have sworn to keep the counsel of the people, of yourselves and of your fellows. You bound yourselves to keep absolutely secret all that may occur in your room. You are not at liberty to divulge anything said or done while arriving at your conclusions. You may not even relate outside what one of you may have said to another. There is but one exception to this. If it should become necessary hereafter in a court of justice, in order to convict a witness under indictment for perjury, a juror may testify as to what that juror witness said in their secret sessions. I know of no other exception. You cannot communicate these secrets even to the court; and the district attorney is equally bound to secrecy and the observance of the law. You shall inquire and due presentment make of such matters as shall be given you in charge by the district attorney, of which you shall have legal evidence as occurring in this County of Yankton. You will truly present to them as they come to you through the officer for this county, and him only, by the witnesses he shall introduce. He represents the majesty of the people. All accusations and evidence must come to you by him alone. Neither he nor you can make the law. This court cannot make the law, but it must obey and administer the law.

The first institution of the grand jury was away back in 1164, when a law was enacted, saying in quaint old language, that in cases where men were suspected whom no one dared openly to accuse, the sheriff should select twelve men who should declare the truth. These men were at first summoned as witnesses to jointly accuse of crime, and put a man on trial with less individual responsibility. The number was afterwards increased. So the grand jury has been ever since a secret place to accuse of crime on behalf of the people, but not to hear and try cases. It would be a high usurpation were it to presume to take the place of the court and forestall the action of the petit jury, who are to hear both sides.

I dislike to quote from books to juries, and some may deem it in bad taste; but I must read to you from the best common law authorities some further rules for your guidance. (Judge reads from Reports, but text not reported by clerk.) This requires that you shall examine such witnesses as the people's officer shall present, or enough of them to justify an indictment. He may attend your sessions, explain to you points of law, make charges and introduce his witnesses, but must not be present at any of your deliberations or votings upon such cases. You must keep secret the evidence you hear, the votes taken and the remarks made to each other. Sixteen men legally compose the jury, and twelve or more of these must vote in favor of an indictment or no bill can be found. All must deliberate and act together.

I will further read from the law principles established ages ago. The prosecuting attorney must submit the indictment and produce proof. No other person can go before you for that purpose, though in open court he may call in the aid of others. What sort of evidence, or how much is required, to justify finding a bill? Sir Matthew Hale, upon this point, has said: "In case there is probable evidence a crime has been committed, the grand jury ought to find a bill; it is but an accusation, and is to be tried afterward before the judge and petit jury." All attorneys know that. You are to consult the district attorney and the instructions of this court upon matters of law. Would it not be a gross usurpation if jurors should secretly judge the law and disregard it? If the grand jury could try cases it would put a party on trial twice for the same offense. From all the authorities here cited, the court is of opinion, that it would be grossly illegal for you to examine or hear witnesses for the defense. Your oath says you are diligently to inquire, etc. But that does not mean that you are to inquire in behalf of both sides, or to hear anything to clear the accused. Inquire diligently into the charge but not the offense. You are to judge of the credibility of witnesses, and are at liberty to disregard the testimony of infamous persons, or those not to be believed under oath. In cases where insanity is presumed and believed, you must still find a bill; it has been invariably held in England that an insane homicide must be indicted for murder, because the grand jury could not try the question of insanity. I shall not ask to be excused for taking so much time in this charge, or for going into such long and explicit details. I repeat I do not ask you to excuse me for performing this solemn duty of laying down the law of the land. This duty the law imposes on me, and I am bound to comply as thoroughly and impartially as in my power. Having instructed you in general duties, I now proceed to charge you in relation to a case of homicide that will be laid before you. I have reason to say this, for I have judicial knowledge that such a case will be presented. Therefore, in view of what will soon be your great responsibilities, I must now proceed to lay before you the general principles of the laws of this territory relating to homicide. I can only give you the general law; special points will arise upon special trial.

From the ancient and general law, "Thou shalt not kill," is derived our present law. Homicide, the killing of one human being by another, is of three kinds: Justifiable, or excusable homicide; manslaughter, and murder. Homicide is justifiable or excusable when a person is killed under certain circumstances set forth by law. The law of this territory says it is excusable when done by accident or misfortune in doing any lawful act, or when committed by accident or misfortune in the heat of passion, or on sufficient provocation; provided, that no undue advantage is taken, or dangerous weapons used; and provided that it is not done in a cruel or unusual manner. It is justifiable when done in executing some necessary legal process, or when resisting some felonious or murderous attack. But suppose that a previous affray had taken place without dangerous weapons being used or serious harm done; suppose sufficient time elapses for the heat of passion to cool; that then one party arms himself, lies in wait to watch for his opponent, and suddenly draws his pistol or gun and kills him, would such an act be excusable homicide under the law just read? Most certainly it cannot be so regarded. If a man is trying to murder you, you are justified in slaying him; also if he is trying to break into your house, or commit other felony upon you. It is important that you should know and understand the whole of these distinctions of crime.

The second grade of homicide, or manslaughter, is found when perpetrated with a design to effect death, and in the heat of passion, but in a cruel and unusual manner, or by dangerous weapon. It can be held manslaughter only when perpetrated without any design to effect death. So that in any case that may come before you, before you can indict for manslaughter, you must first fully believe that there was no design to effect the death of the person killed.

Homicide is murder when unlawfully committed with a premeditated design to effect death. In the case before you, you are to inquire, first, was the killing without authority of law? and second, had he a premeditated design to effect the death of the person killed? Again as presiding judge, it becomes my duty to explain the meaning of the words "premeditated design." You will naturally inquire and the question has arisen in many courts, how long must a purpose have existed to constitute premeditation of purpose? Does it require a year, a month, a day, an hour, or even less? How long does it take a man to form a design to kill? Fortunately we are not left in doubt or ignorance as to the intent of the statute; for section 243 says: "A design to effect death sufficient to constitute murder may be formed instantly before committing the act by which it is carried into execution." The answer is there and thus plainly written. There is no room for conjecture; no need of explanation. It is the law of the land, and neither you nor I have power to alter that law, or deviate from it. One more question may arise: Does anger or intoxication excuse a person from the guilt of such an act? Here again we are not left to float in a sea of doubt or speculation. Section 244 declares: "Homicide committed with a design to effect death is not the less murder because the perpetrator was, in a state of anger or voluntary intoxication at the time. I also read from standard extracts which prove that however great the original provocation, if sufficient time has elapsed for anger to cool, the killing must be classed as murder. I began by saying I could do no more than give you the law of this territory. This duty I have performed, fearlessly and conscientiously, looking solemnly to God for approval, and having fulfilled it without fear, favor or affection, my duty now ceases. I leave you, gentlemen, to begin your responsible labors.

The jury then retired.

On the day following the jury asked further instruction from the court as to whether they were compelled to act upon the exact indictment furnished them by the district attorney, or whether they could substitute another and act on it, or change the grade of crime named.

The judge explained that by act of January 8, 1873, all codes or bodies of written criminal laws were abolished, and in place thereof the regular common law practice was adopted as the standard of procedure, assimilated as nearly as possible to the practice of the United States Court. He then gave the law on the point referred to him, and decided that the grand jury had no power to act upon or present any bill not submitted to them by the public prosecutor.

The following day, Wednesday, April 20th, the grand jury returned into court and presented a bill of indictment charging Peter P. Wintermute with the crime of murder in killing Edwin S. McCook. The offense not being bailable, the defendant was committed to jail.

At the May term of court, 1874, following, the case was called for trial. Counsel for the prosecution and defense the same as before the grand jury. A panel consisting of forty-eight persons had been summoned as petit jurors, and the labor of selecting the trial jury to be composed of twelve was then begun. John Hartert, C. G. Irish, Eugene Alexander, H. H. Davenport, Alfred Bruce, George Jenkins, M. C. Hoyt, John J. Duffack, D. D. Keeler, H. Krudwig, C. H. Edwards and E. S. Mosher, had all expressed opinions and were excused, and only two of the forty-two persons examined stood test as to qualifications. These were Hiram Derby and James Cornell. Court then adjourned till the 14th. On reconvening the court the examination of jurors was resumed. I have

P. Truesdell was sworn in as the third juror. John H. Haas, a farmer, No. 4; Jonathan Renner, No. 5; George Shearer, No. 6; Willis Arnold, of Gayville, No. 7; Iyer Bagstad, No. 8; Charles Van Epps, No. 9; Olaus L. Grimsrud, No. 10; Thomas Royster, No. 11; William Ingram, No. 12.

During the empanelling of the jury, Charles Long, M. Bartholomew, Frank Pechan, Martin Jensen, Louis F. Michael, Alanson Seeley, Silas Presby, Henry Koch, Joseph Emmerson, John M. Johnson, G. J. Devoe, F. M. Devoe, James Donahue, Thomas Frick, William Nieland, Henry Nieland, Gardner Baker, Zebulon Stout, J. G. Beardsley, F. Beers, A. VanOsdel, John Daugherty, S. VanOsdel, Louis Sampson, Ole F. Hille, George Winters, Myron Blodgett, Sannel Blodgett, John Aalseth, John Betts, Robert B. Leach, John C. Woodruff, Elias Hudsmith, Ed Palmer, J. Mundroff, D. M. Noyes, J. B. Robertson, Jacob Griffin, George Platt, William Blatt, William Brisbine, Samuel Ream, Llewellyn Stephens, Henry Mowry, Charles Loffler, John English, W. E. Wilson, Edward Raymond, Norman Learned, Frank M. Withee, Charles Broderson, Adolph Mauxsch, Peter Lewis, John Hateke, Isaac Piles, Griffin Greene, J. Ferdinand, Thomas Limpo, Elias C. Marvin, William Ingram, were all examined as to their qualifications, and discharged, the large majority having formed an opinion; some not being able to understand the English language, and a few thrown out on peremptory challenges. Four special panels were summoned in addition to the regular panel, before a jury was selected. The empanelling of the jury was concluded on Saturday; an adjournment was taken until Monday, when court re-convened, and the taking of testimony on the part of the prosecution was begun May 18th.

Wm. M. Powers, of Yankton, was the first witness. He and F. M. Ziebach were together in the hall, near the courtroom door, on the night of the murder, when Wintermute, passing, said to them: "You tell McCook that I shall shoot him on sight."

C. G. Wicker, president of the Dakota Southern Railroad Company, testified: "I knew the general and Wintermute. Saw them together in the hall or passage that evening. McCook and I were together at the door when Mr. Ash and Wintermute came out of the meeting. Wintermute said to McCook, 'Give me a cigar'; McCook replied, 'I haven't got a cigar.' Wintermute then said, 'Give me the money to buy one then' (with an oath). Wintermute and Ash then went down stairs."

C. L. Bancroft testified: "Have been a bootmaker in Yankton for two and a half years. Went into saloon under St. Charles Hotel about 8 o'clock that evening. Soon followed by McCook. Found there Wintermute, Ziebach, L. M. Griffith, Ash and Cowan. The first I noticed was Wintermute saying to McCook that he could whip him. McCook replied, 'Guess you can't do it.' Wintermute said, 'If I can't whip you, I can shoot you. By —, I will shoot you.' Wintermute then shook his fist in his face and said, 'You are a — stinking puppy, and I'll be — if I don't shoot you.' Then McCook struck him, bent him over the bar, took him by the collar, threw him on his knees and hands and elbows on the floor, striking him two or three times as he held him, saying, 'You'll shoot me, will you.' They were parted, and McCook at once went out, but Wintermute remained and washed his face. It was bloody from a cut from fist, or bruise on left cheek, not severe. Said he would go to the hall again. Cowan said he had better go home. Wintermute said no, he would go to the hall; this was the worst thing ever happened for Capital Street; he'd break up the meeting, for he had the crowd here to do it; and if McCook ever got on Broadway he would shoot him. He left the saloon and I stayed. McCook replied in a cool, easy manner, and not excited, when Wintermute first said he would whip him. When he struck Wintermute two or three times it was not so hard as I should have thought such a man would strike."

F. M. Ziebach testified: "Was in the saloon when Wintermute and Ash came in. The first thing Wintermute said to me in presence of McCook was this: 'This is the man I'm mad at, and I'll tell you why. I came here to this railroad meeting without any money, and asked McCook for 5 cents to buy a cigar, and he told me to go to h—l.' I supposed of course they were joking, and said in joke, 'Then you ought to have whipped him.' Wintermute said, 'I can whip him,' to which McCook said, 'Oh, no, you can't do that.' (Witness here gave an account similar to Bancroft's of the scuffle between the two men.) McCook made not the least attack or provocation toward Wintermute till called a puppy and then threatened. I afterwards saw Wintermute in this courtroom, and in the passage at the door. Powers and I were together. He came to us and said in a calm, deliberate manner, that he'd shoot McCook on sight, and I might tell him so. I told him it was none of my quarrel, and he might deliver his own message. I think Wintermute was not seriously hurt in the saloon."

THE SHOOTING IN THE COURROOM

Miles T. Woolley testified: "At 10 minutes to 8, Wintermute came to W. G. Press, who sat by me, and got him to second his nomination of Ex-Governor Edmunds as chairman of the meeting. Wintermute went out and was gone some time. Came in and took a chair close to aisle. Got up and interrupted Burleigh's speech, called meeting to order, asking if it was a d—d rowdy meeting, saying he had just been licked out of his boots by General McCook, and (pointing to his face) had got this to show for it. He went out and came in twice, and kept looking back at the door. I was looking at him, listening to Mr. Spink's speech. After half or three-quarters of an hour, saw him rise, draw and cock a revolver and step forward three or four steps toward the door. I saw McCook at the door—saw Wintermute fire at him. Rossteuscher rushed into the room toward him—so did McCook. I distinctly saw Wintermute fire the second shot, and think I saw blood then flow, but not before. The time between these shots was very short. The two men were very close together—revolver might have touched McCook's clothes. No one had interfered with Wintermute in the room that night. I got out in the hall; soon heard the third and fourth shots. After the first, McCook rushed in with both hands up, and both were open and empty. I saw no pistol that night but Wintermute's, a medium sized revolver."

Charles F. Rossteuscher, justice of the peace, testified: "I was at the time the affair began, standing in the doorway with McCook, looking at the meeting. Saw Wintermute advance and fire directly at us. I went in and Wintermute stepped back. I took him by the shoulder and said, 'You are my prisoner.' I was pushed aside partly by McCook, just behind and at one side of me, when another shot was fired under my raised left arm. In an instant they had a scuffle and went down on the floor by the stove. When they clinked, McCook had hold of the muzzle of the pistol, and 'English Pete' caught his wrist. Wintermute had been sitting crosswise on his chair, looking often at the door. I had twice been out looking for an officer, as the meeting was disorderly. When they fell and upset the stove, Wintermute was under. Major Hanson stepped on his arm and wrenched the pistol from his hand. No person had meddled with Wintermute from the time he came in until he began to shoot."

Cross-examined—"After they fell by the stove, I took hold of McCook, saying, 'General, for God's sake quit.' He said, 'No, don't you see I'm shot.' They were parted and got up. Then another assault was made, the stove and drum were knocked down, and they fell. Wintermute had just given the fourth shot, but I didn't see it. Hanson took away the pistol. They were again separated and got up. McCook then went to shoving him toward this part of the room toward the window. Forced him against the window; knocked out a pane of glass with his fist, and was trying to push Wintermute through when prevented. He didn't hold or carry him there but shoved and forced him. I arrested Wintermute, and afterward issued warrant on a charge of murder when McCook died. I am a justice of the peace. I saw Wintermute go and look into Judge Bayliss' room as if looking for some one."

Dr. Walter A. Burleigh testified: "Was educated for the medical profession. Practiced till 1860. Knew General McCook. He died September 12, 1873, in this building in Yankton County, from hemorrhage caused by a pistol shot wound under the left clavicle and over the first rib, 3 or 3½ inches left of the breast bone. The ball came out in the back of the shoulder, near the neck. The ball passed through the flesh and muscle, severed the sub-clavian vein and artery, and wounded the brachial plexus or bundle of nerves. Cutting off the sub-clavian artery is very dangerous. When necessary to ligate or tie it up in its third division or the part nearer the shoulder, it sometimes saves life; when ligated in the second division nearer the heart, it oftener fails; and is always fatal when in the first division. Only thirteen cases of trying to tie this artery are recorded, and all were fatal. In General McCook's case it was just between the first and second portion, and was necessarily fatal, because very deep in the body and below the rib. It is not thought best to attempt to ligate in such cases. (Witness explained the aorta with its chief arteries, especially the sub-clavian, lying below the collar bone, which carries blood to the arm.) I first saw McCook about thirty seconds after he was shot, reeling and fainting; his left arm was paralyzed by wound of the motor nerves. This was a mortal wound. No power on earth could have saved him. He was in a state of syncope and had lost a great deal of blood. The opinion of all surgeons and the history of the profession prove it mortal. I did not see the pistol fired, but heard just four shots. Saw the third shot strike the ceiling. While I was making a speech in the railroad meeting, Wintermute came in; called meeting to order and said something. Saw him afterwards come in and sit by the aisle near middle of room; didn't observe his actions there. After the shooting and struggle, I found both deluged in blood, and helped take McCook to his room and bed, where we stripped him and examined the wound. He asked the nature of his injury, I told him I could tell after taking off his clothes. He said, 'I am not afraid to die, Doctor, tell me my true condition.' I said, 'There is no hope; it is all over with you.' He then had us send for his wife and boy, and told them to kiss him for he must soon leave them. He said, 'Charlie, be a good boy, and always mind your mother.' He said to me, 'I'm not afraid to die; I go to me God, with clean hands.' He said his accounts would be all right and all right. About midn't I left him a short time, returned and stayed till he died. McCook said nothing of surviving; no encouragement of it was given him."

Question—"What was said by McCook as to the cause of death, who caused it, etc."

Objected to by defense who entered into an argument to show that it was improper evidence, because the fact that McCook believed he was dying was not fully proved, and they claimed the right to rebut that belief with opposite proof. The prosecution held that to entitle the last words of General McCook to be admitted as dying declarations, prima facie evidence was enough, and that opposite proof was not in order.

It was held by the court that the foundation had been properly laid for introducing the dying declarations as to who killed him; that the defense cannot now stop the progress of evidence to bring in rebutting proof to impeach McCook's statement that he was then just going to die, and that not a single reported case authorized him to decide otherwise.

Exceptions were taken by defense.

Doctor Burleigh then replied to the question objected to, and said: "McCook said substantially this: 'He shot me down like a dog, without giving me a chance to defend myself.' I asked him who? He said, 'Wintermute.' I said, 'Had you no arms?' 'None but these,' said McCook, raising his right arm a little, but failing to stir the left, he said, 'It's no use; I can't move it?' He said he was standing at the door; was surprised to find Wintermute shooting at him and went to take the pistol away, when Wintermute shot him in the breast. I attended the post-mortem examination and then saw the interior course and effects of the ball."

Dr. Geo. E. Moon swore to substantially the same facts as Doctor Burleigh. Described the cutting of the vein and artery, and said such a wound must in all cases cause death. "No help for it. When I came to McCook's bed, he said: 'Doctor, I never thought I would come to this. I am killed.' I replied, 'I guess not General.' He said he was shot just as his brother was, and he knew he could not recover; could have kept out of Wintermute's way if he had known; that he was shot by Wintermute, and the second shot killed him. The blood from the front wound was dark and venous, from the other in his back, came bright arterial blood."

Dr. James M. Miller testified: He did not see McCook while living. He drew a sketch of the aorta and branch arteries for the jury, and testified like the others as to the fatal character of such a cutting of the artery and vein.

Joseph R. Hanson testified: "Was sitting in Mrs. Bayliss' room and saw General McCook there. Was in the hallways when shots were heard. The crowd rushed out, and kept me awhile from getting in. Saw a pistol held high in air and persons trying to get it. Wintermute and McCook fell; I put my foot on Wintermute's arm, and took the pistol away from him. (Produces it.) This is the same one, all but the cylinder, which was on the floor. Was with the general in his room till he died, except about an hour. When undressed he said to Burleigh, 'Doctor, how is it with me?' Being told 'Ed, it is all up with you,' he said, 'All right, Ed, McCook dies game.' This pistol has been in my possession ever since, locked in a safe, except when taken before the grand jury. I identify by its number and a private mark I made on it at first."

Charles H. Bates testified (produces the cylinder and fits it in the pistol): "I picked this up on this floor soon after the fourth shot. I saw flash of first shot; saw Wintermute fire the second shot, and saw blood just after it on McCook's coat and vest. Heard two other shots. I have kept this in my trunk ever since, and the four empty cartridge shells in it have never been taken out." (Both parts of pistol are stained with blood.)

James M. Stone testified: His testimony regarding the affray in the courtroom was substantially the same as the others, and court then adjourned for the day. On reconvening Wednesday morning, May 20th, the cross-examination of James M. Stone was begun, and the entire forenoon was occupied with questions addressed to the witness and objections and arguments of counsel as to their admissibility. Mention was made in Major Stone's examination-in-chief of the resolution Wintermute offered at the railroad meeting, declaring lack of confidence in the Dakota Southern Railroad Company. On this ground the defense claimed the right to cross-examine by such questions as would bring out the whole proceedings of the meeting. Witness was asked what Judge Brookings did, and other questions, which were ruled out by the Court as going beyond the ground of the direct examination. Attorney Swett submitted a written proposition proposing to prove by the witness the main facts of the railroad meeting, the causes that led to it, and the temper and conduct in which it was carried on. Written objections were made by the prosecution to the reception of the evidence, and the Court sustained the objections. Exceptions taken. Defense then proposed to prove that the meeting was violent and turbulent, increasing in anger till the time of the murder. Objected to, argument followed, and court adjourned for dinner. On reconvening the Court sustained the objection and ruled out the questions as not warranted on cross-examination. Exception taken. E. F. Higbee, S. V. Clevenger, J. A. Kent, J. Shaw Gregory, Wm. P. Dewey, E. N. Van Antwerp, A. F. Hayward, Thomas Kilbride, Mrs. Belle Bayliss, Geo. P. Waldron, Henry E. Buell, Henry Thwing, Lott S. Bayliss, D. T. Bramble, John O. Bates, George Wagner, Wm. C. Cowan, and L. M. Griffith also testified for the prosecution, their testimony substantially corroborating the statements already given regarding the shooting and the fracas in the saloon, except the testimony of Mr. Wagner, gunsmith, who testified regarding the pistol and cylinder produced by Witnesses Hanson and Bates, that the cylinder appears to belong to the pistol, and that the cartridge given him appears to be the proper size for that pistol. He had noticed that some shells expand and become tight by firing, and some do not. Sometimes he finds slight difference in size in same box of cartridges. A size larger or smaller would not fit this pistol.

Mrs. Loraine McCook testified: "I am the widow of Edwin S. McCook. I first saw him when shot, after he was placed in bed and undressed. The conversation we had did not show any hope of getting well. He told me not to entertain the least hope that he might live; that I must make up my mind to part with him. Gave some directions about his affairs. My father and mother (Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Whitney) were present. He said it was utterly impossible for him to recover. I tried to encourage him all I could, for I felt it hard to give him up, so I tried to have him keep still and not talk. He said, 'Well, perhaps it is as well; I will try.' They applied ice, and said no more could be done; we must wait till morning. A little fresh blood oozed from the breast, but we did not examine the wound in the back. The bed was so saturated that about midnight we heard the blood dripping on the floor. When E. T. White was sitting by him, he opened his eyes, said: 'Ed, is this you?' I don't remember all he said to him, but think he said: 'Perhaps some time I can come and nurse you.' That was all of that sort that I knew him to say."

Mrs. Oscar Whitney testified (Counsel for defense here objected to receiving the testimony of these two ladies, as belonging to rebutting testimony, if admissible at all. Argued by prosecution that it was an essential part of their case, and if withheld now, perhaps would be inadmissible hereafter. The Court sustained this view, and Mrs. Whitney proceeded): "I first saw General McCook when being led to his room. He said to Doctor Burleigh, 'I shall die. I am shot just as my brother was. What do you think of it?' Burleigh answered: 'Ed, my boy, I can't give you any hope.' I said, 'Oh, Edwin.' He said: 'Mother, don't give way to your feelings; I shall die. Hurry and set me down, and call Loraine and Charley.' When they came his wife said, 'Oh, Edwin, you cannot die; God will not take you away from me.' He replied, 'I shall die; you must not entertain any hopes. I've seen too many people shot to expect I can ever get well. I am not afraid to die. I go to my God with clean hands. I never have wronged man, woman, or child; but to be shot down in this cowardly way without a chance to defend myself, Oh, it is too much.' He said it was Wintermute who shot him; repeated his name several times. After he was roused from his stupor with nausea, perhaps 1 o'clock, he called his wife, who said, 'I'm here.' He said, 'I can't see you any more.' After that time we couldn't tell what he said. He died near 7 A. M. Nothing was given him as medicine; no opiates or any other medicine, but ice was used to stop the blood. Doctor Thomas was with him; sat down in a chair with his head on a pillow and went to sleep while Edwin lay in a stupor. He slept about two hours. Loraine grew very much excited about this. We shook the doctor's arm and begged him to do something. The blood soaked through a thick mattress and dripped on the floor." (Here the prosecution rested its case.)

TESTIMONY FOR THE DEFENSE.

Hon. Leonard Swett made the opening address in behalf of the defense, consuming about two and a half hours, after which court adjourned until the following day, Friday.

Friday, May 22d. John J. Thompson testified: "I came to Yankton County in 1860. Was here in the room at the homicide, sitting by the middle window. Wintermute sat at my right hand three-quarters of an hour, doing nothing unusual as I could see. He got up and asked me to go down and take a cigar; I declined, and he went out. After awhile he came back and sat down near the stove for fifteen minutes or more and did some talking to the meeting, saying that he had been beaten by McCook, whipped out of his boots, or some such thing. His face and cheeks were scarred, his eyes swollen, and some blood on his face. He was pretty badly beaten. Don't think he left the seat till the shooting commenced. I noticed nothing peculiar about his actions or manner. Doctor Burleigh was speaking when he came in. The first that called my attention was a pistol shot. There were two close together; I could not tell where the first one was. Wintermute was standing up when the first was fired. I turned to Wintermute and saw him fire the second shot, don't think any one man could fire two so near together. He was standing at the side of the stove. He did not advance an inch, I am positive. I don't know where the first shot was fired; the sound was right in the room, but where it started from I can't tell. I don't know whether Wintermute fired the first one or not. McCook was standing in the doorway leaning against the left door-jamb when the second was fired. Then he made a rush this way; about half way between the door and the stove they met and grappled. It is hard to tell what occurred next, for having had my feet on a chair before me, they got caught in the back of the chair, threw me down, and I could not rise till most of the crowd had passed over me. Then I went out in the passage. I saw Wintermute rise and stand by his chair before a shot was fired. Wintermute did not walk a step toward the door before the second shot. Meeting was rather boisterous; harsh words between the others. There were no people drunk in the room, though there had been many drinks that day."

Cross-examined: "I was not in when they organized. Wintermute was here when I came. He and Mr. Ash went down for a cigar. They were gone fifteen to thirty minutes or more. When Wintermute came back he sat next to the stove, I think one row of chairs in front of me next the aisle. There were three or four lamps at the speaker's desk and I think back of these also. There was an inch of sawdust on the floor. I didn't notice Wintermute's face hurt till he spoke of it. I didn't see him come along the aisle to take the seat. I was hearing the speeches. There was blood on his face and collar. His right eye was swollen, so I don't think he could see with it; marks on both cheeks. I think his words were, 'Is this a ——— rowdy meeting, or is it not a ——— rowdy meeting.' He also said he had just been licked out of his boots by Secretary McCook, and had this to show for it. Burleigh told him McCook ought to have knocked his head off. I don't remember Wintermute's making a vulgar or indecent reply or any reply. The meeting was quiet and orderly when Wintermute came in that time, though some excitement. No out-break except this shooting. Mr. Spink was speaking when it begun, but he had had no interruption. The only previous disturbance of the meeting was that when Wintermute rose to a point of order, and said he had been licked. The first and second shots were fired very close together. I am confident I couldn't fire them as quick. Wintermute fired the second. I don't think Wintermute had time to put his hand in his pocket, take out a pistol and fire it, after hearing the first. They sounded the same. I didn't see McCook have any pistol. I got out of the room as quick as I could. Heard three or four shots before I got out and one after. I had seen McCook at the door looking in. First saw him inside after second shot. When Wintermute fired there was no one troubling him or molesting him in any way. I was one who signed Wintermute's first bail bond."

William Tripp testified: "I was present sitting in the meeting very near this present witness stand. A pistol shot first drew my attention; the report and what I supposed to be a ball passing near me." Cross-examined: "I was watching Spink who was speaking. These railings were not here then. Doctor Burleigh was at my right. I spoke to Burleigh of hearing the ball go by; we both spoke of it. Don't know where Wintermute was then seated. I am confident it was the ball from the first shot. I heard four or five shots. The second was almost instantly after the first. I think the ball whistled between our heads. I heard it plainly." Re-direct: "We heard it and said we had better get out of there. I got out first."

S. L. Spink testified: "I was speaking when the shooting began. The meeting was then very excited and tumultuous; they asked questions and I replied. Heard cries of 'Put them out,' 'Shut up,' etc. Had heard remarks that the meeting would probably break up in a row. It was broken up by the shooting. I came next morning; the door was locked. Got in and found the room in great confusion. About as left the night before. Examined the room very carefully." (Counsel presents a chair for examination.) "I found this chair. It was between that window and the stove. There was blood upon that chair and the fresh mark of a bullet, which now shows."

Cross-examined: "There was blood on a great many chairs there. I didn't notice on the floor for there was sawdust on it. The ball had gone through, but I didn't look to find it on the floor in the sawdust. A great many chairs were turned topsy turvy. I was making a speech that night against the railroad company, with a good deal of excitement. Was interrupted often by questions from Burleigh, Brookings and others; perhaps Waldron, too. The questions were but a small part of the interruptions; they were both cheers and hisses. Can't recollect any but those three who interrupted. Did not see General McCook till the shooting. Heard and saw no signs of violence against Wintermute, none against me or anyone else. I thought it very likely it would break up in an open fight. The fault was on both sides. McCook was not a participant that I know of. Wintermute participated actively in the meeting and interrupted it once. He was one who helped organize the meeting and nominated Edmunds to preside. Edmunds, Wintermute and I were in the same sympathies regarding the meeting."

A. M. English testified: "I have lived in Yankton since 1860; carpenter and builder. I was present at the homicide. The first shot sounded to me as if fired in the stairway. I did not miss Wintermute from his seat from the time I saw him there until the shot was fired. Next I saw him standing in the aisle, a little more toward the door, about eight feet from the stove; there was a rush and a trampling of feet. I saw people running and McCook advancing toward Wintermute. About as they closed the second shot was fired. They were just then close to the stove, Wintermute in the act of falling and McCook going down on him. I didn't see any pistol nor the blaze. They were near enough to reach each other. When Wintermute came up from the saloon his face was bruised and swollen, one eye nearly closed. (Gives account of Wintermute's speech.) Saw no blood on him. There had been excitement in the meeting over the discussion; a little noisy. When they fell in the scuffle there were two or three other shots fired; I think three. After they were separated I saw Wintermute trying to run or at least on a fast walk by the stove. He fell down and McCook came up to him and kicked him. I saw them wrangling off in this direction, I heard five shots. The first I saw McCook, he was in the aisle approaching Wintermute on a fast walk. Heard him say near the window he wanted to shoot him. McIntyre was trying to quiet the disturbance. I saw 'English Pete' engaged in the scuffle. I heard a crash at the window and think a light of glass was broken; don't know how it was done. I came from Broadway to the meeting—it, Wintermute, and Spink and Ash. I think 'English Pete' was along."

Question. What were you talking about? (Objection by prosecution, sustained, and exception taken.) I don't think Wintermute was angry then. General McCook's name was not mentioned.

Cross-examined. There were about one hundred people in the room; not as many as there are now. I sat on the north side of the aisle, but when Wintermute went out first I took his chair. He came in and sat down an instant, then rose to a point of order. There were some profane and obscene remarks made then. Not over fifteen or twenty minutes later the shooting occurred. I didn't see any one drunk, or any rowdiness, though some had been drinking. There was excitement on the railroad question, but I think it was rather an orderly and quiet meeting considering the excitement. When Wintermute came in again he took a seat at my left, then changed his seat and sat behind me. That was before the shooting. When the first shot was fired, I don't know whether he was standing or sitting. He may possibly been half way toward the door; but I didn't miss him from his seat. The first shot came in from the door. I looked around and saw Wintermute and then McCook following him up. Saw no pistol in McCook's hands. If he had one I might or might not have seen it. He came in with his hand thus (holding them up and open). I can't say whether I saw blood on McCook between the second and third shots or not. Nor whether McCook had hold of Wintermute at the time of the second shot. I didn't see anybody fire it.

Question. Don't you know that McCook did not fire it.

Answer. No, I can't say that I know he didn't. I saw him come in rapidly with his hands up. Don't know as I watched him till they got together. My attention was on them both. I saw no pistol. I never swore before a grand jury that there were only three shots, and that I saw none of them. They must have made a mistake in the notes. It is my opinion there were five shots. Saw a pistol later held high; both men struggling for it. Think it about the size of that one.

Question. Can you distinguish by sound between a shot fired in at the door, and one in the room?

Answer. No, I cannot.

Question. When did that kicking occur?

Answer. After all the shots.

Question. Do you remember hearing McCook say "he has shot me?"

Answer. No, I do not; only heard him say he wanted to shoot Wintermute. Much might have been said that I didn't hear.

Re-direct. I saw Major Hanson pick up a pistol off the floor; not in any one's hand, near the stove.

Cross-examined. Wintermute had just passed near where the pistol was. Didn't see Hanson step on Wintermute's arm and pull the pistol from him. I saw the pistol drop and saw Hanson pick it up. Don't know who dropped it.

Carl C. C. P. Meyer testified: "I have resided here fourteen years. Was at the railroad meeting. I was sitting on the north side by the wall. Saw Wintermute when he came in and rose to a point of order. His face looked very bad. He showed the mark he got from scuffling with McCook in the saloon. The first I knew of the shooting was a shot fired from the outside of the room, which drew my attention and I turned round; turning I saw Wintermute at that moment raise out of his chair, and just as soon as he rose I saw McCook and Rosstenschel rush toward him. Then I saw, right off, two shots fired. I only saw the blaze, as there was no light at that part of the room; saw the blaze of two shots fired at once; not more than so far apart (about three feet), about half way from the stove to the door. Then I saw Rosstenschel close to Wintermute, and McCook just behind him. The shots were about breast high; both flashes were level; were very close together as to time. Then McCook seized Wintermute by the shoulder, and Wintermute was pressed down by the stove; there the third shot was fired that killed McCook; and then when they were struggling on the floor one shot went off that I believe struck the ceiling here, I saw a hand held up but no pistol. Then McCook took Wintermute to the window and tried to put him out. After that I couldn't see much; I only know that Wintermute was on the floor by the stove while McCook was led out of the room. I am positive there were five shots fired or more. I stood in one place all the time. I have been acquainted with the use of firearms forty years. The first shot did not sound like the rest, and must have been of smaller calibre. I am able to tell the difference between firearms by the sound; can't always tell the difference between a shot gun and rifle by sound, but can between pistols of different sizes."

Cross-examined: "I entered the meeting while Brookings was speaking. I rose in my seat when firing began. There was no one sitting between me and Wintermute at all. The space between was entirely open. My attention had not been on Wintermute. I was attending to Spink's speech, till I heard the shot outside the room; then I looked right at the door; first glanced at Wintermute as I turned. Saw Rosstenschel and McCook come this way. Wintermute stood till they came up. Don't believe Wintermute advanced half way to the door to meet him; am not sure but that he advanced one step, but not more than one. McCook did not have his hands raised when I saw him, and I tell how he held them. I didn't see any revolver there at all. Nobody got between me and Wintermute at all till the second shot. I don't know who fired it. I cannot tell from the sort of blaze I saw, which way the pistol was fired; the second and third were fired as quick as that" (claps hands twice as quick as possible).

Question. Were there four shots in the room of the same sound?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Testifying as an expert, did they all come from the same pistol?

Answer. Yes, I don't doubt it.

Question. Then why do you doubt that one man could have fired all?

Answer. He must have had a self cocker, or used his thumb very, very fast.

Question. Is that your opinion as an expert?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What difference between a pistol fired in the room and one fired from the hall into the room?

Answer. The one fired in the room would be the sharper. I have experimented on that while practising. I was in the army.

Question. Did you practise sounds in camp?

Answer. No, sir, I am no expert.

Question. Then your opinion as to sounds is no better than any other person's?

Answer. I don't think it should be.

Question. Did you swear before the grand jury that Wintermute fired the first and second shots?

Answer. I believe I did.

Question. Did Wintermute say he fired the first and second shots?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Did you see no pistol at all?

Answer. No.

Question. Did you see hands held up, that seemed to be struggling for something?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Did you see no pistol then?

Answer. No.

Re-direct. When Waldron asked who fired the first shot, Wintermute said he did.

Silas C. F. Norman testified: "I came in while Brookings was making a speech. The first I noticed, Wintermute stood up; next the report of two pistols, spat, spat. I saw the flash of the one Wintermute fired, but not of the other. I think Wintermute's shot was first, but am not positive. I didn't see McCook till six feet inside the room with Rosstenschier. When McCook reached Wintermute he crushed him down to the floor just as you would crack a bedbug. I heard one or two shots after they fell. I saw a revolver pointed towards me; thought it was in McCook's hand; it might have been a wooden imitation of a revolver. Two shots were fired after, but can't tell who fired them."

Question. How many shots did you hear in all?

Answer. Five, possibly. I believe sir, honestly six. I stood back and didn't interfere. Heard a crash at the window. Two men took McCook out, and Wintermute said, if any one wanted to arrest him to do so; Rosstenschier arrested him, I think. Heard McCook say while being led out, 'They have have disarmed me.' Before the meeting heard McCook say at the foot of the stairs, that Wintermute had been running since noon to get enough men to run the meeting. I saw McCook as he rushed into the room; thought I saw a revolver in his hand above his head, but wouldn't swear to it. It looked like one but might have been an imitation, four to six inches long." (Describes effects of Wintermute's previous whipping.)

Cross-examined: Was Wintermute saturated with blood from his whipping?

Answer. He was pretty bloody.

Question. Very bloody, as you told Mr. Swett?

Answer. I never saw a man's face worse pounded. I was in the room from first to last, near that block nailed on the wall. Forget whether sitting or standing at the time of first shot. I did not come in with Wintermute; he came here before me. It was from thirty to forty minutes from the time Wintermute first came in with face beaten, till he fired the first shot.

Question. I understood you to say that Wintermute fired the two shots that were fired one right after the other.

Answer. Yes, I did. Thought Wintermute fired the first; not positive. He fired it toward the door.

Question. Please stand up and imitate his movements.

Answer. (The witness does so, and says): Wintermute was very drunk. I saw him stand up; I then looked at Spink, and heard two shots; turning round, saw flash from Wintermute's pistol, but not from the other. One sounded outside the door. Wintermute fired toward the door or the ceiling. There were many people between me and these two. I didn't see Meyer. English Pete was next to me. Think two shots were fired just as McCook laid hands on Wintermute. There were six shots fired in this room I think.

Question. That makes four shots you recollect being fired.

Answer. Five, or six, sir.

Question. If Wintermute first fired a shot toward the door, and instantly you heard another, and then when McCook came up to him two more were fired, is that right?

Answer. I never testified to any such thing.

Question. What then?

Answer. I heard two at the door, the third when I thought I saw something in McCook's hand that looked like a pistol.

Question. Who fired that?

Answer. I will swear positively Wintermute fired the third. He stood facing McCook but don't know as he shot him then. Saw no blood on McCook till after all was over. The fourth shot was when they went to the floor. Don't know what became of McCook's pistol; reckon he handed it to some friend. Next I saw of it after the first time, was in McCook's hand after "English Pete" was holding up his hand and trying to get it. I never saw any flash from it, but he might have fired it two or three times. I heard the fifth shot and saw the flash. I believe there was a sixth shot but cannot swear to it. The pistol I saw in McCook's hand was about the size of this in court. I knew it was McCook that made the remark in the passage about Wintermute because it was his voice. I drank a glass of ale and two of beer before I came up.

Question. Did you tell the barkeeper that you had drank twenty-nine glasses of beer that day?

Answer. If I did I wasn't under oath. I was not under the influence of liquor at all.

M. M. Matthiesen, testified: "I sat between the stove and south wall, Wintermute being two chairs back of me. His face was very much swollen and somewhat marked. I saw the flash and heard the report of the first shot. It was back of me, perhaps in the hall. I jumped up, looked round, and Wintermute was standing by his chair with his back toward me. McCook and Rosstenschner were near him. Saw nothing in Wintermute's hands. Heard a sort of double shot, pat, pat, and saw flash. McCook came to him and Wintermute fell down on the side of the stove, McCook on top of him. Wintermute then turned the pistol so that it was close to his breast and fired. There was no flash, just a report and smoke. I saw what I have described. I heard two shots after that."

Cross-examined: "I came alone to the meeting while Brookings was speaking. When I first saw McCook he was close to Wintermute. Think I saw his hands; couldn't tell if there was anything in them. Think McCook laid hands on Wintermute just as the second shot was fired. This double shot was before they got back by the stove. The flash was about breast high. Heard no bullets whistle. The blaze seemed to come this way. The second shot did not sound like the first. Wintermute backed to the stove; McCook followed up, and they fell together. Heard nothing said by them. The third shot was the first I saw fired. Wintermute fired it. I never have said it was a good thing McCook was killed."

Peter Hackney (English Pete) testified: "Reside in Rushford, Wisconsin. Lived in Yankton County three years and four months. Was here at the homicide; sat at right of the stove. The first shot sounded toward the door. I looked round and saw McCook walking into the room to where Wintermute was standing. When about three feet apart two pistols were fired. I saw one in McCook's hand, and saw the flash of both. I got to McCook as soon as I could, after they had gone down by the stove. I took hold of both McCook's hands. He wrenched the pistol away, firing it into the ceiling, right there, and I caught hold of him again with my right hand on the pistol. Then he fired again, and shot me in the right hand. I called for assistance. Some men came and I delivered McCook to them. I took part of bullet out of my hand last March. I had hold of his hand and pistol both. I only saw McCook's pistol. Five shots were fired. I showed my hand to John Bates, Edgar, Spink, Treadway, and lots of others."

Cross-examined: "I am the one called English Pete. Was working as a carpenter on stores on Broadway. Didn't work the first day after this occurred, but two or three days after I worked hewing plank with an ax. I took the lead out myself, last March, in Wisconsin. It had healed up where it went in; it gathered and mottled in another place, and I took out this piece of a ball. It hurt me all the time it was in there. (Shows a sore not yet healed, where he took it out.) I used a jack knife. The ball lodged midway between the two wounds. When first shot was fired Wintermute stood by the stove. Men were sitting between him and me. I don't know whether all the shots were fired in the room. When McCook came up near Wintermute I watched them both. I watched Wintermute's conduct and manner, but could not see his hands for the stove. Don't know that he had any pistol, but it appeared to me that the flash came from where he was standing."

Question. Is it your impression it came from Wintermute?

Answer. I don't know where it came from, there were two flashes in front of me. That was after the firing of the first shot. When Wintermute rose from his seat he made no advance toward the door. McCook was near the stove when I got up. I saw a flash in his hand. Saw none till he got near the stove. The pistol in court I saw in McCook's hand. I saw no pistol in Wintermute's hands. When I saw the flash I was wrest the pistol from McCook, Wintermute was lying on the floor. I'm sure I don't know how he got there.

Question—McCook wasn't within three feet of Wintermute when the second shot was fired, is that true?

Answer. Yes.

Question. Then McCook was not the cause of his going to the floor, was he?

Answer. I don't know.

Question. Did McCook put Wintermute to the floor.

Answer. I don't know.

Question. You say you kept your eye on McCook from the time he came in till they got together.

Answer. Yes, sir.

Question. Tell me then whether McCook put Wintermute to the floor or not.

Answer. I cannot say; they got behind the stove. I saw the pistol in McCook's hand before Wintermute went to the floor, and to the best of my recollection he pointed it at Wintermute. The second shot was instantly followed by a third. I had hold of McCook when the fourth shot came. General McCook fired it. I presume McCook did not fire the second, but did the third, fourth and fifth. The fifth put this lead in my hand. I don't know who fired the first. The second came from the place Wintermute occupied. (Witness was asked if he had said that night to certain persons that he would help hang Wintermute; also that he got his hand hurt from wresting the pistol from Wintermute's hand; all of which he denied.)

H. C. Ash testified. "I was present at the homicide. Sat four or five feet from the stove. Wintermute sat four or five feet from me. He came and spoke to me before he went to the saloon.

Question. What did he say?

Objected to, argued, and objection overruled by court.

He asked if I had any money. I told him I had a little. He said he wanted a cigar. I told him to walk down with me and we'd take a cigar. He was quiet and pleasant in manner as a man could be. We went into the saloon; were together side by side, all the way to the door. Did not meet McCook on the way.

Question. Was there any conversation between Wintermute and McCook in any respect like the following: "General McCook will you let me have a cigar?" "I have none." "Let me have the money to buy one, — you."

Answer. There was no such thing said. I stopped at the billiard table; Wintermute walked to the bar, and McCook entered and walked there too. McCook spoke to Wintermute first; I didn't hear what he said. Heard Wintermute say: "McCook, you are a bigger man than I am; if you lick me I'll shoot you." McCook then knocked him against the wall, breaking a picture, and pounded him on the floor with his fist fifteen or twenty times. Didn't see him kick him, but kicked at him when pulled off. McCook then went out doors. Wintermute was very badly pounded up. I have lived in Sioux City and here since '56, but never saw a man so badly beaten with fists. McCook did not have a scratch. They were men of about one hundred and thirty-five pounds and two hundred pounds. McCook was about six feet tall. Don't think Wintermute struck a blow. After washing, Wintermute went upstairs to the meeting. I sat here and heard the first shot, which sounded as if down on the stairway, or outside. In the saloon I think I heard all that was said. I was twenty feet away at first. Nothing was said by Wintermute about whipping McCook, and he called him no ugly names that I heard. Wintermute was excited when he got up and told the meeting he had been hurt; seemed wild. The first thing that really disturbed me was the two men coming together by the stove. The first shot out doors or in the hall, did not disturb me. Wintermute had not, to my knowledge, been toward the door. The second shot roused me, and I looked around. They went down and a general tumble and shooting began. Think there were three shots inside the room. The meeting was called to try to harmonize the people and the railroad company, about $200,000. (Objection.) One side claimed the company should withdraw the suit on the bond question, to prevent mortgaging the road. It was a warm spirited meeting; saw no signs of violence. They spoke as is usual in western meetings.

Cross-examined: "Nothing in the meeting had indicated riot or bloodshed. To the best of my judgement four shots were all there were. Don't know as I could distinguish by sound a shot fired out through the door from one fired in from outside. Think the first was outside. It is a certainty in my mind. Don't know as I heard two in very quick success. I didn't see what Wintermute was doing while standing up; many were skedaddling then. I saw them both when the second shot was fired. McCook was pressing forward to Wintermute. Cannot say as to his hands; saw no pistol; but only heard report. Think third and fourth shots were fired while on the floor. There must have been twenty-five men around them; a jam so I could not see. In the saloon, I did not hear Wintermute say what was testified to, of his being mad at McCook, nor of asking McCook for a cigar. Don't think it could have been said there without my hearing. Didn't see Ziebach step between and try to reconcile them. I remained by the billiard table. Wintermute did not shake his finger in McCook's face with insulting words. Did not see Bancroft there. Saw Wintermute washed up; but don't remember that Bancroft washed him. I used to take some drinks daily. Was then but little under the influence of liquor, if at all. Drank beer before I went there. I think my memory was then as good as now.

Abraham Adler testified: "I saw General McCook inside the room on the night of the meeting, in the northeast corner. He stood there when Wintermute offered a resolution in the meeting. Heard nothing said by McCook. He came to P. C. Conway, tapped him on the shoulder, and said, 'P. C. be on hand; you will see some fun.' This was while Wintermute spoke. Wintermute went out soon; Conway soon followed, and so did I. I entered the saloon and heard Wintermute say, 'General McCook you are a larger man than I am and can whip me, but if you do I will shoot you.' McCook said: 'You'll shoot me!' and struck him on the back of his head. (Here describes the whipping and washing up.) Didn't hear Wintermute call McCook a dirty puppy, or threaten to whip him. Don't think Wintermute was gone from the meeting more than ten minutes. I went back with him."

A. J. Sweetser testified: "After the shooting Wintermute was taken to my hotel. I saw him the second day after. His left hip was bruised, and black and blue; a spot as large as my hand. I was at the railroad meeting. I heard the first shot outside, and heard the bullet whistle past myself, Burleigh and General Tripp. We all spoke of it at the time. I judge six or seven shots were fired in all. Saw Wintermute kicked by General McCook."

Cross-examined: "The bullet came this way. Have never looked for the place it struck. From the sound I am satisfied it was fired from outside the door. I saw no person fire a shot that evening. Couldn't swear whether the first and second shots were similar in sound or not. It was impossible to locate all the shots, but there were six I think."

Erick Iverson testified: "I was at the railroad meeting. The first I knew of the trouble, I heard a shot. I sat near the stove on the left. Turned round and Wintermute was standing about three paces behind. Think he was there when shot was fired. There was no smell of smoke to show he had fired it. When I heard it, I heard a noise of chairs as if somebody was getting up. It was just behind me where Wintermute sat. Saw Rosstenschier and McCook come up to Wintermute. McCook had both hands raised. McCook took him by the shoulders. They were in the act of going down when I saw the flash of a pistol in Wintermute's hands. It was very close to McCook's breast. I went out of the room."

Cross-examined: "Did not see who fired the first time. Wintermute was then sitting down by the aisle. The second shot was the one I saw fired at McCook's breast. I saw no pistol in McCook's hands. He had hands on Wintermute before that second shot. (Witness and counsel go out in stairway and examine bullet marks.) I think a ball from where Wintermute stood when first shot was fired, could not have struck there; would have hit the door post."

J. R. Gamble testified: "I found a chair in this room with a bullet hole in it, on the edge of the seat; the ball had fallen out, being not deeply imbedded. The chair shown in court was not the same chair. Found the chair at the October term of court and examined it carefully. Have looked for that chair since in the room. Think I told some one then that there was the mark of one of the bullets in the McCook affair. When I saw this other chair exhibited I told Mr. Purdick it was not the same one."

Cross-examined: "I only casually remarked to some man in October about the chair. The ball had gone in about as deep as its own size, and had dropped out. I am familiar with bullet holes. It couldn't have been anything else."

Newton Edmunds testified: "Resided here since 1891. Was president of the railroad meeting. Doctor Burleigh was making a violent speech; much feeling aroused. Mr. Spunk was called on to reply. Persons were about the room somewhat in liquor, making more noise than the rest. The feeling grew more intense. I thought the first shot was outside the room; from its difference from the other shots thought it was entirely out doors. The shooting was over before I left the room."

Cross examined. Describes conduct of the meeting and says he saw nothing indicating riot or bloodshed before the shooting. Don't recollect Wintermute asking if this was a rowdy meeting. He said he rose to a point of order, and I asked him to state it. He said he had been whipped, etc., think I told him his point of order was not very well taken, and asked him to sit down.

W. M. Edmunds testified: "I am a son of Newton Edmunds, the preceding witness. Was standing in main door of this room at left side. General McCook and Rosstenschier stood in the door with me and others behind. A pistol shot first took my attention. It was very close to me. I felt the burn of the powder on my face. Don't know where Wintermute was at the time. Saw no one between me and the stove. It was entirely clear in front of me for ten or twelve feet. I don't know who fired the shot. When that flash came out, my face I stepped into the passage, and did not go back until it was all over."

Cross-examined: "I was leaning on the left door casing as we now face it; General McCook in opposite side, but a little more outside."

Question. Did you feel the breeze of the pistol shot going by you, or did you merely inhale the fumes of the powder?

Answer. The powder flashed in my face.

Question. Did General McCook fire it?

Answer. I think not. Saw no one standing in front of me, because I didn't look back; see; I got out of that as soon as I heard the shot. Didn't return until it was all over."

Monday, May 25th —John Treadway testified: The first shots sounded out in the hall or in the door. Looked and saw McCook and Rossteuscher advancing. There was no body in front of them. They came to the stove. Corroborates other witnesses as to the struggling.

Lucien W. Case testified: "I had Wintermute in custody as sheriff and was with him every day. There were marks on his face as long as he remained, until October 13th."

William Leeper testified: I am city marshal. Testified same as case regarding Wintermute's injuries.

Dr. Robert L. Thomas testified: "Have resided here eight years and practiced medicine twenty-five years. Had charge of Wintermute for six or eight days as a patient, after September 11th. On Friday morning he was half conscious and stupid from an internal difficulty caused by external injuries. He had partial concussion or contusion of brain. (Gives particulars of his bruises.) I think he was in danger of inflammation of the brain. I was in this room the night of the homicide. A shot first attracted my attention. It sounded at a distance, either at the door or out of the room. Saw McCook when taken to his room; was there when undressed, and almost all the time until he died. Heard Burleigh tell him that he must die. He replied that he wasn't afraid to die. Could die like a man, but guessed he would not die. At 5 or half past 5, when Mr. White had been waiting on him and was about to leave, the general shook hands with him, saying: 'Good-night, when you get shot I will do for you as you have done for me.' When the general's clothes were first removed, the blood was stopping over, and we placed ice on the wound to check the flow. There was very little hemorrhage after I saw him or during the night. It was brought on again by coughing, after White left; also by vomiting. There was no reaction. Two or three hours after being placed on the bed there was more pulse and more cheerful prospects. I had hopes of his recovery while with him. Told him everything depended on quietness. Can only conjecture as to what blood vessels were cut; my opinion is that the sub-clavian vein was hit, but not the artery. Saw nothing looking like arterial blood. Had the artery been cut he would not have lived over five minutes. Saw no spurting of blood like an artery. In consultation that night, it was agreed that the vein was cut. I saw the post-mortem. His muscles were powerfully developed. The difference between him and Wintermute was that between a giant and pigmy. The chest was laid open, but developed nothing but the fact that there was no internal hemorrhage."

Cross-examined. Do I understand you that contusion and concussion of the brain are the same?

Answer. Contusion is a breaking of parts—live parts, and concussion is a disturbance of the functions of the brain. They mean the same as applied to the brain.

Question. Did you advise or aid physically in the post-mortem on General McCook's body?

Answer. I did not.

Question. What is the amount of blood in the body?

Answer. About one-fifth to one-sixth of the weight, or from twenty-eight to thirty pounds. I should think a loss of five or six pounds would cause death.

Question. Do you not think the body showed a loss of more than six or eight pounds?

Answer. Well, the body was bloodless, comparatively. I think the shot was the immediate cause of death; that the best treatment was given; and that nothing more could have been done, that would have saved his life. His death cannot be charged to mal-practice.

Direct examination resumed. Supposing the blows you saw on Wintermute on Friday, September 12th, to have been given at 8 or 9 o'clock P. M. on the 11th, and that the homicide occurred about an hour later, under these circumstances, what is your opinion as to whether the defendant would know what he would be doing within an hour afterward; not generally, but whether he knew what was right and wrong in regard to the crime of murder?

Answer. If his mental faculties were so disturbed by concussion as to result in this injury, I think he would not be able to discern between right and wrong.

Cross-examined. Suppose a man came to a public meeting, nominate a presiding officer, and after organized make a motion; that afterwards he should go out, get into a fight, and get a black eye, and blows on the head—that he returns to the meeting, raise a point of order, then sit down and remain twenty minutes; that while sitting he watched the door, and saw the man with whom he had the fight in the door, and seeing him he should get up, advance toward him and fire at him, should you think he could distinguish between right and wrong?

Answer. I should suppose that he might.

Dr. J. B. VanVelsor, Dr. D. F. Etter and Dr. Franklin Wixson also testified as to the fatal character of the wound. Doctor Etter attended Wintermute while he was suffering from his injuries at the Merchants Hotel. Thought he had concussion of the brain. Was confined to his room from Friday until Monday.

Alexander Hughes, of Elk Point, testified to having called on Wintermute during his stay at the Merchants; but the latter did not recognize him, though he was accustomed to meet him daily during the sessions of the last Legislature.

An effort was now made by the prosecution to impeach the testimony of Peter Hackney, otherwise known as "English Pete," who had sworn that he saw a pistol in General McCook's hand during the struggle in the court room; that he made an effort to wrench it away from McCook, and was severely wounded in the hand from a shot fired by McCook. Hackney had not been supported in his testimony by any of the witnesses who were present and saw the affray. His testimony was intended to support the claim that Wintermute acted in self-defense. Some twenty-five or thirty witnesses were called, who testified regarding what Hackney had said to them after the shooting, and also testified as to his reputation.

Wm. Treadway saw Pete's hand in the St. Charles saloon right after the shooting. It was bleeding and the wound looked like a tear.

A. M. English saw Pete in the court room after the affray. His hand was bloody and marked.

M. P. Ohlman saw Pete on the corner by the St. Charles, a half hour after the homicide. His hand was bleeding, but didn't know the cause.

Charles H. Greene testified that he saw Pete Hackney ten or twelve days after the shooting near Fred Schmauber's, and heard him say that when Wintermute was in the act of shooting he grabbed his hand, and that was what he had to show for it, at the same time showing his hand. He said it was Wintermute's hand he caught.

John O. Bates testified: I knew Peter Hackney by sight September 11th. Saw him in the saloon that night after the shooting exhibiting his hand. He said then that he was trying to take the revolver out of Wintermute's hand; and that McCook was also trying to get it. I put the question to him: "Did you see McCook have any revolver?" and he said, "No, only the one they were wrestling for." He also said he got his hand hurt by trying to take pistol from Wintermute's hand, when it went off. I said to Pete I thought the hurt was not caused by a ball. He said it was.

S. K. Felton testified: "I knew English Pete. Had a talk with him within a few minutes after the 11th of September, about his hand. He then said he got it hurt in trying to take the pistol from Wintermute."

Cross-examined: "That was at noon the day McCook died. Met him on the sidewalk. Asked him what ailed his hand, as it was done up. He said it was hurt a little; that General McCook had grasped Wintermute's wrist, and that he had grasped the pistol and it went off."

H. E. Tuttle testified: Was present in this room. Do not know Hackney. Saw a man that they call English Pete that night after McCook was taken out, exhibiting his hand and saying, "I was trying to take the pistol from Wintermute, and it went off and shot me in the hand." Some one asked him if McCook had a pistol, and he said "No."

Mile T. Woolley testified: I knew Peter Hackney at the time of the murder, and saw him in this room soon after the shooting. He and others were standing close to the stove and he said: "Master Woolley, see what I got," holding up his hand. "I had hold of the pistol trying to get it out of Wintermute's hand, and it went off and shot me through the hand." I took his hand and looked. He had a gash right through the fleshy part of it. On cross-examination witness said he had no personal feeling in this case.

J. G. Baumann testified: Was in the saloon and saw English Pete there after the killing; heard him say he got hurt. I asked him how he got hurt. (Objected to unless this is the same conversation related by Mr. Bates.) Do you remember seeing Mr. Bates in the saloon. I do not. (Counsel now obtained leave to recall Peter Hackney to lay the foundation for further questions.) Hackney stated that he did not make any such remarks in the St. Charles saloon, about taking the pistol from Wintermute's hand, in Baumann's presence; nor on the street, in Mr. Dedrich's presence; nor that if it had not been for him, McCook would have taken the pistol from Wintermute's hand and shot him.

Baumann resumed. Hackney told me in the saloon that night that he got his hand hurt trying to take the pistol from Wintermute.

James Dedrich testified: Knew Hackney and saw him the morning after the affray, examined his hand then, and he said he was down there and helped in the affray, and said, "I came near being shot myself, and here's what I got." Said that McCook was about to throw Wintermute down, take away his pistol, and would have shot him if it hadn't been for him (Hackney). He said the pistol was in Wintermute's hand, and he and McCook were trying to get it, when it went off and hit his hand. I examined his hand; nothing like a bullet in it, nor any hole; but a sort of a cut or scratch.

Doctor Burleigh recalled. I saw Wintermute in the room after he came up from the fight below.

Question. Did he have concussion of the brain then? (Objected to, finally allowed.)

Answer. At the time he rose to a point of order, he was not laboring under it, or at any time when I saw him.

Prosecution here rests the case.

For defense—A. M. English recalled, testified. Heard Hackney say he got the wound in his hand from a pistol in McCook's hand. Heard nothing said or a pistol in Wintermute's hand. Have known Hackney over three years. Have never heard much about his character. Could form no opinion whether good or bad.

Ed Iverson testified: "Heard Hackney's words on the corner. He said he got his hand hurt in taking the pistol away from McCook. I never heard his veracity questioned."

William Box testified: "Was present at the conversation referred to. Heard that he got his hand hurt taking the pistol from McCook. I don't know what I can say for veracity among the people." On cross-examination Mr. Box said, "I would positively but that he may have said that he and McCook were both trying to get the pistol from Wintermute's hand."

L. S. Mosher, James Burke, J. Q. Johnson, John Lawrence, William Treadway, Silas C. E. Norman, Newton Edmunds, Geo. B. Hoffman, John G. Edgar, H. C. Ash, Fred Schnauber, Jacob Brauch, L. H. Elliott, J. Shaw Gregory, A. P. Hammon testified as to Hackney's reputation for truth and veracity, and while some of them had not known much of him lately, they generally swore that his reputation was good.

Defense here rest their case.

THE ARGUMENTS

At the conclusion of the taking of testimony, court adjourned until Thursday morning, the 28th, when it convened at 9 o'clock A. M.

Hon. Geo. H. Hand made the opening argument for the prosecution. He spoke two hours and twenty minutes.

He was followed in the afternoon by Hon. S. L. Spink, for the defense, who spoke one hour and forty minutes.

Court then adjourned until Friday morning, the 29th.

Friday morning, Hon. Philip K. Faulk, district attorney for Yankton County, addressed the jury, occupying two and a half hours.

Friday afternoon was occupied by Hon. G. C. Moody, for the defense, in an argument occupying three and a half hours.

On Saturday morning, Hon. Leonard Swett, the Chicago attorney, for the defense, took the floor and occupied the entire day, speaking in all seven and one-half hours. Swett's speech was interrupted at one time by applause, which was promptly checked by the court. Adjourned until Monday.

Monday morning, Hon. Jason B. Brown, of Wyoming, began the closing address for the prosecution. He occupied six hours Monday, and did not complete his argument, when court adjourned, reconvening at 9 o'clock Tuesday morning, when Mr. Brown again took up his argument. He concluded at 11 o'clock, occupying in all about eight hours. He was warmly complimented when he concluded.

THE CHARGE FROM THE JUDGE

Judge Shannon then delivered his charge to the jury, which was full, complete and impartial. The defense submitted a list of "instructions," which it requested the judge to include in his charge, ruling upon each in their numerical order. The thirteenth point of the "instructions," which is here given with the comments of the judge, will indicate the substance of the others, as nearly all laid stress upon the duty of McCook to have stepped one side when first attacked, and thus have avoided a conflict with the defendant:

The judge said:

The 13th point is, I think, substantially and clearly on the same subject. Here quotes: "13th Point. The jury are also instructed that under no circumstances is the taking of life excusable and justifiable, except from necessity, real or apparent, and if the jury believe from the evidence, that the defendant made a felonious assault upon the deceased, and the deceased was so situated that he knew he could evade the assault by stepping a few feet to one side of the jam of the door, then the law required him to make such retreat, and if instead of making such retreat, he chose to rush upon the defendant, and the defendant abandoned his assault; his rights of self-defense attached to him immediately upon such abandonment."

The Judge, "I have answered that. I have said already that if the jury find that at the public meeting on the evening of the 11th of September last, the defendant was the first mover and made a murderous assault upon the deceased by firing a pistol at him within close distance, and that immediately thereupon the deceased advanced unarmed for the purpose of resisting or preventing any further attempt upon his life, or for the purpose of disarming the defendant; such advance was not unlawful, and if, in the reasonable belief of the deceased, under such circumstances it was necessary so to advance to protect himself from a renewal of the felonious attack, it was not a duty imposed upon him by the law to retreat. I have stated under what circumstances the right of self-defense attaches. I suppose I had better read that over to make it plain. Here is what I have said in regard to that: His right of self-defense attached immediately upon such abandonment, and he has the right to repel the assault as though he had not himself committed the first assault."

Whether he did so abandon his first assault is not a question of law, but one of fact, and the jury must determine that fact from all the evidence in the case. I repeat, every fact in the case is material; not for the court but for the jury. I said this hypothetical proposition admits on its face a first murderous assault by the defendant, and is negated, unless the jury find that the conduct of the defendant was so marked in the matter of time, place, matter and circumstance, as not only clearly to evince a withdrawal of the defendant in good faith from the conflict, but as also such as fairly to advise the deceased that his danger attached; and to make the conduct of the deceased thereafter the pursuit of vengeance rather than measures taken to repel the original assault, or to prevent a further murderous assault, in which event it is a murder.

The jury is instructed that no particular act done or word spoken is necessary in order to constitute an abandonment of an assault. The question is simply one of fact, whether the defendant did or did not abandon it, and in determining whether the defendant did or did not in this case, abandon his assault, the jury will consider all the facts in the case. Subject to the law as I have laid it down in my first proposition, this is affirmed.

At 3 o'clock, P. M., the case was given to the jury and it retired to deliberate upon their verdict. The following day, at noon, the jury rendered their verdict. In response to the usual question as to whether the jury had agreed upon a verdict the foreman responded in the affirmative, and rose to hand it to the clerk, when the judge asked him: "Do you find the prisoner guilty or not guilty of the crime charged?" "Not guilty," was the reply. The judge took the written verdict, and told the foreman to read it aloud. The foreman read: "We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty of the crime of murder, but find him guilty of manslaughter in the first degree." The jury was then discharged with the thanks of the court for their faithful services.

The next proceeding was an application by the prisoner's counsel for a new trial, supported by affidavits from several persons, tending to show that the juror, H. G. Derby, was disqualified by reason of previously expressed opinions. The judge took the application under advisement.

On the 1st of July, 1874, at a special session of the court, the judge overruled the application for a new trial, giving his reasons at length, and proceeded to pronounce sentence upon the defendant, Wintermute, first inquiring: "Has the defendant any other legal cause to utter why the judgment of law should not be declared." There was no reply, when the judge said to the defendant:

Peter P. Wintermute, stand up. You were indicted for the crime of murder. The jury sworn to try that indictment on the plea of not guilty, came into court on June 3d and declared you not guilty of murder but guilty of manslaughter in the first degree. I have heard counsel on motion for new trial and arrest of judgment. You have heard the result. You are now asked if you have anything further to urge. You have not. It is needless for me to say to a person of your intelligence what the law demands of you. I can say, looking to God for approval, that I have sought to give a fair trial. If I have erred, you have the Supreme Court for appeal. I could sentence you to be imprisoned for the rest of your life, but my purpose is to be as merciful to you as in my opinion is consistent with justice and the law. This verdict shows you to have been the instrument of sending out of existence, a fellow creature—a neighbor. Human life, God given, is, and must be held sacred. Society is aggregated for the protection of life, liberty and property. It is a sad thing to take human life. He is dead and gone. You sent his spirit suddenly to the judgment seat of God. Punishment is intended for the prevention of crime; and one mode is also intended for reformation. The latter is adfixed for you.

You have been found guilty of the manslaughter of Edwin S. McCook, and it is now considered and adjudged by this court, and the sentence of the court is, that you, Peter P. Wintermute, be imprisoned in the state prison or penitentiary of the State of Iowa, located at Fort Madison in said state, for and during the term of ten years, there to be fed, clothed and kept according to the laws and rules regulating the said penitentiary, and that while so confined therein, you shall be exclusively under the control of the warden or other officer having charge of said prison, and that you stand committed until the sentence is complied with.

Court then adjourned and Wintermute was returned to jail.

The Supreme Court of the territory convened at Yankton on the 7th of July, 1874, and among the first proceedings was an application by the counsel for

Peter P. Wintermute, for a stay of the sentence pronounced upon him, until his case, upon the writ of error, could be argued and finally decided by the Supreme Court. Coupled with the motion was an application for a writ of habeas corpus, to bring the prisoner before the court in order that he might be released from jail upon bail, until the final disposition of the writ of error.

The court granted the habeas corpus, and the prisoner was shortly after brought into court where the arguments upon the motion were heard. On the following day the court granted the suspension of the sentence as asked for; but held over for advisement the request for admission to bail. On the 13th, the court unanimously decided that the motion to admit to bail was denied. And it was denied without prejudice, however, to any rights he may hereafter have, and the prisoner was remanded to jail, there to remain until further lawful orders. The court appointed Friday, July 17th, for a hearing upon the writ of error.

The arguments in support of the writ were duly made at the time appointed by the court, and were substantially the same as those presented before the District Court in the bill of exceptions heard by Judge Shannon, and decided adversely, and were taken under consideration by the court. Nothing further was done at this term and the defendant, Wintermute, remained in confinement at Yankton until the meeting of the Supreme Court in January, 1875, when on the 30th of said month, the following proceedings were had ordering an arrest of judgment, reversing the judgment of conviction, and admitting Wintermute to bail in the sum of $20,000, to answer any new indictments that may be found against him in the District Court of Yankton County:

IN SUPREME COURT

The defendant in this action, having been convicted of manslaughter in the first degree at the April term in the Yankton County District Court in the year A. D. 1874, a writ of error having been duly sworn out by the defendant, by which said action and all proceedings therein were removed from said District Court to this court, and a motion in arrest of judgment having been duly made and entered herein, and after hearing counsel for prosecution and defense, it is now hereby ordered, adjudged and determined that said judgment of Peter P. Wintermute, of manslaughter aforesaid, be arrested and reversed;

And it is further ordered that said defendant be discharged from his said arrest upon said judgment and conviction; and it is further ordered that said defendant be and he is hereby ordered into the custody of the sheriff of the County of Yankton, to be held by him to answer any new indictments which may be found against him, said Wintermute, in the premises, by the grand jury of said county.

By the court.

Now comes the said Peter P. Wintermute, in open court, in person and by counsel, and the judgment of this cause having been arrested by order of the Supreme Court; and the said Peter P. Wintermute being by said court ordered remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Yankton County, having now applied to said court for an order admitting him to bail for his appearance at the next term of the District Court in and for the County of Yankton, to answer to any indictment that may be found against him, the said Peter P. Wintermute, and bases this his application upon and refers this court to the record and proceedings herein:

Signed, Leonard Swett and others, counsel for said Peter P. Wintermute, January 30, 1875.

The within motion having been, this 30th day of January, 1875, argued by the counsel of the respective parties, it is hereby ordered and adjudged that the said Peter P. Wintermute be admitted to bail. Done in open court; and it is hereby ordered that the amount of said bail be and it is hereby fixed at the sum of $20,000; that the sureties justify in accordance with law; and that if this order is not complied with during this term of court, the sufficing of the bond and the sureties therein, be approved by the judge of the Second Judicial District as was taken at a term of court this 30th day of January, 1875.

By the court.

The Supreme Court adjourned without day on the evening of the 30th of January, 1875.

BENNETT SUCCEEDS KIDDER

Judge Kidder resigned his judicial office shortly after the adjournment of the Supreme Court in order to prepare for his congressional duties which began on the 4th of March; and Granville G. Bennett, of Grinnell, Iowa, was appointed his successor.

At the April term, 1875, of the Second Judicial District Court, held at Yankton, beginning about April 20th, Judge Shannon, the presiding judge had occasion to be absent for a brief time and called on Judge Bennett to preside during his absence. The Wintermute case came up among the first to engage Judge Bennett's attention. The Supreme Court having abrogated the former trial and verdict, and ordered a new trial for defendant Wintermute, the case came on before the District Court on the 20th of April.

A change in the counsel for the prosecution had taken place since the former trial in 1874. John R. Gamble having been elected district attorney of Yankton County, and therefore appeared as counsel for the prosecution in place of Phil K. Faulk, former district attorney. Millard A. Baker had also succeeded L. W. Case as sheriff. The counsel for the prosecution was made up of District Attorney Gamble, and Jason Brown, of Wyoming; while the defense was represented by Moody & Cramer, Bartlett Tripp and S. A. Bentley.

The first step in the proceedings was a challenge of the panel of the grand jury by the counsel for the defendant Wintermute on the ground that no notice had been given of the drawing of the grand jury. District Attorney Gamble replied that no notice but the order of the judge was necessary, and the law of 1875 made no change in the law of 1867-68 in that respect. The court ruled that the officers in drawing the jury were presumed to have acted in accordance with the requirements of the law, and overruled the challenge, to which the defendant excepted.

The members of the grand jury were then subjected to a rigid examination regarding their qualifications.

District Attorney Gamble challenged M. P. Ohlman, under the seventh subdivision of the causes enumerated in code of criminal procedure for interposing a challenge to an individual grand juror, which reads as follows:

That a state of mind exists on his part in reference to the case, or to either party, which will prevent him from acting impartially and without prejudice to the substantial rights of the party challenging; but no person shall be disqualified as a juror by reason of having formed or expressed an opinion on the matter or cause to be submitted to such jury, founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or common notoriety, provided it satisfactorily appear to the court upon his declaration under oath, or otherwise, that he can and will, notwithstanding such opinion, act impartially and fairly upon the matters to be submitted to him.

Mr. Ohlman, upon being examined stated that he had formed and expressed an opinion in regard to the guilt or innocence of the accused; had talked with persons who had witnessed the shooting of McCook by Wintermute, and believed their statements; had formed an opinion several times and had changed it again; is one of the bondsmen of defendant; has no opinion at this time in regard to the guilt or innocence of the accused; and states upon oath that he can and will act impartially in the consideration of this case. Challenge not allowed.

George B. Hoffman was challenged for same cause. Had formed and expressed an opinion; is one of the bondsmen of Wintermute; has twice been bondsmen for Wintermute in this case; has today an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused. Is very little acquainted with Wintermute; has formed his opinion from what he has heard; his opinion would not prevent his acting impartially.

Examined by the Court. He has such an opinion as would require evidence to change it, but can and will act impartially. His opinion was formed from rumors and newspapers; has never talked with defendant. Challenge not allowed. R. N. Ervin same as Hoffman. Challenge not allowed.

Defendant's counsel challenged Michael McLean. He was not present at the shooting of McCook; has formed and expressed an opinion; has talked with different parties in regard to the affair; was not present at the previous trial.

of Wintermute, but has conversed with persons who were witnesses on the trial; listened to the argument of Leonard Swett, counsel for defendant at previous trial. On cross examination Mr. McLean was asked whether he could and would notwithstanding the opinion he had formed act impartially and fairly upon the matters to be submitted to him. To this question Mr. Moody objected on the ground that the opinion formed by the juror was not "founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or common notoriety." The objection was overruled, to which Mr. Moody excepted. Mr. McLean then answered that he could and would act impartially, and without prejudice to the rights of the accused. Challenge not allowed. Thomas N. Bray was next challenged on the ground of prejudice and after examination the challenge was allowed. C. E. Brooks was then sworn and examined. Mr. Brooks was accepted which completed the jury. Mr. H. B. Wynn, of the jury, then arose and inquired of the court what case was to be brought before the grand jury first. No answer being returned to this question, Mr. Wynn remarked that if it was the Wintermute case, he desired to be excused. No reply was made to Mr. Wynn's question or remark. Judge Bennett then asked Mr. Wynn to arise, and administered to him the oath prescribed by law for the foreman of a grand jury. The members of the grand jury were: Samuel VanOsdel, M. P. Ohlman, Peter W. Johnson, Geo. B. Hoffman, H. B. Wynn, Geo. Kimber, R. N. Erwin, Michael Stokes, John Moore, E. C. Walton, O. A. Ogstadt, C. A. Marshall, C. E. Brooks, W. H. Sheldon, Michael McLean, and E. Seegarrd.

The judge then delivered a brief charge to the jury, covering the object of grand juries, their duties, the importance to the cause of justice that these duties be faithfully performed, the dependence of the court upon the grand jury, and various reminders of their specific duties, also had read to the jury the law defining the powers and duties of grand juries; but made no allusion whatever to any particular case. It was a very able charge on general principles. The jury then retired.

On the 8th of May the jury returned into court and presented an indictment against Peter P. Wintermute, charging him with the murder of Edwin S. McCook on the night of September 12, 1873, whereupon District Attorney Gamble moved the court that said Wintermute be forthwith arraigned.

Defendant's counsel here produced a statement from Dr. R. I. Thomas, Wintermute's physician, averring that the illness of the defendant rendered it impossible for him to appear in court. It was stated that the bond of the defendant who had been admitted to bail under the order of the Supreme Court, held him to answer the indictment. The matter rested until the 8th of June following. In the meantime Judge Shannon had returned and resumed his place as presiding judge. And on the 8th of June Wintermute was arraigned on the charge of murder, and on motion of his attorneys the case was continued until the 10th, when Wintermute appeared in person and by counsel, and moved that the charge against him be dismissed on the ground that he had been once placed in jeopardy by a former trial and acquitted, and could not be tried again for the same offense.

The court, Judge Shannon presiding, refused to grant the motion.

CHANGE OF VENUE

Thereupon Wintermute moved for a change of venue to another county on the ground that he could not obtain a fair trial in Yankton County. The judge, after the reading of the affidavits of Erick Iverson, Newton Edmunds, Jacob Brauch, O. H. Platt, Fred Schnauber, L. W. Case, William Leeper, Bartlett Tripp, S. H. Bentley, and G. C. Moody, which affidavits supported the motion for a change of venue for the reason mentioned, and after argument, the court granted the motion, and remanded the case to the First Judicial District, commonly called the Vermillion District. Granville G. Bennett, was now the judge of this district, Judge Kidder having resigned to take his seat in Congress as delegate. The time of the trial was set for August 1, 1875.

THE TRIAL AT VERMILION

This second trial was called August 19, 1875, before Judge Bennett at Vermillion. District Attorney Gamble, of Yankton, and Hon. Jason Brown, of Wyoming, appeared for the prosecution; and Moody & Cramer, Bartlett Tripp and S. A. Bentley, for the defendant. Wintermute was transferred from the custody of the Yankton County sheriff to the authorities of Clay County.

At the opening of court, Colonel Moody, for the defense, made an able argument on his motion to discharge the defendant on the ground that he had been acquitted of the charge of murder on the former trial. He was answered by the counsel for the prosecution, and on the following day the court overruled the plea of acquittal, and set the trial for Monday, August 30th.

Court convened Monday morning, the 30th, and the selection of the trial jury immediately entered upon. Three days were consumed and 108 talesmen summoned and examined, before the jury of twelve men was finally selected and seated in the jury box. Their names, occupation and nativity are here given: Frank Dennison, farmer, Vermont; Ole Highland, farmer, Norway; Charles Chaussee, farmer, Canada; Ole Byrsonson, farmer, Norway; Jesse Shriver, farmer, Iowa; Ezra Harrington, farmer, native American; David Powell, farmer, native; J. D. Tucker, farmer, native; Scott Wright, farmer, native; Richard Odell, farmer, native; Bernard Burke, farmer, —; G. W. Woodruff, —, native American.

The taking of testimony was begun on the 2d day of September, the witnesses being the same persons and their testimony substantially the same as that given on the former trial before Judge Shannon, at Yankton, to which the reader is referred. The names of the witnesses testifying for the prosecution were J. A. Kent, M. T. Woolley, J. O. Bates, Wm. M. Powers, H. Thwing, F. M. Ziebach, Dr. W. A. Burleigh, Doctor Miller, A. E. Hayward, C. F. Rosstenschner, C. L. Bancroft, Dr. D. E. Etter, J. Shaw Gregory, D. T. Bramble, W. P. Dewey, E. H. VanAntwerp, G. P. Waldron, William Cowan, Mrs. Bayless, Mrs. Oscar Whitney, and Mrs. Lorraine McCook, widow of Edwin S. McCook. The prosecution rested on the 5th, when the defense took the case, and called as witnesses, Newton Edmunds, A. J. Sweetser, John Lawrence, A. Adler, William Leeper, L. W. Case, Peter Hackney, M. M. Matthiesen, A. M. English, William Tripp, J. R. Gamble, Doctor Burdick, of Vermillion. The defense rested on the 8th. No new facts of importance had been elicited. The arguments of counsel followed. By Gamble and Jason Brown for the prosecution, and by Bentley, Moody, and Bartlett Tripp for the defense. The judge's charge followed.

The case was given to the jury on the 10th, and after deliberating seven hours, returned into court with a verdict of "not guilty." On the first ballot the jury stood nine for acquittal and three for conviction; on the second, eleven for acquittal and one for conviction; the third ballot showed a unanimous vote for acquittal. The verdict was severely criticized by a large proportion of the Dakota communities, and characterized as scandalous by the leading newspapers of the country, the prominence of the principals making it a case of national interest. Wintermute was discharged, went to Yankton, and two days later departed for Chicago with his family. He did not return to Yankton. It was understood that his long confinement had seriously impaired his health, and the expense of the long litigation had wrecked his fortune.

The following brief news item in the press dispatches of 1877, told that the earthly career of Mr. Wintermute had terminated, and quite probably from disease contracted during his long trial and the anxiety that accompanied it.

FROM NEW YORK, JANUARY 27.

Peter P. Wintermute, who shot and killed General Meade, at Yankton, 10 years ago, died of consumption at his father's home in Horse's Head, Chicago, on Saturday last. (January 27th.)

INDUSTRIAL CIVILIZATION OF THE INDIANS

CHAPTER LIX

INSTITUTING THE SIOUX INDIAN PEACE POLICY

A STATEMENT OF THE PEACE POLICY—THE SIOUX FROM 1854 TO 1868—PEACE TREATIES OF 1865 AND 1866—MILITARY CLAIM PRIORITY IN TREATY MAKING—THE ONKPAHPAH TREATY AN INDEX TO MANY—GENERAL SULLY AND COMMISSIONER PARKER—GENERAL SHERMAN PROCLAIMS THE INDIAN WAR ENDED—THE ARGUMENT, PRO AND CON, FOR THE CONTROL OF THE INDIANS—TEXT OF SHERMAN TREATY OF 1868—THE INDUSTRIAL PEACE POLICY UNDER PRESIDENT GRANT—CHURCH DENOMINATIONS FURNISH INDIAN AGENTS—CONGRESS TO OPPOSE FURTHER TREATIES WITH INDIANS AS A FOREIGN NATION—SHERMAN TREATY GAVE INDIANS TOO MUCH DISCRETION IN CHOOSING BETWEEN WORK AND HUNTING—THE SIOUX IN 1870 AND 1871—STANLEY'S REPORT.

The position of the United States Government in its attitude toward the various Indian tribes within its borders had been the same until a comparatively recent period, that had been held towards them by the foreign governments from whom the United States received its sovereignty over the soil of the country.

It was a principle established many centuries ago by civilized nations that discovery of a country conferred the right of sovereignty upon the country under whose authority the discovery was made; and further, that the discoverer was entitled to the exclusive right of acquiring the soil from the natives, who were conceded to be the rightful occupants, with a just claim to retain possession until they saw proper to part with it; but this they were not permitted to do except to the sovereign of the country.

It was furthermore established that they could part with it only to those who claimed sovereignty by right of discovery or to their rightful successors. Thus far were the rights of the natives as owners of the soil restricted; they could not sell or convey to any power, or its citizens, except the power that possessed the sovereignty of their country at the time. The policy of the British government in treating its Indian subjects in America was the same as that pursued by the United States after acquiring sovereignty of the country east of the Mississippi from that power.

By the treaty with Great Britain, at the close of the Revolutionary war, the United States succeeded to the sovereignty of the country east of the Mississippi River; and by the Purchase of Louisiana from France, it succeeded to the sovereignty of France west of the Mississippi, which had recently been acquired by that country from Spain. The last named sovereignty had made treaties of cession with its Indian subjects, and in order to protect these treaty rights and grants, France inserted the following clause in the treaty with this Government by which Louisiana was transferred:

The United States promise to execute such treaties and articles as may have been agreed between Spain and the Tribes and Nations of Indians until by mutual consent of the said Tribes and Nations, other articles may have been agreed upon.

And it will be observed that in the effort of Dakota, extending over a period of seven years, to secure statehood, the treaties with France and others were appealed to as authority in establishing the solemn agreement of our Government to confer statehood upon the inhabitants of the ceded domain when they came forward with certain and lawful qualifications and demanded it.

This policy of making treaties with the Indians for cessions of the territory occupied by them was pursued by our Government until the year 1871, about eighty-seven years, when Congress enacted that "thereafter no Indian nation or tribe within the territory of the United States shall be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe, or power, with whom the United States may contract by treaty."

Up to 1868, the year of the Laramie treaty, known as the Sherman treaty with the Sioux, the greater portion of the lands embraced within the territories of the United States, had been ceded by treaties that had been ratified by the Senate. It is presumed that the treaties made with the Sioux in 1805 and 1806 were so ratified. None of these, however, were treaties that ceded the land. The Laramie treaty, above referred to, embraced the principal features of those treaties, and supplanted all that had been made with the individual tribes by the Edmunds commission of 1805-06. While its legality was denied by the United States courts when it came to be tested seven or eight years later, it had for the time, displaced all other treaties with the Sioux nation, kept the Crow Creek reservation closed against settlement by white people, and opened all of Northern Dakota that was claimed by the Sioux nation east of the Missouri River, and the northern portion of Southern Dakota, to be occupied by the white race; and had also furnished the basis of the Government's intercourse with the Sioux which included the payment to them, in supplies of subsistence and raiment, and in money, of hundreds of thousands of dollars. And it delayed the opening of the Black Hills for a number of years.

The failure of Congress to ratify the treaty may not have been an oversight, but a foreshadowing of the later action of both houses, declaring that Indian nations or tribes should not thereafter be recognized as treaty-making powers.

In this history we first meet with the Oglala and Brule Sioux Indians on the North Fork of the Platte River, in the new Territory of Nebraska and near its western border. They were there when General Harney came out on his expedition against the Sioux in 1855.

A tradition, fairly well authenticated by subsequent events, has come down from the Brule Indians, that many years prior to the Harney expedition, and the battle of Ash Hollow, a quarrel of a serious nature occurred in the Brule tribe in the North Platte country, which resulted in a division of the tribe, one faction selecting a location south of the North Fork, the other remaining on the north side, and from this circumstance arose the name of "Lower Brules." The Lower Brules were much less numerous than their northern relatives, but their grievance was of such a serious and unpardonable nature, that they were never thereafter willing to amalgamate with the northern faction. They maintained a separate tribal organization and when the Sioux were divided up under the Black Hills treaty, they secured a separate reserve nearly opposite Chamberlain where old Fort Lookout had been built a half century earlier, and were thereafter treated with by the Government as a separate tribe.

But these Sioux, Oglalas and Brules, including the lower tribe, were still in the North Platte country thirteen years later when the Laramie treaty of 1868 was made with them by General Sherman and others, and there was but little in their location for several years following that event, though the treaty provided them a reservation in Dakota.

Some little time after this treaty, the Red Cloud Indians (Oglalas), were located at Fort Robinson, near Crawford, Neb., and the Spotted Tail Indians (Brules), were located on Beaver Creek, Neb., about fifteen miles southwest of the present Pine Ridge Agency, and the agencies were known as "Spotted Tail's Agency," and "Red Cloud's Agency." By the terms of the Sherman treaty the Indians were permitted to occupy a large strip of land in Nebraska north of the North Platte River extending to the Dakota boundary, and the agencies above designated were located on this strip. The Lower Brules moved to the Missouri River and settled in the neighborhood of old Fort Lookout.

The peace policy as pursued by the Government in its intercourse with the Indians, forms an important link in the history of Dakota, inseparable from its growth in population and the expansion of its settlements from the earliest period of white occupation of the Dakota country. Its industrial feature, to which the ultimate success of the policy is due, was first ingrafted in the agreements with the Sioux in Dakota, and its earliest experiments as well as later achievements, have been notable events in the history of the territory.

The policy will not be claimed as a reform to be credited entirely to one generation; though it became more of an issue and a political as well as an economical question following the Little Crow war of 1862. William Penn might be historically cited as its author, and first to apply its principles; but we find all through the intercourse between the Government and its Indian subjects, where something like the peace policy has been effectual in promoting the condition of the Indians; and it has also been a prominent factor in extending the settlements of civilization until they would encroach upon the country set apart for the Indians, or upon his rights and privileges, which would lead to a war in which the Indians would never fail to be worsted; and new treaties marking some advanced steps in restraining the privileges and so-called rights of the red man, would be agreed upon between the Government and its subdued subjects; who in theory at least were treated with as a foreign nation, except that the Government was of necessity compelled to act for both parties and for the best interests of both, considered in their mutual relation.

The peace policy which the country has known as such for the past forty years or more, is more properly an industrial policy—it is a policy which in theory at first, declined to contribute to the support and maintenance of the Indian until he would signify his willingness to abandon his wild life, give up the chase, relinquish all ambition for war with his own race as well as with the Government, settle down in a permanent home and become a factor in the industrial life of the nation. It was conditions brought about by the spread of the settlements of civilization, that forced the adoption of this policy, and it is most remarkable to note that from the time it was entered upon with a determined purpose to adhere to it, its practical application and operations have more than justified the claims of its early supporters.

The Indian wars had brought to the front a large number of men who had given the Indian problem a great deal of thought in an effort to determine what was best to do for the welfare of the Indian and at the same time rid the frontiers of all dangers from this source, thus opening the way for the whites to come in and develop the lands and mines and make the desert blossom. The Government officials were endeavoring to hit upon something practical that would accomplish this, and finally it was decided to colonize the red people on an immense reservation where they were to be taught to farm, and the different mechanical trades, and the young people educated in good schools. It only remained to get the consent of the Indians to make the plan a success, at least so far as its preliminary work of gathering them all together was concerned, and for this purpose President Johnson sent the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Hon. Wm. P. Dole, out to Dakota in 1865 to negotiate treaties with all the Indian tribes for the purpose of inducing them to abandon savage life and settle down to the peaceful pursuits of civilized industry, upon reservations. While this policy was necessarily slow and beset with many difficulties, it possessed sufficient merit to commend it to the favor of the humane people everywhere.

Mr. Dole did not succeed at this time in effecting such treaties, but he paved the way for a number of agreements, which were subsequently made by commissioners specially appointed to treat with the hostile tribes, in which the reservation, industrial and educational plan was given an initiative and being followed from that time has been more successful than was anticipated.

ARMY VERSUS CIVIL CONTROL OF INDIANS

In August, 1865, following the Indian wars in Dakota during the preceding three years, in accordance with a resolution of Congress appropriating $20,000 for the purpose of defraying the expenses of a peace commission to treat with the hostile Sioux of Dakota and Montana, and in response to a very general sentiment held by a large body of influential citizens of the country, led by the Indian Rights Association of Philadelphia, of which William Welch was president, President Johnson appointed a commission, composed of prominent civilians and military men, which was authorized to visit the hostile Sioux—those that had been engaged in the recent wars following the Little Crow outbreak in Minnesota, (and every tribe of the Sioux, except the Yanktons, was included in the term hostile), and arrange with them treaties of peace.

At this point the military people interposed an objection that as no treaties had been made with the Indians who had been in arms against the authority of the Government since the actual conflict ceased, the question of peace and its conditions was one which the War Department had under its sole jurisdiction, as the matter was still on a war basis; and contended that the civil authorities should not interfere except through the medium of the army. That the moral effect of such interference was to weaken the standing and influence of the army among the Indians, who would interpret it as a rebuke by the Government to its soldiers who had subdued the Indians and brought them to the Government seeking peace and a restoration of friendly relations.

However, the army does not appear to have offered any more than a verbal objection, for in September following the peace commission appointed by the President assembled at Yankton, organized and prepared for the journey up the Missouri. This commission was a mixed body made up of civilians and army men, as follows: Newton Edmunds, governor of Dakota; Gen. S. R. Curtis, commanding the Dakota Military Division; Gen. H. H. Sibley, Minnesota; Edw. B. Taylor, Northwestern Superintendent of Indian Affairs; A. Guernsey, Jamesville, Wisconsin; and Henry W. Reed, of Dubuque, Iowa. Governor Edmunds was chosen chairman of the commission, and M. K. Armstrong, of Yankton, was employed to accompany the expedition and keep the record of its proceedings. The Steamboat Cylipso had been chartered for the river journey, and though the season of navigation was nearing its close, word had been sent out to all the hostile tribes by runners to gather at certain points on the river for the purpose of arranging terms of peace, and the peace ambassadors left on their mission Monday, September 25, 1865, feeling confident of success, and desiring above all things to perform their full part in their efforts to meet the Indians in order that the latter should have no grievance on that score. The lateness of the season, and the brief time that had been allowed for getting word to the Indian people, thousands of whom were encamped at points inaccessible by river, worked at disadvantage to the success of this mission, but in the face of these drawbacks there was an encouraging response on the part of the red people, with the result that representatives of most of the former hostile tribes were conciliated with treaties agreed upon. There were few representatives from the Indians inhabiting the interior, and owing to the close of navigation it became necessary to post further efforts until the season of 1860; when the same commissioners having chartered the Steamer Ben Johnson, resumed their labors and succeeded in bringing every rebellious tribe into a peace agreement.

The commission on this second journey in 1860, ascended the Missouri River as far as Fort Union, Mont., and counselled with the Rees, Mandans and Gros Ventres, peaceable tribes, who are not Sioux, at Fort Berthold, and treated with the Cheyenne in that vicinity. Before reaching Fort Union they met and treated with over two thousand of the Upper Sioux and Assinaboines, and at the fort were greeted by a throng numbering at least five thousand, composed of Mountain Crows, Assinaboines, Blackfeet, and Bloods, from the Yellowstone Valley and the Black Hills region. The Indians met were all clamorous for peace and for reinstatement in the favor of the Great Father, and were not disappointed. The expedition closed with the treaties made at Fort Union, and the commission returned. Their treaties were all approved by the President.

While separate treaties had been made with each tribe, the matters agreed upon were identical with all tribes with the exception of money allowance, which varied in amount, and in other comparatively unimportant particulars—the main object sought being to secure a pledge from the Indians to refrain from hostilities and live on terms of amity with the Great Father and his white children, and also with other tribes of their own people, it having been discovered that much of the trouble on the frontier in which the Indians participated, arose from quarrels between the tribes or nations, leading to depredations upon the lives and property of the white people.

A copy of one of these treaties is here inserted for the information of those who desire to know the terms of this first settlement between the warring Sioux and the Government following the great war of 1862-65. Similar treaties had also been made under a separate commission with the hostiles of Nebraska, Kansas, and the other territories:

Treaty with the Sioux—Onkpahpah band—at Fort Sully, 1865.

Article 1. The Onkpahpah band of Dakota or Sioux Indians represented in Council, hereby acknowledge themselves to be subject to the jurisdiction of and authority of the United States, and hereby obligate and bind themselves, individually and collectively, not only to cease all hostilities against the persons and property of its citizens, but to use their influence, and if requisite, physical force, to prevent other bands of Dakota Indians, or other adjacent tribes, from making hostile demonstrations against the Government or people of the United States.

Article 2. Inasmuch as the Government of the United States is desirous to arrest the effusion of blood between the Indian tribes within its jurisdiction hitherto at war with each other, the Onkpahpah band of Dakota or Sioux Indians, represented in Council, anxious to respect the wishes of the Government, hereby agree to discontinue for the future, all attacks upon the persons or property of other tribes, unless first attacked by them, and to use their influence to promote peace everywhere in the region occupied or frequented by them.

Article 3. All controversies or differences arising between the Onkpahpah band of Dakota or Sioux Indians involving the question of peace or war, shall be submitted to the arbitrament of the President, or such person or persons as may be designated by him, and the decision or award shall be faithfully observed by the said tribe represented in this council.

Article 4. The said band represented in council shall withdraw from the routes overland already established, or hereafter to be established, through this country; and in consideration thereof the Government of the United States agrees to pay the said band the sum of $30 for each lodge or family, annually, for twenty years, in such articles as the secretary of the interior may direct; Provided that said band, so represented in council, shall faithfully conform to the requirements of this treaty.

Article 5. Should any individual or individuals, or portion of the Onkpahpah band of Dakota or Sioux Indians, represented in council, desire hereafter to locate permanently upon any land claimed by said band, for the purposes of agricultural or other similar pursuits, it is hereby agreed by the parties to this treaty, that such individuals shall be protected in such location against any annoyance or molestation on the part of whites or Indians, and whenever twenty lodges or families of the Onkpahpah band shall have located on land for agricultural purposes, and signified the same to their agents or superintendent, they as well as other families so locating, shall receive the sum of $25.00 annually, for five years for each family, in agricultural implements or improvements; and when 100 lodges or families shall have so engaged in agricultural pursuits, the Indians shall be entitled to a farmer, and blacksmith, at the expense of the Government, and the same shall be at the option of the secretary of the interior, whenever deemed necessary.

Article 6. Any amendment or modification of this treaty by the Senate of the United States shall be considered final and binding upon the same manner as the original council, as a part of this treaty, in the same manner as if it had been originally presented and agreed to by the chiefs and head men of said band.

In testimony whereof the commissioners on the part of the United States, and the chiefs and head men of the Onkapahpah tribe of Dakota or Sioux Indians, have hereunto set their hands, this 20th day of October, 1865, after the contents of which were read, interpreted and explained to the chiefs and head men.

Signed by Newton Edmunds; Edward B. Taylor; S. R. Curtis, major general; F. J. Sibley, brigadier general; Henry Reed; Orrin Guernsey, for the Government of the United States.

The time was propitious for making favorable terms with the hostiles. They were in an impoverished condition as the result of their recent wars with the Government, and had never been in a mood where they better appreciated the advantages of peace with the "Great Father," and for that reason it seemed of the first importance to make a compact with them that would bind them to observe peaceful relations with the whites. They were moreover in imminent danger of starving; destitution and suffering stared them in the face, and it would become the humane duty of the Government to provide them such relief as would preserve their lives, even in the absence of treaties—therefore the urgent haste shown in making these agreements, which were, as the sequel shows, only preliminary to the treaty of 1868, which was made with the entire Sioux nation, and covered nearly every phase of the proposed reform policy of the Government.

No attempt was made at this time to punish any portion of the Indians who had engaged in hostilities in the wars of 1862-63-64. A large number of the original fomenters of the uprisings in Minnesota in 1862, had been tried by a military tribunal and executed for their crime, in 1863, at Mankato, Minn., but their offence was the unprovoked massacre of hundreds of children, as well as men and women, which placed the offenders in the category of murderers, and the situation at that time was of such a critical nature that extreme measures were demanded. It became customary, however, in the treaties concluded with the Indians from about this date, to incorporate a provision in the article relating to treaties made with them, requiring the tribe to surrender to the Government authorities any individual Indians charged with any serious felony where the offence committed was in violation of the treaty, that such offender might be tried and punished under the laws of the Government in the same manner that similar offences were punished if committed by white subjects of the Government.

It will be observed that these treaties of 1865-66 provided for opening wagon roads across the Indian country, and no objection appears to have been made by the Indians. It appears that the upper river Indians were not concerned at that time about the Black Hills, and possibly the emergency which their destitute condition produced, had made them indifferent to the provisions of the treaties so long as it provided them with provisions of a more substantial character in the shape of bread and meat. But when the tribes lower down the river were encountered, the opposition to permitting the opening of any roads to or near the Black Hills was met with.

The Cheyenne Sioux were given an allowance of $25,000 in cash for the wagon road which had previously been established by W. W. Brookings, from the mouth of the Cheyenne up to the forks of that stream, which would have been a direct route into the Black Hills country as far as the location had been made. The road, however, was projected and designed to continue on along the north fork of the Cheyenne or some more practicable and direct route to a junction with the Sawyer wagon road—the point of connection to be in the Territory of Montana. Mr. Brookings, who located the road, and Governor Edmunds, who headed the treaty commission, had in mind that the location to the forks of the Cheyenne would hasten the exploration and opening of the Black Hills, which region, among Dakota people, was known to be gold bearing.

The conflict with the Sioux at Fort Rice took place previous to the peace treaties with a portion of the upper Sioux made late in the summer and fall of 1865, and therefore was not considered a violation of those agreements.

The massacre at Fort Fetterman was attributed to the Oglala, under Red Cloud, and these had not been treated with, and were not reached until 1868. At the time of this massacre, December, 1866, representatives of all the Sioux tribes living on the Missouri, had been treated with, but the Sioux under Red Cloud in Nebraska had not. The treaty commission had conciliated with them but had not been able to come to an agreement. The pretext advanced by the Indians for the Fetterman atrocity, was that the establishment of the post Fort Phil Kearney in the Big Horn country, was without their consent, that they did not want it, and concluded to destroy it. The Indians had uniformly been opposed to the establishment of forts in their hunting territory.

Following the Fetterman massacre, there was comparative quiet on the Dakota frontier, until 1870-71 when the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad aroused the northern Sioux tribes, who, under Sitting Bull had organized to oppose and prevent its construction.

SIoux CHIEFS VISIT WASHINGTON

A numerous delegation of Sioux chieftains and warriors, numbering nearly fifty were brought together at the capital of Dakota in February, 1867, for the purpose of a visit to Washington to see the "Great Father," and be given an opportunity to express their sentiments on the Indian question. These untutored children of the plain had been preparing for the trip during their sojourn, and when they departed on their important mission, accompanied by their agents and superintendent, seated in eight especially furnished lumber wagons for the railway terminus in Iowa they were dressed in the height of aboriginal fashion, including their feathered headgear, as though they expected to meet their distinguished and wisely-loved Great Father host at the first turn of the road. There were forty-two Indian chiefs and renowned warriors in the company representing all the Sioux tribes except the Yanktons, who had just returned from a similar visit. The Indians were accompanied by Maj. Joseph

R. Hanson, agent of the Upper Missouri Sioux, and also those at Fort Thompson, as the Crow Creek Agency was called; also by Maj. James M. Stone, agent of the Santees at Niobrara; and by Maj. Patrick H. Congar, the Yankton agent. The title of major prefixed to the name of an Indian agent is a sort of landmark in the service, and grew out of a custom of the general government, when the Indians were under the supervision of the war department to designate officers of that rank to perform the duties of Indian agent.

This embassy from Dakota, representing all the Sioux tribes was going on for the purpose of revealing the sentiments of the red men to the "Great Father" regarding the transfer to the war department. Fortunately for the Indians there was a very influential organization of pale-faces, known as the Peace Society, that took an active interest in their welfare. These people were very much disturbed over the proposed change, which seemed to them a retrograde step and diametrically opposed to the avowed policy of the government then being pursued under late treaties, which seemed to be working out its own justification quite satisfactorily. The Indians as a general rule were peaceably inclined, notwithstanding the recent outbreak of the Tetons at Fort Phil Kearney, whose hostility would be but temporary. The Indians, the Peace Society held, were manifesting great interest in the new policy, and thousands of them stood ready to abandon their savage mode of life, and adopt the customs of their civilized neighbors.

The United States Government at this time had a large number of army officers for whom little important military duty could be found. The disbandment of the volunteer forces, following the termination of the Civil war, had left a surplus of regular army officers who had held commands in the organizations that had been disbanded, so that considered in the light of immediate economy, their employment in the Indian service could be justified, as it would save the large expense which the employment of civilians made necessary.

The Dakota Indian delegation reached their destination and were cordially greeted by the Hon. Wm. F. Dole, who was then commissioner of Indian affairs and who received and provided for them at Washington. The position the Dakota Indians had taken was very gratifying to the interior department, and no effort was spared to strengthen their hostility to the proposed transfer. A number of grand councils were held, and the Indians in a body called on the President, who listened to their remarks with much interest. The outcome of the contest was that no action was taken by Congress, and the Indian bureau was not disturbed; nevertheless some understanding was had that permitted the employment of army officers as Indian agents, temporarily.

Gen. Alfred Sully, accompanied by General Parker, of General Grant's staff, and Colonel Colborn, an army officer, visited the Missouri Valley country in Dakota in May, 1867. They had been out investigating the Fort Phil Kearney massacre, had returned by way of Omaha, and were going up the river to have a council with some of the restless and troublesome savages. General Parker was a full-blooded Indian of the "six nations" of New York, and held the rank of general during the War of the Rebellion. It was expected that Parker, owing to his Indian blood and intelligence could exercise a favorable influence over the recalcitrant Sioux. The result of the mission, however, did not justify the hopes of its projectors. Parker seems to have done but little more than excite the curiosity of his less civilized brothers, who were led to wonder how he could have so completely mastered the white man's manners and language. When he counseled peace and industry, and pointed out to them what his own tribe had accomplished they seemed to regard him suspiciously as more of a friend to the whites than to his own race and they grunted angrily and refused to be mollified. Their great grievance was the crossing of their hunting grounds by so many hundreds of emigrants. If General Parker could stop that there would be no further trouble. Except to ascertain the disposition of the untamed Sioux and to learn their grievances, the mission was fruitless. Parker's Indian blood could a prejudice in the minds of the Indians, instead of securing their confidence. They could not see how he could be their friend and advocate the cause of their oppressors, the white people.

A much more formidable and important military peace commission visited the Sioux tribes and many others, later in the season of 1867, which was made up of Gen. William T. Sherman, Gen. Win. Harney, General Tappan, General Sanborn, General Pierson, General Taylor, who was president of the board, Gov. Andrew J. Faulk, of Dakota, and A. S. H. White, secretary, and Colonel Merrill of Sherman's staff. Gen. Alfred Terry was one of the board and preceded this party. Accompanying the commission were Jack Howland, an artist, and Geo. B. Phillis, photographer; H. J. Budd, of the Cincinnati Gazette; S. J. Bulkley, New York Herald; W. Fayel, St. Louis Republic; United States Senator Henderson, of Missouri; Gen. C. T. Campbell, special Indian agent. This party had chartered the steamboat Saint John and reached the capital of Dakota about the 20th of August where they were joined by Governor Faulk, who succeeded Governor Edmunds in the fall of 1866, and proceeded on their mission to the Indian country. As peace treaties had already been concluded with practically all the wild Indians, the object of this commission was to further the interests of peace by inducing the Indians to consent to an arrangement under which all of their people north of the Platte River in Nebraska, and all in Dakota, should be given a large reservation west of the Missouri River in Dakota, where they would have ample facilities for farming and stock raising, and would be supplied by the Government with subsistence and encouraged by substantial assistance to become a civilized people. A number of large delegations from the various Sioux tribes met the commission at Fort Sully, where councils were held and the proposed plan and policy thoroughly discussed; nothing definite, however, was arrived at; but the Indians had been apprised of the intention of the "Great Father," and it was understood that they were inclined to favor the arrangement.

The commission then proceeded to Fort Laramie, where a council was held with large delegations of the Ogalallas, Brules, and others, whose domain was north of the Platte in Nebraska. These Indians evinced decided opposition to the big reservation plan, and desired to retain the country they then inhabited, and demanded as a condition precedent to any negotiations that all work on the Union Pacific Railroad through that country be abandoned. General Sherman told them that could be done no more than the sun and moon could be stopped. The Indians appeared surprised at this declaration, and finally began to realize the hopelessness of their "condition precedent," asked for further time to consider the matter, which was given, and it was agreed to meet them again on the 8th of October, at Fort Harker, Kan. The Fort Harker council was not at all encouraging, and it would seem that the large reservation plan was losing strength among its white supporters owing to some impracticable features with which it was burdened.

While the result of these several councils had not fulfilled the expectations of the Government, a great deal of value had been accomplished and the way opened for an arrangement that would embody the most valuable features of the plan, which was to bring the Sioux Indians together on one reservation, and require them to reside upon it. This would result in freeing a large portion of the frontier from strolling bands, put a stop to many small depredations, and give opportunity for the introduction of the arts of civilization among them. This policy was thereafter consistently pursued, and the Great Sioux reservation in Southwestern Dakota became the abode of practically the entire Sioux nation.

The unfriendliness that had been manifested by the Sioux along the Upper Missouri had ceased, and peace had brooded over that country for many moons, so that General Sherman, on returning to headquarters at St. Louis in November, 1867, issued a congratulatory proclamation in which he officially declared that Indian troubles in the Northwest were ended, and the signs then indicated a long respite from border difficulties. This encouraging view was no doubt justified by the attitude of the Indians the general had met, who seemed to have reached an intelligent comprehension of their situation, which was one of helplessness and poverty unless guided, assisted and governed by the "Great Father" of the white people.

THE ARMY SEES CONTROL OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

While the advocates of army control of the Indians did not cease their efforts to secure a transfer of the Indian bureau to the war department, for several years, the sentiment of Congress as well as that of the country generally, was dominated by the "peace element," and even President Grant, who was possessed of strong predilections favoring the army in most matters, was wholly at variance with its ambition to secure the control of the Indians; and the peace policy, so-called, was familiarly termed "Grant's Peace Policy" before the second term of his presidency was concluded.

Since the official close of the Indian war in 1864, as declared by General Pope, there had been a growing sentiment, especially in army circles, for the transfer of the Indian bureau from the interior department of the Government to the war department. The military authorities held, and were supported by valid argument, that the country relied upon its military arm to suppress Indian hostilities, protect the frontiers from invasion, and protect emigration across the great plains, and that it could do this with greater efficiency, more economically, and much more satisfactorily, if the entire management and control of the Indians were entrusted to its authority.

Opposed to this was a strong and growing sentiment among religious bodies, led by the Quakers of Pennsylvania, and the Indian Rights Association, who favored a policy that ignored, practically, all danger of Indian hostilities if their peace policy could be adopted and the Indians brought to believe that the Government and the white people were their friends, willing and anxious to promote their welfare, and opposed to fighting them or controlling them by force of arms. These contended for a policy that would bring the Indians into communities where they could be educated and taught mechanical trades and encouraged in agricultural and pastoral employments; supervised directly by officers recommended by religious bodies. This contest grew to be a national issue in 1867, and each party was making every effort to induce Congress to its support. If the military people won, it would relegate the civilian agents to private life, hence the religious bodies were strongly supported by those then connected with the Indian service and the class of influential politicians who did not approve of being deprived of the large patronage which the Indian bureau controlled, while through this influence and because of prejudice against soldiers, many of the leading Indian chieftains and headmen were influenced to throw the weight of their uncompromising opposition against the army.

It should not be understood that military control of Indian affairs meant war or difficulties of any kind with the savages, for the military people were as zealous for peace as the civilians, but demanded that the Indians should be required to make their peace treaties with that department of the Government which had subdued their hostility and brought them to a peace seeking humor. Nothing unreasonable in that. They demanded control of the Indians in peace as well as in war, as a matter of good policy.

As a matter of fact peace was the sincere desire of all, including the Indians. As a rule the army men were friendly to the red man, anxious to promote his welfare, and the Indians understood this, but they also understood that the army people insisted on peaceful behavior, and the observance of treaty obligations. It was the indifference to treaty obligations on the part of the civilian authorities, and of the Government and the Indians both that brought upon the country the occasional Indian troubles.

The official relations of the Indians and their experience with the army had not been of that pleasurable nature which would foster a predilection in the Indian's breast for that branch of the public service; and when they were made to understand the meaning of the movement which had sent such an unusual number of military chieftains as well as noted civilians to council with them they arrayed themselves in their best apparel, bearing on their bosoms the medals which they or their ancestors had received from their "Great Father in times past" testifying to their exemplary character and faithfulness, and as many as could get permission, made the journey to Washington to protest before Congress against the transfer; and their opposition had its effect.

It was generally believed, however, among those whites who had given the subject an unprejudiced study, that army control would be more economical for the Government, and the Indians would receive all the material aid which the Government provided for them—something it was alleged they did not have under the less scrupulous system then in vogue under the interior department; but it was seriously and with good faith questioned whether the army, from its spirit, training and purposes, was equipped for promoting the civilization of the Indian, and his instruction in agriculture and the mechanical arts, which under the new peace policy were regarded as of the first importance. For the time had come when the Indian must forever cease his roaming and aimless life as viewed from the standpoint of civilization, and learn to work and thus provide himself with the necessities and comforts of life, or go hungry and naked—become pauperized—starve and freeze—for there was no longer a field vacant that could supply him with hunting grounds; and the Great Father in his wisdom had proclaimed that he would not support him longer in idleness while so many of his white children were suffering for the want of sufficient food, raiment and shelter, which the Government was powerless to lawfully relieve. Therefore, in making a choice as to which department should have charge of his tutelage, the civil power was largely preferred by those who had taken the most unselfish and intelligent interest in the welfare of the red race, and did not regard the Indian as solely responsible for the misfortunes that had fallen upon his people.

The supporters of the claims of the war department in this matter were designated as favoring a war policy, while their opponents were called the advocates of a peace policy; though each faction was zealous and earnest for peace, and in fact the Indians who could comprehend their situation were as zealous and earnest for peace as was the Government, and willing to make any reasonable sacrifice to preserve it. Their wars had stripped thousands of them of their food supplies, their clothing, their camp equipments, their arms, and even their tepees, leaving them in a most pitiable and destitute condition, which demanded immediate relief which the Government only was in a situation to furnish. The great mass of the Indians who had been engaged in the wars were clamorous for peace, and decidedly averse to being transferred to the control of the department of war, and for this reason large delegations from the different tribes were taken on to Washington in order that their influence might be used to stay the threatened transfer of the bureau from the interior department.

The only incorrigible elements existing at that time among the Indians, consisted of a heterogeneous mass made up of lawless individuals representing nearly every tribe, many of whom had been outlawed and driven off by their tribal associates, and who had been banded together under a new leader, Sitting Bull, an incorrigible enemy of the Government, and an able and wary chief and medicine man, who refused all peace overtures and indignantly spurned the assistance of the Government. It was these people mainly who were responsible for the Custer massacre and who for many years following that atrocity found an asylum on British American territory under the protection of the British flag. They disclaimed all proffers of the Government—would sign no treaties, and held to the doctrine that the Indians were the lawful and rightful owners of the soil.

and the Government had obtained no title by its treaties unless every individual Indian interested gave his and her consent.

SANTEES AT NIOBRARA

The Santee Indians, who had been established on a reservation at Crow Creek in 1803 were removed in 1806, to a reservation selected for them near the mouth of the Niobrara River, in L'Eau Qui Court County, Neb. The Santees at this time had no rights that the Government was bound by treaty to respect, having forfeited their treaty privileges and annuities by their outbreak and massacres under Little Crow, in 1802. At the time of this removal, about ninety members of the tribe, who had been confined in Government prisons for three years for their participation in that war, were released and sent by the steamboat Dora, to the new reservation. Their proximity to the settlements of Dakota, was the occasion of some alarm and general indignation. They were regarded as a hostile, treacherous and blood-thirsty people, who would be a constant annoyance to the settlers in Dakota, and a serious hindrance to immigration. Efforts were fruitlessly made to induce the Government to place them at some point more remote from the settlements. The governor and the Legislature of 1806-07 enlisted in this work; but the Santees were not disturbed, and as time passed and the Indians exhibited no indications of a hostile disposition, the alarm and indignation subsided. The Indians, however, were not allowed to roam about the country, but required to remain on their reservation unless provided with a special permit; with this written testimonial as to good character and industry, a number of the squaws and occasionally an aged warrior, found their way to the settlements, where the women found employment in washing and other domestic work for the pioneers. They had learned these rudiments of housekeeping before their removal from Minnesota, where they were accustomed to mingle freely with the whites. Later, this matter of the removal of the Santees was taken up by Congress, who, by resolution, directed the secretary of the interior to furnish the House of Representatives with a statement of his authority and reasons that had led to the removal of the tribe from Crow Creek without congressional sanction; what land had been taken for an Indian reservation; and whether the land had been purchased of private persons, and all other information in possession of said secretary. There appears to have been a suspicion that certain officers of the Federal Government had procured the removal of these Indians for personal reasons and for private gain, and Congress determined to sift the matter.

It was explained that no permanent reservation had been taken at Niobrara, and the removal was for the benefit of the Indians who were partially civilized, and who would have gone back to their savage condition if compelled to associate with the wild tribes that frequented the Crow Creek region; and further that the department was engaged in selecting an advantageous location where the Santees would be placed in charge of the Quakers.

Three years later, 1809, a large tract of land was secured much nearer the settlements, at a point in Nebraska opposite Springfield, Dakota, and here the tribe was located and has since remained.

We now come to the time and occasion when the Government endeavored by treaty to define the boundaries of the Sioux Indian Territory, whereon they were to be required to reside and beyond which they were forbidden to roam, and to mark out a plan that it was hoped would even totally result in disenthraling the Sioux from the dominion of barbarism, idleness and ignorance, and direct his way to become civilized and instructed in the arts of civilization, and a partaker in its employments, comforts and advantages.

In the spring of 1808 the military peace commission, commonly known as the Sherman Peace Commission, which is described and named in a circular issued at Fort Sully during the previous fall, convened at Fort Laramie, then in Dakota Territory, for the purpose of making a treaty with the Indians of the Sioux Nation that would embody the plans set forth in its councils with the various tribes at different places during the year 1867.

As this treaty contained the most definite proposition to the Indians to abandon their wild and nomadic life and adopt the customs and industries of the white people, a fair understanding of its provisions will serve to stimulate interest in the future career of the race as they emerge from their condition of barbarism into a higher sphere. It was the forerunner of the important step taken in 1876, when the Black Hills were ceded, and a system, practically compulsory, was then adopted, requiring the Indians to adopt an industrial life and to educate their children. The treaty is here inserted:

THE FAMOUS SHERMAN TREATY OF 1868

Andrew Johnson, President of the United States of America, to all and singular to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Whereas, a treaty was made and concluded at Fort Laramie, in the Territory of Dakota (now the Territory of Wyoming), on the 26th day of April, and afterwards, in the year of Our Lord 1868, by and between Nathaniel G. Taylor, William T. Sherman, William S. Harney, John B. Sanborn, S. F. Tappan, C. C. Auger and Alfred H. Terry, commissioners on the part of the United States; and Ma-za-pon-kaska, Tah-shun-ke-co-qui-pah, Heh-won-ge-chat, Mah-to-non-pah, Little Chief, Mokh-pi-ah-in-tah, Co-cam-i-yah-yah, Con-te-pe-tah, Ma-wa-tau-ni-hav-aka, He-na-pin-wa-ni-ca, Wah-pah-shaw, and other chiefs and headmen of different tribes of Sioux Indians on the part of said Indians, and duly authorized thereto by them, which treaty is in the words and figures following, to-wit:

Article 1. If bad men among the whites, or among other people subject to the authority of the United States, shall commit any wrong upon the person or property of the Indians, the United States will upon proof being made to their agent and forwarded to the commissioner of Indian affairs at Washington City, proceed at once to cause the offender to be arrested and punished according to the laws of the United States, and also reimburse the injured person for the loss sustained.

If bad men among the Indians shall commit a wrong or depredation upon the person or property of anyone, white, black, or Indian, subject to the authority of the United States and at peace therewith, the Indians herein named solemnly agree that they will, upon proof being made to their agent, and notice by him, deliver up the wrongdoer to the United States, to be tried and punished according to its laws; and in case they wilfully refuse so to do, the person injured shall be reimbursed for his loss from the annuities or other moneys due or to become due to them under this or other treaties made with the United States. And the President, on advising with the commissioner of Indian affairs, shall prescribe such rules and regulations for ascertaining damages under the provisions of this article, as in his judgment may be proper. But no one sustaining loss while violating the provisions of this treaty or the laws of the United States, shall be reimbursed therefor.

Article 2. Boundaries, etc. The United States agrees that the following district of country, to-wit, viz.: "Commencing on the east bank of the Missouri River, where the 46th parallel of north latitude crosses the same; thence along low water mark down said east bank to a point where the northern line of the State of Nebraska strikes the river; thence west across said river and along the northern line of Nebraska to the 104th degree of longitude west from Greenwich; thence north on said meridian to a point where the 46th parallel of north latitude intercepts the same; thence due east along the said parallel to the place of beginning; and in addition thereto all existing reservations on the east bank of said river, shall be, and the same are, set apart for the absolute and undisturbed use and occupation of the Indians herein named, and for such other friendly tribes or individual Indians as from time to time they may be willing, with the consent of the United States, to admit amongst them; and the United States now solemnly agrees that no persons except those herein designated, and authorized so to do, and except such officers, agents and employees of the Government as may be authorized to enter upon Indian reservations, in discharge of duties enjoined by law, shall ever be permitted to pass over, settle upon, or reside in the territory described in this article, or in such territory as may be added to this reservation for the use of said Indians, and henceforth they will and do relinquish all claims or right in and to any portion of the United States and territories, except such as is embraced within the limits aforesaid, and except as hereinafter provided."

Article 3. If it should appear from actual survey or other satisfactory examination of said tract of land that it contains less than one hundred and sixty acres of tillable land for each person who, at the time, may be authorized to reside on it under the provisions of this treaty, and a very considerable number of such persons shall be disposed to commence cultivating the soil as farmers, the United States agrees to set apart, for the use of said Indians, as herein provided, such additional quantity of arable land, adjoining to said reservation, or as near to the same as it can be obtained, as may be required to provide the necessary amount.

Article 4. The United States agrees, at its own proper expense, to construct at some place on the Missouri River, near the center of said reservation, where, time or place later may be convenient, the following buildings, to-wit: A warehouse; a storeroom, for the use of the agent in storing goods belonging to the Indians to cost not less than twenty-five hundred dollars; an agency building for the residence of the agent to cost not exceeding three thousand dollars; a residence for the physician to cost not more than three thousand dollars; and five other buildings, for a carpenter, farmer, blacksmith, miller and engineer, each to cost not exceeding two thousand dollars; also a schoolhouse or mission building, so soon as a sufficient number of children can be induced by the agent to attend school, which shall not cost exceeding five thousand dollars. The United States agrees further to cause to be erected on said reservation near the other buildings herein authorized, a good steam circular sawmill, with a gristmill and shingle machine attached to the same, in cost not exceeding eight thousand dollars.

Article 5. The United States agrees that the agent for said Indians shall in the future make his home at the agency building; that he shall reside among them, and keep an office open at all times for the purpose of prompt and diligent inquiry into such matters of complaint by and against the Indians as may be presented for investigation under the provisions of their treaty stipulations, as also for the faithful discharge of other duties enjoined upon him by law. In all cases of depredation upon persons and property, he shall cause the evidence to be taken in writing and forwarded, together with his findings, to the commissioner of Indian affairs, whose decision, subject to the decision of the secretary of the interior, shall be binding upon the parties to this treaty.

Article 6. If any individual belonging to said tribes of Indians, or legally incorporated with them, being the head of a family, shall desire to commence farming, he shall have the privilege to select in the presence and with the assistance of the agent then in charge, a tract of land within said reservation not exceeding three hundred and twenty acres in extent, which tract when so selected, certified and recorded in the "Land Book" as herein directed, shall cease to be held in common, but the same may be occupied and held in the exclusive possession of the person selecting it, and of his family, so long as he or they may continue to cultivate it.

Any person over eighteen years of age, not being the head of a family, may in like manner select and cause to be certified to him, or her, for purposes of cultivation, a quantity of land not exceeding eighty acres in extent, and thereupon be entitled to the exclusive possession of the same as above directed.

For each tract of land, so selected, a certificate containing a description thereof and the name of the person selecting it, with a certificate endorsed therein that the same has been recorded, shall be delivered to the party entitled to it by the agent, after the same shall have been recorded by him in a book, to be kept in his office, subject to inspection, which said book shall be known as the "Sioux Land Book."

The President may, at any time, order a survey of the reservation, and when so surveyed, Congress shall provide for protecting the rights of said settlers in their improvements, and may fix the character of the title held by each. The United States may pass such laws on the subject of alienation and descent of property between the Indians and their descendants as may be thought proper. And it is further stipulated that any male Indians over eighteen years of age, of any band or tribe, that is or shall hereafter become a party to this treaty, who now is or shall hereafter become a resident or occupant of any reservation or territory not included in the tract or country designated or described in this treaty for the permanent home of the Indians, which is not mineral land nor reserved by the United States, for special purposes other than Indian occupation, and who shall have made improvements thereon of the value of two hundred dollars or more, and continuously occupied the same as a homestead for the term of three years, shall be entitled to receive from the United States, a patent for 160 acres of land including his said improvements, the same to be in the form of the legal subdivisions of the surveys of the public lands. Upon application in writing, sustained by the proof of two disinterested witnesses, made to the register of the local land office, when the land sought to be entered is within a land district, and when the tract sought to be entered is not in any land district, then upon said application and proof being made to the commissioner of the General Land Office, and the right of such Indians or Indians to enter such tract or tracts of land shall accrue and be perfect from the date of his first improvements thereon, and shall continue as long as he continues his residence and improvements, and no longer. And any Indian or Indians receiving a patent for land under the foregoing provisions, shall thereby and from thenceforth become and be a citizen of the United States, and be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of such citizens, and shall at the same time retain all his rights, benefits, according to Indians and tribal treaty.

Article 7. In order to insure the civilization of the Indians entering into this treaty, the necessity of education is admitted, especially of such of them as are engaged in agriculture on said agricultural reservations, and they therefore pledge themselves to send their children, male and female, between the ages of five and sixteen years, to attend school, and it is hereby made the duty of the agent for said Indians to see that this obligation is strictly complied with; and the United States agrees that money shall be appropriated for said ages, who can be induced or compelled to attend school, to employ a teacher, and a teacher competent to teach the elementary branches of American English.

furnished, who will reside among said Indians and faithfully discharge his or her duties as a teacher. The provisions of this article to continue for not less than twenty years.

Article 8. When the head of a family or lodge shall have selected lands and received his certificate as above directed, and the agent shall be satisfied that he intends in good faith to commence cultivating the soil for a living, he shall be entitled to receive seeds and agricultural implements for the first year, not exceeding in value one hundred dollars, and for each succeeding year he shall continue to farm, for a period of three years more, he shall be entitled to receive seeds and implements as aforesaid, not exceeding in value twenty-five dollars. And it is further stipulated that such persons as commence farming, shall receive instruction from the farmer herein provided for, and whenever more than one hundred persons shall enter upon the cultivation of the soil, a second blacksmith shall be provided, with such iron, steel, and other material, as may be needed.

Article 9. At any time after ten years from the making of this treaty, the United States shall have the privilege of withdrawing the physician, farmer, blacksmith, carpenter, engineer and miller, herein provided for, but in case of such withdrawal an additional sum thereafter of $10,000 per annum shall be devoted to the education of said Indians, and the commissioner of Indian affairs shall, upon careful inquiry into their condition, make such rules and regulations for the expenditure of such sum and as will best promote the educational and moral improvement of said tribes.

Article 10. In lieu of all sums of money or other annuities provided to be paid to the Indians herein named, under any treaty or treaties heretofore made, the United States agrees to deliver at the agency house on the reservation herein named, on or before the first day of August of each year, for thirty years, the following articles, to-wit:

For each male person over fourteen years of age, a suit of good substantial woolen clothing, consisting of coat, pantaloons, flannel shirt, hat and a pair of home-made socks.

For each female over twelve years of age, a flannel skirt or the goods necessary to make it, a pair of woolen hose, twelve yards of calico, and twelve yards of cotton domestics.

For the boys and girls under the ages named, such flannel and cotton goods as may be needed to make each a suit as aforesaid, together with a pair of woolen hose for each.

And in order that the commissioner of Indian affairs may be enabled to estimate properly for the articles herein named, it shall be the duty of the agent each year to forward to him a full and exact census of the Indians on which the estimate from year to year can be based.

And in addition to the clothing herein named, the sum of $10 for each person entitled to the beneficial effects of this treaty shall be annually appropriated for a period of thirty years while such persons roam and hunt, and $20 for each person who engages in farming, to be used by the secretary of the interior in the purchase of such articles as from time to time the condition and necessities of the Indians may indicate to be proper. And if within the thirty years, at any time, it shall appear that the amount of money needed for clothing under this article, can be appropriated to better uses for the Indians named herein, Congress may by law change the appropriation to other purposes; but in no event shall the amount of this appropriation be withdrawn or be discontinued for the period named. And the President shall annually detail an officer of the army, to be present and attest the delivery of all the goods herein named to the Indians; and he shall inspect and report on the quantity and quality of the goods and the manner of their delivery. And it is hereby expressly stipulated that each Indian over the age of four years, who shall have removed to and settled permanently on said reservation, and complied with the stipulations of this treaty, shall be entitled to receive from the United States for the period of four years after he shall have settled upon said reservation, one pound of meat and one pound of flour per day; provided the Indians cannot furnish their own subsistence at an earlier date. And it is further stipulated that the United States will furnish and deliver to each lodge of Indians, or family of persons legally incorporated with them, who shall remove to the reservation herein described and commence farming, one good American cow, and one good well-broken pair of American oxen, within sixty days after such lodge or family shall have so settled upon said reservation.

Article 11. In consideration of the advantages and benefits conferred by this treaty, and the many pledges of friendship by the United States, the tribes who are parties to this agreement hereby stipulate that they will relinquish all right to occupy permanently the territory outside their reservation as herein defined, but yet reserve the right to hunt on any lands north of North Platte, and on the Republican Fork of the Smoky Hill River, so long as the buffalo may range thereon in such numbers to justify the chase. And they, the said Indians, further expressly agree:

1st. That they will withdraw all opposition to the construction of the railroads now being built on the plains;

2d. That they will permit the peaceful construction of any railroad not passing over their reservation as herein defined;

3d. That they will not attack any persons at home or traveling, nor molest or disturb any wagon trains, coaches, mules, or cattle, belonging to the people of the United States, or to persons friendly therewith;

4th. They will never capture or carry off from the settlements, white women or children;

5th. They will never kill or scalp white men, nor attempt to do them harm;

6th. They withdraw all pretense of opposition to the construction of the railroad now being built along the Platte River and westward to the Pacific Ocean, and they will not in future object to the construction of railroads, wagon roads, mail stations, or other works of utility or necessity, which may be ordered or permitted by the laws of the United States. But should such roads or other works be constructed on the lands of their reservation, the Government will pay the tribe whatever amount of damages may be assessed by three disinterested commissioners, one to be a chief or headman of the tribe;

7th. They agree to withdraw all opposition to the military posts or roads now established south of the North Platte River, or that may be established, not in violation of treaties heretofore made or hereafter to be made with any of the Indian tribes.

Article 12. No treaty for the cession of any portion of the reservation herein described which may be held in common shall be of any validity or force as against the said Indians, unless executed and signed by at least three-fourths of the adult male Indians occupying or interested in the same; and no cession of the tribe shall be understood or construed in such manner as to deprive, without his consent, any individual member of the tribe of his rights to any tract of land selected by him, as provided in Article 6 of this treaty.

Article 13. The United States hereby agrees to furnish annually to the Indians, the physician, teachers, carpenter, miller, engineer, farmer, and blacksmith, as herein contemplated, and that such appropriation shall be made from time to time, on the estimates of the secretary of the interior, as will be sufficient to employ such persons.

Article 14. It is agreed that the sum of $500 annually, for three years from date, shall be expended in presents to the ten persons of the said tribe who in the judgment of the agent may grow the most valuable crops for the respective year.

Article 15. The Indians herein named agree that when the agency house shall be constructed on the reservation, and other buildings shall be constructed on the reservation named, they will regard said reservation as their permanent home, and they will make no permanent settlement elsewhere; but they shall have the right, subject to the conditions and modifications of this treaty, to hunt, as stipulated in Article 11 hereof.

Article 16. The United States hereby stipulates and agrees that the country north of the North Platte River, and east of the summits of the Big Horn mountains, shall be held and considered to be unceded Indian territory, and also stipulates and agrees that no white person or persons shall be permitted to settle upon or occupy any portion of the same, or without the consent of the Indians, first had and obtained, to pass through the same; and it is further agreed by the United States, that within ninety days after the conclusion of peace with all the bands of the Sioux Nation the military posts now established in the territory in this article named shall be abandoned; and that the roads leading to them and by them to the settlements in the Territory of Montana shall be closed.

Article 17. It is hereby expressly understood and agreed by and between the respective parties to this treaty, that the execution of this treaty and its ratification by the United States Senate shall have the effect and shall be construed as abrogating and annulling all treaties and agreements heretofore entered into between the respective parties hereto, so far as such treaties and agreements obligate the United States, to furnish money, clothing or other articles of property to such Indians, and bands of Indians as become parties to this treaty, but no further.

In testimony of all which, we the said commissioners, and we, the chiefs and headmen of the Brule band of the Sioux Nation, have hereunto set our hands and seals, at Fort Laramie, Dakota Territory, this twenty-ninth day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight.

And, whereas, the said treaty having been submitted to the Senate of the United States for its constitutional action thereon, the Senate did, on the 16th day of February, 1869, advise and consent to the ratification of the same, by a resolution in the words and figures following, to-wit:

In Executive Session, Senate of the United States,
February 16th, 1869.

Resolved (two-thirds of the senators present concurring), that the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty between the United States and the different bands of the Sioux Nation of Indians, made and concluded the 10th of April, 1868.

Attest: George C. Gorman, Secretary.

Now, therefore, be it known, that I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States of America, do, in pursuance of the advice and consent of the Senate, as expressed in its resolution of the 16th of February, 1869, accept, ratify and confirm the said treaty.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this 24th day of February, in the year of our Lord One Thousand Eight Hundred and Sixty-nine, and of the Independence of the United States of America, the Ninety-third.

By the President:

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State.

It will be observed that this treaty was made on the part of the Government by representatives of the war department, a concession probably to the demand of that strong arm whose valor had subdued the hostile and warlike spirit, and brought about the conditions favorable for an amicable agreement.

The administration of President Johnson, it will be recalled, was seriously disturbed by his unfortunate differences with Congress over the problem of reconstruction, which continued throughout his term, causing much perplexity and delay in other important matters of national concern.

During all this time the Government had given comparatively little attention to any systematic or well considered effort to prepare the Indian for a more useful life as a factor in such civilized industries as he was capable of comprehending and performing; but had been engrossed with the concerns of its own people of the white race, leaving the Indian problem to work out largely under the moral and religious influences of the missionaries supplied voluntarily by our various religious bodies, who had no authority even if so inclined, to enlighten them in the mechanical crafts or agricultural arts; but occupied themselves with teaching the precepts of the Christian religion, a work that was fraught with no real benefit and advantage to the benighted race; and extended its beneficent influence in scores of instances to the care and succor of hapless widows and children, whom the misfortune of war had made captives and slaves.

In the meantime the plan of the industrial system as a means of redeeming the savage and giving him a place among the useful factors of the country's industrial system, was gaining strength and enlisting new advocates—the progress which had been made by the friendly Santees and Yanktons—both Sioux tribes—demonstrating that the Sioux Indian was capable of performing intelligent manual labor, and willing to work when freed from the allurements of the chase and the old free wild life; given a substantial reward for his labor, and aided by the incentive of further reward should he persist in his well doing.

The year 1869 witnessed the inauguration of President Grant and the further extension of the peace policy, so-called, in the administration of its Indian affairs. No section of the United States had a more direct interest in this matter than the Territory of Dakota and its white inhabitants; the hostile and warlike tribes of the great Sioux nation, all being inhabitants of the territory, and occupying that portion west of the Missouri River, an area embracing approximately one-fourth of the territory. There was at this time a general change, not only in the persons who had in charge the administration of Indian affairs, but in the system and methods of administration for the purpose of conforming them more closely to the new policy which had been rather tentatively on trial during the preceding administration of Mr. Johnson. The religious denominations now step into the places of authority as typifying more clearly the policy to be henceforth pursued in Dakota.

Among the early official acts of President Grant's administration was the assignment of army officers to the temporary discharge of the duties of agents at the various Indian agencies in Dakota Territory. During the Civil war there had been an increase in the number of subordinate officers in the regular army who had been employed in command of the volunteer troops; that arm now being disbanded left a surplus of military officers on the rolls of the regular army for whom there was no proper employment in the military activities of the country. It was therefore suggested in army official circles that the control of the Indians be taken from the civil authorities under the interior department and transferred to the war department. There were many sound arguments advanced in favor of the change; one having considerable force, being the necessity that existed of maintaining the army in the Indian country to keep the Indians in subjection and subdue their hostilities; also that the army men understood the Indians more thoroughly than did the civilians; could manage them with less friction and complaint; and finally that the army could supply competent officers to act as superintendents and agents, without entailing any extra expense on the Government for their employment, as they were under salary in the military department whether employed or idle.

These assignments of military people were not satisfactory to that element in the country who favored the compulsory education of the Indian people in agricultural and mechanical arts. This element was led by a very reputable and influential association called the Indian Humanitarian Association, of Philadelphia, of which William Welch, a prominent Episcopalian was president. The assignments of military people, however, were not designed to be permanent but were made in order to rid the Indian service of some possibly objectionable element, preparatory to entering upon the new proposed plan which gave to the religious denominations of the country the privilege of recommending suitable persons for employment as agents, and in the fall of 1870 or early in 1871 this change was made. In Dakota Territory, on the recommendation of Mr. Welch, Samuel Webster, of California, was appointed agent of the Yankton Indians; James M. Washburn, of Indiana, but more recently of Dakota, agent of the Brule Indians at Whetstone Agency; Henry E. Gregory, of Dakota, agent of the Poncas; Dr. H. F. Livingston, of Yankton, at the time surgeon at Crow Creek, agent of the Crow Creek Agency; Dr. J. F. Cravens at Cheyenne; and Major Hughes (Catholic), at Standing Rock. These agents represented the Episcopal denomination except at Standing Rock. Samuel E. Jenney, Quaker, had been some time earlier placed in charge of the Santees in Nebraska.

In his message to Congress, December, 1871, President Grant said:

The peace policy pursued toward the Indian has resulted favorably so far as can be judged from the limited time during which it has been in operation. Through the exertions of the various societies of Christians, to whom has been entrusted the execution of the policy, and the board of commissioners authorized by the law of April 22d, 1869, many tribes of Indians have been induced to settle upon reservations, to cultivate the soil and perform productive labor of various kinds, and to partially accept civilization. They are being cared for in such a way, it is hoped, as to induce those still pursuing their old habits of life to embrace the only opportunity which is left them to avoid extermination. I recommend liberal appropriations to carry out the Indian peace policy, not only because it is humane, Christianlike and economical, but because it is right.

I recommend to your favorable consideration also, the policy of granting a territorial government to Indians in the Indian Territory, west of Arkansas and Missouri and south of Kansas. In doing so, every right guaranteed to the Indians by treaty should be secured. Such a course might be the means of collecting most of the Indians now on the Missouri River and the Pacific coast, and south of the British possessions, into one state or territory.

The sentiment of the country, influenced largely by the agitation of the peace policy, had been gradually working towards a denial of the claims of the Indian to original ownership of large tracts of the public domain. The past uniform policy of the Government had been in recognition of this ownership, but as the necessity for more complete control by the Government grew under the aggressive advance of immigration and public improvements, it was evident that the Indians, prompted probably by a class of white people who had become incorporated with them were more and more inclined to assert their rights as proprietors of the soil, and every forward movement in the progress of developing and opening up the vast domain of the Northwest was met and disputed, the Indians claiming that being the owners of the land they had a lawful right to forbid all trespassers, and were also justified in refusing to negotiate for its sale and transfer. There was probably sufficient ground for this claim in the treaties heretofore made between the Government and various Indian tribes, in which the ownership of the Indians was virtually acknowledged. Confronted by the obstinacy and hostility of a portion of the tribes of the Northwest, which, during the period when the Union Pacific Railroad was under construction, manifested their sovereign authority by open warfare against the extension of railroads through their country, Representative John Taffe, a Nebraska congressman, in February, 1870, introduced in the House of Representatives, a joint resolution to disencumber the public domain of the so-called Indian title.

The resolution declared:

That after the expiration of one year from the passage of this resolution, the public domain of the United States shall be held to be and shall be treated in all respects as disencumbered of the so-called Indian titles.

The resolution failed of enactment, but it aroused considerable attention throughout the country; was earnestly supported by the people of the Northwest, and it was claimed would have had the approval of Congress but for a feeling that the Government had too often committed itself to an acknowledgment of the Indian title, and that a radical declaration in denial, might injuriously complicate the new policy which the Government had adopted in its control of the Indian tribes, and provoke a troublesome controversy with the Indian Rights Association, which also held that the Indians could not be divested of their title without their consent. Notwithstanding the failure of the resolution, its purport thereafter found expression in the acts of Congress and in the negotiations of the Government commissions having to do with Indian affairs.

Finally, in 1871, a law was enacted by Congress, which declared that Hereafter no Indian nation or tribe within the territory of the United States shall be acknowledged or recognized as an independent nation, tribe or power, with which the United States may contract by treaty.

This law came three years later than the Sherman-Laramie Treaty of 1868, which inaugurated in written form some of the features of the industrial peace policy, and marked out the Great Sioux reservation. The provisions of this treaty, while forming the basis of the Government's treatment and care of the friendly Sioux, during the few years until the time when it was superseded in 1876 by the Black Hills agreement, were not all put in practical operation. Congress, however, continued its appropriations, and the annuities agreed upon were delivered, always accompanied by complaints of fraud from the Indians; who also complained that they had been deceived in the treaty; that its provisions had not been properly interpreted. And the Government became convinced, by a closer examination and more intimate acquaintance with the provisions of the treaty, that the Indians had been given too much discretion in choosing whether they would become tillers of the soil, or continue their former career as followers of the chase, to which the treaty seemed to invite them by allowing an immense territory for hunting grounds—a grant of discretion diametrically opposed to the theory and success of the industrial policy.

This reservation embraced all the country north of the southern boundary of the territory, west of the Missouri River including the Black Hills, and extending north to the 40th parallel of latitude, and apparently was a serious blow to the growth, development and prosperity of the Dakota settlements. It effectually locked the door of the Black Hills, and put an end to all enterprise to open up overland routes through Western Dakota to the gold fields of Montana and Idaho. It probably had a deterrent effect upon the occupation of the Missouri River counties west of Bon Homme, there being an apprehension that it would not be safe to get so near the reconstructed savages as the distance across the Missouri River, for the red man was an adept in the building and plying canoes, and was expert in their management on the water. It was looked upon at the time as quite partial to the transportation interests of the Union Pacific Railroad, which would land the Montana and Idaho immigration at Cheyenne, from whence they had as long or much longer wagon road trip than they would have starting from various feasible Missouri river points.

The treaty provided that it should be in force when ratified by the Senate of the United States; but the law of Congress which made the treaty commission, passed in 1867, provided that:

The district of lands set apart as a reservation for said Indians, when so selected and the selection approved by Congress, shall be and remain the permanent homes for said Indians.

Inasmuch as the treaty provided for the permanent disposal of the public domain, and contained other provisions making it necessary that it be sanctioned by the law-making power of the Government, and not of the Senate alone, and Congress never having acted on the treaty, the courts held the treaty invalid when it came to be tested later during the pell-mell rush of emigrants to the Black Hills gold fields during the two or three years preceding the lawful opening of that region.

The people of Dakota were in accord with all peace movements, which were also supported in good faith by the legislatures of the territory and by the governors of that day, both Governor Edmunds and Governor Faulk pronouncing for the policy in unequivocal terms. In fact one of the earliest criticisms of the war policy from an official source was contained in the annual message of Governor Edmunds submitted to the Legislature in 1865.

The treaty of 1868, unfortunately, left the door open through which the Indians could employ their time in the chase, and a vast country, including the Black Hills and Big Horn Region, surrendered to them as hunting grounds. While this treaty contained much that was commendable, it was plain from its practical workings, that so long as the discretion was left with the Indian to pursue his wild life, or undertake to live after the customs of civilized people, he invariably chose the former, contending that the Government did not furnish sufficient subsistence to keep them from starvation. This contention was not well taken, though there are grounds for believing that the Indians did not receive all that the Government supplied for their use. But the fatal weakness in the treaties was the liberty given the Indian to follow the customs of his ancestors. It was conceded that a system of compulsory industry must be inaugurated if the barbarian was to be transformed into a civilized or semi-civilized being, and this was the position that confronted the Government when General Grant became President.

REMOVAL OF THE PONCAS

The Sherman Treaty with the Sioux Indians in 1868 gave the Sioux all the lands in the Territory of Dakota south of the Cannon Ball River and west of the Missouri; this included the Ponca reservation, and necessitated the removal of the Poncas to save them from the deadly animosity held toward them by the Sioux. It was said that the Sherman commission was not informed that the Poncas had this reservation, and that including it in the Sioux Treaty was an oversight. The Ponca reserve included the land known as Todd County, which the Government subsequently gave to Nebraska in 1882. In 1870 Congress enacted that the Poncas should be removed to the Indian Territory. No treaty had been made with them for their Dakota reserve, but being a docile tribe and few in numbers, they consented to the removal and were located on the Quapaw reservation in the Indian Territory. Here they suffered great hardship, and a number of them died from the effects of the climatic change, and other causes. They would have rejoiced had they been permitted to return to Dakota, but the law forbade, and to better their situation they were allowed to select a new reservation at the junction of the Salt Fork and the Arkansas—a finer reservation. Here they remained for a time contented, except in the case of a few old chiefs, who continued the agitation for return to Dakota, which culminated in enlisting the sympathy of the Indian Rights Association, which succeeded in having them brought north and located upon the Omaha and Winnebago reserve in Nebraska, where they found a congenial home. Finally by the Crook Treaty of 1880, they were given allotments on their old reservation in Dakota.

THE HOSTILE INDIANS

Gen. D. S. Stanley, in command of the military district of Dakota, headquarters at Fort Sully, was, at a later day, requested by the war department to ascertain and report regarding the tribal relations of the irreconcilable hostile and turbulent people, under Sitting Bull, and under date of July 1, 1871, in responding, states:

The Indians in the hostile camps were fragments of the Santee and Yanktonais tribes, but have no intercourse whatever with the friendly Santees. The Yanktonais, however, communicate with the agency Yanktonais at Grand River Agency. The Santees are a portion of that tribe who have remained hostile and wild since the Indian war of 1862. They are in three bands under Head Chiefs Inkpaduta, White Hat, and Standing Buffalo, 300 lodges in all. Standing Buffalo's band is quite friendly; the others are not. They number 300 lodges and are mostly armed with bows and arrows, but have some firearms which they obtain from British traders. The Yanktonais are 500 lodges strong, and pretend to be friendly. The chiefs are "Medicine Bear," "The Man Who Feels His Bear," "Little Black Eyes," and "Skin of the Hearts." There is also a band of Sissetons, about fifty lodges, under "Thundering Bull," that stay most of the time in the Yanktonais camps. I do not think it possible to induce these Indians to join their own tribes. Placed upon the same footing as the Assiniboines as regards annuities, might partly remedy this. I have in a manner Red Cloud and his Ogallalas. The military could not force them to a military post somewhere about Milk River, a measure which I hesitate to recommend with the small number of troops at the disposal of the department.

When the North Pacific Railroad crosses the Missouri, the entire Sioux problem will be brought to a head, and in my opinion will only be solved by an Indian magnitude. Until that time I would recommend that conciliatory measures be taken with the Indians that are the subjects of this paper.

D. S. STANLEY,
Major-General.

LOCATION OF THE FRIENDLY TRIBES

None of the Sioux tribes west of the river appear to have had any particular local residence prior to the Laramie treaty of 1868, though all had been supplied with annuity goods—food and clothing for at least ten years before that event. The goods were brought to them annually by a special agent of the Government, who had them transported by steamboat, and delivered them at certain specified points on the river. Dr. A. H. Redfield, of Detroit, was the first of these agents beginning his journeys about 1858. He was followed in 1861 by Judge Latta, of Leavenworth, and the latter was succeeded in 1866 by Maj. Joseph R. Hanson, of Yankton. The special agency plan was discontinued at the close of Major Hanson's term in 1869, and individual agents were thereafter appointed for each tribe, and agency buildings constructed. The Lower Brule tribe was given a reservation by the Edmunds commission in October, 1865, on the west side of the Missouri below Crow Creek and extending down the river for several miles taking in the ancient site of Fort Lookout nearly across the river from Chamberlain. It had been a trading post of the American Fur Company, was very substantially built and enclosed in a stockade. It was constructed about the year 1820 for one of the company's principal depots. It had been considered more suitable for military headquarters, by General Harney, than Fort Pierre, when that commander came into the territory in 1855, and was taken over by that officer and occupied by a part of his command until after the completion of Fort Randall in 1856, and was later intermittently occupied by the Government. Some fragments of the old fort were found within the area enclosed by the stockade, when the Government, through Agent Hanson, located the Lower Brules on their reservation in 1867.

Before going to the Missouri River in 1877, the Red Cloud (Oglala) Indian Agency had remained in the upper White River valley on a commanding site near which was Camp or Fort Robinson, a military post, also near Crawford, Neb. The valley was from eight to ten miles wide, and the highlands on either side were crowned by white chalk hills, of irregular formation, which gave an interesting variety to the view. The buildings were of wood, erected in an enclosure 200 by 400 feet in area, surrounded by a stockade ten feet high. These consisted of an ample warehouse, three offices, rooms for employes' quarters, a mess house 16 by 50 feet, and a two story residence for the U. S. agent, who at the time was Doctor Irwin.

Spotted Tail's Agency, or the agency of the Brule tribe, on Beaver Creek, Neb., was about forty-five miles northeast of Red Cloud. It had a beautiful situation in a fine valley that afforded opportunities for farming. The small villages of the Brules were scattered along the creek for twenty miles. The buildings were similar to those at Red Cloud, with the addition of a schoolhouse and chapel. About fifty pupils attended school, which was conducted by lady teachers under the auspices of the Missionary Society of the Episcopal Church, whose services were furnished without compensation from the Indians or Government. Camp Sheridan was the name of the military post near this agency.

Article 4 of the Sherman treaty provided for agency buildings at some point on the Missouri River near the center of the reservation, but these improvements do not appear to have been made otherwise than providing a supply depot at the Whetstone Landing or at the mouth of Landing Creek.

About 1870, the Whetstone Landing at the mouth of Whetstone Creek, a few miles below the mouth of White River, was established, and called the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies, where substantial buildings were erected, and supplies for a large part, if not all of the two tribes of Brules and Oglalas were deposited by the steamboats at this landing, and were hauled overland to the agencies. Indians were employed largely to do the hauling under the supervision of white wagon masters.

The Oglalas and Brule tribes included more than half of the Sioux nation. The other tribes were the Minneconjoux, Uncapapas, Sans Ares, Upper Yanktonnais, Lower Yanktonnais, Two Kettles, Blackfeet, Santees, Yanktons and Sissetons, though the three last mentioned had little or nothing to do with the affairs of the nation. The other and smaller tribes mentioned appear to have inhabited the country north of Fort Pierre and the Cheyenne and Cannon Ball regions, while the Yanktonnais had been allowed by the Edmunds Peace Commission, to occupy the improvements at Crow Creek which at that time had not been made a lawful reservation.

In all there were nine tribes west of the Missouri River, commonly called the "wild tribes," and three tribes east of the river—the Sissetons, the Santees, and the Yanktons, making twelve in all, from which coincidence they were sometimes compared with the twelve tribes of Israel. The three tribes east of the river were reputed to be further advanced in civilization than those west, and their affairs had been conducted by resident agents.

CHAPTER LX

INFLUENCE OF CHRISTIAN RELIGION ON THE SIOUX

PE-HE-ZI-WI, SPOTTED TAIL'S DAUGHTER—INDIANS IN COURT FOR MURDER—MISSIONARIES' GREAT WORK FOR CIVILIZATION—FATHER DESMET—INDIANS LIKE WHITE MAN'S WAYS—SPOTTED TAIL'S RELIGIOUS VIEWS—TOMAHAWK READS THE BIBLE—RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATIONS HOLD MEETINGS WITH INDIANS—CUSTER HEARS "OLD HUNDRED" SUNG BY HIS INDIAN SCOUTS.

Before the treaty of 1868 nearly all the Sioux west of the Missouri River were considered in the hostile class. The settlement of the country following the building of the Union Pacific Railroad, convinced them that their hunting grounds had become greatly contracted. Still the relations of the Indians to the whites were of such a peaceable and friendly character that the tribe of Brules, headed by Spotted Tail, frequently camped on the North Platte in Nebraska, and Spotted Tail and his family had frequent opportunities of becoming acquainted with the officers and soldiers at Fort Laramie; and the modest demeanor and striking beauty of his eldest daughter had made her a great favorite with many at the fort. And she soon came to apprehend the advantages of the whites in their superior numbers, and in all the comforts and refinements of civilized life which the white race had over the Indian, and it seemed quite in keeping with her superior mental qualities as well as her physical perfections, that she should without premeditation imbibe a strong partiality for the whites. As a child she attracted much attention at the fort, and when she had grown to womanhood she became a favorite companion of many officers of the volunteer troops, which at that time, which was during the years following the Civil war, composed in part the garrison at the post. In addition to being intelligent and graceful, and pure, she was the daughter of the principal chieftain of the Sioux nation, a position that gave her great importance among her own people, and as she innocently assumed, entitled her to an equal social standing among the whites. Her figure was rather below the medium height, with a face perfectly oval, illuminated by eyes black and flashing, with a small straight nose, finely formed lips and teeth white and perfect. Her name was Pe-he-zi-wi, meaning it was said golden hair; but her hair was perfectly black and fine, not coarse as is uniformly the case with the Indian race; she was naturally modest, which added to her many other attractions. Her visits to the fort were in the winter season while the Indians were in a permanent camp near by; she wore a blue cloth dress, beaded leggings and moccasins appropriately ornamented as became the daughter of a prince of the Dakotah nation. She wore strings of turquoise shells for earrings and necklace, her hands and arms adorned in Indian style with rings and bracelets, and a handsome buffalo robe thrown around her, she was a very attractive figure. It was known that Pe-he-zi-wi used all her influence with her father and her people to dissuade them from hostilities toward the white people. She felt that war against the whites could secure no advantage or retrieve anything that the Indians had given up in the way of lands, but on the contrary invariably left the Indians many times worse off than before, and she was, therefore, bent on cultivating a desire for peace and the adoption of a permanent peace policy by her father and his warlike subjects.

All this was prior to the treaty of 1868, and in the meantime the Sioux were engaged in a number of depredations, necessitating the frequent interposition of the soldiery to quell their hostile intent and punish them for their criminal lawlessness. And finally a council was called to meet at Fort Laramie for the purpose of making a treaty of peace, at which the famous General Sherman would preside. Spotted Tail did not intend to be present at this council which was called at Fort Laramie, but with his family and band camped within a reasonable distance of the fort in order to be where he could be apprised of whatever was taking place. It was at this place that his favorite daughter, Pe-he-zi-wi, was attacked with what proved to be a fatal illness. Her malady was a violent fever, and the medicine men of the tribe exerted themselves with all their skill and incantations, but the daughter grew more feeble and Father Spot could see that his loved one was rapidly nearing dissolution. Apprehensive that she could not survive the malady, she made an affectionate appeal to her father in favor of peace with the pale faces. An Indian's eldest child is invariably held in great favor, and Spot's daughter had so endeared herself to her father that he felt that she was all he had to live for. She implored her father, that after she was dead—an event close at hand—he should go straight to Fort Laramie and meet the white chiefs, and make a treaty of peace which should be everlasting. As Spotted Tail afterward narrated this scene, she said: "Remember the dying words of Pe-he-zi-wi; go to the pale faces, shake hands with them strong; promise me this, and also promise me as a pledge that you will do this, you will bury me in the cemetery among the pale faces at Fort Laramie." The old chieftain, savage and little accustomed to such sentimental influences, could not resist her appeal; his heart was touched, and his judgment was convinced that her counsel was for the best; and taking her hand in his, he gave her the promise she had so urgently sought, pledging his affection and his honor as a chief, that he would do all she had asked of him. Her earthly mission was fully accomplished, the hour of her death saw the triumph of her life, and her soul went forth to be received into the spirit land to receive the reward due to those who like her had labored for and sought for peace on earth.

Spotted Tail kept his promise; he made his way to Laramie and joined in making the first peace treaty of his nation that started the Sioux on their memorable journey from barbarism and savagery to civilized industry and in thousands of instances to Christianity. An Indian maiden's grave within the limits of the old fort, towering above the graves of the white people there buried, stands as a memorial of peace secured by the faithful daughter, Pe-he-zi-wi. It was for a long time related as a romance of the fort that she had cherished an unrequited affection for an officer of the army once stationed there, and that as an alliance was denied her, she gave way to despondency and died of a broken heart; but this story was not credited in best informed circles and her father knew that natural causes were responsible for the death of his devoted child. When Spotted Tail passed through Laramie in 1875, on his way to Washington to treat for the sale of the Black Hills, his white companions on the trip relate that he pointed out the grave, his eyes filled with tears, and he said his heart was big with sorrow because of the loss of Pe-he-wi-zi, and it was also big with joy as he recalled his pledge to her and the better days he had seen with his people because he had redeemed that pledge in good faith. He also said to the interpreter, "had it not have been for her and my pledge, I would not now be at peace with the Great Father." And from that time until the day of his death, the old warrior never forgot his promise, but his voice and active efforts were ever found counseling the peaceful settlement of all differences which from time to time were the invariable accompaniment of the progress of his untutored and untamed people toward a civilized mode of living and a peaceful industrial career.

The Indian enjoyed immunity from punishment under the white man's law for the crime of killing another Indian, in the early days of Dakota. The U. S. A.

tee Indians named Huxsa alias Crooked Legs, and Wagena alias One Road, were indicted in the United States Court held at Yankton for the murder of a Ponca Indian on the Ponca reservation which was then in the territory and a part of the Second Judicial District. The case came on for trial at the April term of the court, 1875, Judge Peter C. Shannon, presiding. Phil Faulk and Oliver Shannon defended the accused, and when the case was called they moved the court to quash the indictment on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction and ought not to take cognizance of the offense because the "crimes committed by one Indian against the person and property of another Indian are not triable by this court." Judge Shannon allowed the motion, the indictment was quashed, and the Indians discharged. As the United States District courts of Dakota had jurisdiction of all offenses committed in the Indian country, the decision of the court was regarded as virtually deciding that there was no federal law under which an Indian could be punished for offenses against his red brother.

A number of Indian delegations from Dakota visited Washington during the summer of 1870, the Government providing for these visits with a view of influencing the red man to preserve peace and persevere in his efforts to become civilized, industrious, and live like white people, and also with a purpose of defeating the effort to transfer the control of the Indian to the war department. Nearly all the tribes of the Sioux were represented in these visits, though not all at the same time. A delegation of chiefs and leaders composed of Sans Arcs, Two Kettles, and Minneconjoux, had an interview with General Parker, commissioner of Indian affairs, that became quite notable. Grant was President. Parker, who was a full-blooded Oneida Indian, but a well-trained citizen in manners, education and mode of living, had been given this position as a testimonial of good will toward his race, on the part of the Government, and under an impression that he would be able to forward the peace policy with less difficulty than would a white commissioner.

In one of his interviews with his Indian visitors, Parker asked "Little Swan," a Sans Arc chief, whether his chiefs and young braves would agree with him as to peace and have good hearts. The chief replied that he had visited Congress and found the members there disagreeing. "It was the same way," he said, "with his people at home." The question was then asked whether "his people had gone out this summer to hunt or to commit depredations?" The chief replied, "They did not intend to go out for a war, but I suppose they will war while they are out." Parker asked him "how he became a great chief?" Swan replied, "By deeds in battle." A military officer standing by suggested, "By killing people?" "Yes," replied Swan, "the same as the Great Father in the white house."

CHRISTIANITY AMONG THE INDIANS AND MISCELLANY CONCERNING THEM

To the teachings and good influences of Christianity must be ascribed the most powerful factor in humanizing and elevating the Indian character during the centuries of his intercourse with the white race. Its teachings once imbedded in his conscience have in many individual cases wrought the change in his life we denominate "conversion," and which has in due course transformed him from a pagan savage to a sincere Christian. The progress, however slow, has been sure, and the Christian principles instilled by the missionary have found a lodgment in many a red man's breast and become the rule of his or her life.

The religious instruction which the great body of Indians has received through the efforts of the religious denominations has had such a beneficial influence upon their character and lives, that the efforts put forth by the Government to teach them the industrial arts and customs of civilization have been beneficially promoted and greatly simplified because of the earlier religious preparation of the soil.

A number of the religious denominations of the United States, at their own request, had been given practical control of the care and education of the reservation Indians of the nation for several years following the inauguration of President Grant in 1869. The important agencies in Dakota Territory were placed under charge of the Protestant Episcopal Church denomination. These included a number of the tribes and possibly all of the peaceable Sioux Indians. The Indians at Whetstone were under the chieftainship of the renowned Spotted Tail, who figured as the leader among the peaceful Sioux for more than a score of years.

During the spring of 1871, the Episcopal bishop of Nebraska and Dakota, Rev. W. H. Clarkson, of Omaha, visited several agencies, holding councils with the Indians, pointing out to them the advantages of a civilized life, and instructing them in the Christian faith. A very interesting affair was the visit of this greatly beloved church dignitary to the Ponca Agency in 1871, where a large number of the Indians were assembled to greet him and listen to his words of counsel and instruction. The bishop held a convocation, and through an interpreter addressed the Indians, advising them to abandon their barbarous customs and heathenish superstitions, embrace the virtue of the Christian religion, and adopt the customs, modes of living and industries of the white people. At the conclusion of the bishop's talk he was replied to by a number of the leading braves present, all of whom seemed interested in contemplating their future career brightened by the many advantages and comforts which would come to them through such a changed mode of life as the bishop had presented to them.

The Indians who spoke were known among the whites as "White Eagle," "Standing Buffalo," "Lone Chief," and "Standing Bear." All expressed themselves much gratified with the bishop's words, and gave him a most cordial greeting in the Indian fashion.

"White Eagle" said that they all believed there were two roads through life, the one traveled by their own people, and the other by the whites. They believed the white man's road was much smoother and easier than their own, and they would all gladly exchange their own rough and rugged way for that of the whites, but did not know how.

If some one would lead us we would follow in the trail; but we do not know how to get over into the white man's road without a leader. The roads are wide apart and there is no road by which they are connected. Give us some one to mark out the trail and we will follow. On one side we see the whites, on the other the blacks, and we claim the Indian is between the two—but we believe all are equal—the same God made us all.

"Lone Chief" said that he was old and might never reap the benefits that would come from a Christian life, but his children would be able to derive all the advantages, and the day might come when some of his descendants would stand where the bishop was standing and teach Christian ways to his brother Indians.

At the conclusion of the speaking the bishop assured the Indians that he would provide a leader for them who would lead them across from the Indian trail to the white man's trail; that he would also build them a church building without expense to them; that good people toward the rising sun, who had kind hearts for the Indian, would bear all the cost. In closing, the Indians were informed that it was customary among good white people upon such occasions to invoke the divine blessing upon their work. The bishop and the whites present then knelt in prayer, but the red people, not having been instructed, remained seated, preserving a reverent silence.

While these Poncas for a time fulfilled the promise of their spokesman, they were not given all the assistance and careful environment that was bestowed upon the Yanktons and Santees. They constituted but a small, unimportant nor influential tribe. They were located to the Omaha reservation in Nebraska above the city of that name.

In view of what the religious denominations have been doing in civilizing and christianizing the Santees and Yanktons, whose regeneration was undertaken about the same time by a settled and well-sustained policy, and by the same organizations, it is fair to believe that had the Poncas been kept by themselves and not subjected to certain vicious influences which surrounded them after their removal, their descendants would now have been enjoying the same degree of enlightenment and prosperity which has come to the other tribes mentioned.

Christianity among the Indians is very much like Christianity among the white people. There are many instances cited upon unquestionable authority of Indians who have been enabled to comprehend what a true Christian life is, and have faithfully followed it, and the claim is also made on equally good authority that Indians of this type of Christians were never found in hostility to the white people even when the tribes of which they were members were in open warfare; that these Christian Indians were found putting forth their efforts to allay strife; succoring those who were in danger; caring for the wounded and suffering, and rescuing prisoners, and other good works of a similar nature. Compared with the whole body of Indians, these Christians among them were not numerous, but possibly their numbers, considering their opportunities, might compare favorably with many civilized white communities.

There are also thousands of Indians who, while they have a high regard for the white missionary, and gather together in large numbers to hear them and apparently listen patiently to their teachings are not so much impressed and influenced by it as to bring about any remarkable change in their lives and conduct. They tacitly consent to the truths which the missionary explains to them, but apparently fail to comprehend or accept them as a rule of conduct in their own lives. In this respect are they very unlike the majority of pale faces that make up many of our civilized communities? It would seem that the Christian Spirit, that which was exemplified by the Good Samaritan, is no respecter of civilization or of color, but that it finds a congenial home in the breast of the untutored Indian, and leads him to the performance of good works and a blameless life, just as it does his pale faced brother and sister, whose Christianity is exemplified by good works without ostentation.

Christian missionaries of the white race have been zealously at work among the Indians of our country from the time when Columbus planted the sacred emblem of the Christian faith upon the soil of San Salvador. History recounts the zealous, unselfish, and self-sacrificing labors of these heroes of the Christian faith who have devoted their lives to teaching the great truths of Christ's gospel to these people, and the historic pages that tell of their valor, their privations and sufferings, and the multitude of their good works, are the brightest and most treasured legacy bequeathed to the great Republic by the pathfinders. Their achievements are among the most treasured in the chronicles of the world's progress in civilization and christianization.

Dakota Territory, centuries before that name was bestowed upon it, was the field in which these pioneers of the cross found abundant employment. It appears that among the first, if not the first, and possibly the first civilized whites to visit this section, were the Jesuit missionaries of France and Canada, who had journeyed through many and arduous difficulties and privations to reach and redeem a benighted and barbarous people.

Father St. Jacques, for whom the James River was named, is credited with being one of the earliest missionaries in the southern portion of the territory known as Dakota. He was a French missionary of the Roman Catholic Church, as were nearly all the missionaries who came among the Indians of this portion of the Northwest following the establishment of the Hudson's Bay Company in the Winnipeg and Red River country in 1740 though Father St. Jacques's labors were in the Big Sioux and Red River valleys largely. These missionaries were not all of the Society of Jesuits, but belonged in every instance to Catholic orders, St. Francis being one, and the Society of Oblates of St.

Mary Immaculate, another. The Society of Oblates conducted the cathedral, convent and college at St. Boniface, Can., in 1684 and later, sending out missionaries to the Indian tribes inhabiting that portion of the Northwest.

The fur trading interest demanded the construction of substantial forts as posts for barter and storage along the Red River and its tributaries, particularly the Pembina River, which runs near to and nearly parallel to the international boundary line. Posts were also erected on the Missouri River, and some of its tributaries, and many of these posts became the center of a mission, where the missionary would make his headquarters when not absent in his field of labor.

Selkirk, though a Protestant, sought every opportunity to assist the missionaries and used his influence to secure those of the Roman Catholic faith to work among the people of his settlement in the Pembina country. Among the names of the pioneer clergy of the last century to the northern portion of Dakota we find Father Tabeau, a Canadian; Father Provencher, and Father Dumoulin, both Canadians.

FATHER DESMET

In 1830 the Rev. Father DeSmet began his labors among the Mandans and other tribes of the Upper Missouri. DeSmet belonged to the Jesuits, otherwise known as the Society of Jesus.

Rev. Peter Johann DeSmet has linked his name most worthily with the work of civilizing and Christianizing the savage nations of the Upper Missouri. While other missionaries as faithful and devoted preceded him by many scores of years, he came upon the field at a time just anterior to the great wave of emigration which swept across the Mississippi, and has largely covered the great plains between the Father of Waters and the Rocky Mountains. His mission began when there were no white settlers west of the Missouri and north of the Platte, and few north of the Kaw. He was quite well known, personally, to many of the early settlers of Dakota Territory, and more intimately by such pioneers as Todd, Galpin and Culbertson, who held him in high esteem.

Among the Dakota Indians he won his way to a position of commanding influence not alone as a Christian missionary but as a most valuable counsellor and devoted friend. His observations taught him, aside from his evangelical work, that the Indians were, in most cases, "more sinned against than sinning," and he exerted himself to improve the methods which governed the intercourse of the Government and the whites with the savages. There is no doubt that through his instrumentality the Indian policy of the Government took on a more useful and humane character because of his earnest and unselfish efforts. In this way, and by exhibiting to his savage charge the nobleness of his character, he accomplished much for the race. He performed the most difficult task of smoothing the way for his successors; removed many of the prejudices held by the Indians against the white race generally. So highly was he regarded by them and with such affection, that violence was never offered him, though accustomed to journey freely and alone through the Indian country, visiting the people in their villages, camping with them on the chase, and not infrequently becoming, though not intentionally, the honored guest of a war party. His rare intelligence, industry and unselfish devotion, combined with his most meticulous piety and lofty mission, enabled him to discern more closely and accurately the Indian character than many others who had expended almost a lifetime among them, and he finally became the repository of many of their most important confidences. He was acquainted with the secret of the gold deposits in the Black Hills for many years, but did not divulge the matter, apprehensive that it would at the time work more harm than good.

DeSmet was a man of rare courage, coupled with his sublime faith, which he displayed in efforts to assist his fellowmen when they were most in need, seldom being called upon to protect or defend himself, relying confidently upon the protection of his Divine Master, whom he zealously served. In illustration of his exalted heroism, and that he had learned the lesson of the Good Samaritan, it is authentically related that during a voyage up the Missouri River in 1851, upon which occasion he was accompanied by Father Hoecken, the cholera appeared among the passengers and crew, who were very numerous, numbering nearly one hundred, made up largely of persons who were employed or were to be employed at the different trading stations along the river. Within a brief time the contagion spread until nearly one-half the people aboard were ill with it. Father DeSmet, who studied medicine as an aid to him in his missionary work among the savage people, he and Father Hoecken exerted themselves in caring for and administering to the sick, until the latter was stricken and died. DeSmet was attacked but recovered, and rendered of great service in nursing his fellow passengers who had been unable to resist the disease. There were nineteen fatal cases before the contagion had spent its force, which was the boat had reached what is now Dakota. There was a terrible scourge of smallpox among the Sioux the same year, and it was estimated that over one thousand Indians died of it. DeSmet gave himself up to caring for the stricken savages, though himself a partial invalid from the effects of his contest with the cholera.

At the time of Harney's expedition in 1855 Father DeSmet was appointed chaplain, and accompanied the expedition for a time, but did not continue with it in its march to Fort Pierre.

He was born at Dendermonde, in Belgium, January 31st, 1801, and died at Florissant, near St. Louis, in May, 1873. He came to America at the age of 21.

He was educated partly in Belgium, in Maryland, and at Florissant, near St. Louis, at which place he arrived in 1823. After spending several years as a teacher in the Catholic schools of St. Louis he was sent as a missionary to the Pottawatomies and Kickapoos, then living near Council Bluffs, Iowa, and here commenced his long career among the Indians, the most remarkable and successful of any missionary of the nineteenth century. In 1841 he was sent west of the Rocky Mountains, among the Flatheads and other western tribes, starting from where Kansas City now stands, with the annual expedition of the American Fur Company, and until within a year of his death his labors were continuous. In the prosecution of his work he made seven different voyages to Europe in aid of contributions for the missionary work. On one of these trips he chartered a vessel, loaded it with his contributions and brought them by way of Cape Horn to the mouth of the Columbia River. His labors were mainly with the Shoshones, Blackfeet, Flatheads, Mandans, Pawnees, Pottawatomies, Sampeetches, Pen d'Oreilles, and affiliated tribes.

He published several works on Indian missions, among them: "Western Missions and Missionaries;" "Oregon Missions," and "Letters and Sketches." On his last trip to Belgium he was made a Knight of the Order of Leopold, by the hands of Leopold II, as a recognition of his great merits. For some years prior to his decease he held the position of treasurer of the province, which includes all of the Jesuit houses from the Alleghenies to the Rocky Mountains.

He never sought the aid of either military or commercial interests in his work, but alone he traveled over the whole Indian country, with nothing but the word of God in his hand, and his black gown the only badge of his office, and it was by this name, "Black Gown," that he was known all over the Indian country. He possessed a charming simplicity of character, united to a resolution that was indomitable. He was also a man of remarkable physical strength and endurance, and had it not been for an accident on shipboard during his last trip to Europe by which he had three ribs broken and received internal injuries, he might have had his life prolonged for a score of years longer.

DeSmet was a man of diversified scientific knowledge; but his specialty was botany. He was a good topographical engineer and draughtsman, and there are many of his maps and surveys of the Rocky Mountains and Oregon which he made in the establishment of missions, that are considered authentic and of great value.

He was buried in the cemetery of St. Stanislaus, at Florissant, where fifty years before he felled trees to erect the log houses of the novitiate. He was said to be the last of his order of the Jesuits in North America, all of whom became distinguished for their Christian zeal and wanderings among the savage tribes of the West. The rapid extension of settlement and the construction of railways has changed the character of their work as well as Indians themselves. Like the hunters, trappers and voyagers, the missionary as he was known in early times, has disappeared, and with him has gone the romance and poetry of life and adventure among the aboriginal races.

By the writer of the foregoing biographical sketch, who knew DeSmet, and was familiar with his life, it is claimed that in the long list of Jesuit Fathers who have left the impress of their work and history upon the annals of the West, the name of Father DeSmet will stand out as one of the purest, most zealous, self-sacrificing and disinterested among them all. He was beloved and trusted, and respected by the Indian, the trader, the trapper, the soldier, the emigrant, the Catholic, the Protestant; and has passed away with only the blessings of all to follow him. He was simply and only a Christian.

Father George Anthony De Balcourt began his labors in the Red River Valley as early as 1830; he was a native of Canada, and later in 1846 settled on the Pembina River, built a chapel and convent, set up a grist-mill and a portable saw-mill. He called his settlement St. Joseph. He also built a chapel north of Pembina Village. The inhabitants of the country during Balcourt's mission were largely French mixed-bloods and Indians who had learned the French language. Balcourt proved to be a very useful man in various matters; of great enterprise and courage, and withal a zealous missionary. He became a naturalized citizen of the United States, and placed himself on record as a very zealous friend of the people on the American side of the boundary in the Red River country. In 1854 because of repeated aggressions of British subjects and the Hudson's Bay Company upon the persons and property of the people on the American side who were, in their church associations, under the charge of Father Balcourt, the reverend missionary was sent as a delegate to Washington for the purpose of laying before the President the grievances of his people. Arriving at the capital, he was requested to reduce his complaint to writing, which he did, stating:

They (his people) complain against the Hudson's Bay Company and the British subjects, who come two or three times a year over the line, being four or five weeks at each time, hunting about on the Indians' hunting ground, to the great detriment of the Indians, particularly in the fall. When the Indians have made a choice of winter quarters, from the appearance of buffaloes being abundant, then the British half-breeds would come, hunt, load their carts, and set to flight all the buffaloes, leaving behind them our Indians in starvation and despair. Now, for my part, I will complain in the name of philanthropy of this inhuman traffic in intoxicating liquors of the Hudson's Bay Company. Our laws in regard to liquors not to be introduced on Indian lands are well observed on the part of our traders among the Pembina Indians, but the importation of rectified spirits by the Hudson's Bay Company this year is one-third of their whole importation. This rum is to be sold by their emissaries to our Indians whenever they find them over the line; by this way of conduct impoverishing and demoralizing our Indians, frustrating our traders of the produce of our country, and rendering useless the philanthropic laws that the wisdom of our Government has enacted for the welfare of our Indians. Nothing but an agreement between the two governments could ever put a stop to that ever-cursed branch of commerce. For the sake of humanity do use your credit to shut the door of misery and hell.

Moreover, as commissioned by the half-breeds of the Pembina country, numbering over two thousand, I have to humbly represent that being American citizens and so recognized in our territory, we invoke the protection of the Government against the encroachments of the Hudson's Bay Company and British subjects on our territory. We earnestly appeal to that part of the Constitution that gives to every citizen the privilege of being protected against the encroachments or the insults of the strong.

This counsel with the authorities had a beneficial effect and there was less complaint from these grievances and less cause for complaint from that time. Balcourt died in New Brunswick in 1874, having retired from the work in Northern Dakota about 1860, serving thereafter in the province of Quebec. His evangelical labors, however, had been wisely done and their beneficial influence was permanent, as those who came after him gladly testified.

Father Revoux and Father Thinbault were also foremost and zealous in the work. Father Martin Marty, who became an early bishop of the Diocese of Southern Dakota, served as a missionary among the Indians of the North, beginning as early as 1845. Marty was contemporary with Father John DeSmet.

Father Jean Baptiste Marie Genin was another Catholic missionary of great zeal, courage and enterprise, equalling Balcourt in his industry and success among the pagan people who were in his field of labor. Genin was a native of old France and came into the mission field of the northern part of the Territory of Dakota about 1860. He was successfully identified with the work through all the troublous years of the Indian wars beginning in 1862 with the Little Crow outbreak, and used his best efforts to restore peace between the Government and its recalcitrant subjects; while he possessed the confidence of the Indians, who recognized in him a faithful friend, he was unable to bring the Indians to realize that the whites were disposed to treat them fairly, they holding up the broken treaty pledges and the dishonesty of Government officials, as evidence of the wrongs they had suffered. Genin realized, as did many other prominent clergymen, that the Indians had good ground for complaint, and in some instances had almost been goaded into hostilities, but he also realized that the only safe and sensible course for the Indians to pursue was to seek redress through peaceful channels, because war inevitably brought him into condition much worse than those from which he would try to extricate himself by a show of force and such barbarous and cruel practices as accompanied an Indian insurrection.

Concerning the Christian Indians who were members of the tribes engaged in the Little Crow hostilities of 1862, in Minnesota, there exists a statement to the by Rev. John P. Williamson, a Presbyterian missionary, who at that time with Rev. S. R. Riggs, both for two score years since conducting Christian missions at the Santee Agency, opposite Springfield, Dakota, and at the agency of the Yankton Indians, was living at Yellow Medicine Agency or on the Yellow Medicine Reserve, in Minnesota, and had charge of the religious instruction of the Sioux engaged in that insurrection.

There were 4,000 Sissetons and Wahpetons on the Yellow Medicine Reserve, and there were also about twenty-four hundred Mdewakantons and Wahpekatus who, at the time of the massacre, had their agency at Redwood. Their principal chiefs were Little Crow, Little Six, Mankato, Wabashaw, Wakute, and Red Legs. It was the Mdewakantons who commenced the massacre. There were but few Christian Indians at that time. Not half a dozen among the Redwood Indians, and not over a score among the Yellow Medicines were members of the church. I have not seen the evidence that one of these was connected with the massacre.

Subsequently Reverend Williamson stated:

I have seen the evidence that a large number of them were very actively engaged in their efforts to befriend the whites. Taopi, Good Thunder, and Napesin, the most active friends of the whites among the Redwood Indians, were the Christian men of that tribe. And among the Yellow Medicine Indians, Otherday is noted as having rescued a party of over sixty. Caske Hopkins and Big Fire aided another party of over forty in their escape. Lorenzo rescued two captive families and led them for days through hostile ground until he reached our lines. Simon recovered a captive woman and children and took them fifty miles to Fort Ridgeley, at great peril. Paul, in the face of the death penalty, rose in public council and pleaded the cause of the whites.

These were prominent members of the church at Yellow Medicine. As all of these tribes had been removed to Dakota, some of them to reservations where they were being taught the arts of civilization, while others were in the hostile force that was led by Sitting Bull in the far North, the statement of the reverend missionary was made partly with the view of showing that the tribes occupying reservations in proximity to the settlements were of the better sort of Indians and not at all inclined to insurrection. Reverends Williamson and Riggs worked under the auspices of the Presbyterian Missionary Society.

The Catholics were in the majority in the settlements on Red River country which were located principally on the Pembina River. Rev. Father Balcourt estimated that the Selkirk colony consisted of about seven thousand souls, probably nine-tenths of them partly Indian, and that they were divided among religious denominations in the proportion of a little more than one-half of the whole number Roman Catholics; the remaining nearly one-half, divided between the Church of England (Episcopal), Presbyterians and Methodists.

Among the Sioux Indians west of the Missouri River, the Roman Catholics appeared to be most in favor, if one is permitted to judge this preference from the frequent expressions and requests of the leading chieftains, nearly all of whom who spoke of the matter requesting that Catholic missionaries be sent to them.

The Sioux east of the Missouri, including the Santees, Yanktons and Sissetons were favorably inclined toward the Presbyterians.

The Catholics, however, had gained an ascendancy with the red people of the generation existing during Dakota's early territorial days through the labors of such zealous priests as DeSmet, Marty, Balcourt, and probably Genin, and many less distinguished, who appeared to push their missionary work with unflagging industry, tireless in their adventures from tribe to tribe and village to village. They were, moreover, friends of the savage in every commendable way, acting as physician, for the body as well as the soul, always counseling peace, and interceding with the Government at times for leniency toward the warlike but penitent. The Catholics were sincere advocates of the peace policy when counseling the Indians, illustrating before them in every way that would appeal to their understanding, how they were always the losers by hostilities, and gainers by remaining at peace.

The Indian in his wild, untutored state appears to have an intelligent conception of a Great Spirit—a Supreme being, and a future home which he calls the Happy Hunting Ground, to which he will journey when he dies. He must therefore have a belief in the immortality of his spirit. And it would seem from the aggregate of his religious beliefs in a future, that he has received them from an ancestry who had a clearer and more perfect conception of the future life as Christians view it, than is now found among the unenlightened aboriginal peoples. This leads to connecting the race, at some early period of the world's history, before it found its way to this continent, with a higher civilization and enlightenment.

In the following sketches from the real life of the native American Indian, he is shown as having a religious side, and the interesting statement of Spotted Tail's theology exhibits him as something of a profound student of theological subjects. When the question is asked, how can a human being having any regard for a humane religion be guilty of the atrocities committed by Indians upon helpless whites in war or when out on their predatory excursions? It can be answered, as the Indian views it that these inhuman butcheries of the whites are not wrong, and no more do the whites regard as wrong the inhuman cruelties practiced in emergencies by whites upon brother whites. Spotted Tail's statement of his religious belief, herewith given, indicates that he does not regard the killing of a white person by an Indian as wrong.

SPOTTED TAIL'S THEOLOGY

The famous Indian chief, Spotted Tail, grand sachem of the Oglala Sioux, and together with Red Cloud of the Brules, the most influential Indians and chieftains among the Sioux, had a theology somewhat original and indicated that he had given considerable thought to religious matters. He was induced to state his belief during the trying times which accompanied the negotiations preliminary to opening the Black Hills and the removal of the Sioux to the Indian Territory was being discussed by both the Indians and the Great Father and his advisers at Washington. Through an interpreter of his own choosing, he said:

Most Indians believe in the Great Spirit—in a heaven and in a Hell. But some are unbelievers, and think that when they die they are no more, just like the dog and the horse. There are but two worlds—the one in which we live, and that one where the Great Spirit dwells. The Spirit World is more than ten thousand times larger than this, its hunting fields have no end, and the game there is inexhaustible. Its flowers are more beautiful and fragrant than any we have ever known, and its maidens are as lovely as the clouds of the clouds before a setting sun, and never grow old. The land does not have to be cultivated there; but every kind of good fruit, and in the greatest abundance, hangs from the trees and vines, waiting to be plucked. Nothing ever dies there, and the wants of all who go there are constantly and forever supplied without the necessity of any work. All good men, whether they are white or red, go to heaven; but a great difference will exist between the conditions of the races of men and individuals there and what they are here. Everything nearly will be reversed. The wealthy here will be poor there, the powerful and great here, will be humble there. The Indians who have been empowered by the intelligence and skill of the white man here, will have a better of me there. Everything which has been taken from them here will be given to them there. Here the Great Spirit has been on the white man's side; there He will lean to the cause of the Indian, and then we will fight it out, and we will not be driven from our hunting grounds like the snake and the wolf. Then bad men of all nations will go down into the center of the earth and be excluded from the Spirit Land.

Here the speaker was interrupted by one of his listeners, who remarked: "You say that when your people die, they rot like the horse and dog, and their bodies are scattered on the earth, the air and water. How is it that you are to get to the Spirit Land and live? Nothing there as individuals very much after the same manner that you do here?" To which the chief replied:

"We go there as spirits, and there get new bodies, which the white man cannot do."

The chief was then asked if he had not heard through the missionaries of Jesus Christ, the son of the Great Spirit? to which he answered:

Yes, I have heard all about Him; how good He was; what great things He did; how He would help the bad man to be good; how He would lead all who would listen to Him to the Great Spirit, His Father; and I have also heard how the white man killed Him. The Indian never would have done that; he never would have murdered the Son of the Great Spirit. He would rather have loved Him better than his own life; would have given Him anything and all he had, and for Him would have gone upon the warpath and conquered the world. It was for a long time after I first heard about Jesus Christ, that I did not understand how the white man could have killed Him; but when I got better acquainted with the whites, when I realized the fact that they had no respect for the rights of the Indian; would take away his home where he was born, murder him and his children, despoil his women, and rob him of his winter's food, I then very readily understood how they would even kill the Son of the Great Spirit, as they did.

TOMAHAWK'S FAITH

General O'Brien, stationed at the Standing Rock Agency, Dakota, in 1876, told an interesting story in relation to an Indian at Standing Rock known as Tomahawk. This Indian became a convert to religion some years ago, and has since lived an exemplary life, guarding with a jealous care, apparently, every thought, as well as word or deed, lest the Great Spirit, being displeased, should refuse to smile upon him. Tomahawk had adopted the arts of peace, was cultivating the land and was getting around him cattle and swine, as well as ponies and children, and was anxious to train the latter up in the ways of the white man, as well as in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Tomahawk had a Bible, which from its worn appearance indicated constant use. On inquiry, it was found that morning, noon and night, this untutored Indian sat down by his fire-side—a comfortable log cabin—and beginning where he left off at a former sitting, traces the lines slowly, as if reading, page after page, and when he gets through turns a leaf, beginning again where he left off. After, in this manner, passing through the Bible, he begins again at the first chapter and again passes through it in the same manner. In explaining why he does this, he said:

This is the Word of the Great Spirit, and when I do this He sees me, and knows I want to read His Word, and it makes me happy; and then, when I go to my work, or out on the hunt, I remember that He is good to me, and it makes me happy to think He will again smile upon me when I return to read His Word, and then I can live in the sunshine of His heart. I want my children to learn to read this book, and then I will have them read it in the white man's tongue, and tell me in Sioux what the Great Spirit says; and it makes me happy to think this.

Tomahawk, it seemed, though unable to read a word, had found the true secret of happiness—love of God, and confidence in His promises.

The annual meeting of the Dakota Presbytery of Indian Churches was held in 1875, at Santee Agency, Neb., opposite the City of Springfield, Bon Homme County. The meeting began at 6 o'clock P. M., Thursday, June 18th, and held until the following Monday noon. There are nine churches in the Presbytery having an aggregate membership of over eight hundred. One is at the Yankton Agency; one at Santee Agency; one at Flandreau; and the others on the Sisseton and Wahpeton reservation, in the vicinity of Fort Wadsworth on the Coteau des Prairies. All the churches were well represented, there being more than two hundred visiting Indians. These churches are all under the supervision of native pastors, and they were all present but one; who was too busy building a church to allow him to be present. The elders and deacons of the churches were also present, as well as several teachers in the various schools. During the sessions various questions of interest were discussed in a very intelligent manner. The subjects were the same that interest members of churches of the whites, such as "How Best to Keep the Sabbath," "The Sanctity of the Marriage Relation," "The Best Way to Carry on Missionary Work Among Those Who Have Not Heard the Gospel." No fair-minded white person could have witnessed the proceedings of these meetings without imbibing a very favorable impression regarding the capacity of the Indian for civilization and christianization. Twelve years ago nearly all these people were in Minnesota, and many of them may have participated in the Little Crow massacre of that time. They are now, to all appearances, safely on the road to become useful citizens of the United States, and possibly as good citizens as the average of their white brothers.

The Congregational Association of Dakota was held in the Indian Church at Santee Agency, Nebraska, in 1873, as a compliment to Rev. A. L. Riggs, who was a Dakotan as well as a Nebraskan. Rev. Joseph Ward represented the mother church of Yankton. The proceedings and services were conducted partly in the Indian language and as the Indians who attended formed the greater part of the assemblage, there was much of interest in the conference for the pale faces. The Indians sang a number of hymns which had been popular in the church for half a century and had been translated by Mr. Riggs, and there was more expression and spirit and voice in their singing than would be found in an exclusively white gathering. There was an earnestness about everything in which the savages took part. A large number of Indian children were brought to the altar and consecrated to God in baptism; the Sacrament of the Communion was also celebrated in which the Indian participants were surprisingly numerous.

A CUSTER INCIDENT

General Custer related this incident which occurred during his Black Hills expedition in 1874.

It was during one of our resting days in camp. I was seated alone in my tent, when suddenly, as if from the rocks and forest of that beautiful region, I heard the familiar "Old Hundred" burst forth from a score or more of manly voices. Then followed the equally familiar hymn, "Rock of Ages," and others not less known. Cavalrymen are not noted for their hymn-singing qualities, and I slipped outside my tent to discover from whom this music came. It was from a group of Santee young men, my scouts, and I shall long remember the pleasing effect produced by hearing these good old hymns sung, as I then heard them, by men, or the sons of men, who but a few years ago roamed over this country in a state of barbarous wildness. So much for the labors of Christianity and civilization.

Rev. Joseph W. Cook, of the Yankton Agency, in February, 1876, wrote:

Yesterday I received the chief, Medicine Cow, into the church by baptism. Black Eagle, another chief, rode fifteen miles through a snow storm to be present at the ceremony. Henry Swan, also a chief, rode six miles for the same purpose. Five out of eight Yankton chiefs are now members of the church, and Mad Bull, who died three years ago, was a member.

It is related by R. S. Alexander, of Dell Rapids, that in 1872 quite a number of Indians visited that frontier hamlet with furs to barter for supplies. Alexander had the privilege of singing Old Hundred with two of them accompanied on the piano by Mrs. William VanEpps. The Indians sang out of their own hymn book and Alexander used an English version. The Indians sang well and the two languages harmonized quite well in sound. The Indians sang soprano, but were not aware of it, Alexander sang bass, and Mrs. VanEpps, alto. Mr. Alexander would run over an old tune, and the Indians would soon turn to the hymn in their book which they sang to that tune. The music was continued for some time, but did not exhaust the repertoire of the red people, who came into Dell Rapids with a fine yoke of cattle and a large sled; the sled being one of their own manufacture, somewhat rough but strong and serviceable.

DOCTOR WARD'S REPORT ON DAKOTA MISSIONS

The American Board of Domestic Missions held their annual meeting in Milwaukee in October, 1878. Rev. Joseph Ward, pastor of the United tional Church, of Yankton, submitted the report on Dakota missions, which appeared to elicit more interest than any other topic presented for the consideration of the board. The report was made on the authority of a committee to which the Dakota missions had been committed, and as it incited a spirited debate was recommended without definite action.

The report stated:

The work in Dakota has been progressing with a gratifying proof of the power of the gospel to regenerate the wildest Indian. The committee rejoices at the translation of the bible into the Dakota Indian language, and wish to bring before the members of the churches points which should be kept continually in mind. The Indians are not dying out, but increasing, which can be conclusively proven by a single glance. If they are to remain among us and form an essential part of our national life, it becomes necessary to adopt plans, not only to work harmoniously for the present but to look far into the future. Christian people have no longer the right to cherish the hope that the Indian question is going to be settled by visitation by God, or through the agency of disease. We will not believe they ever felt it should be settled by extermination. The policy of massing the Indians in great numbers by gathering them into the Indian Territory, and a few large reservations, is fatal to true progress. It sounds plausible, but if it were possible, it is not right. It cannot be done without disregarding the rights of every tribe. Two things urge the adoption of the plan, the greed of the white man for Indian lands, and the half sentimental way of looking at the question held by too many good people. It is a dream of many to find a wholesale way of Christianizing the Indian. It is a beautiful theory to let the job by contract in a lot, and have them away from us by themselves. We must not forget our children's interest in this land, with Indians, Germans, Irishmen, Scandinavians, Chinamen, etc. Since they are to remain and form a part of the nation, the sooner legislation recognizes and conforms to this fact the better for them and us. We should do all in our power to secure proper legislation, so that the Indians everywhere shall have the privilege of taking and holding public lands like other citizens. They should be placed under the same laws that protect us, and punished the same as the whites.

It is to be regretted if any religious body felt that it had the exclusive right to give missionary instruction. As the American missionaries furnished the true solution of the eastern question, so the missionaries of this board wrought the solution of the Indian question. This country applied the gospel faithfully and the gospel solved it. If the Indian can't be saved we are all lost. Now is the time to press forward, because if we do not lift the Indian up, with citizenship, he will be dragged down into barbarism. Their treatment is the loadstone of national honor. Greater work can be done than in Turkey.

The memorial of the Dakota Mission, submitted by Doctor Ward, asked the board to testify against any monopoly of missionary rights established by civil authority, favoring some and excluding others from certain fields.

Second—While we recognize the advantages that have resulted to the Indian service from the plan of giving to religious bodies the selection of Indian agents, we are constrained to say it should be abandoned. Its special usefulness is now past, and its continuance is to risk odium and damage to the Christian church, entailing political responsibility, which is burdensome and dangerous and not in accord with the genius of our Constitution.

Third—The true civil as well as spiritual regeneration of the Indian tribes is by the power of the gospel, and now is the time to push forward mission work among them.

CHAPTER LXI

COST OF WAR AND PEACE COMPARED

SECRETARY DELANO EXPLAINS PEACE POLICY—GENERAL SHERIDAN IN 1874—GENERAL SHERMAN'S VIEWS—COST OF WAR COMPARED WITH COST OF PEACE—WITHDRAWING PUBLIC LAND FROM MARKET TO PROTECT THE SIOUX AND RESTORING IT.

In 1873 a formal statement was made by the secretary of the interior in explanation of the plan, purpose and scope of what had become known as the Peace Policy. There was considerable agitation throughout the country regarding the opening of the Black Hills. The pressure for the transfer of the Indian bureau to the war department was most acute; and the secretary explains, as his purpose in making the statement, that "the public mind is sought to be confused by criticism and misrepresentation as to the real purpose animating the Government in its course toward the Indian tribes," hence he deems it best to present the Government's position, as follows (Mr. Columbus Delano was then secretary of the interior):

First—The "Peace Policy" proposed to place the Indians upon reservations as rapidly as possible, where they can be provided for in such manner as the dictates of humanity and Christian civilization require. Being thus placed upon reservations, they will be removed from such contiguity to our frontier settlements as otherwise will lead necessarily to frequent outrages, wrongs, and disturbances of the public peace. On these reservations they can be taught, as fast as possible, the arts of agriculture and such pursuits as are incident to civilization, through the aid of the Christian organizations of the country now engaged in this work, acting in harmony with the Federal Government. Their intellectual, moral and religious culture can be prosecuted, and thus it is hoped that humanity and kindness may take the place of barbarity and cruelty. If a majority of the people of the United States prefer extermination to the course here indicated, and desire to see all the horrors and bloodshed and loss of life among both whites and Indians incident to the policy of extermination, then it is well enough to denounce in vague and general, if not unmeaning terms, the "Quaker Policy."

Second—Whenever it shall be found that any tribe or band of Indians persistently refuse to go upon a reservation, and determine to continue their nomadic habits, accompanied with depredations and outrages upon our frontier settlements, then it is the policy of the President to treat such band or tribe with all the military force at his disposal, according to their outrages according to their merits, and then to place them upon a reservation. If, by the advice of the Government and go upon reservations, and begin to develop, and then continue the native habits and practices. The agent in charge of the Mission would report to the Government an example for the treatment of such tribes and bands, and would accept the benevolent purposes of what is termed the "Quaker Policy." There can be some so impressed with the necessity of non-resistance, as to object to the removal of Indians under the circumstances last referred to. If there be any such, they will be fully assured, have no opportunity for complaining, because the policy is not peaceable enough.

Third—It is the determination of this policy to send all supplies, of every kind and nature, whether for food or clothing, purchased for the Indians, to some one place, where they remain at peace, are procured at fair and reasonable prices, so that the Indians need not, these supplies may receive the same without having the funds of the Government squandered in their purchase. If there be any whose vocation may be interrupted by being deprived of the profits which speculation or speculation may lay, heretofore afforded in the purchase for Indians, such persons will find abundant reason to complain, because the "Peace Policy" deprives them of the opportunity of gains and profits heretofore only found in business.

Fourth—It is the purpose of the Government, as fast as possible, through the influence of humanity and by the advice of the religious organizations, and by all other means within its power, to procure competent, upright, faithful, moral and religious agents, to care for the Indians that go upon reservations, to distribute the goods and provisions that are purchased for them by the benevolence of the Government, to aid in their intellectual, moral and religious culture, and thus to assist in the great work of humanity and benevolence which the peace policy means. If there be any who are thus deprived of Government positions and office that have hitherto afforded large profit without labor, and without merit, and who are to be prevented in the future from defrauding Indians for their own personal gain, those persons may complain of the Quaker policy and demand extermination.

Fifth—It is the purpose of the peace policy to establish schools, and through the instrumentality of the Christian organizations, acting in harmony with the Government, as fast as possible to build churches and organize Sabbath schools, whereby these savages may be taught a better way of life than they have heretofore pursued, and be made to understand the comforts and benefits of a Christian civilization, and thus be prepared ultimately to become citizens of this great nation.

These I understand to be the purposes of the President's peace policy, and this seems to be the occasion when it ought to be studied as to be so understood; for I believe that when understood there are few American citizens who will find the heart to condemn it. I also feel at liberty to say that, as here explained, it has the approbation of every member of the President's cabinet, and that the secretary of war and the secretary of the interior will hereafter, as they have heretofore, act in perfect accord and with perfect sincerity in endeavoring fully and completely to carry out and execute this policy.

Very respectfully yours,

C. DELANO.

SHERIDAN'S REPORT

The annual report of Lieut.-Gen. Phil. Sheridan, in 1874 (who had succeeded General Sherman in command of the Department of the Missouri), to the secretary of war, exhibits the situation during the Black Hills excitement as viewed by the second in command of the army establishment. The following excerpt from the report gives the portion only that refers to Dakota matters, and takes up the transfer of the Indian bureau to the war department. The language of the report is characterized by that audacious frankness which was a distinguishing feature in whatever the gallant soldier wrote officially, or uttered in his brief speeches. We quote:

In the Department of Dakota the military have had the double duty of protecting the settlements from the raids of hostile Indians and the Black Hills country from occupation by miners attracted there by real or imaginary mineral wealth in the soil.

I earnestly recommend some action that will permanently settle the Black Hills question and relieve us from an extremely disagreeable and embarrassing duty. I feel quite satisfied that all the countries south of the Yellowstone River, from the Black Hills of the Cheyenne as far west as the Big Horn Valley, and perhaps as far west as Clark's Fork of the Yellowstone, is gold bearing, but as to the amount of gold deposit I cannot say; it may be great or it may be small. This area is also well timbered at many places; has many beautiful valleys of rather high altitude, with good soil and abundance of running water. Nearly the whole of it is well adapted to grazing purposes, the grass being principally bunch grass, with so little rain in the fall and winter as to let the grass cure on the ground and make better hay on the stalk than if cut and cured in the usual manner. The winters are, I have every reason to believe, very cold, but the temperature is uniform; and cold weather is found to be less injurious to stock, where there is no shelter, than a milder climate where the cattle are subjected to the changes of alternate freezing and thawing, and where the rains rot the grass. I make this statement from having studied this country for a long time, and in order that my superiors, who will before long have to deal with the question of the Black Hills, may be able to better appreciate the interests of all concerned, be they white or red.

The Sioux Indians, numbering about twenty-five thousand, now hold this extensive and perhaps very valuable country, and, in addition, the belt eastward from the base of the Black Hills of the Cheyenne to the Missouri River, which would make about ten thousand acres of land for the head of each family, and perhaps much more, without one single acre being cultivated, while the maximum amount given to one adult white settler by the Government is only 160 acres, on which he has to live, build a hut, put up fences, till the ground, and pay taxes. Hence much of the trouble of protecting Indian reservations; the hardy pioneer having very little consideration for the red man, who has so much, and is still so idle and worthless. It would have been better if the Indians had been considered a part of the population of the United States, and dealt with generously, and when forced on reservations, which is always the case, let them be reasonable in size, subject to especial rule and government, until they are fitted to obey the ordinary laws of the country for the control of all our people. But at present we see the ridiculous anomaly of having the most stringent laws, municipal, state and federal, with penalties such as imprisonment in penitentiaries, and even the gallows, for the government of intelligent white people, while we are attempting to govern these poor wild savages without any power over them or any laws at all.

The observation of many years in my own command, and throughout most of the Indian country for the last twenty years, has left the impression that this system of civilizing the wild portion of Indian inhabitants has not met with a success which gives a fair equivalent for the expense, trouble and bloodshed which has attended it. I believe there is true humanity in making the reservations reasonably small, dividing them into tracts for the heads of families, making labor gradually compulsory, and even compelling the children to go to school.

To accomplish this purpose, to civilize, make self-supporting, and save many of these poor people than otherwise will be saved, I believe it best to transfer the Indian bureau to the military, and let it be taken under the general administration of the army, governed and controlled in responsibility of accounting in accordance with our present system. The Indians will thus be humanely and honestly dealt with; and, I believe, if this had always been the case, there would have been but few of the troubles and bloody records which have characterized the civilization of the Indians in many years gone by.

To meet the troubles which will originate from the Black Hills question, and be in advance of them when they come, and be better able to deal with them, I directed, without expense to the Government, an exploration of the Yellowstone River last spring, and selected two sites for military posts, one at the mouth of the Big Horn, the other at the mouth of the Tongue River, both in the Valley of the Yellowstone. These stations can be supplied by steamboats and will have so important a bearing on the settlement of the Sioux Indian question, that I earnestly recommend that Congress be called upon to give authority for their establishment, and the necessary funds for their construction.

P. H. SHERIDAN,

Lieutenant General Commanding Department of Northwest.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S VIEWS

General Sherman, head of the United States army at the time, in one of his annual reports to the secretary of war discussed the Indian question at some length, in which he affirms the theory of the military department:

The peace policy now being pursued by the Government, with every appearance of necessity, could not and would not prosper unless a greater show of force was mingled with the milk of human kindness with which the powers that controlled were endeavoring to tame the untutored savage. Speaking of General Sheridan's command, which included Dakota, the report states that it "embraces a country 1,500 miles long by 1,300 miles broad, and that within the preceding ten years the vast region had undergone a radical change. From being a pasture field for millions of buffalo and other game, affording abundant food for the Indians, it had passed into a farming country traversed by a number of railroads. Game has been driven off and the Indians forced on to small reservations. Nearly all the Indian treaties were made on the theory that this change would occur more slowly and that the Government would have to furnish but partial food for the Indians, who would procure a half or a quarter of their necessary meat by hunting; and it was further urged that the Indian would see for himself why he should cultivate the ground like the white man, but his progress in this respect is hardly perceptible, save in remnants of tribes like the Santees, Pawnees, Cherokees, while the Sioux, Cheyennes and Arapahoes prefer idleness to the common toil of the farmer. It was hunger, the report claimed, which drove the Cheyennes and Bannocks to war the preceding summer, and similar escapades will occur each year unless the Indians are kept quiet with more food. It seems idle to expect that the enterprising white race will cease their encroachments until every foot of land on the continent susceptible of cultivation is reclaimed; and it is not to be expected these pasture fields can be used by the two races without continual conflict. The reservations set apart for the Indians are large enough, and should suffice them to raise all the meat and grain necessary for their subsistence, but in the meantime, unless they are supplied with food, they will steal and fight. To convert these Indians into a pastoral race is the first step in the upward progress of civilization. In this direction is the sole hope of rescuing any part of the nomad Indian from utter annihilation. This end cannot be reached by means of the present policy, agent because persuasion is wasted on an Indian," says the general. "There must not only be a show of force, but actual force and subjection used. Force will be necessary to compel the nomad to cultivate his own ground."

The general had found that there was a wide distinction among the tribes, and that each tribe must be dealt with according to its nature, and that large discretion in the food should be lodged with the President or some other power. "Starvation will come, and the army cannot foresee or prevent these wars. All it can do, after the Indians have come out to plunder or steal and murder harmless families, is to pursue and capture them, and conduct them back to their reservation and turn them loose to return to their old habits."

libitum. "The way to continual peace, the general urged, was through the Indian's stomach; but this would not incline him to habits of industry—force must be added if this was to be brought about."

COST OF PEACE OR WAR POLICY

It was far cheaper to keep peace with the Indians, but whether any policy could have been adopted at a date earlier than recorded, that would have prevented the occasional recurrence of outbreaks among the savages of such a serious nature as to demand the interposition of the army and a campaign of costly war, cannot be freely conceded. The army was the only power that could have brought the Sioux to sue for peace after the Little Crow outbreak in 1862, and the succeeding three years of war. The hostile Indians, brought to the verge of starvation, were glad to invoke the pardon of the Great Father. This they would not have done at the beginning of the outbreak, for that uprising was partially, at least, due to the belief among the Indians that owing to the great Civil war then prevailing, they had an opportunity to strike a blow that would drive the palefaces from the frontier and give the Indians back the lands they had ceded. Neither would the olive branch have been successful if presented to Sitting Bull, the terror of the Yellowstone country for a number of years.

One of the most potent factors in securing a footing for the Peace Policy with the better class, that is the more intelligent, but not therefore peace-loving, was the practical exhaustion of their hunting grounds and the growing scarcity of buffalo and other game upon which they had largely subsisted through many generations. The whites had peopled the land and the locomotive engines with their long trains of cars rumbling through the prairie combined with the shrill screech and whistle of the locomotive, had accomplished a large part in bringing the Indian to realize that if he would exist at all, he must exist as a civilized being.

The question of economy in past management of the Indians must be viewed from both the standpoint of peace and war to get a fair conclusion. There was no just way to measure the cost when a year of war was taken and compared with a year of peace. As a matter of course war was enormously expensive, and unavoidably so, but it was at times necessary in order to subdue the Indians and bring them into subjection, and would have been just as expensive had the campaigns been under control of the interior department. The waste of war is enormous; but a peace commission would probably have lost their scalps had they been sent among the hostiles with their olive branch in 1862, 1863 or 1864, or at any time prior to the complete overthrow of the Indians by the military, and the conviction forced upon them that death by starvation would be their portion if they could not find a way to make peace again with the Great Father. It could be no disparagement of the valuable services rendered by the army to show the excessive cost of a military campaign over that of a year of ordinary peace and quiet. Nevertheless, comparisons, based on the cost of Indian administration were made by those in authority who measured the difference in cost unfairly in endeavoring to draw a parallel between the cost of war compared with that of peace; when to be just, the cost of war should have been added to the cost of peace, for the military campaign had been rendered necessary to subdue the hostility of the Indians which had been aroused and set aflame under the so-called peaceful administration of the department of the interior. A few years of peace was almost certain to be terminated by a war, which was the result of a half dozen causes—Indian depredations; peculations of thieving Government employees; failure to observe treaty stipulations, but seldom could the cause be traced to the door of the army.

The argument of cost was, however, a weighty one, though sometimes considered from an erroneous or unfair point of view. It never failed to suggest itself when the Indian question was considered. The secretary of the interior made use of it in the contest pending for the control of the Indian bureau, when in his report to the President he said:

If I were to waive all inquiry as to the material objections of a Christian nation, under such circumstances, I think it would be demonstrably clear that as a mere question of pecuniary economy it will be cheaper to feed every adult Indian now living, even to sleep, surfeiting, during his natural life, while his children are being educated to self-support by agriculture, than it would be to carry on a general Indian war for a single year. The shocking barbarities and mutilations of dead persons, prisoners, which are often referred to, are the usual accompaniment of Indian warfare. By preserving peace we may hope to avoid them, and I cannot believe it is beyond the wisdom and resources of a great Christian nation like our own to give a peace policy a thorough trial.

A possible wrong impression may be gathered from this comment of the secretary. While the Peace Policy was probably less costly, if undisturbed by war, it should be kept in mind that the Peace Policy did not do away with the employment of troops. The Government was compelled to maintain an army to enforce the Peace Policy with its industrial feature. The Indians did not take kindly or readily to the alternative that they must work or starve; and when these conditions were insisted upon, the Government understood that it had a force of troops (and the Indians also knew) at a dozen different military posts in the Indian country who could compel obedience and at the same time protect the settlements from offensive retaliatory measures on the part of the Indians.

The military authorities should not be held responsible for the causes which brought on the Indian wars; and acts of imprudence in their official intercourse with the Indians were seldom alleged. It may be seriously questioned whether the Sioux Indians would have accepted any arrangement that obliged them to abandon the chase, and become in a measure self-supporting, with its attendant conversion to civilized methods of living, at any time prior to the Civil war. So long as they had land to hunt and roam over and to treat for, they were never in a mood to consent to any restriction of their native liberties. It was conditions of this nature that were difficult to surmount—that prevented the application of the power of the Government to force them to abandon their wild life which of itself meant everything but peace and industry. The army it would seem had ever been the mainstay of peace—and none knew this better than the Indians. Without the army in the background, where the Indians could almost feel its power, it is extremely doubtful whether the Indians would have agreed to a peaceful relinquishment of the Black Hills.

It is doubtful whether the Government, or even the peace societies, would for a moment have considered making the proposition to the Indians involving their change of life from free hunters, trappers and warriors to the more arduous and disagreeable pursuits of civilization, without considering the power it possessed in its military arm, which was strategically distributed all through the Indian country, in permanent forts and camps, and never better qualified and prepared from actual experience, to prevent hostilities and quell insurrections.

The object, and the sole object, in maintaining this costly army on the frontier, was the control of the Indians, therefore the cost of the peace policy must include the expense of maintaining the army at Forts Randall, Thompson, Hale, Sully, Bennett, Rice, Yates, Totten, Lincoln, Stephenson, Buford, Union, Ellis, Phil Kearney, Meade, Pembina, Abercrombie, Laramie, and Niobrara, not to mention a number of camps established for patrol stations.

When everything is considered it will probably be found that the cost of the peace or industrial policy was not a dominant factor in its favor. It was approved because it was the most humane and better suited the principles and purposes of a Christian nation; but more important from a material view, it held out the substantial promise to uplift the nations of savages whom the Government had contended with for nearly a century, place them upon a plane where they could be a useful element in the citizenship of the country, and in process of time relieve the Government and the country of the care of the Indian altogether, by educating and disciplining him to support and maintain himself as white people do. There is no longer a reasonable doubt that the policy will work out in this way—it being only a question of time—rather indefinite—when the Indians will all be numbered among the industrial and self-supporting peoples of this country, and the blanketed or naked warrior, and his tepee, will be only a tradition.

ADDITION TO THE BIG SIOUX RESERVE

On the 11th of January, 1875, President Grant issued a proclamation withdrawing a large area of lands in Dakota, from market. The lands thus set aside were ostensibly for the use of the Indians whose colossal reservation covered the whole territory west of the Missouri, but those Indians were not expected to occupy them or use them in any way. The purpose of the Government was for the time being to place the country along the Missouri on the east side under the control of the interior department, and thus prevent its occupation and settlement by the whites, although a considerable settlement had already been effected in Charles Mix, Brule and Buffalo counties; and as by the withdrawal and annexation of the tract to the Sioux reservation it would be Indian land and subject to control by the Interior Department, it was expected that it would put a stop to the surreptitious introduction of intoxicating liquors into the Indian country. The lands withdrawn were thus described in President Grant's proclamation:

Commencing on the east bank of the Missouri River, where the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude crosses the same; thence east with said parallel of latitude to the ninety-ninth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich; thence south with said meridian to the east bank of the Missouri River; thence up and with the east bank of the Missouri River to the place of beginning. Said lands are hereby set apart for the use of the several tribes of the Sioux Indians, as an addition to their present reservation in said territory.

Included in the tract so withdrawn was the northwest corner of Charles Mix County; the west two-thirds of Brule County including Brule City; nearly all of Buffalo County; all of Hughes, Sully, Hyde, and more than one-half of Hand County; all of Walworth, Potter, and Campbell counties, and nearly all of Faulk, Edmunds, and McPherson counties, in the southern part of the territory; and the southern portion of McIntosh and Emmons County, now in North Dakota. This occurred about a year before the Black Hills treaty was negotiated, and gave to the Sioux nation the country above described and all of the later State of South Dakota west of the Missouri River, and all of the later State of North Dakota south of the Cannon Ball River—or nearly one-half of the Territory of Dakota.

A later order made a further addition to the reservation on the north, as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, D. C., March 16, 1875.

It is hereby ordered that the tract of country, in the Territory of Dakota, lying within the following described boundaries, viz.: "Commencing at a point where the 102d degree of west longitude intersects the forty-sixth parallel of north latitude; thence north on said 102d degree of longitude to the south bank of the Cannon Ball River; thence down and with the south bank of said river to a point on the east side of the Missouri River, opposite the mouth of said Cannon Ball River; thence down and with the east bank of the Missouri River to the mouth of Beaver River; thence up and with the south bank of Beaver River to the 100th degree of west longitude; thence south and with the said 100th degree of longitude to the forty-ninth degree of north latitude; thence west with said parallel of latitude to the place of beginning," be and the same is hereby withdrawn from sale, and set apart for the use of the several tribes of Sioux Indians, as an addition to their present reservation in said territory.

U. S. GRANT, President.

By command of Brigadier General Terry,

O. D. GREYNE, Assistant Adjutant General.

The purpose of this order, and a similar one affecting lands in the North, withdrawing from sale and setting apart the same for the use of the Sioux Indians, was stated by Edw. P. Smith, commissioner of Indian affairs, to aid in the suppression of the liquor traffic with the Indians on the Missouri River; but the order was not to affect the existing rights of any person resident within the limits of the territory withdrawn. The order was to be rescinded as soon as the cause of it was abated.

All the lands so withdrawn by executive order were restored to the public domain by proclamation of President Hayes, under date of August 9, 1879.

The lands included the country embraced in the territory north of the Yankton reservation to the forty-seventh parallel, and east of the ninety-ninth meridian of longitude; taking in the counties of Logan, Emmons, Campbell, Potter, Walworth, Sully, Faulk, a large part of Hand, Edmunds, McPherson, Brule and portions of Hughes, Hyde, Buffalo and Charles Mix counties.

CHAPTER LXII

CHIEF STRIKE-THE-REE MAKES A SPEECH

HON. WILLIAM WELCH AND OTHERS VISIT INDIANS—INDIAN TREATS WITH INDIAN—THE INDIAN TALKS—THE OTIS TREATY—COMMISSIONER SMITH AND THE YANKTONS—STRIKE-THE-REE'S VIEWS, AND THOSE OF OTHER FAMOUS SACHEMS—IMPORTANCE OF BLISTERED HANDS.

William Welch, Esq., of Philadelphia, Doctor Paddock and Colonel Kemble, composing the executive committee on Indian affairs of the Episcopal Church, with Mrs. Rumney, a devoted missionary, were engaged in investigating the condition and progress made by the Indians at Crow Creek, Cheyenne, and Lower Brule agencies, during the summer of 1872. For the purpose of showing the nature and scope of the authority possessed by the representatives of Christian denominations in Indian affairs at that time, which is referred to in the excerpt from President Grant's message already quoted, the following report by Mr. Welch is given. From this it appears that not only the management of Indian affairs in a general way, including their religious instruction, but all matters affecting the welfare and rights of the red people was under the jurisdiction of the Episcopal denomination in Dakota:

While finding the Indians in a peaceful mood and their general condition encouraging, the committee stated that the four following causes of annoyance naturally disturb the Indians, who, Mr. W. stated, had been wronged "so often that they are suspicious of every white man until his friendship has been tested:"

First—The proposed expedition to the Black Hills for the purpose of taking, by violence, property held by the Indians under a title as sacred as any that can be given by the Government of the United States. (This expedition had been forming at Sioux City in 1872, but as a public enterprise had been abandoned because of a prohibitory edict from the army authorities.)

Second—The Indians allege that the telegraph line to Fort Sully was placed on their lands without consent being first obtained, and some cases where Indians sold telegraph poles they had been deprived of part of the purchase price. As this telegraph line is important to the Government, the Indians should be paid or their irritation will increase and they will continue to break the glass insulators. As telegraph lines often precede railroads, these Indians fear that a railroad up the Missouri is also to be forced upon them.

Third—The Indians very properly claim that they should be conferred with and an equitable arrangement made with them before the Northern Pacific Railroad crosses the Missouri River and drives the game, upon which they subsist, from the fertile valleys of the streams, including the Yellowstone and its tributaries. The Peace Commission Treaty of 1868 stipulates that a railroad may go through the neutral ground north of the forty-sixth parallel, yet it also agrees that no person shall dwell in or pass through that region without the consent of the Indians having been first obtained.

Fourth—The just complaints of very high prices that were charged by their traders for supplies we adinsted by promising competitive trading stores. In some instances twice and three times as high a price was charged for the same article on the Upper Missouri as was paid by the same Indians in the lower agencies. The Indians also complain that no good cattle have been furnished them, although promised by the Peace Commission and stipulated for in the treaty. Another cause of complaint will be removed as the agents of the reservations under care of the Episcopal church are directed to enforce Christian marriage or to eject from the reservation any white man who takes a wife after the Indian fashion, whether he be high or low, rich or poor. Our agents have in many instances, at the risk of their lives, closed up or destroyed whisky ranches on or near the reservations. Steamboat owners are asked to prevent the landing or vending of intoxicating liquors near the reservations. In the sensitive condition of the Indians, before the important questions enumerated are settled, a drunken brawl may stir up an Indian war.

INDIANS TREAT WITH INDIAN

One of the first fruits of the peace policy, and in pursuance of the stipulation in the treaties, was that the Indians would endeavor to live in peace among themselves; and furthermore encouraged thereto by Col. Elmer Otis, commanding at Fort Rice, D. T., and a wise and prudent commander, a treaty of amity was concluded in the summer of 1870, between certain northern tribes composed in part of the Sioux or Dakota nation of Indians, and the Arickarees, Gros Ventres and Mandans, three smaller nations, not Sioux, whose local habitation was at Fort Berthold. A deadly hostility had existed between these nations for many generations, in fact their traditions revealed no period when they were not enemies; but under the influence of such measure of civilization as they had imbibed from association with the whites, and moved thereto by their late treaties to abstain from war with each other, aided by the prudent counsel of the Christian commander mentioned, they now have become willing subjects of the Great Father and the white Government subsisting largely on the generous store of supplies furnished them by the white man's Government—were persuaded that it was for their welfare and best interests to cease fighting among themselves, since by fighting they had nothing whatever to gain but everything to lose, for a victory brought them nothing but the empty satisfaction that they were for the time stronger than their opponents, and their wars had never been fruitful of anything but more war, and constant anxiety and vigilance. The Indians admitted that peace would be better for them; and in July, 1870, a grand peace council was assembled at Fort Stephenson, a few miles from Fort Berthold, to which place Colonel Otis conducted fifty of the chiefs and headmen representing the various Dakota tribes who inhabited the northern part of the territory, and here the representatives of the three nations above mentioned, met them.

At the opening of the council, Colonel Otis addressed the Indian delegates through an interpreter, saying:

Friends—We cannot speak your language. I wish we could; so we have to speak to you through interpreters. I have left my station, where duty calls me, to do what I can to establish peace between you. A short time ago the Sioux came to Fort Rice, and declared their willingness to make peace with all people, both whites and Indians. I thought that they were sincere, so came with them to this post. We came here not with any intention of praise, but because we thought it our duty to do what we could to bring about a peace between two such warlike and hostile nations as you have proved yourselves to be towards each other. If you agree upon terms and make peace with each other, I will do what I can to carry out the stipulations to the best of my ability. While I am in the country I shall hold myself responsible for the action of these Sioux, and if they deceive me I will punish them. I don't want to take up the time of the council. I want you to give all the time possible to talk among yourselves. The objects assembled here are friends to all of you; they have your good at heart.

Captain Clifford, the military Indian agent, for the time being of the Upper Missouri Indians, then addressed the council, saying:

In behalf of the Rees, Mandans and Gros Ventres, I must say that they have kept the peace with the whites for twenty-six years. When I came here last year they all told me they would not do anything without my advice and consent. This promise they have faithfully kept. They have never left on a hunting or a war expedition without my approval. As an evidence of the manner in which they kept their promise, one of them was a user of shooting at a soldier, when the commanding officer at Fort Stephenson requested that the man should be given up. The Indians used every effort to discover the man, but were unsuccessful. If they made a treaty, I am willing to become responsible for their actions.

"Two Bears," the famous head-chief of the Yanktonnais Sioux, then stepped on the platform, and said:

I am very much pleased to see the white faces so kind. I have long ago made a treaty with whites, and am now ready to make peace with your people (the Rees, etc.). I sent for you to come down to my camp, but you did not come, so we came up to see you, and are willing to shake hands and smoke with you, and make a treaty of peace. I am tired of war; my people are tired of war. We want to live in peace with all men. Our Father has told us that the Great Spirit will not prosper us if we are enemies of each other, and we have found this true. We would frequently starve if it was not for the whites. We have all received food and clothing from them, and now that the buffalo and antelope are scarce, we would starve if the whites would not take care of us. (Here the Indian audience gave their approval with a number of energetic exclamations of "How! How!")

The next speaker was White Shield, the orator of the other nations, Sans Arcs, Mandans, and Gros Ventres, a very dignified, and stately man, who spoke as follows:

I greet the officers, and to these Sioux I wish to say that they have been the aggressors, and should propose their terms first. They have come here. Let them state what they want. We did not send for them. They came voluntarily to us. We have nothing to say until we hear them. If they want peace, why don't they keep their young men at home, and not send them to kill our people and steal our horses? Why don't they stay at home, and not send war parties upon our lands to kill our game and steal our property? ("How! How!" from the party of the second part.)

This called the Yanktonnais chief, Two Bears, again to his feet, when he made this statement:

My friends, I have a desire to make a peace. I can only speak for my own people. My tribes are scattered over a vast country. I cannot be responsible for all their acts when they are so far away from my home; but if any of my young men do anything wrong, I will at once inform the commanding officer and give up the offender for punishment. Our fathers advised us to make peace with the white faces, and advised us to keep that peace; but some of our people are fools. They go on the warpath without the knowledge of their chiefs, and commit horrible crimes. The whole tribe is blamed for it, but if we make a peace, I will deliver those bad men to the white officers. You see, friends, but few of our people are present, but we that are here shake hands and smoke; that means the whole Sioux Nation. Some of the young men, who are fools, will start a war party from the Yankton or Cheyenne Agency. They will call at all the agencies until they collect quite a considerable band, and then make war on any party they meet. We, their chief men, do not allow this, but they are led off by the young men with bad hearts and bad spirits. We are sorry for it. It makes our hearts feel bad to see how foolish they are.

This concluded the speech-making, and a general shaking of hands and smoking of pipes and cigars was then indulged in, and the Indians mingled together and conversed through their interpreters, where they were unable to understand each other. The council lasted about six hours, and resulted in an agreement to make a formal written treaty of peace; when adjournment was had for refreshments and to give time for the writing of the article of a treaty of amity. In the evening the council reconvened, and the following treaty was read, interpreted and duly signed:

Treaty of amity between the Sioux tribes of Indians known as the Upper Yanktonnais, Lower Yanktonnais, Black Feet, Uncpapa, and Sans Arcs, of the first part, and the Arickarees, Gros Ventres and Mandans, separate nations, united, of the second part. Witnesseth:—

That the chiefs and principal men of all the bands above mentioned, here in council, do mutually and severally agree that from this day forth they will hold each other as friends; that they will neither make war upon each other, nor in any way manifest enmity by any action whatsoever. They agree to discourage all hostile acts and intentions, either open or covert, on the part of any member of the nation to which they severally belong; and also agree, if any person of the bands over which they have control, or in which they exercise influence, shall at any time commit any depredation, theft, or unfriendly act, on any member or members of the bands herein represented, they will see that such persons receive material punishment for the offense, and that they will make full restitution to the party aggrieved for the wrong done. They also agree that when wrong has been done or complained of by any member to this treaty, that full investigation shall be had, and that every effort shall be made to turn over offenders when discovered to the United States authorities at the nearest military post where the band to which the offender belongs shall be encamped. The bands who are parties to this agreement have for a long time been at war; many injuries have been inflicted; many lives have been lost; many heads have been made sad; and much mourning and sorrow occasioned. They now desire to put an end to all such practices; they desire to live in concord with each other; to rejoice and sorrow with each other; and to be bound with each other by the same friendly sentiments which now unite them with the whites.

In witness whereof we have each set our hands and seals at the Post of Fort Stevenson, D. T., on this 17th day of July, 1870.

White Shield, Chief of the Lower Yanktonnais.

Two Bears, Chief of the Arickarees.

Crow Breast, Chief of the Gros Ventres.

The commissioner of Indian affairs, Hon. E. P. Smith, made a tour of the Indian agencies in the Northwest in the summer of 1873, accompanied by his wife and daughter, possibly to give stronger emphasis to the claim then being made that the new peace policy for governing the Indians, which was being enforced by President Grant, had produced such a favorable change in the situation on our frontiers respecting the Indians, that it was safe even for women to journey among them without fear of being molested by the red men. His itinerary in Dakota extended up the Missouri River to the Grand River Agency, and included the Cheyenne and Crow Creek, all among the most important and populous of the Sioux agencies, and then regarded as the temporary rendezvous for thousands of the refractory element (when hungry), who could easily be induced to war, and who were even then, in a surreptitious manner, represented with Sitting Bull, who with quite a following was opposing the extension of the Northern Pacific Railroad in the country farther north.

At each of these agencies he held a formal council with the Indians for the purpose of ascertaining their sentiments regarding the new peace policy and to find out by personal observation to what extent they were engaging in industrial employments. As a rule he found them fairly well disposed toward the new order of things; but everywhere he learned that they needed a great deal more than they were receiving from the Government. A number of the leaders among the red men made known their sentiments and wants in formal speeches. These Indian speeches had been a common feature at all councils held with them by the pale faces, and the Indians invariably appear as complainants that the Great Father was not living up to his agreements in furnishing them supplies.

The commissioner concluded his investigations at Greenwood, the Yankton Agency, where he met all the leaders of the tribe and many hundreds of the people, men and women and children. The Yanktons had been known as one of the best disposed tribes of the Sioux, and had made considerable progress in the customs and arts of white people. Here the commissioner made a speech, which was interpreted to his audience, wherein he endeavored to show them just what the new peace policy expected of the Indians, and how they were to be rewarded by submitting and conforming thereto in good faith. The commissioner said:

My friends, I have heard of you very often. For two years I have been living with the Indians of Minnesota, and they have often talked to me of the Dakotas, and they wished me to bear friendly words to you. Some of them have been over to Lake Traverse and Fort Totten lately, to make peace with the Dakotas. Some of the Chippewas have lately gone to a new reservation, where they can raise corn, wheat, and cattle. They live in houses and are doing very well indeed. Some will have 150 or 200 bushels of wheat this year. Their children are many of them in schools and are learning to talk English. I have been up the river, looking at the Dakotas there, and am now going to the agencies below, and then to Washington. I have wished to see you, so that when your agents write me at Washington, I may understand them, and know how to answer them. I find that many of the Indians above here are not doing much for themselves. They have been receiving beef and flour, and coffee and sugar, for many years, but are still living in tepees and wearing blankets, as they were years ago. They seem to think that all they have to do is to sit down and that white people will come along and put pork and flour down their throats; so they will live and their children after them. I think the worst thing we can do for a man is to feed him and let him be idle. Let all the people at Yankton be fed and do nothing, and in five years they would be ruined. And the only real difference between the white man and the Indian is due largely to the fact that one works and the other does not. If a poor man has a real friend who wants to help him, his friend will help him only as he helps himself. And if that poor man is lazy and will not work, the best way to help him is to let him go hungry, because it may be that when he is pinched with hunger he will go to work, and that will make a man of him. Of course work alone will not make a man. We must learn to do right, one with another, and love God, and for that we want teachers and missionaries to instruct us. Now you have all the chance to be men that anybody wants. You have land, and water, and timber, and teachers, and preachers, and friends. And besides, you have rations, and clothing, and farmers, and carpenters, to help you; and you have a chance to be men if you are willing to work. But all these will not make you men unless you have stout hearts and take hold with both hands and work.

Now, I want to tell you one thing. After this year the agreement with the Government to supply you with rations is gone. The little money and clothing you get will be continued longer. Now, what will you do when you get no more rations? How much are you getting out of the ground to put in your tepees to live upon next winter? That is all I will say now.

The first Indian to respond to the commissioner was the second chief, Medicine Cow, an Indian of fair ability, and peacefully disposed at all times. He said:

My friend, I wish to say this morning that when a man has much to say, he will forget much, and I would like to have friends here suggest to me what I may forget. The last time we had a talk when the bishop was here, some things were wrongly interpreted and we misunderstood each other. I wish Mr. Williamson to see that the interpretation is correct. My friend, I am glad to hear what you have said, but I do not think we can do all this that we ought to do at once. I see today the way the white people work, and the way we have done in the past, and I think the way of the whites the best. Our Indian ways are such that I, for my part, do not see how we can live as we have done any longer. Now we are trying to plant, but some years it does not rain. When it does rain, we are thankful to God, and our crops grow. You see these young men here; they can plow and make hay. We remember what our Great Father told us in Washington—to tell our men to plow and work, and that if they would do so, the money paid to white people for labor would be paid to Indians. The young men here are able, I think, to do all the common work—plow, make hay, build houses of logs—but I do not think the agent hires as many Indians as he might. There are Indians now who could fill nearly all these places. I know that those who put on trousers, cut their hair, and work, blister their hands, but the whites do the same thing and we can do it too. The white men alone are not able to herd the cattle. Indians are used to driving cattle on horseback, and they can do the herding well. Our people are very different from the hostile Indians west of us. We do not want to go on the war path. We are raising ponies and sell them for wagons and other useful things. Here are two stores and two missions, and we wish our young men to do all the missionaries and traders wish to have done, and then we shall prosper. These men here grew up on the prairies and get their living by traveling about. The Great Father wished us to settle down and go to work, and we have done it. The Great Father promised to help us. I do not think he has helped us as much as he might have done. We have young men here learning all these trades. They do not feel able yet to take charge of the work, but will be able to do so soon. When I was at Washington the last time, I told the Great Father we could not come to see him every day, but often we wish to say something to him; there is some difficulty, or the whites employed here do not suit us. And he told us that when things did not go right we should let him know, and he would see what could be done. I wish you would remember this, and am glad you are having what I say put in writing. I suppose the collection of money for the Indians which the Great Father makes must be a very serious matter, and must take great labor. I consider that our Nation has always been faithful and true to the Government in times of war and peace, and that the Great Father is under obligation to us on that account. Do not think we are particularly proud of this; I do not speak of it for that reason. Nevertheless it is true, and I think that the Great Father should be particularly faithful to us in supplying our wants. You have mentioned many of our advantages. The Great Father has not provided all these for us. Of all we have here, he has given us only eight wagons and twenty-five harnesses. There are eight bands of men here, and when we want to work we have so few implements we almost fight over who shall use them. I see how the white people get a living. On the prairies, far from wood and water, they settle and dig wells, and haul wood, and fix themselves up. I wonder if you think we could go out on the prairie and do as they do with only our hands. I say this because the agent has been having the prairie surveyed, and I wonder if you expect us to go out there and settle without implements. The Great Father has sent food here for the Indians; that is well. Now what arrangement does he make about the white people of the agency? Does he expect them to live from these provisions? If so, very well. At other agencies the Indians get larger rations; but I have told our young men to say nothing about it. Sometimes we feel bad—jealous of the hostile Indians because they get more than we do; but I advise them to keep quiet; and say that perhaps in the end the Great Father will do better for us than for them. When a man asks here he does not inquire of one man about us, but from many; from the agent; missionaries, and others. If you do this you will get at the truth. One thing puts us in a little danger. Other tribes are coming here to visit us, and there is danger that some of our young men will be drawn away by them into war parties. When Indians go to Washington and sign treaties there with the Great Father, before God, I consider these treaties binding, and have great respect for them. And I understand that when the Great Father makes promises, he is bound to keep his promises also. When the treaty was made I understand that it was promised that we should have this reserve for at least fifty years. If you hear of anyone speaking of removing us elsewhere, do not listen to them. I know railroads are running across the country. Some run entirely across the country; some only a little way. I speak of this because at Sioux City they are starting a railway which points this way. I think transportation this way should be made by the river. If I was alone I should not care about it, but other Indians may make trouble if railroads are run through this country. I have listened to what you have said about the white people do work. We have tried it. Our hands are tender and we have blistered them, but we shall continue to work, nevertheless. It takes about ten thousand dollars of treaty money to run the agency here; but I did not understand the agency was to be run out of money paid for our land. I think all the money paid for our land should be used for agricultural purposes, tools, and farming implements and improvements. I know I feel very much as a nursing child feels towards the nursing mother. I know I can not get along without the help of the Government yet, and I have confidence that the Government will continue to help us abundantly.

Strike-the-Ree, the head chief, and one of the best known Indians in the country at that time, then addressed the commissioner. He had the unlimited confidence of his people, and the burden of his discourse, which is here given, was the lack of something to aid his people in their upward climb to the ways of civilized people. Strike-the-Ree said to Mr. Smith:

I heard last winter that you were coming. I see you here today, and am glad. There are eight bands of us here. I want you to use your efforts to get wagons and oxen for each of the bands. We want harnesses also. Then our women have all burnt their fingers trying to cook as white people do, with Indian utensils. We want stoves. The Sutes, many of them, have stoves. I have heard these reports about rations before, but never so directly from the Great Father. I have trembled before when I thought about it. Now it seems as though the heavens were falling over our heads. If the Great Father stops providing for us before he helps us to help ourselves better, he might as well exterminate us at once. But one thing he can do to help us to help ourselves. He can distribute cows among us and farming tools. One thing more you can do: the storms came last winter and killed many of our ponies. If you could send us better horses, so that we could raise horses of a better stock, it would help us to get a living. Since the storm we have been frightened, and we all want hay for our ponies, but the question is how to get it. We try to borrow scythes, but there are not enough for all of us. If the Great Father would send us a few mowing machines we could easily put up hay enough for our stock. All these young men that you see here want to live in houses, but they hardly know how to build them. They start out and cut trees in the woods, but cannot get the logs hauled to us. If some way could be provided for the hauling of the logs, it would be of great benefit to us. And when you send things to help us, we would like to have them issued to individuals, and not kept stored up for the band. I know we ask for a great many things, but one other thing our young men ask for continually—that is guns. There are a great many rabbits in the timber and we want guns to hunt them. The Great Father may be afraid we will not use them for good purposes, but we want them only for hunting. If you cannot give them to us, we will not complain. We look upon you as a man of great influence and power, and come to you with great faith that all you promise will be fulfilled. I do not speak at random. Other men have been here saying they were great men, and have promised great things, and we have never heard from them again. We believe that all you promise will be accomplished.

As Strike-the-Ree spoke in the Dakota language, it will be understood that his remarks were interpreted, and written down at the time by the secretary of the Indian commissioner.

Commissioner Smith then replied to "Old Strike," as follows:

If you have such great expectations respecting me, I must be very careful what I promise, and I will not be safe if I promise you a great deal, I fear. I told you this was the last year of the treaty agreement to give you rations. I do not say the Government will give you rations no longer, but that the Government will be under no obligation to give you more. This friend has well said that it is difficult to raise taxes to feed Indians, and your Great Father has no money of his own for this purpose, and can only get what Congress grants and raises from the white people. The great Council meets in winter, and I go to them from the Great Father, and say:

"Here is the writing you have given the Sioux, promising them so much; now give it to them this year."

And the great Council says: "Yes, we agreed to do this, and we must do it;" and they vote the money.

Now, next year I shall go and say: "I want money for the Sioux to buy flour and beef."

They will look at the writing and say: "No, that has gone out; we will grant them no more."

Then I shall say: "The Sioux are poor, and want something to eat."

Then they will say: "There are many poor people among the whites and we do not give them anything. These poor white people work ten or twelve hours a day to feed their children; why cannot your Sioux do the same?"

What shall I say? I shall be glad to say: "I saw eight blisters on this chief's hands;" it will help things very much, and I know this, that I cannot get money except I say: "The Sioux are at work." You speak of the white people on the prairies. These white people came naked into the world, just as you did. They did not come in a wagon, and with their hands on a horse's bridle when they were born, and horses and harnesses did not grow. They have made it all with their hands and heads. Two years ago, on the prairies of Minnesota, I saw a man digging a hole in the ground. He had land, and wood, and five children, and that was all. He dug that little hole and put poles over it, and turf, and that was his house; and then he worked for other men, got food, and made a garden, and finally got oxen. No one gave them to him. He worked and bought them, and plowed more land, and built him a better house, and in five years he will be a rich farmer. No one helped him except God, who helped him to have a good heart and good hands to work. You see your advantage over him. I know you have not been brought up to work, and it is hard for you, but you can learn. I think some of the Yanktonnais are doing well; perhaps they will outstrip you; but you are doing very well. You are learning. I want to praise you as much as I can. Your agent is going to get sheep, and you will soon have wool for clothing and blankets, and will start a new mode of life. I shall send you two horses to improve your ponies. But it will be better for you to sell horses as fast as you can. Raise them to sell—not to keep. I think your agent can arrange to have some one come right here and buy all you want to sell right here. That will be better than for you to try to keep them. I am going to send you a few cows, not a great many, just a few. They are to be given as presents to those who are doing their best and will take the best care of them. It will be a hard thing to give a few cows to so many people, and I am afraid it will make your agent trouble, because some will think they ought to have a cow when they cannot get one. I am going to send stoves also, but now think I shall instruct your agent to give them to men who will pay for them in work. I shall send some harnesses also in the same way. What I will do about oxen and wagons I cannot tell now. Now I suppose that it seems to you that it is not so much of a present when you earn it, as it would be if I gave these things to you right out; but I give them in this way because it will do you the most good.

Sometime you will find, I think, that this country will not support you. If grasshoppers come one year, and dry weather the next, and flood the next, you will get hungry in three years if you do not raise anything. Now, nobody will ask you to go away from this country at present; but sometime when you get to be white men and want to do the best thing for yourselves, we may talk about another country. There is a country south, about thirty days (Indian Territory), where you would get a living much easier than here; where livestock runs out all winter; wood and water are to be had in abundance. You could have land there if you wanted it. There are white men all around it who want to get in, and they say it is the best land in the world. But you do not wish to think about that, so it is not worth while for me to talk about it; but there are some who are talking about it, and will go, I think, and those who go first will get the best land. A white man never stays at home when he can do better.

Now, I am glad to have seen you, and I want you to think of one thing: the people who are helped the most are the people who help themselves the most, and the way to help people the most is not to put things in their mouth to eat, but in the hands for use. I would rather give one of you a cow than fifty sacks of flour as far as helping you would be regarded. I am sorry you do not make more of your schools. Your schoolhouses here ought to be filled with scholars. I want you to learn to talk English as fast as possible, and get your blankets off—you cannot work in blankets. I will remember you when I get to Washington, and hope to hear a good account of you. I want you to remember what a hard place your agent has to fill. If not more than half of you are angry with him at one time he will be doing very well.

Commissioner Smith, in this talk to the Yanktons, gave out the first intimation of the half-formed plan of the Government to remove the entire Sioux nation to the Indian Territory, where they were told they would find a better country for farming and stock-raising and as much milder climate than Dakota. This was probably true, and had the plans succeeded it would have relieved Dakota Territory of its entire Indian population save a few Chippewas on the Red River; but whether the territory would have advanced more rapidly without the Indians is not easily proven. The Black Hills were thrown open within three years after this interview with the Yanktons. This was about all the advantage, at that time, the territory could have gained by the removal of the Sioux, while the benefit accruing to the territory from the world-wide advertising of Dakota and its gold fields would have been entirely lost. In addition, the people of the territory have profited largely from the transportation business through the reservation, and still greater prosperity came to those engaged in contracting with the Indian bureau and the military who were maintained in Dakota to protect the settlements against the hostile Sioux. It appears that our Indian population, at least in the first decades of the life of the territory, were indirectly a valuable aid in maintaining the white population. Their removal in 1876, when the moral force of the Government was exerted in that direction in earnest, would have cost the territory all its military posts, Indian agencies, and practically deprived our steamboat interest of the traffic which at the time employed from fifty to seventy-five vessels and several thousand people, and it may have been that a regard for these industrial interests discouraged the prosecution of the plan.

It would seem that Dakota's Indian population, admitting that it may have been the cause of keeping many reputable people from settling upon the public lands in the territory at that time, was a decided advantage during the early years of the territory's growth and development.

Peace was not secured with all the Sioux under the Sherman treaty, and the only apparent advantage, at the time, gained, was the collecting of the Sioux tribes within certain extensive limits known as the Great Sioux reservation. Sitting Bull now comes to the forefront as an uncompromising opponent of all treaties of cession, and the construction of the Northern Pacific Railroad west of the Missouri River, and is supported by a strong well armed force of determined warriors made up of the young men of several tribes, but chiefly those enumerated in General Stanley's report, heretofore given, and probably a contingent from the Red Cloud Agency.

The conviction had gradually forced itself upon the minds of the authorities that so long as they fed and clothed the Indians and left it discretionary with them whether to work or play, they would make no progress in any industry, no matter how much in the direction of substantial aid was promised; and it needed but the irresistible demand of the white people for the opening of the Black Hills and the lamentable tragedy at the Little Big Horn, to arouse public sentiment and compel the Government to abrogate the discretionary privileges granted to Indians by the Sherman treaty, practically, without consulting the other party and substitute in its stead an agreement by which the Indian would be compelled to work in a reasonable way, or go hungry and naked. With this alternative before them, virtually whole tribes turned their attention to honest labor, and it is now universally conceded that the results attained completely justified the means employed in obtaining them.

The cupidity of the pale faces worked for the speedier civilization of the Indian. The pale face covets more land, and the Indian had more than he could use, while the pale face stands ready to purchase it. The white man's knowledge of what is best to promote the Indian's civilization is reliable, because he has learned it from the progressive career of his own race, and he knows it will do the same for the Indian, because he has already the object lesson in the advance of the Santees, the Yanktons, the Sissetons, and many individual cases within our borders,—Indians that have worked their way within a quarter of a century from barbarism to a condition of self-support, become patrons of schools, churches, and in some cases having gained a fair knowledge of representative republican government.

CHAPTER LXIII

INDIAN CHIEFS VISIT WASHINGTON

1875-78

NAMES OF INDIAN AGENTS IN 1875, AND THEIR AGENCIES IN DAKOTA TERRITORY—INDIANS REMOVED TO MISSOURI RIVER AFTER BLACK HILLS TREATY AND THEN MOVED BACK AGAIN—INDIANS GO TO WASHINGTON—PRESIDENT HAYES AS GUN FATHER TALKS TO HIS RED CHILDREN—RED CHILDREN HAVE SOMETHING TO SAY—COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS HAYT COMES OUT TO DAKOTA TO SEE HIS RED PEOPLE—PROHIBITS USE OF BEADS WHICH ARE A SERIOUS STUMBLING BLOCK IN THE PATH OF INDIAN WOMEN BECOMING CIVILIZED—REMARKABLE REVIVAL OF BEAD TRADE—MR. HAYT HAS AN INTERVIEW WITH SPOTTED TAIL.

Secretary Chandler, of the Interior Department, recommended the removal of the Indians under Chiefs Red Cloud and Spotted Tail, in 1875, to the Missouri River, at some points between Fort Randall and the mouth of the Cheyenne River, where they would have a better country, and recommended that future appropriations for them be made contingent upon such removal. He also suggested that inasmuch as the Government was then paying the Indians about two million two hundred and sixty thousand dollars a year in supplies above the amount required by any treaty, that the Indians be required to relinquish the Black Hills and right of way thereto in consideration of such sum, if it is to be longer continued—or that the payment to them be contingent upon their surrender of their claim to the Hills.

The principal object in removing the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies to the Missouri River was to save the enormous cost of transporting the Indian supplies to the agencies in the interior. Major Howard, who was in 1876, the agent at Spotted Tail Agency, stated that it cost more to pay for this overland transportation than the value of the goods transported. By removing the agencies to the Missouri River where the boats delivered the supplies, the Indians would assemble at these agencies, receive their supplies, and would save for their own benefit, a large sum of money.

The names of the United States Indian agents in the Territory of Dakota, in January, 1876, were: Sisseton Agency, J. G. Hamilton; Ponca, A. J. Carrier; Cheyenne, H. W. Bingham; Devil's Lake, Paul Beckwith; Yankton, John G. Gassmann; Spotted Tail, Edwin A. Howard; Crow Creek, H. F. Livingston; Standing Rock, John Burke; White River, Thomas A. Reilly; Fort Berthold, Lyman B. Sperry; Red Cloud, James S. Hastings; Flandreau, John P. Williamson, special agent.

At this time (1875, '76), negotiations were pending that looked to a cession of the Black Hills region to the Government. The Indians were, already, under the treaty of 1868, required to remove to the Missouri River and receive their supplies, but this provision had not been insisted upon, and they were occupying their agencies at Beaver Creek and Fort Robinson, and were strongly opposed to the proposed removal. On the eve of the Black Hills treaty was not a fortunate time to ruffle the feathers of the red men, who were the party of the West.

part, and such a misfortune would undoubtedly have been the result had Mr. Chandler's recommendation been followed, hence the matter rested in abeyance.

The Black Hills treaty being satisfactorily concluded in 1876 (see Black Hills chapters), containing a similar removal agreement, and President Hayes having succeeded President Grant, the reader will understand the proceedings which here follow:

PRESIDENT HAYES AND INDIANS—HAYES MAKES A PROMISE

Delegations of the Sioux and Arapahoe Indians, with Red Cloud and Spotted Tail, visited Washington in September, 1877, for the purpose of protesting against the action of the Government in locating their agencies on the Missouri River; the Indians preferring to have these central stations in the interior of their reservation. The visitors obtained an interview with President Hayes at the White House, where were gathered the members of the cabinet, General Crook, the Indian commissioner, Hayt, and others.

The President opened the council by stating that he was ready to hear the Indians. Spotted Tail broke the silence by urging that the lands now occupied by his people as agreed by the treaty of 1876, be secured to them. His sentiments were applauded by the other chiefs.

Red Cloud, always in a gruff humor, then said:

The foot of the Black Hills is a good place to put my agency. I did not come here to beg anything. The Black Hills were mine; I gave them to the commissioners. Suppose you are going to decide what you are going to give us for the hills, and I have come to get it.

General Crook advocated the claims of the Indians, and the President was presented with the pipe of peace. The President then said:

My good friends, you have desired to take counsel with me and I have permitted you to come. I am glad to see you. I have attentively listened to what you have said. I have also heard Mr. Wm. Welsh, and General Crook, who spoke for you as your friends, and who have my confidence. I have well considered all that was said. Now listen to my answer. I have your welfare at heart. I will be a good friend to you. The wishes you express I shall be glad to gratify when it is in my power, and for your own good. There is an understanding between you and the white people which I want to have carried out by both. That understanding is that you should go to your reservation and occupy it. That the lands should be yours. I have removed the Poncas to the Indian Territory to give you more room. I have promised to procure food for your people to eat. The great Council of my nation, the Congress of the United States, resolved, and your chiefs and headmen agreed, that supplies to be furnished to you should be delivered to you near the Missouri River. This is what I was told; this is what the the great Council of my nation believed. I have fulfilled that promise. You say you do not like to go to the Missouri River; but your supplies cannot be taken to any place before your people will need them, and before the cold days of winter will come. If you do not go near that place where your supplies are, your people will be hungry and I shall not be able to give them food. I desire to do all for you I can, therefore want you to be in that place this winter, where my helping hand can reach you. But I do not mean that you and your people shall stay near the Missouri River always. You shall stay there only this winter. When spring comes you shall select for your permanent abode such land on your reservation as you like best. The agents will aid you in making a selection. Your country is large and there is much land, where you can cultivate the soil, and raise crops and where cattle can be fed. That land is to be surveyed and allotted to each family to be its homestead. There your people can build cabins and make homes for their families. When that land is surveyed and allotted, and your families have taken possession, I shall ask the great Council of my nation to give you cows and oxen, and tools with which to till the soil, that you may be able to provide for your own necessities. I desire you to have schools for your children, so that they may be educated to take care of themselves (right here the Indians smiled broadly), and become industrious and prosperous like the children of my people. I also wish your people to have churches where they can worship. I shall speak good words for you in the great Council of my nation, that it may grant your people these benefits. If you are wise you will heed my advice. Game is fast disappearing from your country, and you cannot always live as hunters; neither can we for all the time provide for your wants, and feed your people and their children. If you want to live in security you must do as white people do—you must learn to work and produce for yourselves that which you need. Cattle and horses and plows will be more useful to you than ponies and guns. To be educated so as to know how to work (the aboriginal smile again greeted the distinguished speaker), how to make their own living by raising cattle and tilling the soil, will be better for your children than hunting buffalo, and dancing war dances (the chiefs smiled incredulously). When you look around you you will see that the white people are in a great multitude, which you can not count. Every year their numbers increase by far more than the number of all the red men in this great land. They cannot be kept away from the western country, and year after year more and more of them go there. If you live, roaming about, without homes, they will sweep over you like a great flood of water. To sustain yourselves against that flood, you must have homes in which you and your families permanently live, and land on which you raise that which is necessary to support you. Then you will have firm ground to stand upon, and the flood will not sweep you away. I am a good friend to you and your people, and as a good friend I give this answer and advice.

Now I will speak a word to the Arrapahoes. You desire to go West with your people, to join the Shoshones, and live with them as friends. But if you go, you must provide for your own support. The grand Council of my nation has given me no money to aid you on your way. If without such aid you will make the journey, then I am willing you should go, and an agent whom I have sent to the Shoshones shall also be the agent for you. You have been good friends to the white people and I hope you will remain so. You all have the best wishes of my heart; let us live in peace and friendship together, and I will protect you with all the power I have.

I heard yesterday morning that forty lodges of the people of Crazy Horse and Lame Deer have gone north. As long as those people are north we do not know our friends from our enemies among them. It is of the greatest importance you should keep all these people at the agencies. I know that your hearts are right; that will make you strong with me. It is impossible for me to let those people go up into the Tongue River country until we know they are all our friends. It is necessary that all the Indians should go down in the direction of the Missouri River to get their supplies, so as to be ready early in the spring to select the best lands on the White River, and other places on the reservation, for cultivation.

The conference or council closed with this address from the "Great Father" in person.

The Indian delegation left Washington early in October, and to the last moment protested that they could not persuade their people to go to the Missouri River for their supplies. A final council was held with Secretary Schurz, when Red Cloud said to him:

I know when I go back all my young men will feel very badly because we have got to go to the Missouri River, where they say all our stock will die.

Spotted Tail said to the secretary:

The decision the Great Father has made is yours, not ours. We cannot go near the Missouri River this winter. Our delegation here has so decided. If I should tell my people we had been ordered to go there, and had sanctioned the order, they would scatter all over the country. We would like to be at peace and keep peace with the whites, but it is impossible for us to move away this fall. We want our agency at Wounded Knee Creek. Where we are at present we are all prepared for winter. Your words to me are very good, but we do not want to move. The white men never throw away their labors. What the white men have they love. It is the same with us. If you want us to throw that property away you should pay us for it. If you pay us for it, probably we can move away; otherwise we cannot.

The secretary then told them it was too late to make any change in the place where their supplies were delivered; and inasmuch as they would need food for the winter, and inasmuch as their food could not be carried to the Indians where they then were located, about one hundred and fifty miles west of the Missouri River, the Indians must go near the place where the food is. A grand hand-shaking followed, and the Indians then departed for Dakota by way of New York.

The Indians finally consented to gather at their Missouri River agency, and receive their supplies for the year then passing; having been assured that they should have their agencies located in the interior of their reservation the following year.

COMMISSIONER HAYT VISITS HIS INDIAN CHARGE

Hon. E. C. Hayt, who was commissioner of Indian affairs under President Hayes, and also under direction of the secretary of the interior, was not a popular official. The general criticism was that he was too officious; too offensively insistent upon the introduction of new notions regarding the treatment of the Indians by the agents; assuming a superior knowledge of such matters in which he had no experience and which can be gained only by much experience in contact with the Indians. As a rule he was regarded as a theorist with impracticable theories, even conceding his honesty and sincerity which was not granted by many without at least mental reservations.

Grant's peace policy had been making commendable advances in civilizing the red man, and Hayt seemed desirous to stamp his name upon it somewhere as one of its most valuable promoters, and he accordingly issued an order prohibiting the sale of beads, paints, shells, etc., to the Indians; these beads he regarded as one of the most serious hindrances to their rapid moulding into civilized beings; they linked the Indian women with the wild life of the past which they had pursued, and Hayt was anxious that the Indians should become oblivious to their old savage ways and everything connected therewith before his term as Indian commissioner expired, and he purposed to hasten it by abolishing those relics of barbarism and folly and idleness, the beads that the partially civilized men and women of the race ornamented their moccasins and leggins and other articles of apparel with.

Spotted Tail was very much offended at the order and openly rebelled against it. He declared to Major Lee, the agent at Rosebud, that the Indians would not submit to such foolishness. He claimed that the young men and women of the Sioux had the same right to purchase ornamental articles and use them to adorn their persons, as the whites had. The old chief said that white women painted and powdered, bought beads, and fancy articles; and he claimed further that if the young Indian women were forbidden to manufacture their various articles of bead work which were freely purchased by the whites, they would have nothing to do, and great evils would result from such enforced idleness. Mr. Hayt had designed it as a reformatory measure—that by depriving the Indian women of these articles, they would the more readily turn their attention to improving themselves in the domestic arts of home making and housekeeping. The order is said to have stimulated the trade in the luxuries instead of diminishing it and many of the tribe who could do so laid in several years supply before the order went into effect.

The Indian agents were always inclined to obey the instructions of their superior officer, the commissioner, and in doing so it became necessary to explain to the Indians, that the new rule, or custom, or whatever it chanced to be, was "by order of the commissioner." In this way the Indians formed an opinion of Mr. Hayt, and did not regard him as a wise man. Mr. Hayt visited the Sioux of Dakota in 1878 for the purpose of obtaining, by personal association with them, or near them, but not dangerously near, the finishing touches of what he admiringly regarded as a complete mastery of the Indian problem (he had never seen an Indian tepee before except at Wild Bill's show). He was received at the agencies with respect, and every opportunity given him to investigate and inform himself concerning any matters that he felt had been omitted in his previous career. He must have borne himself somewhat haughtily and by his austere manner betrayed his consciousness that he was a great man, in such manner that the intelligent and observing Indians, who had met scores and hundreds of great men, from President down, perceived in him something of the fabled animal inside the cloak of the lion's skin, for they were not inclined to render him more than scant homage.

On one occasion while Mr. Hayt was at the old Spotted Tail Agency on the Missouri River (the former Ponca Agency), before the Indians were removed to the interior, he held a council with the chiefs and the headmen. Chief Spotted Tail and a hundred others were present. It should be stated here, parenthetically, when the Black Hills treaty was made in 1876, the Sioux Indians agreed to receive their supplies furnished by the Government at certain points on the Missouri River where their agencies were to be established. This was in 1876 under Grant's administration. In 1877, Spotted Tail and Red Cloud paid Washington a visit as was their custom, and entered an objection to that requirement of the treaty, and insisted that their agencies should be established in the interior and western part of their reservation (they were then living in the interior not having removed to the Missouri). The chiefs succeeded in appealing the matter to President Hayes who presumably regarded it as a matter of small consequence, and he finally promised the Indians that if they would come over to the Missouri River and receive their supplies that year, 1877, they should have the privilege of returning to such points as they might select for their agencies or that would be selected for them, in the interior, the following year, 1878. The Indians would not agree to come to the Missouri for their supplies in 1877, but they were told in unmistakable terms that the Government had made its arrangements for the delivery of their supplies on the river, and this could not be changed. They must come and get them or go hungry. They concluded after reaching home and counseling with their brother Indians, not to go hungry. Buildings were put up for the accommodation of the Spotted Tail (Brule) Agency at old Ponca Agency; and at Yellow Medicine above for accommodation of Red Cloud's people, and the twelve or fifteen thousand Indians belonging to Spotted Tail's and Red Cloud's tribes lived sumptuously on the banks of the Missouri all winter. When the spring of 1878 dawned the chiefs began to clamor for a fulfillment of President Hayes' promise that they should be removed to the interior. In the meantime this move had been reconsidered by the authorities, owing to the enormous expense of transporting the supplies for twelve or fifteen thousand people, in wagons, from the river to the interior. It was shown that the cost of transportation would exceed the cost of the supplies; and anticipating that the Indians would finally yield, contracts were let for a number of expensive and necessary buildings at both agencies and the buildings constructed. But the Indians were inexorable. They refused to release the President from his promise; and now, returning to Commissioner Hayt's visit to the Spotted Tail Agency, we find that he has in mind making a last appeal to the Indians to stay where they were and to abandon the thought of removal.

Commissioner Hayt held a council with the Indians. Spotted Tail and a hundred others were present, and in addition were a number of whites, including two or three who had accompanied the distinguished commissioner. The pipe of peace was not ignited, which may have been omitted in deference to the chief. Spotted Tail did not smoke. This is notable from the fact that he was probably the only Indian in the tribe who abstained from the weed. But as to fire water, the case is different. He indulged moderately on special occasions, and was pleasantly accused of having a phial in his closet, which would be uncorked in case of snake bites.

Commissioner Hayt opened the proceedings with a patronizing sort of speech, not well-timed, and in the course of his remarks explained to them how much better off they were to remain at the agencies where they were then comfortably located, and abandon the plan of removal. He also told them that the Great Father had in mind to give them a great many cows, and he wanted to know if the Indians would keep them, and not slaughter them for beef. To this Spotted Tail replied that they would. The commissioner, in the course of his remarks, referred again to the cows, and wanted to know if they would keep them.

answered that they would keep them. The commissioner went on with his speech, which had to be interpreted to the Indians, and again referred to the large number of cows the Great Father intended to send them, asking the question again with considerable emphasis: "Will you keep them?" Old Spot then went as close to the commissioner as he could get, and making a trumpet of his hands, pointed it toward the commissioner's ear and yelled: "Yes, we will keep them; put this in your ear and take it to the Great Father."

While in Washington the Indians were disposed to treat the Government officials respectfully and decorously; but they were prone to exhibit the other side of their nature when they met the same representatives at their agencies where they were at home, and not oppressed into obedience by any civilized environment.

When the commissioner had concluded, Spotted Tail arose to reply. Commissioner Hayt, by the way, was a very bald-headed man. The matter of the removal of the Indians to points in the interior of their vast reservation was the one uppermost in the minds of the chiefs and head-men and they all demanded it, but the common people among them were indifferent and many opposed it. Spotted Tail, however, said:

I have not much to say, and there is no occasion for much talking. The Great Father has promised that we should be permitted to move in the spring, and I have confidence in him and believe that when he makes a promise he intends to fulfill it. The Great Father has a great many bald-headed men about him, and sometimes he sends some of his bald-headed men out among the Indians. My experience is that all bald-headed men are liars, and I can place no confidence in what they say. We have the promise of the Great Father that we shall be moved to an agency more to our liking in the spring. We have waited long beyond the time for the fulfillment of that promise. We will wait ten days longer, and then if the word of the Great Father is not redeemed, I will bring my young men here, burn these buildings, and move ourselves. I have selected a place for our future home; we are going there, and it is useless for you to say that we shall not go, or that we shall go to some other place.

Spotted Tail had reached that friendly and familiar position in his intercourse with the whites that he felt that he could talk plain and yet not give offense, for it was not believed he would commit any overt act or do more than express his somewhat heated sentiments. Though ordinarily mild and tractable, he had the reputation of being something of a whirlwind when aroused by anger, and it was therefore deemed imprudent to oppose him. It was also understood that the commission to select the new agencies had already been appointed and would shortly be in the field to designate the new locations.

Mr. Hayt was conspicuously bald-headed, which might have inclined the hostile savage, seeking scalps, to regard him with disfavor. Spotted Tail had noticed this absence of hirsute on the commissioner's head, when he alluded to the fabricating propensities of bald-headed men. The Indians all have long black hair, and it is claimed that their prejudice against the bald-headed whites arises from the absence of their scalp-lock.

CHAPTER LXIV

ARMY AND CIVIL AUTHORITY CONTEST FOR CONTROL OF INDIANS

RED CLOUD AND SPOTTED TAIL REMOVED TO THE MISSOURI RIVER—SECRETARY SCHURZ VISITS DAKOTA AND THE INDIANS—STANLEY COMMISSION SELECTS AGENCY SITES IN THE INTERIOR—COLONEL POLLOCK—HARNEY CITY—NEW ROSEBUD AGENCY—CIVILIZATION A PLANT OF SLOW GROWTH—INDUSTRIES OF THE YANKTON INDIANS—MILITARY CHIEFTAINS CRITICISE CIVIL CONTROL OF INDIANS—CONGRESSIONAL IDEA THAT CIVIL CONTROL IS A FAILURE—SHERIDAN TELLS OF THE MILLIONS WASTED—SCHURZ REPLIES—HAYES MILDLY DEFENDS PEACE POLICY.

The selection of agency grounds, and the erection of the numerous necessary buildings for the permanent agencies for these two powerful and numerous tribes, numbering over six thousand people in each, had all been commenced early in the spring of 1877, by the superintendent of Dakota, Gen. J. H. Hammond, and were completed and ready for occupation by midsummer.

The agency for Red Cloud was at or near the mouth of Medicine Creek, a western tributary of the Missouri River, about one hundred and eighty miles by river, above Fort Randall, and thirty-eight miles below old Fort George, and nearly opposite the upper end of the Big Bend of the Missouri in Buffalo County. From the Crow Creek Agency it was eighteen miles by land, and sixty by river. This was the agency for the Oglalas and Arrapahoes under Red Cloud and was to be known as the Medicine Agency. The journey of Red Cloud's people from Pine Ridge, comprising a colony of over six thousand people, men, women and children, a majority women and children, with their personal effects, was a great hardship, and they protested strongly against it. For a time they rebelled to the extent that thousands of them halted when part way across and demanded that their supplies be hauled out to them, that they were exhausted and could go no further. Their waiting camps were scattered along the White River for a distance of sixty miles. The agent at Medicine refused to send them any subsistence, and in the course of weeks hunger broke their stubborn spirit and they began to move toward the source of supplies, but November had dawned before they had all reached their new Missouri domicile. The superintendent had collected an abundance of food and raiment which had been stored in commodious warehouses. The supplies had been shipped up the river on the steamboats during the summer. It was this advantage for landing the Indian supplies economically that induced the Government, by the Treaty of '76 to require the agencies to be located on the Missouri River.

Spotted Tail's Indians, the Brules, had preceded the Oglalas and were located at the old Ponca Agency above the mouth of the Niobrara, about thirty-five miles below Fort Randall. They also numbered about six thousand, and occupied a large tract in Todd County. Their journey had been made with little complaint, this distance being less than sixty-five miles for many of them. The same care and expensive preparations had been made to accommodate the Spotted Tail Tribe of Brules as were provided for the Oglalas, namely—A warehouse, a stable with stable yard, a corral and weighing corral, a mill, the scales and scale house, and one slaughter house with corral ground.

The agencies for Spotted Tail and his Brules, numbering 6,500, were divided, one being located at Whetstone Creek on the Missouri, twenty-five miles above Fort Randall, and the other, and principal one, at the old Ponca Agency, twenty miles below Fort Randall. The buildings were all substantial structures and intended for permanent use.

It appears that it had already been agreed upon by the commissioner of Indian Affairs at Washington, Mr. Hayt, who was decidedly opposed to any further return of the Indians to the interior, that a strong effort should be made to induce the Indians to release the President from his promise to return them inland, and to make their homes on the Missouri permanently. The President was said to have consented that the effort should be made, convinced that he had not had a full understanding of the situation when he made the promise to the chiefs.

The presence of such a body of wild and partially civilized Indians in such proximity to the settled portions of the territory excited some apprehensions for the safety of the white settlers; but the winter passed away without a serious disturbance.

CARL SCHURZ IN DAKOTA

Secretary of the Interior Hon. Carl Schurz reached Yankton August 25, 1879, accompanied by Webb C. Hayes, son of the President; Count Donhoff, secretary of the German legation at Washington; H. Gallieur, of New York; John M. Corson, chief of the Washington bureau of the New York Times; E. P. Hanna, private secretary; and ex-Mayor Mark M. Sheafe, of Elk Point. The citizens of Yankton, led by the mayor, gave the distinguished party an appropriate reception, and a big feast at the Jencks Hotel. Mr. Schurz and party were on their way to the Indian country where the secretary expected to visit, and investigate matters at many of the principal Indian agencies. They departed from Yankton on the steamboat Benton, stopping briefly at the Yankton Agency, and thence to Rosebud Landing near the mouth of Whetstone Creek; and thence overland. The overland journey to Spotted Tail's Agency, otherwise called the Rosebud, distance about seventy-five miles, was without unusual incident. Schurz had been in the Union army during the Civil war and enjoyed "roughing it." The party reached Rosebud September 5th, and were cordially received, Spotted Tail making the welcoming address. He complained that the Indians had no money—that the traders had got all the money and sent it East. Schurz reminded Spot that the trader was obliged to send the money East to buy more goods for his trade because the Indians did not manufacture anything. Spot replied that he "knew that was one reason, and he had saved a lot of watermelon seed to plant next year."

Maj. J. C. Newell was the agent at this agency, appointed from Ypsilanti, Mich. It is related that Mr. Schurz became slightly acquainted with all the white officers and employees about the agency. The physician was introduced to Mr. Schurz, and during a brief conversation informed him that he was "from Ypsilanti, Mich., Mr. Newell's old home." Schurz thought little of it at the time, but in the course of getting acquainted he ascertained that all the sub-officials and about all the employees were from Ypsilanti, and he began to ponder over it, and finally meekly inquired of the agent if there was "anybody still living in Ypsilanti."

STANLEY COMMISSION SELECTS AGENCY POINTS

In accordance with the promise made to Red Cloud and Spotted Tail by President Hayes the location of their agencies was changed the following year. The Stanley Commission, appointed to select locations for these headquarter points in the interior of the reservation, was composed of Major General Stanley, Maj. J. M. Hawarth, and Rev. A. L. Riggs. This commission met at Yankton July 5, 1878, and adjourned to the Spotted Tail Agency, then located just above the mouth of the Niobrara River, called by the French, Leau qui Court. The commission went their way in quest of a site and were not long in agreeing upon a location on the Rosebud Creek, about seventy-five miles west of the Missouri River, for the Brules, Spotted Tail's Indians. This location had been previously selected by Spotted Tail, and was therefore satisfactory to the Indians, and as soon as the necessary arrangements for transferring the agency property could be made the agency was removed, under direction of Major Pollock, the agent, to the mouth of the Rosebud, on the south fork of White River, in Meyer County. The main body of Spotted Tail's people began moving the last week in July almost entirely depopulating the rich valley of Ponca Creek, where thousands had been residing and which afforded them many comforts and advantages.

Colonel Pollock, who was inspector of Indian affairs in Dakota under the Hayes administration, was a remarkably able man in that field. He was born in Ohio, in Union County, in 1836, afterwards removed with his parents to Illinois, at an early age. He joined a caravan of gold seekers who were bound for Pike's Peak, in 1858, and in 1862 left the Colorado diggings and went to the newer discoveries in Idaho and Northwestern Dakota, now Montana, where he remained several years engaged in mining and selling merchandise to the mining people, and at the same time doing considerable trade with the Indians, where he acquired a sufficient knowledge of their language to enable him to transact business with them without an interpreter. He also became interested in the race, studied their relations with the Government, their treatment by their agents, and various matters connected with them, which resulted in attaching him quite closely to the Indian race as a friend who believed that the Indian was to a great extent the victim of pernicious dishonesty practiced by many of those who had been entrusted with their practical or business affairs in connection with the Government. The result was that he espoused their cause whenever opportunity offered, and being abundantly courageous in speaking his mind, and a man of good ability, and withal equipped with much practical experience gained from his association with them during his life in the West, he was recommended to Mr. Hayes as a proper man to discharge the duties of an Indian inspector, and was appointed to that position or as superintendent and given charge of the northern superintendency, which included Dakota. The most important matter connected with the Sioux at the time, was their removal from the Missouri River to the interior of the reservation. Bids for doing the work which consisted in great part of the transportation of the stores and the material for the new Rosebud Agency, were called for but were found so largely in excess of appropriations and also of expectations that Pollock determined upon doing the work without the assistance of contractors, and for this purpose he ordered 100 wagons and harness for 100 horses, which were shipped forthwith to Rosebud Landing, where the wagons were put together, under Pollock's supervision, with Spotted Tail acting with him. As the wagons were put together they were taken to the warehouses and loaded, their contents inventoried, when the vehicle was hauled up on the plateau; and thus proceeded until the entire 100 wagons had been loaded, covered with canvass and stood in order in a great semi-circle on the plateau above the agency. The Indians now came in with their ponies, and great was their enthusiasm when they beheld the long array of new wagons, all their own. It was Pollock's design to have the Indians do the hauling with their ponies and the following morning a suit of clothing was issued to each of the 100 teamsters. None of them had ever before been dressed in a suit of white man's clothes, and now came a remarkable and rapid change. Blankets were thrown aside, and pantaloons were drawn upon legs for the first time, vests followed, then coats, then hats. The transformation was finally complete, and as was remarked by the agent, "the wild, reckless, careless savage had disappeared, and a hundred men, clad in the garb of civilization, had taken their places." The harnessing of the ponies followed, and was accomplished with some difficulty, owing largely to the size of the harness, which had been made for ordinary horses which are much larger than the ponies.

Every white man present lent a hand, however, and it was finally finished. As the teams were made up and hitched to a wagon, an effort would be made to start. Some of the ponies balked, went backward, refusing to pull, some went forward, and some started off at a brisk gallop in every direction. The Indians knew nothing about driving, and their ponies had never been broken to harness, but finally all these disagreeable features were adjusted, safely, and the grand train moved westward in orderly procession, a caravan over a mile in length, and four days later reached the new agency on the Rosebud.

The results, direct and indirect, growing out of this incident, were looked upon in later years as having a valuable and salutary bearing upon the new industrial life of the Indian. He had "broken the ice," had learned something about work, had discovered that it was not as disagreeable as he had apprehended, and thoroughly enjoyed the compensation which was paid to each one for his share of the labor. The incident was quite helpful. It was also less expensive, by $5,000, so estimated by the agent, than the price demanded by contractors. Pollock remained in the Indian field for some years, and retired with an honorable record.

From Rosebud the Stanley commission proceeded west in quest of a location for Red Cloud and his 7,000 Oglalas, which had already been indicated by Red Cloud. The commission found two excellent sites, one on Wounded Knee Creek, a tributary of White River, 175 miles from the Missouri, and the other on White Clay Creek, 210 miles distant. The White Clay location was selected. On this mission the Stanley commission was accompanied by James B. O'Bierne, correspondent of New York Herald. Mr. E. K. Hayt, son of the commissioner of Indian affairs, accompanied the party.

Red Cloud's Agency was removed from Medicine to White Clay Creek late in August, 1878. Here substantial buildings were erected, and the main agency located. A sub-agent was retained at Yellow Medicine, where the Lower Brule tribe was located, and the agency became an adjunct of the agency at Crow Creek.

In 1878 the new agency established for the Oglala tribe under Chief Red Cloud, was built on White Clay Creek, a southern tributary of White River, and within fifty miles of the Black Hills. It was built on the border of the famous pine lands which were abundant, and which furnished the material for the buildings. From this circumstance it obtained the name of the Pine Ridge Agency. It was about two hundred miles west and south of Whetstone Landing on the Missouri River, and about the same distance from Fort Randall which was twenty-five miles below Whetstone. A first class highway connected the agency with the Whetstone depot where the steam boats deposited the supplies. A steam boiler, weighing ten tons was transported from Whetstone to Pine Ridge during the summer. There were about six thousand Sioux at Pine Ridge and a few hundred of the Arrapahoes and Cheyennes.

The supply depot at the mouth of the Whetstone, was retained for both the Rosebud and Pine Ridge agencies. The roads from this depot to the agencies had been surveyed and marked by the Stanley commission, who had finally determined the distances from the Missouri to the Rosebud, to be sixty miles; and to White Clay, 160 miles. Harney City was located opposite the Whetstone landing, and was notorious for a time as the liveliest settlement in the territory.

The Rosebud or Spotted Tail Indian Agency, the official headquarters of the Brule tribe of Sioux Indians, was about as complete in all essentials, as any of the numerous agencies in Dakota. It was built in 1878, after a lengthy and expensive contention between the Government and the Indians, in which leading army officers as well as civil dignitaries took part. Its location and substantial improvement was a decided victory for the Indians.

It was situated about eighty miles west of old Fort Randall. It was built on a small plateau surrounded by high bluffs. East of the agency flows the Rosebud Creek which empties its waters into the south fork of White River, three miles below. A light stockade, enclosing an area 400x500 feet, surrounded the agency buildings. The agent's office was on the north side, in dimensions 20x40 feet, divided into three apartments, accommodating the agent, clerk and physician. It also contained an ante-room for visiting Indians, and a sleeping room for the clerk. West of the office at a convenient distance, was a large L-shaped building, 200 feet in length and 30 feet in width; the issue store and warehouse. Its storage capacity was ample for a year's supply for the nearly seven thousand Indians who drew supplies from the agency. South of the warehouse was the private residence of the agent, 38x40, two stories, with a veranda on the east and south. It was equal in finish and internal arrangement to the best of ordinary modern residence buildings. South of the agent's domicile was the school-house, 30x40 feet, divided into two rooms, and was in charge of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Southwest stands another warehouse, 30x70 feet, used exclusively for the storage of corn and flour. East of the school building was a row of four buildings, each 18x30, used as shops for the wagon maker, blacksmith, carpenter, harness maker, and painter. South of the office stands a large two-story double dwelling, for the physician and farmer. The buildings were painted white and presented a pleasing appearance. Outside the stockade a short distance were the stables. The corral and slaughter house were conveniently arranged for issuing and slaughtering the beef, and were located three-quarters a mile away on the lower Rosebud. North of the agency buildings stood the traders' two stores. South of the stockade was Charles Tackett's store. He was an adopted member of the tribe. On the east bank of the Rosebud stood a neat and inviting mission chapel in charge of Rev. Wm. Cleveland, cousin of Grover Cleveland. There were thirteen regular officers and attaches at the agency, and as many more employees who were assistants to the farmer, blacksmith, and carpenter. There were also six herders and twelve laborers; and in addition the ox-train with twenty-four teamsters, under a train master. This train did the hauling from the supply depot on the Missouri River. The drivers were all Indians, and they were paid $20 a ton for hauling. There was a saw-mill seven miles away on the south fork of White River, operated by steam power when the water in the creek was low. The mill cut 3,000 feet of lumber a day, and 3,000 shingles could be made daily at the shingle mill. The agency farm lay between the agency and sawmill enclosed by a substantial fence. It contained a good farm house and stables, and furnished an agricultural school to the Indians who manifested a desire to learn how to farm.

Spotted Tail, the head chief, had built a very good residence building near by. It was larger than the agent and fitted up in comfortable style and somewhat expensively. Spotted Tail was said to be in the employ of the Government at a good salary, but the character of his services was not explained further than a suggestion that he saved the Government a great deal of money through his influence in keeping the Indians peaceable and encouraging them to industry. The chief's residence was two-stories, and contained eight rooms beside a council chamber and an audience room. He had four wives and was about to take another, as he had plenty of room to keep them separate. Three of his wives were sisters, and the fourth was their first cousin. The fifth that he was wooing was a sister of this cousin. Spot explained that it was the custom to marry all the sisters and near relatives, so the wives wouldn't quarrel. White Thunder, who ranked next to Spot, had five wives, four of whom were sisters and the fifth their aunt.

Spotted Tail in 1879, was about fifty years old, five feet ten inches in height, weighed a hundred and seventy pounds. He had a quiet demeanor, an intelligent face, and wore a pleased expression. He looked squarely in the eyes of those he conversed with. Speaking of the progress the Indians were making in their industrial life, he said they were doing well, and would do better. They were anxious to be self-supporting. He said the Indians did not like to be dependent on white people. Speaking about the Indians' foods, the chief said that the Great Father's secretary that some of the Indian children had been to school for six years and did not know any more about the English language than when they began. He said:

We do not care about having our children taught to read and write the Dakota language. They know the Dakota better than their teachers, and they talk it enough at home. What we want them to learn is the English language; we want them to be able to read, write and talk in English. If we old folks cannot read nor understand English, we want our children to be able to translate for us the newspapers and tell us what the white people are doing. So long as we have Dakota teachers we will not send our children to school. We would like to have a large boarding school where we could send our children and have them taught by civilians and not by ministers. I am tired of them and do not want them here.

My people get a dollar a hundred for freighting and make a great deal of money. Go to their tepees and see the furniture they have; look at the children's clothes, the wives' ornaments, and it will be seen that the Indians have begun to understand the value of money. The time is passed when the white people can sell us brass for gold and get our ponies for nothing. Our agent is building a grist mill for us now and a bakery that will bake 400 loaves of bread a day. The Indian women have not learned to make good bread yet, and they waste a lot of flour. Another thing would please the Indians; the Great Father should appoint the Indian traders from among our own people; then the money he made would stay with our people and not be sent away to enrich the whites.

At this time there were some 7,000 people at the Rosebud who traded there, showing that Spotted Tail was fully appreciative of the value of the patronage of the people of his realm.

The new policy could not in the nature of its purposes move ahead at all rapidly, and therefore some of its supporters and early advocates grew disheartened and expressed discouraging apprehensions of its outcome, but this class, while respectable and somewhat influential, were not essential to the pursuit of the policy, and did not hinder it. From some one, or more, of a dozen reasons, they had become convinced that the Indian could not be civilized, and it was never intended that he should be. This had been the opinion of nine-tenths of the white people up to about the time the Territory of Dakota was organized. Civilization is a plant of slow growth. It does not make much appreciable advancement during one year, and little change can be expected in five years, though to the experienced and friendly person, engaged in promoting it, encouraging progress was observed among the Dakota Indians very early after the new policy was given the whole field, and this progress never slackened, but has been subject to periods of unusual advancement. It was not expected, at least by those who had given the matter their attention and their personal aid, that much change could be accomplished with the adults—it was expected to wean them away from the hunt, the tepee and the blanket, and furnish them something more harmful to occupy their time. It was the young people and the generations to be born, that were to justify the wisdom of the policy, who were to become accustomed to the atmosphere of civilization in their dress, their plays, their schools, where they were taught the English language and could thereby better comprehend the advantages of a civilized life and an industrious one. The young were to see and experience as little as possible of the former savage and barbarous life, and imbibe a lasting distaste for it.

THE YANKTONS AS MECHANICS

In mechanical industries not a great deal was looked for from the Indians. Those best acquainted with Indian character and best qualified to pronounce upon the kind of employment best suited to his nature and genius, recommended outdoor employments—the rearing of livestock first, which it was expected he would excel in, and along with it the growing of grain. It was therefore a matter that evoked considerable surprise and favorable comment when the territorial fair was opened at Yankton early in October, 1877, to find an exhibit there of staple useful articles wholly manufactured by the Indians of the Yankton Tribe.

It consisted of serviceable wagons, woolen fabrics, tin ware, ornamental bead and porcupine work, in quantity, together with grain and vegetables. The wheels and tongue of the wagons were the products of Indian genius as well as the parts requiring less skillful labor. Wheelbarrows were also shown of their own manufacture. Their woolen fabrics spun and woven at the Yankton Agency from wool of sheep sent to them by Indian Commissioner Smith a few years earlier and a flock themselves had raised, were well made up, were strong and serviceable, and many of them handsome in design. They were equal in quality and by many thought superior to the woolen goods furnished by the Government. The tin ware was pronounced equal in quality to any shown at the fair, and the woolen articles had no competitors made in the territory. In addition to premiums the red men and women received many congratulatory testimonials.

TRANSFER OF INDIAN BUREAU BEFORE CONGRESS

Congress had, at the session of 1878-79 and later, a joint committee, which had under consideration the transfer of the Indian bureau to the war department, and there was a fair prospect that it would succeed. Sheridan and Sherman were making strenuous efforts to effect it, and were backed by nearly all the military influence in Dakota, especially General Gibbons, who was then in command of the Dakota military district. The Crow Creek troubles were calculated to aid the transfer of the bureau as showing rascality under the interior department.

And about this time (Congress having just met, December, 1878), General Sherman filed an official communication with the Senate committee regarding the Indian situation in Dakota, in which he spoke disparagingly of Red Cloud and Spotted Tail affairs, and said:

It requires no prophet to foresee more wars near at hand, especially with the Sioux on the Upper Niobrara. The present Indian agents with these tribes, and also with the others on the Missouri River, at the Lower Brule, Cheyenne, Standing Rock and Fort Peck, are utterly and ridiculously powerless to keep their Indians peaceable, without the aid of the army. To me it is a matter of demonstration that for the present time, and for years to come, the Indian bureau itself, without the help of the army, cannot maintain in peace the larger tribes of the Indians, and peace is essential to enable the white emigrants to fill up the country.

General Gibbons, commanding the District of Dakota, in his report to the general of the army, commenting rather satirically upon the religious denomination control of the Indians, said:

The average Indian agent, intent upon the spiritual welfare of the red man, desirous of elevating the soul and achieving what has never yet been reached in a single generation—making a civilized man of him—but too frequently neglects his bodily wants, and while the agent is preparing him for heaven, as he thinks, is actually making a hell for him upon earth by leaving him unclothed and unfed, while but too frequently the price of his clothing and food is put into the agent's pocket.

The removal of the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail Indian agencies from the Missouri River to Rosebud, and White Clay Creek, displeased General Sherman, who was then in command of the army, and also General Sheridan, then in command of the great and important Division of the Missouri, wherein were located all the troublesome Indians. The generals laid the responsibility of the removal upon the interior department in charge of Hon. Carl Schurz, and the occasion gave rise to a newspaper controversy in which the generals and the secretary of the interior, appeared as principals and champions, and gave an illustration, though not a definite answer, to the proverb, that "the pen is mightier than the sword."

The military people had not abandoned the hope of securing a transfer of this Indian bureau. A pen and ink contest had been waging eloquently and aggressively for nearly twenty years. The misfortunes which had been endured to the administration of Secretary Schurz, and his active representative commissioner of Indian affairs, Mr. Hayt, gave the military people an advantage which they did not fail to improve; and Congress was prevailed upon to raise a joint committee from members of the Senate and House to investigate the transfer question.

The House members of this committee made a long report, in which it was stated:

The history of the governmental management of Indians, and the treatment which the Indians had received from the Government, was a shame and a mortification to all right-thinking and liberal-minded men. A proper solution of the Indian problem is pressing itself more strongly upon public attention every year, and is demanding the immediate attention of Congress, and cannot, with either safety to the Indians, or the honor of the Government, be longer delayed. Fraud and mismanagement are notoriously conspicuous in the Indian service; and we believe the interests of the Government and the good of the Indians will be best promoted by transferring the management of Indian affairs to the war department, leaving it discretionary with the secretary of war to appoint civil agents to those agencies which, in his judgment, the interest of all concerned will be best secured by such agent, and officers of the army where the interests of the service require it.

This indicates a remarkable change in the sentiment of Congress during the Hayes administration, but it did not reflect the majority sentiment, and was in direct conflict with the theory of the peace policy or industrial policy, which had made an encouraging beginning and was making progress.

The present occasion which brought this matter again before the country, was the removal of the Dakota Indians above referred to. The military people were strongly opposed to this step, and it was in direct contradiction of the terms of the Black Hills agreement in 1876, and also of the Sherman Treaty of 1868, which provided that all supplies for the Indians should be delivered to them at points on the Missouri River. It is easily seen that there was a great saving of transportation charges by this arrangement. Steamboats could carry the Indian supplies to depots on the river, where the Indians could receive them. On the other hand, with the receiving depots in the interior, there would be a long railway haul from Omaha, over the Union Pacific to Sydney, Neb., thence by wagons to the depots; and it was asserted that the cost of this transportation doubled the cost of the goods.

The Missouri and Yellowstone rivers were also the strategic base of military operations, and the construction of the substantial forts required, and temporary camps could be proceeded with in a systematic and comparatively economical manner, a feature of military administration which received the closest scrutiny of the generals, for it was only by the most persistent and earnest persuasion that they were able to get from Congress the appropriations needed to build posts and maintain the defenses on the western frontier. The cost of a first class fort, in some cases reached as high as a quarter of a million dollars for a good fort was a good-sized village in magnitude, and necessarily substantial. Sheridan said, after the Custer massacre, that "If he could have had the money to build two forts on the Yellowstone, that awful tragedy would not have occurred."

This question of expensive transportation, and the military base on the rivers, were strong points in the claims of the war department. General Sheridan had stated in one of his letters that Red Cloud and Spotted Tail had been allowed to select their agencies in the interior owing to a systematic working up of the case by traders and contractors.

Schurz retaliated by stating that the "policy was adopted by his department on the earnest advice of the distinguished Indian fighter and manager, General Crook, who, as a result of long experience with the Sioux, opposed any policy that would force the Indians, against their unanimous and determined protest, to stay on the Missouri River, as seriously endangering our peaceful relations with those powerful tribes." Secretary Schurz evidently overlooked the fact that up to the last moment, he had, through the protest of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs Hayt, opposed the removal, and Spotted Tail defiantly informed Mr Hayt that he would burn the buildings on the Missouri River, if any obstruction were placed in the way of removal.

As this matter was understood by Dakotans, this location of the Indian agencies was not governed altogether by motives of economy, and the wishes of the great majority of the Indians were not considered. The chiefs assumed that they knew best what was most advantageous for the Indians and were not accustomed to consult their people in order to ascertain their sentiment. The great mass of the Indians at that time were not well informed on any matter affecting their welfare as the Government was endeavoring to promote it. It is altogether probable that the transportation companies were also interested. The steamboat people, backed by the Indian Rights Association, favoring the water route. Red Cloud, who was at Pine Ridge or in that vicinity where he was located in the interior, was 108 miles from the Missouri River. He was friendly to the Union Pacific and Omaha, where the opposition to the Missouri route was quite pronounced, and where General Crook, who is quoted by Secretary Schurz, had his headquarters, he being at the time in command of the department of the Platte.

This removal furnished an opportunity for urging a transfer of the Indian management to the war department, and though the transfer appeared to hait with the friendly report of the House committee, the army for a number of years was maintained in the territory, and detachments of troops were stationed in camps or temporary posts, at convenient distances from the agencies. Among the people of Dakota who were interested in the proposition, it was held that the Missouri River offered the most economical route for the Indian business, taking into consideration the fact that the supplies for the military must come by that route, and frequently the same vessel that brought supplies for the troops carried possibly an equal or greater amount for the Indians. But the opinion was quite pronounced among the people that the settlement of the Missouri Valley and its safety from depredations by lawless redmen, would be best assured by the location of the Indians at interior points, to be furnished with their supplies from depots located on the river, by wagon trains operated by Indian labor. This plan was the one finally adopted, in part.

The Indians, as a matter of course, were irreconcilably opposed to being transferred to the war department. The day had passed when the wishes of the Indians were not taken into consideration by the Government. It appeared that as the officers of the Government became more intimately acquainted with the nature and intelligence of the Indian, who apparently began to realize the unselfish and continued efforts that were being made in his behalf by the pale-faced people, that distrust and suspicion gave way to confidence, and a sentiment of friendship gradually developed in the breasts of the untutored savage. Thus familiarity bred respect and confidence.

The growth of improvement was looked upon as unnecessarily tardy, but it was substantial growth nevertheless and fully justified as such by its beneficial and permanent progress and results. It grew as the shapely tree grows, stronger and better, and the worst vices of the savage gradually disappeared. They have no abiding place in Dakota.

SHERIDAN'S ATTACKS ON UNNECESSARY EXPENDITURES

In a letter to General Sherman, in November, 1878, General Sheridan called attention to the prodigious expense the army is put to because of the frequent removal of the Indians by the interior department, from point to point, and the entire dependency of the Indian bureau upon the army to manage the Indians and maintain peaceful relations. Sheridan's letter is an answer to a communication sent by Secretary Schurz to the general of the army, Sherman, in the same portant as showing how Government appropriations may be practically wasted by inexperienced officials.

The agency of the Oglala Sioux, ten or twelve years ago (in 1866-68), was at Fort Laramie, an expensive post built to control these Indians. The agency was removed from this post by the Indian bureau to Camp Robinson, on Shadron Creek, to avoid the presence of the military. Shortly after the necessity for a military force compelled that bureau to ask for troops to be sent to Camp Robinson, and a new post was built there at an expense which the general of the army can well comprehend.

The Spotted Tail, or Brule Sioux, were then at the Whetstone agency on the Missouri River, not far from where Fort Randall had been built, to give it and other interests protection, but these Indians were removed to Camp Sheridan, 250 miles farther west, and being unable after a time to get along without troops, a new post had to be established there at great expense. These Indians have been again moved and two more posts established since. They are now at Wounded Knee Creek and Big White Clay, and by and by the necessity of having troops will compel the erection of two new posts at each of these localities. These removals have cost us hundreds of thousands of dollars, and no one can tell how soon a new change may be made.

The Indians now at Standing Rock were first located at Grand River, and a military force was requested and Fort Yates was established to help govern them. Soon after they were moved up to Standing Rock, and being unable to do without troops, the post at Grand River had to be moved there. The post at Fort Sully was established to control the Yanktonnais and Minneconjoux Sioux, but the agency was moved up the river to get away from it, and in a little while a new post had to be established there. The post at the Lower Brule agency was subjected to and followed the same conditions.

The post at Fort Stevenson was established to control the Gros Ventres, whose agency was at Fort Berthold, and subsequently the Gros Ventres agency was moved up to Old Fort Union, and Fort Berthold had to be established and enlarged in the vicinity; and then the Gros Ventres agency was moved up to Fort Peck, and the troops had to follow there, and then the agency was moved down to Poplar Creek, so that it will be seen that this matter of moving agencies about was well understood. Now these removals, which have absorbed millions of our appropriations in the last ten years, would naturally suggest the inquiry, "What were the reasons that influenced them?" It could not be to have better soil, or less expenses, because the soil was no better, and the expense of supply was greater.

These changes, and the reports of army officers from the highest to the lowest (and which are to be found in the office of the general of the army), on the subject of bad management, frauds and corruptions, will furnish the best and most reliable evidence to sustain the remark made. In addition, I have had, by visits to agencies and military posts, opportunities to get the views and impressions of people there, and I am led to the conclusion that the main causes for these removals was hostility to army officers because of their reports, which come in the way of their official duties; and after the removals were made from place to place it was found that the Indians could not be controlled, and troops had to follow; first one company and then a post. During the six and a half years of my service on the Pacific Coast before the war, most of which time I was on Indian reservations, I observed the same jealousies and arising from the same cause.

The changes named are only some of the instances of the expensive conditions attending the administration of Indian affairs which have to be borne by the army, and which cry out loudly for reforms. It can scarcely be possible that the honorable the secretary of the interior, means to take up the defense of Indian management for the last quarter of a century. Then why should he have used language toward me as he has in his communication to the honorable secretary of war? There can be no excuse for his want of knowledge on the subject, and that does not excuse the stilted tone and the language used.

* * * I fully understand the relations of the military to the civil administration of the Government, certainly as well as the secretary of the interior, and know nothing in those relations which should prevent me from calling the attention of my superiors to unnecessary waste of the public money through the bad administration of the Indian bureau.

P. H. SHERIDAN,

Lieutenant General United States Army.

SCHURZ EXPLAINS

In his annual report for 1878, submitted November 28, Secretary Schurz presents his opinions of the much mooted management of Indians, which he has formed during his nearly two years incumbency of the cabinet position which he has held. Reference has already been made to the political party conditions existing at the time, which were of a character to induce extraordinary investigations of the doings of the previous administration for the purpose of showing that it had not deserved the confidence and good opinion of the American people to the extent these had been accorded to it. Both administrations were under republican presidents and cabinets but the foes of one's own household are proverbially much more uncompromising than foes of a separate household. Hence, it was discovered that Secretary Schurz found affairs in the Indian management in a reprehensible condition. Concerning this division of his department, he says:

The Indian service has been reorganized in several of its branches. It was found necessary to remove a number of agents on account of improper practices or lack of business efficiency, and great care has been taken in filling their places with new men. Where mistakes were found to have been made in the selections they have been promptly rectified. Important changes have been made in the contract system and methods of accountability. Active supervision has been exercised by inspectors and special agents. Detection of fraud has been followed by vigorous prosecution, and on the whole I feel enabled to say the character of the service has been raised in point of integrity and efficiency. I am, however, far from pretending that the present condition of Indian affairs is what it ought to be. Experience gained in earnest effort to overcome difficulties and correct abuses has enabled me to appreciate more clearly the task still to be accomplished. Gradual improvements can be effected only by patient, energetic and well-directed work in detail. An entirely satisfactory state of things can be brought about only under circumstances which are not and cannot be under control of the Indian service alone.

1. If a recurrence of the Indian trouble is to be avoided, the appropriations made by Congress for the support of the Indians who are not self-supporting must be liberal enough to be sufficient for that purpose, and they must be made early enough in the year to render the purchase and delivery of new supplies possible before the old supplies are exhausted.

2. The Indian service should have at its disposal a sufficient fund to be used with proper accountability, at discretion, in unforeseen circumstances.

3. Citizens of the western states and territories must be made to understand that if the Indians are to cease to be troublesome, the paupers and vagabonds are to become orderly and self-supporting. They must have lands fit for agriculture and pasture; that on such lands they must be permitted to reign and establish permanent homes, and that such result cannot be obtained if the white people insist upon taking from them, by force or trickery, every acre of ground that is good for anything.

The first of two things can be accomplished by appropriate action on the part of Congress. The difficulties growing out of the continually reported encroachments by people on the rights of the Indians may be lessened by the concentration of the Indians on a smaller number of reservations.

To keep Indians on their reservation and prevent disturbances and conflicts, the commissioner of Indian affairs recommends the organization of a mounted body of Indian police or auxiliaries, to be drawn from the young men of the various tribes, and to be under the command of the military authorities. I heartily concur in this recommendation. It is a matter of general experience that the Indian so employed can be depended upon as to loyal fidelity to the duties assigned him.

The principal end of our Indian policy consists in gradually introducing among the Indians, habits and occupations of civilized life, by inducing them to work for their own support, by encouraging pride of individual ownership of property, and by educating the young generation; and no efforts should be spared to bring to bear upon them proper moral influences in that direction. Such efforts should not be sneered at as mere sensational fancies, nor should they be discouraged by the assertion that success is impossible. The advance made by some Indian tribes is sufficient proof that similar advance may be made by others.

The Sioux, so far, have given evidence of a loyal spirit, and rumors current that they were showing a hostile disposition, proved unfounded. Great difficulty was encountered in sending supplies from Missouri River to the new agencies in consequence of the combination of transportation contractors to force the Government to pay exorbitant prices. The bids were rejected and an organization of wagon trains, to be manned by Indians with their ponies, preceded with their task, which was difficult, owing to the character of the country and the circumstance that the grass had been burnt off the plains between the Missouri River and the new agencies, as rumor has it, by evil disposed persons to bring about a failure of this experiment, but it has so far been unsuccessful.

PRESIDENT HAYES MENTIONS THE TRANSFER

President Hayes, in his message to Congress in December, 1879, states the status of that movement in Congress and his position toward it, in the following brief paragraphs:

The question whether a change in the control of the Indian service should be made, was in the forty-fifth Congress referred to a joint committee of both houses for inquiry and report. In my last annual message I expressed the hope that the decision of that question, then in prospect, "would arrest further agitation of this subject, such agitation being apt to produce a disturbing effect upon the service, as well as upon the Indians themselves." Since then, the committee having reported, the question has been decided in the negative by a vote in the House of Representatives.

For the reasons here stated, and in view of the fact that further uncertainty on this point will be calculated to obstruct other much needed legislation, to weaken the discipline of the service, and to unsettle salutary measures now in progress for the government and improvement of the Indians, I respectfully recommend that the decision arrived at by Congress at its last session, be permitted to stand.

PRESIDENT ARTHUR'S VIEW OF INDIAN POLICY

In his first message to Congress, December, 1881, Pres. Chester A. Arthur presents the question of Indian affairs in a very intelligent, candid and practical manner, and in doing so highly commends the peace policy which had then been pursued for about ten years with favorable results. As Dakota was then the important field in which the Government was engaged with its industrial policy, the suggestions and comments of the President will be locally interesting. The President said:

Prominent among the matters which challenge the attention of Congress at the present session is the management of our Indian affairs. While this question has been the cause of trouble and embarrassment from the infancy of the Republic, it is but recently that any efforts have been made for its solution, at once serious, determined, consistent and promising of success. It has been easier to resort to convenient makeshifts for coping over the temporary difficulties than to grapple with the great permanent problem, and accordingly the easier course has almost invariably been pursued. It was natural, at a time when the national territory seemed almost illimitable, and contained many millions of acres beyond the bounds of civilized settlement, that a policy should have been initiated which, more than ought else, has been the fruitful source of our Indian complications. I refer, of course, to the policy of dealing with the various tribes as separate nationalities; of regulating them by treaty stipulations to the occupancy of immense reservations in the West, and of encouraging them to live undisturbed by any earnest and well directed effort to bring them under the influence of civilization. The unsatisfactory results which have sprung from this policy are apparent to all. As the white settlements have crowded the borders of the reservations, the Indians, sometimes contentedly and sometimes against their will, have been transferred to other hunting grounds, from which they have again been dislodged whenever their new found homes have been desired by the adventurous settlers. These removals and the frontier settlements by which they have been succeeded have led to frequent and disastrous conflicts between the races. It is not proper to discuss here which of them has been chiefly responsible for the disturbances, whose recital compels to large a space on the pages of our history. We have to deal with the appalling fact that thousands of lives have been sacrificed and hundreds of millions of dollars expended in the attempts to solve the Indian problem."

It had until the past few years seemed scarcely nearer a solution than it was a century ago; but the Government has of late years been cautiously and steadily moving in the way toward the adoption of a policy which has already produced gratifying results.

which, in my judgment, is likely, if Congress and the Executive accord in its support, to relieve the reservations from the difficulties which have hitherto beset us. For the success of the efforts now making to introduce among the Indians the customs and pursuits of civilized life, and gradually to absorb them into the mass of our citizens, sharing their rights and holding to their responsibilities, there is imperative need of legislative action. My suggestion in that respect will be chiefly such as have already been called to the attention of Congress, and which have received, to some extent, its consideration.

First, I recommend the passage of an act making the laws of the various states and territories applicable to the Indian reservations within their borders, and extending the laws of the State of Arkansas to that portion of the Indian Territory not occupied by the five civilized tribes. The Indians should receive the protection of the law. They should be allowed to maintain in court their rights of person and property. The Indian has repeatedly begged for this privilege and its exercise would be very valuable to him in his progress toward civilization.

Second, and of even greater importance is the measure which has frequently been recommended by my predecessors in office, and for the furtherance of which several bills have, from time to time, been introduced in both houses of Congress: The enactment of a general law permitting the allotment in severalty to such Indians at least as desire it, of a reasonable quantity of land secured to them by patent, and for their own protection made inalienable for a period of twenty or twenty-five years, is demanded for their present welfare and their permanent advancement. In return for such considerate action on the part of the Government, there is reason to believe the Indians in large numbers would be persuaded to sever their tribal relations and to engage at once in agricultural pursuits. They would soon learn that their hunting days were over, and that it is now for their best interests to conform their manner of life to the new order of things. By no greater inducement than the assurance of permanent title to the soil can they be led to engage in the occupation of tilling it. The well attested reports of their increasing interest in husbandry, justifies the hope and belief that the enactment of such a statute as I recommend would at once be attended with gratifying results.

A resort to the allotment system would have a direct and powerful influence in dissolving the tribal band which is a prominent feature of savage life, and which tends so strongly to perpetuate them. I advise a liberal appropriation for the support of Indian schools, because of my confident belief that such a course is consistent with the wisest economy. Even among the most uncultured Indian tribes there is reported to be a general desire on the part of the chiefs and older members, for the education of their children. It is unfortunate, in view of this fact, that during the past years the schools which have been at the command of the interior department for the purpose of Indian instruction, have proved to be utterly inadequate.

The success of the schools which are in operation at Hampton, Carlisle, and Forest Grove, should not only encourage a more generous provision for the support of these institutions, but should prompt the establishment of others of similar character. They are doubtless much more potent for good than the day schools upon the reservations, as the pupils are altogether separated from the surroundings of rough life, and brought into constant contact with civilization.

General Miles spent the summer of 1879 in the north watching Sitting Bull. His supply depot was at Fort Peck and his camp near Bear Paw Mountain.

EARLY MILITARY MOVEMENTS

While at Fort Keogh, in June, 1880, General Miles was ordered by General Sherman, at the request of General Terry, to organize a strong column and move north across the Missouri River, to the country south of the International boundary line, and attack, arrest or drive back the hostile Sioux supposed to be hunting buffalo on American soil, and occasionally attacking whites. This move was expected to be a matter of international interest inasmuch as Sitting Bull and his people were at the time considered to be British subjects, and it was held at Washington that they were invaders.

The army officers campaigning in Western Dakota in 1878 were of the opinion that Sitting Bull could not remain long in British America owing to the scarcity of buffalo in that country, and his people would be compelled to return into the United States to procure meat. The buffalo, always an important factor in considering the Indian question, had now assumed a new importance. General Cook, quite famous in the Indian wars of those years, believed that the decrease of the buffalo had been so rapid that the Indians would have to find some other means of subsistence, and this condition would compel them still more to rely upon the Government. It was estimated that over 100,000 buffalo had been slaughtered every year for the past ten years, and the natural increase had been very much less. The largest proportion of the buffalo killed were cows, and this ratio of decrease in the numbers of the female, pointed to the early extinction, practically, of the animal. Careful estimates regarding the buffalo were made by General Crook, based on the large number of buffalo hides shipped from the various trading posts down the Missouri River. This number was found to be fully 60,000 a year, for several years, and it was known that thousands of buffalo were killed at a season when their hides are worthless for commercial purposes, and were not shipped.

The Indians relied upon pemmican for subsistence when engaged in hostilities and when on the hunt. It was the mainstay of the Indian family; but it could not be prepared by them without buffalo; thus by its disappearance the hostile savage was brought to face a problem of subsistence in a new light. The reader will observe the coincidence of peace, substantially, with the Indian tribes, and the gradual fading away of the buffalo.

It became apparent to the military authorities at the various forts and military camps in the northwest portion of Dakota and Montana, then under command of Gen. Nelson A. Miles, that the recalcitrant and heretofore incorrigible Sioux Indians, who had been associated with Sitting Bull and self-exiled in British America practically since the Custer massacre in 1876, were becoming homesick, and hungry, and were inclined to get back to the Great Father's bountiful table. The evidences of this desire to return were made so plain and authoritative, that the President directed that the Indians should be permitted to return unmolested, and should surrender to the military authorities as prisoners of war; their arms and ponies taken from them, and they sent to such agencies on the Missouri River as the secretary of the interior should designate. It was then intended to sell the ponies and arms, the proceeds to be used to feed and clothe the repentant rebels; there would be probably many thousands of the ponies, but whether such disposition was made of the entire property cannot be here stated on authority. There were reports of the sale of large numbers of the ponies, and the reader has probably observed that in later years a claim was made against the Government by Indians at Pine Ridge and Cheyenne and Standing Rock, for several thousand confiscated ponies that, it was alleged, the Government had wrongfully taken from the Indians and sold. In the interest of maintaining peace it is probable that these claims were amicably adjusted. The action of the Government in taking the animals from the Indians, at the time, was to be commended. It had for three years maintained an army in that country, for the purpose of keeping these Indians from raiding and warring upon the ranches, the emigrant trains, the military camps, and raiding the working parties engaged in building the Northern Pacific Railroad. The expense of maintaining this army and erecting posts for their accommodation and the keeping of supplies had been enormous, and the military duty arduous. By permitting the surrender of the hostile people and taking from them their ponies and arms, the frontier was at once freed from these predatory and warlike bands, and there was nothing whatever to be gained by refusing to take them back. During the year, from two thousand to two thousand five hundred, counted as hostile, made their way in large numbers to Fort Keogh, Fort Buford and the Milk River Post, gave up their arms and ponies and as a rule were sent to the agencies where their tribes were located. In August there were 600 who made their way to Fort Keogh on the Yellowstone. At that time Secretary of the Interior Schurz, who was touring the West, was apprised of the surrender, and gave orders from his residence in the Yellowstone Park designating the route to which the Indians were to be escorted.

TO MAKE SITTING BULL AND HIS FOLLOWERS PRISONERS OF WAR

General Miles, who had charge of military operations north of the Missouri River to the Canadian border, paid Washington an official visit in 1881.

1880, for the purpose of consulting with the secretary of war concerning Sitting Bull and his hostile Indians, who had been making their abode in British America since the Custer massacre, but who had now found it necessary, in order to provide themselves with subsistence, to invade the Territory of Dakota, and were then within our domain. And because their frequent inroads made it necessary to maintain a large military force in the country, and military posts, it was esteemed best to adopt a policy that would look to compelling the Canadian government to prevent their crossing into the territory of the United States, or of excluding them altogether and leaving their treatment and government solely with the United States. General Miles submitted his ideas of the best policy to pursue to Secretary of War Ramsey, who had it referred to the attorney-general.

Miles, in a letter, stated in substance, that three years' experience had demonstrated to him that the Sitting Bull Indians could not subsist during the winter season without crossing the border line into this country, where, as an invariable sequence, they commit wholesale depredations upon the settlers. The general stated that a portion of the Indians desired to surrender, and these, the general recommended, should be received as prisoners of war, and held until such time as they could safely be turned over to the interior department, the remainder to be treated as outlaws. He held that they should not be harbored by the Canadian authorities, immediately upon our borders, where they were a constant menace to peace on our side.

The state department was inclined to take the ground that Sitting Bull and his Indians were British subjects, and that the Canadian government must be held responsible for them. But this view had its impracticable features. The plan recommended by Miles of taking charge of them while they were in a peaceful mood and holding them until the interior department could handle them with safety, appeared to meet with most favor. It was a new departure in the Indian policy, but the confidence felt in the wisdom and prudence of the general, and the utter absence of any other practical method of handling the problem, settled the administration upon the Miles' policy, the general returned to his district north of the Missouri, and it was not long after his arrival that Indians from Sitting Bull's camp began to apply for leave to surrender. The policy was not only a practical one, but was wise, humane and had a permanently beneficial effect.

Adopting the plan proposed by General Miles, the war department through General Sherman, instructed Miles to receive the surrender of the hostiles in any numbers, the surrender to be without conditions, the Government to use its discretion in the treatment of the prisoners after they gave themselves up. In May about one thousand of the hostiles belonging to Sitting Bull's forces, that chief not being present, assembled near the Poplar River Agency above Milk River, and held a council to consider the question of a surrender, and to learn the terms under which their surrender would be received. At that time it was understood that Sitting Bull would interpose no obstacles to the surrender of such of his people as preferred that course, but for himself he had determined that he would remain in Canada, and never surrender. Gall, a chief, ranking very high in the hostile bands, was one of the leading men at Poplar River, and the council determined to send a messenger from their bands in to Fort Buford, then commanded by General Hazen, and learn from him the terms upon which their surrender would be received, the Indians as yet having had no authentic advices that they would be taken back until their warlike spirit was thoroughly subdued by chastisement and deprivation. The ambassage was sent to General Hazen, the spokesman of the party being a young Uncpapa warrior. One morning in May, he presented himself to the general at Fort Buford. His name was Young Bull, an adopted son of the redoubtable hero of the battle at Little Big Horn, who delivered his message to the commanding officer, as follows:

My people sent me here, having for a long time heard of the chief at Buford. Having been at war ten years they don't want to fight longer. We have never struck the first blow.

When there has been riches and gold in our country you have driven us away from it. Here is my message from Sitting Bull. "My father, Sitting Bull's father, was a chief, but they cast me out and left me on the prairie. I have been driven a long way beyond my country to the last point I can be driven to, and I want to know who is doing it. I want to know what you will do with us if we will surrender. If it is good, I will come. If not, I won't. I will wait until the young man goes back. I want to know if you will build me a trading store for myself. You have driven me to the last point and I don't want to give up my country forever without some place and some pay for it. If what you say is true and good, then send me four prisoners now at Fort Keogh, and I will come and surrender."

The message the young Indian had delivered was in the words Sitting Bull had given him to speak. General Hazen gave the young ambassador the information he desired, which was simply that the Government would give them no terms, but would accept their unconditional surrender, and they would be required to give up all their arms and ponies. The young man represented that nearly all the Indians who were engaged in the Custer battle were at Poplar River waiting for his return and for General Hazen's answer. He was generously treated at the fort, supplied with subsistence, and allowed to return to his people on a steamboat which opportunely came along bound for Benton.

While the Indians professed to be somewhat indignant at the humiliating terms the Government had imposed, they had concluded that anything was preferable to starvation, and it was not many weeks before small bands began to put in an appearance at Buford, prepared to surrender but demanded a modification of the terms. The military people were inexorable, and in fact they had no discretion. The Indians were compelled to surrender arms and ponies, which would leave them nothing to fight with, and then they would be placed under the direction of the army. In this business the Indian bureau had no part, the army had complete jurisdiction, and held it so far as a large portion of these ex-hostiles were concerned, for a number of years.

The surrender policy recommended by Gen. Nelson A. Miles became the fixed policy of the Government, and proved a panacea for all the serious Indian troubles. When the Indians were made aware of the fact that they could surrender they began to come in to the forts and give themselves up. By the 20th of August about eight hundred had made their appearance at Miles' headquarters at Fort Keogh, on the Yellowstone, had been disarmed and dismounted. Their arms and their ponies were to be sold and the proceeds used to purchase supplies for their subsistence. In their future career it was determined that they would have no use whatever for arms and very little for their animals, for after being subjected to a process of taming at the old agencies from whence they had gone to fight with Sitting Bull, they would enter the ranks of good Indians and be placed in line for the work of civilization under the industrial policy that was then being wisely and energetically enforced.

The Indians generally understood that they were in the future expected to work for their living, that they could in no other way provide food and clothing for themselves and families, and while the Great Father stood ready to provide temporary support in cases of merit and necessity, he did not propose to longer sustain his red children in idleness. These prisoner Indians, for they were held as prisoners of war, would be kept for some time under the supervision of the army, and when their condition and conduct would recommend it, they would be turned over to the civil authorities represented by the interior department, and returned to the agencies, rejoining their old tribe. The surrender of these people must have been known to and approved by Sitting Bull, who saw that there was no other course open to them unless they were prepared to starve, and the wily leader had it also in mind probably to follow in the path his people had made to the forts where the surrenders were accepted, where he could show a reasonable pretext for yielding.

It is not probable that Sitting Bull expected to be shown any favors compared to the others who surrendered, for there was much less friendship for him than for the others, but he was a very proud Indian and not to be out-that it would accord better with his dignity and reputation if he would exhibit a reluctant spirit and demand concessions, which being denied, he could, with a show of much sacrifice, yield to overwhelming numbers and military necessity, and then take his place with the common people who had given themselves up, and were already enjoying the bounties of the Great Father's well supplied table.

At this time, a more tranquil condition prevailed throughout all the Dakota frontiers. The war clouds had been drifting away and disappearing. Gen. Nelson A. Miles had been in active command of military operations and by an aggressive policy never surpassed in the annals of Indian warfare, had broken the spirit of hostility among the hostiles and they were suing for peace. Sitting Bull had remained in British America, and had quite a large force under his direction. His Indians had been able to subsist on the game which the country afforded; but before in the winter of 1879-80, they suffered for food, and Miles forbade them coming across the line to hunt.

Early in 1880 Sitting Bull submitted a proposition to surrender himself and band, which was now reduced to comparatively a small number, on the terms proposed by the President, provided he should be allowed to come to Fort Keogh without military escort, or be subject to interference by Indian agents. His application was sent forward to the President; but it was not expected there would be any modification of the terms of surrender in the case of the notorious leader. And there was no attention paid to it more than to inform him, unofficially, that no exception would be made in his case, that he would be required to surrender unconditionally, with his guns and ponies, just as the other Indians had done.

Following this, within a few weeks, the notorious medicine chief came into Fort Buford, with 200 of his people, his immediate family and retainers, the last of the incorrigible element, on the 20th of July, 1881, and voluntarily surrendered to Major Brotherton, the commander. Fort Buford was the post situated nearly opposite the mouth of the Yellowstone.

Sitting Bull wanted to surrender, but he was averse to an unconditional giving up to the Government and wanted certain privileges coupled with the event, which included a separate reservation and other impracticable factors to show that he had been accorded consideration due to his importance as a chieftain of rank and influence; but General Hazen, who was in command at Fort Buford, simply informed him that the terms of his surrender required the giving up of all arms and ponies belonging to himself and his followers. The eminent chieftain was highly indignant, and disposed to remonstrate, but he and his people that were with him, were very hungry and growing hungrier. An Indian prizes highly his ponies and his gun, but he realizes that he cannot eat them, and finding the officer unyielding, submitted to the terms, and were humanely treated during the interval that elapsed before the steamboat came and bore them away to Standing Rock, where Sitting Bull and his people were to be kept under military surveillance.

The Sitting Bull cavalcade consisted of six army wagons loaded with squaws and children, followed by thirty Red River wagons well filled with baggage; Sitting Bull and his chiefs and ex-warriors rode their ponies. At this time there was no ceremony of welcome. The commander of the post simply took them in, gave them blankets and food, provided them comfortable accommodations, and directed them to the place where they would remain until the steamboat General Sherman called for them, when they would be transported to Fort Yates where about three thousand five hundred of the repentant Sioux had already been gathered and were awaiting to be assigned to their future homes. Sitting Bull was among the last to give in. He had been urged to the step by the trader at Poplar River, and by the physical necessities of his people, who had been leaving him all through the warm season and seeking an asylum under the Great Father's protection, from which they had been absent for full five years, except as many of them, had surreptitiously visited the agencies. Sitting Bull made no demonstration on his arrival; uttered hardly a word; simply stood sullenly awaiting any disposition the commanding officer saw fit to make of him.

A day or two later the commanding officer held something of a formal council with the fallen medicine man of the Sioux nation. Sitting Bull entered the council, and seated himself at the left of Major Brotherton, placed his rifle, which he had not been required to give up between his feet, and with a sullen expression tinged with anger or ugliness, remained silent. His dress consisted of a cheap calico shirt, considerably worn in appearance, from long use, and somewhat soiled, a pair of black leggings, a blanket dirty and old, and a calico handkerchief was tied in turban fashion about his shapely head so as to protect his eyes which were red and sore. In this silent posture there was nothing whatever remarkable about the man to indicate that he was anything more than an ordinary Indian silent and stoical in demeanor. Major Brotherton opened the council by stating in a positive manner, from which there would be no appeal, the policy the Government would follow in its disposition of the surrendered prisoners, and by which Sitting Bull and his people will be governed. They would be sent to join the other surrendered Sioux at Fort Yates. He assured them that the military people would treat them well if they behaved well. There were some manifestations of approval among the chiefs when the major had concluded, except Sitting Bull, who gave out no sign whether he was pleased or displeased, evidently expecting to make some modification of the programme when he replied, which he proposed to do and which the major courteously invited him to. Sitting Bull did not immediately respond; he seemed to be ruminating, or gathering his thoughts for an eloquent effort. He then addressed a few words to his Indian attendants, which were not interpreted, then turning to his little son who was with him, he told him to take up his rifle and present it to Major Brotherton. This was done, when the chieftain said:

I surrender this rifle to you through my young son, whom I now desire to teach in this manner that he has become a friend of the Americans. I wish him to learn the habits of the whites and become educated as their sons are educated. I wish it to be remembered that I was the last man of my tribe to surrender my rifle. This boy has given it to you and he now wants to know how he is going to make a living. Whatever you have to give, or whatever you have to say, I would like to receive it now, for I do not want to be kept in darkness any longer. I have sent several messengers in here from time to time, but none of them have returned with news. The other chiefs, Crow King and Gall, have not wanted me to come, and I have never received good news from here. I now wish to be allowed to live on this side of the line or the other as I see fit. I wish to continue my old life of hunting, but would like to be allowed to trade on both sides of the line. This is my country, and I don't wish to be compelled to give it up. My heart was very sad at having to leave the great father's country. She has been a friend to me, but I want my children to grow up in our own country, and I wish to feel that I can visit two of my friends on the other side of the line, Major Walsh and Captain McDonald, whenever I wish, and would like to trade with Louis Legare, as he has always been a friend to me. I wish to have all my people live together on one reservation of our own on the Little Missouri. I left several families at Wood Mountain and between there and QuAppelle. I have many people among the Yanktonais at Poplar Creek, and I wish all of them and those at Standing Rock to be collected together upon one reservation. My people have many of them have been bad. All are good now, that their arms and ponies have been taken from them.

(Addressing Major Brotherton.) You own this ground with me and we must try and help each other. I do not wish to leave here until I get all the people I left behind and the Uncapapas now at Poplar Creek. I would like to have my daughter, who is now at Fort Yates, sent up here to visit me, and also eight men now there counting them by name, and I would like to know that Louis Legare is to be rewarded for his services in bringing me and my people here.

This closed the council. The major simply assured Sitting Bull and the others that the Government would deal with them in the manner best suited to their welfare, and then dismissed them giving them in charge of Captain O'Brien.

Quite reluctantly, the notorious chief and his party were taken on board the steamboat General Sherman, which had been sent up to Fort Buford for that purpose, and on the 20th of July, 1881, started for Fort Yates. The command delay could not be granted. A steamboat chartered to carry Indians or merchandise for the Government receives a per diem compensation, and a liberal one, therefore the Sherman was expected to make no delay.

There were 187 of the Sitting Bull party, counting women and children. There were over three thousand five hundred of his old guard at Yates and more to come from Keogh. Those who had talked with Sitting Bull found him quite unfriendly but not to the extent of desiring to renew a war with the Government; and feeling that he was grossly persecuted. He denied that he had committed an offense for which he deserved punishment—he had only defended his country and himself from their enemies. He was not conquered, but he was destitute and his people were close to suffering for the necessities of life and he had only taken the only way open to him to provide for them.

A brief halt was made at Bismarck on the way down, and the chiefs were allowed to go ashore, and were taken to a hotel for dinner. Here Sitting Bull saw the first locomotive engine he had ever seen. His life had been passed remote from such devices. The engineer pulled the throttle-valve, and as the engine moved away he drew his blanket closer about himself, and said he didn't want to see it again, and refused to ride upon it. At Bismarck it was discovered that he could write his name and he was besieged by a large number of people of both sexes for his card. Of some he received recompense. He wrote clearly and quite rapidly, but it was observed that he copied from a card that he carried with him. He was now fifty years of age. He appeared to enjoy the attention he received, and strutted as he walked, indicating that he was not averse to being an object of interest. The stay at Bismarck was brief; the date July 31st, and August 3d the Sherman tied up at Fort Yates and there discharged its cargo of human freight.

It was not in the least the intention of the Government to treat Sitting Bull and his people as the prodigal son was treated, but rather to impress upon them that they had been guilty of the grossest ingratitude by turning their arms against the Great Father while at the same time they were being sustained by his bounty; that their unprovoked depredations upon and murders of white people were deserving of serious punishment, but its infliction might be withheld or greatly modified by their conduct thereafter. They were for a time on probation and under bayonet rule. To such an extent was this the case that whenever one of them was disinclined to obey orders the bayonet was pressed into service. The rigidity of this rule was noticeably relaxed, however, on the occasion of the arrival of the Sitting Bull party at Fort Yates. All the Indians were landed except the famous warrior, his father, Four Horns, and Chief Running Antelope, who remained. These three were ushered into the cabin of the boat where they were introduced to the officers of the fort and their ladies and a number of whites employed at the post. Sitting Bull was very gracious to the ladies and furnished them his photograph without fee or reward, while he made a charge of from $1 to $5 to all others. His favorite daughter was not there to greet him. She had been sent out to a camp some distance off where about two thousand others were being guarded. It was designed to make Fort Yates a permanent camp for Sitting Bull and such of his Indians as could not be trusted to return to their former agencies, for it should be remembered that every one of these people belonged to some tribe of the Sioux nation, and in their tribal organization every tribe had been at peace with the Great Father for many years. There were a large number of Yanktonnais, nearly a thousand of Red Cloud's people, in fact every tribe except the Yanktons were said to be represented.

As the Indians improved in physical strength they began to get restless under the strict regime which had been adopted for the purpose of preserving a proper discipline among them. Sitting Bull was ill-natured; and plans were laid by numbers of them to escape. A quantity of pistols, a few guns and ammunition were found secreted in the camp which had been stealthily brought in by some of their visiting friends, and it was deemed best to separate the leader from his people by removing him to some other location. The camp itself, now grown to nearly seven thousand in number, composed of the unfriendly class, was regarded as a menace to the peace of the border. The military force was regarded as insufficient to prevent a hostile uprising should the Indians be able to act concertedly; and there was further cause for apprehension of trouble to follow the recent assassination of Spotted Tail who exercised a restraining influence upon the belligerent young men of his tribe, but who might now be won over easily by emissaries from Sitting Bull, who was still defiant and ugly under the restraints which he was compelled to submit to. Finally it was determined to remove Sitting Bull and a few of his closest relatives and chiefs to Fort Randall, and the steamboat Sherman was sent for upon which to transport the party to that post. Sitting Bull was informed of his proposed transfer, and angrily protested against it, and so defiant did he become that a company of troops was detailed to move his camp to the river banks, where he was kept under close restraint until the steamboat arrived. The Indians were disposed to aid Sitting Bull in his refusal to be removed and the result was that every white man employed at the post as well as the soldiers were armed and prepared for a fight should the resistance become serious enough to warrant it. It was suspected that many of the Indians were armed. The steamboat finally came along, the Sitting Bull party was marched aboard with bayonets behind it, and Company H, Seventeenth Infantry went along to keep the peace during the trip. Sitting Bull was interviewed during the voyage by some one curious to get him to relate the story of his remarkable career. He was asked: Where were you born and when?

Sitting Bull replied:

I don't know where I was born and cannot remember. I know that I was born or I would not be here. I was born of a woman; I know this to be a fact, because I exist.

Sitting Bull then held a long conversation with his uncle, Chief Four Horns, and after pointing at different fingers for some time, said:

I was born near old Fort George, on Willow Creek, below the mouth of the Cheyenne River. I am forty-four years old, as near as I can tell; we count our years from the moons between great events. The event from which I date my birth is the year in which Thunder Hawk was born. I am as old as he. I have always been running around. Indians that remain on the same hunting grounds all the time can remember years better.

"How many wives and children have you?"

Sitting Bull, running over his fingers and then with thumb and forefinger of one hand pinching and holding together two fingers of his other hand: "I have nine children and two living wives, and one wife that has gone to the Great Spirit. I have two pairs of twins."

Lieutenant Dowdy: "Tell Sitting Bull he is more fortunate than I am; I can't get one wife."

Sitting Bull was greatly amused at this, and laughed aloud.

"Which is your favorite wife?"

"I think as much of one as the other. If I did not I would not keep them. I think if I had a white wife I would think more of her than of the other two."

"What are the names of your wives?"

Sitting Bull, raising the side of his turban and calling a squaw to him, asked her, and then replied: "Was-Seen-By-The-Nation is the name of the old one. The One-That-Had-Four-Robes is the name of the other."

"Are you a chief by inheritance, and if not, what deeds of bravery gave you the title?"

Sitting Bull: "My father and two uncles were chiefs. My father's name was Jumping Bull. My uncle that is here is called Four Horns, and my other uncle was called Hunging His-Lodge. My father was a very rich man and owned a great many good ponies in red colors. In ponies he took much pride. They were roan, white and gray. He had great numbers and I never wanted for a horse to ride. When I was ten years old I was famous as a hunter. My specialty was buffalo calves. I gave the calves I killed to the people. I had no horses. I was considered a good man. My father died twenty-one years ago. Four years after I was ten years old I killed buffalo and fed his people, and then I was one of the fathers of the tribe. At the age of fourteen I killed an enemy, and then I made myself great in battle, and became a chief. Before this, from ten to twelve years people had named me the Sacred Standshoty. After killing an enemy they called me Ta-Tan-Ka U-You-Tan-Ka, or Sitting Bull. An Indian may be an inherited chief, but he must make himself a chief by his bravery."

No amount of persuasion could induce Sitting Bull to reveal any thing of his life beyond the age of fourteen.

The party reached Fort Randall and were formally turned over to the commandant, who gave them a suitable camping place where they could have sufficient freedom and yet be under close surveillance.

THE MESSIAH CRAZE—MILES' STORY

To avoid repetition, the reader is referred to the proceedings of the several treaty commissions which precede this sketch, for many of the incidents in Sitting Bull's career after his return to the United States from British America and to his allegiance to the Great Father, a period of ten years, and this chapter will close with a reference to the final brief war between the Sioux and the Government, and the tragic death of Sitting Bull, which occurred in 1890, soon after the Dakotas had entered upon their careers as states of the American Union.

This last uprising of the Sioux nation occurred after several years of tranquillity and peace upon the frontiers, when public sentiment was resting in an assurance that the story of the last of hostilities on the part of the Indians had been written more than a decade past. It came like "a thunderbolt from a clear sky." Gen. Nelson A. Miles had continued in active command of the military district of Dakota, which for prudential reasons had been maintained, but with so little ostentation, or performance of legitimate duty, that the general public had ceased to regard it as a dweller on the frontier. Instead of quoting from the official reports of the lamentable affair, which was called the "Messiah Craze," or the "War with the Messiah," we have had recourse to a narrative prepared for publication by General Miles some years later, which explains the origin of the trouble and its brief duration. General Miles had then been called to the command of the Military Division of the Missouri in which the Department of Dakota was a sub-division, when in 1890, there came reports of a threatened Indian war in which all the tribes of the West were to participate. It was not an outgrowth of any alleged delinquency on the part of the Government to fulfill its treaty obligations, nor was it charged that the whites were in any manner trespassing upon the rights of the Indians, but, as the general states it came from so-called prophets, medicine men, as well as intriguing leaders, who were influencing the Indians in a belief that some Divine interposition was about to rescue them and restore to them the hunting grounds, the buffalo, and the freedom of the old wild life of their ancestors. A numerous body of native speakers were traversing the Indian country, and explaining to the Indians that the second coming of Christ was at hand. That he was coming to redress the wrongs that had been committed upon the Indian by the white race, and counseling them to prepare to join his forces and aid in achieving the triumph which could not fail under such a leader.

The "Messiah," or rather the person (his name was Hopkins) answering to that sacred title, was a person living in the mountains of Nevada, who had assumed the character, and knowing the Indian character, his credulous nature, his predilection for the supernatural, had enlisted quite a body of leaders under his banner, informing them that he had the authority and power to restore his people to their former condition and possessions, but he would require the active aid and participation of all the Indian tribes to accomplish his mission. He sent chosen representatives to the tribes in Dakota and elsewhere, informing them of his coming, and notifying them of his abode near Walker Lake, Nevada. Upon all Indians to whom this secret was disclosed, the utmost secrecy was enjoined, and this admonition had been faithfully observed. Miles relates that "the year before there was any open manifestation of war, three Indians left the large tribes located in Southern Dakota, presumably from south of White River, on a secret mission to the west. Their names were Kicking Bear, Short Bull, and Porcupine. They could neither read nor speak the English language, but they journeyed three hundred miles to the Crow camp in the northwest, thence west to the Shoshones and Utes, and thence to the tribes in Utah and Nevada, and they finally reached the camp of the Messiah, who received them cordially but with severe formality. He proclaimed to them that the prophecy made nearly two thousand years before had been fulfilled, that their own land was to be transformed into the Happy Hunting Ground, and that all the departed Indians were to be restored to life. He told them that he was about to remove eastward, when there would be driven before him vast herds of horses, or ponies, and an immense number of buffalo, and deer, and as he moved east the dead of their race would arise and join him. He taught his visitors mystic ceremonies and methods of religious worship that were new to them. The trio of emissaries were enjoined to secrecy but they were to go on and announce to the various tribes what had been confided to them. They returned, visiting the tribes, and safely reached their starting point, but their movements had been so carefully guarded that it was several months after their return that it became known to the agent that they had been absent. The hostile elements—those who could never become reconciled to the new industrial life—welcomed the information brought by the visiting committee, with joyful manifestations. The information aroused the old-time belligerent nature of Sitting Bull and stirred to life his smouldering ambition to free his country from the presence of the white race. He declared that they would not wait for the coming of the Messiah but organize and go forth to meet him. He sent out runners to every tribe in the northwest that he knew of, and also to Canadian tribes, appealing to them to rise and leave their reservations, assemble near the base of the Rocky Mountains, and march west until they should meet with the Messiah, and escort him on his crusade of deliverance.

SITTING BULL.

The greatest war-chief the Indians ever had Killed in 1890

No plan of hostility could have been better devised to kindle anew the natural animosity of the Indians toward the whites. They believed in it, and anticipated the fruits of the great triumph they were to achieve. Miles declares that it was a threatened uprising of colossal proportions, and only the prompt action of the military authorities prevented it from being attempted with much more sanguinary results following than those which attended the repression of the revolt.

That General Miles had come to regard Sitting Bull as the most formidable and dangerous of all the Indian foes his troops would be called upon to meet, is shown in his anxious and determined efforts to place him under arrest at Standing Rock to prevent his joining with the hostile forces in the Bad Lands.

General Miles said:

I considered it of the first importance to secure the arrest of Sitting Bull and his removal from that part of the country (Standing Rock Agency). My first effort in the direction proved a failure, owing to adverse influence that was used to defeat my purpose. I sent a second positive order, directed to the commanding officer of the nearest military station, to secure the person of Sitting Bull without delay. This order was sent to the commanding officer at Fort Yates, North Dakota, who detailed a troop of cavalry, a few trusted Indian scouts, under the command of Major F. G. Fehet, an experienced Indian officer, who executed the order promptly. A few hours delay would have been pregnant with misfortunes, for Sitting Bull, with some two hundred warriors, had been in preparations to leave that morning and join the large hostile camp which was then assembled in the Bad Lands of South Dakota, the rendezvous of the Messiah. Major Fehet moved his camp at night some thirty miles to a close proximity to Sitting Bull's camp, and sent his friendly Indians forward to arrest the notorious war chief. These friendly proceeded to Sitting Bull's lodge and intimated him that he was under arrest and must go with them. He protested, but without avail. They had ordered him to take steps when he uttered the war cry, which aroused his fellow warriors, who rushed to his aid. Then occurred a short, desperate combat in which Sitting Bull was killed, and a large number of his followers, as well as five of the Indians who made the arrest, were slain.

and his troops reached the sanguinary battlefield by this time and soon dispersed the hostiles.

No further particulars were given by the general, but he adds the following estimate of Sitting Bull as a man and leader. He said:

It was strange that this last encounter of this greatest of Indian chieftains was a tragedy in which he fell by the hands of men of his own race. He was the strongest type of a hostile Indian that this country has produced. His reputation had been made by courage, energy, and intense hostility to the white race in his early days. He had gradually risen to leadership until he became the great organizer and controlling spirit of the hostile element. None of the other Indians possessed the power of drawing and molding the hearts of his people to one purpose, and his fall appeared to be the death-knell of the Indian supremacy in that western country.

While this incident created much excitement in the north and at the agency at Standing Rock on Grand River, the Sioux were gathering for war in large force in the vicinity of Pine Ridge Agency and in the Bad Lands on the headwaters of White River, 200 miles away. The Indians had left their agencies, abandoned their little homes and cultivated fields, in many cases destroying their property, and had removed to the great camp of the Messiah in the Bad Lands. Here the ghost dance was being celebrated—the prelude of war, and the doctrine of the Nevada imposter loudly advocated. Everything that would arouse the Indians, awaken their animosity toward the whites, which had lain dormant for years, was being done, and it needed but the presence and bold counsel of a Sitting Bull to start them on the war path. All tribes of the Sioux west of the river were largely represented.

The hostile attitude of the Indians called for prompt action on the part of the military forces in the country. General Miles explains:

Fortunately a branch of the Northwestern Railroad could be utilized in the disposition of the troops. The large Indian camp was located near the center of the angle formed by the main line and the branch of this railroad. By distributing troops at available points on the two lines, we were enabled partly to envelop the Indians, and at the same time to place a barrier to the west of them, by which their contemplated movement in that direction could be prevented. As soon as a sufficient force was assembled, the troops were gradually moved toward the Indians' position, pressing them back toward their agency. In the meantime the Indians under Big Foot, a noted chief, left their village on the Cheyenne River, at the junction of Deep Creek, with the intention of uniting with the hostile camp. A strong force of cavalry was sent to intercept them, and so far succeeded as to cause them to halt. A parley occurred, but the commanding officer, instead of insisting on their disarmament and return to their agency, took a promise that they would do so, and returned to camp. Whereupon the Indians, as soon as night came on, continued their journey toward the Bad Lands. Another force was ordered to intercept them, which was done before they reached the main camp of the hostiles, and a demand was made for their surrender. This they agreed to do, and encamped near the troops that night. The next morning a formal demand was made for their arms, whereupon the Indian warriors came out into the open field and laid their arms on the ground. While they were being searched, and a party that had been sent into camp was searching for arms, a controversy occurred, and the Indians thought they were going to be killed. The fanatical leaders commenced the "ghost dance," one of their ceremonies being to take up dust and throw it over the warriors under the belief that it would render them invulnerable to the bullets of the enemy. This continued only a short time, when the Indians made a rush for their camps, the troops, unfortunately, being so placed that some of them were in the line of fire of their comrades. Many of the shots directed at the warriors were thrown straight into the camp of the Indian women and children, and a general melee and massacre occurred, in which a large number of men, women and children were killed and wounded. In fact, the commanding officer reported that the camp or village had been destroyed. The Indians fled in all directions, pursued by the troops, and the bodies of the dead and wounded were found on the prairies, some of them at long distances from the place of the disturbance. I have never felt that the action was justified, and believe it could have been avoided. It was a sad fatality that Indian disaffection and war should finally end in a deplorable tragedy.

The following day a band of about sixty young warriors, mostly boys, set fire to a building at the mission, six miles from Pine Ridge. The colonel of the Seventh Cavalry, with eight troops and a detachment of artillery, went to drive them away. The Indians fell back toward their main camp, followed by the troops. Without taking proper precautions the colonel moved his command down a ravine, and was soon in a pocket, with the Indians occupying the hills and bluffs on three sides. The colonel sent back repeated requests for assistance, and for troops to rescue his command. The last messenger, Lieut. Guy Preston, a gallant officer, dashed up the valley under fire and returned with the relief. Fortunately Lieut.-Col. Guy V. Henry, a very able officer, was within reach. Although his battalion of four troops of the Ninth Cavalry (colored) had marched 100 miles in the last twenty-four hours, he moved rapidly to the rescue. The four troops were deployed to the right and to the left and drove the scattered Indians from the hills and bluffs, and relieved the Seventh Cavalry from what might have been another massacre.

These two affairs occurred but a short distance from the great hostile camp, causing great excitement, and for a time it was feared that nothing could prevent a general outbreak and a devastating war. But the strong cordon of troops continued their slow pressure, moving more and more closely to the main Indian camp, so as to overawe it by force, and at the same time every measure was taken to draw them back to a peaceful condition by sending messages to the principal chiefs. Fortunately I had met most of the leaders on former occasions. Many of them had surrendered to me before, in the campaigns of the Northwest, and I was enabled to appeal to their sense of reason and better judgment and to convince them of the impossibility of the theories upon which they were acting. I also assured them, in case they should surrender to peaceful conditions, of strict compliance with the terms of their treaty, that a representation of their needy condition should be made at Washington, and that I would be their friend. This argument, although it required many days and great effort, finally prevailed, and I succeeded in drawing that large camp back to their agencies, where they agreed to abandon their hostile designs and follow my direction. This was one of the most gratifying events of my life, as it undoubtedly saved many valuable lives and the country from a devastating war. It was effected without the Indians breaking out into the settlements and without the loss of a single life outside of those engaged in the military service and the Indians above mentioned.

The bringing about of this desirable result consumed many anxious months, occasioned by the necessary delay in getting the troops into position, and moving them judiciously to where their presence would have the best effect. At the same time long delays were made before the Indians would accept the terms of the Government. The delays incident thereto, not being understood by those distant from the scene of action, excited adverse criticism and unfavorable comments charging inefficiency. I received many insulting communications, denouncing what the writers supposed to be procrastination or timidity on the part of the military, and from others anxious to have hostilities precipitated in order that the vultures might prey upon the spoils of war.

These last active operations occurred during the severity of winter. The ground was covered with sleet at times and frequently with deep snows, but the troops were well equipped for a winter campaign, and very little suffering occurred among them.

When the Indians were moved back to their agencies they were advised to give a guarantee of their good faith that such threatening hostilities or acts of war would not occur again in the near future, and as an earnest of this they were told that they should send a body of representative men to the East as hostages, and as a pledge that in the future they would keep the peace. This they consented to do, and a party of some thirty of the principal warriors was gathered together and sent to the nearest railway station, and thence by rail to the headquarters of the division at Chicago. This body included two of the Messiah's missionaries, Kicking Bear and Short Bull. I placed Capt. Jesse M. Lee in charge of their agency, and he, by his rigid integrity and able administration, soon won the confidence and gratitude of the Indians.

A small delegation, composed of representative men of the Oglalas and Brules, was also selected and sent to Washington with a few indigent officers, to represent the condition of their people, the non-fulfillment of treaty stipulations, and the want of provisions and their suffering in consequence. This body included such prominent chiefs as American Horse, Red Cloud, and Broad Trail.

After peace was fully restored the troops were reviewed preparatory to their being sent back to their former military stations. This review was one of the most interesting in my experience, as it occurred in mid winter and during a snow storm. The vast prairie, with its rolling undulations, was covered with the white mantle of winter. That scene was probably the closing one that was to bury in oblivion, decay and death that once powerful, defiant and resolute race. It was doomed to this poor, leaving behind it no evidence of its former life and power. And as the warm breezes of spring would remove the robe of winter, a new life, verdure and beauty would appear. Those prairies would see a new civilization, happy homes, prosperous communities, and great states. The sounds of merry bells of industrial activity and the music of progress were to take the place of the war-cry and the echoes of alarm and violence.

The Indians here had a fair opportunity of witnessing the terrible power which they had fortunately avoided, as well as the advisableness of remaining at peace in the future. At its close the troops moved to their various destinations, not since to fight against the Indians.

In 1870, after a series of conflicts between the troops and Indians which beset the railway construction and cost a number of lives, the hostilities culminated in the massacre of Custer and his men on the Little Big Horn, which practically ended Indian hostilities in the Dakota country, though the Black Hills troubles, of a local nature, disturbed that section for a year or more.

But there was no further organized hostility to the Government or the whites, until the Messiah craze of 1890. Then the hostile council fires were rekindled and flamed for a brief month, entailing great loss to the Indians and requiring the sacrifice of life by the troops. With the extinguishment of that remarkable and insane rebellion, the hostile spirit of the Sioux appears to have been effectually and permanently subdued, and Dakota had witnessed the last of its hostile Indian troubles.

No achievement of great merit in the history of our Government will surpass in importance its successful efforts in civilizing the Sioux Indian. Whether the long delay which preceded the adoption and execution of the Peace Policy and led to this happy result, will be set down to the country's discredit, or will be shown to have been practically unavoidable; it ought not to detract from the merit of final success. The adoption of the beneficent plan was in the line of duty to a barbarous race confronted with possible extermination. It was prompted by humane motives of the most exalted character; and it moreover added to rather than detracted from the burdens of the white people. It is a part of the white man's mission and duty to lift up those races that have not the native force and intelligence to lift themselves. Left alone in his savage situation, with no pursuits but the war and the chase, constantly warring among themselves, exposed to decimating disease, extermination must have followed. Christian civilization has saved the race; and the Territory of Dakota supplied the field as well as the race where this glorious work has been accomplished. Many of the tribes are now represented by a generation of peaceable, industrious and enlightened Indians to whom the war path is a tradition. The Indians of the Northwest will never again resort to hostilities as a means of obtaining redress for wrongs and injuries. He can now patronize the courts, plead his own cause, preach his own sermons, build his own modern houses and live within them, plant his own fields and harvest his crops. The wise policy of the Government during the past forty years has wrought a marvelous change in the Sioux Indian.

THE SISSETON INDIANS

As late almost as 1847 the Sisseton and Wahpeton Indians were running free and wild in Minnesota and found a favorite resort at St. Anthony Falls where they were accustomed to fish and to hunt.

They were not unfriendly toward the whites and the new white settlers or invaders rather, who were then finding their way to the wilds of the west from the civilized centers of the east, found a friendly greeting from them and their intercourse continued indefinitely to be of an amicable and in many respects a profitable nature. Alexander Ramsey was among the earliest of these pioneers, an honest, wise, discreet and humane man, who by his exemplary conduct, and judicious course, gained the confidence of these Indians, which cling to him with increasing strength through his long and useful life and the history of the north star state discloses how valuable a factor was the ascendancy gained by Ramsey over these tribes, in promoting the cession of Indian lands to the Government, in maintaining peaceable relations with the Indians, and in the early settlement of the territory by an excellent class of eastern people who were wise enough to profit by Colonel Ramsey's example. He was the William Penn of Minnesota.

In 1851, through Alexander Ramsey and Luke Lea, a treaty was made with these tribes, the Sissetons and Wahpetons, by which they transferred to the Government the largest and all things considered the best portion of Minnesota, amounting to over thirty million acres, and extending from St. Anthony Falls to the Big Sioux River including the eastern shore of the Big Sioux Valley from the Iowa northern boundary to Big Stone Lake and Lake Traverse, including, of course, the ground upon which the principal and most valuable portion of the flourishing metropolis of Sioux Falls has been built. The Sisseton and Wahpetons were friendly tribes, and so remained and still remain. They were not allied with the Santees and had no part in the Little Crow outbreak of 1862. Little Crow's people who joined with him in his atrocities, were known at that time as the "Lower bands," while the Sissetons and Wahpetons were called the "Upper Sioux." Little Crow, however, occupied a reservation lying on the Minnesota River Valley which had been reserved for them by the treaty mentioned or subsequently set apart for them, while the Sisseton and Wahpeton tribes had withdrawn to their present reservation at or contiguous to Lake Traverse and Big Stone Lake. It was the Sissetons and Wahpetons who befriended the white people during the Little Crow raid. They rescued from Little Crow's hands 250 white women and children and captured about three hundred of Little Crow's warriors the same fall, and turned them over to General Sibley at Camp Release.

Settled on their new reservation these friendly tribes had, apparently by their own volition, largely discarded their former barbarous customs, abandoned the chases, given up living in tepees and built log houses, the Government and a wise agent assisting to some extent, but the Indian people, men and women, seemed to lead in the industrial life they were striving to follow, the Government simply seconding their meritorious efforts.

SECOND SISSETON CESSION

About one million acres of land in the northern part of the territory were ceded by the Sisseton, Wahpeton and Cut-head tribes of the Sioux in May, 1873; the tract was bounded and described as follows:

Bounded on the south and east by the treaty line of the Lake Traverse Treaty of 1851 and the Red River of the North to the mouth of Goose River; on the north by the Goose River and a line running from its source by the most westerly point of Devil's Lake to the Chief's Bluff at the head of James River. On the west by James River to the mouth of Moccasin River; thence to Kampeska Lake, to a point on the boundary of the cession of 1851, as above mentioned.

In this treaty these tribes cede all their land and extinguish all their claim to land in Dakota Territory, except the tract known as the Sisseton Reservation, which was to be divided into farms for the Indian owners. In payment of the land ceded the Government obligated itself to pay the Indians $800,000, to be paid in ten installments of $80,000 each, in live stock, agricultural implements, clothing, provisions, and such other articles as the Indians may require, in the discretion of the secretary of the interior.

The Sisseton and Wahpeton tribes were located on a reservation whose eastern boundary was identical with the eastern boundary of the territory, adjoining Big Stone Lake. The two tribes numbered about two thousand. They were regarded as friendly Indians and nearly all of them were fairly industrious, partially civilized and prosperous.

The Indian commission composed of ex-Governor Edmunds, Secretary J. H. Teller and ex-Judge P. C. Shannon, who had been sent to the Sisseton Agency for the purpose of making a treaty of cession with the Wahpeton and Sisseton Sioux, attended to their mission in May, 1881, but were unable to induce the Indians to sell any portion of their reserve which was located west of and adjoining Big Stone Lake and Lake Traverse. The Indians were found to be unwilling to part with any portion of their land at that time.

that they would be able to secure a much better bargain by holding it, and they were not in want of money or other things of value at the time. The Indians were found living in a state of their own organization. They have a government consisting of governor and State Legislature. Chief Gabriel Renville was their governor, and the Legislature consisted of twenty-eight Indian members. It was divided into two houses, the upper house containing fifteen members, and the lower house thirteen members.

Their seat of government is at Sisseton Agency. The Legislature holds regular sessions, all its business is transacted in the Sioux tongue, and the records are kept in the Sioux vernacular. Bills were introduced and passed, the same as in the law-making bodies of the whites, and were then submitted to the governor for approval or rejection. There were on the records instances where the governor had vetoed bills, which had afterwards been passed over the veto. There had been cases of influence exerted by lobby members, but rarely. The measures passed by the Legislature were subject to the scrutiny of the interior department, under whose sanction the Legislature had been inaugurated and encouraged. The treaty commission was the signal for a called session of the Legislature, which was fully attended, before which the proposition of the commissioners was laid and considered and discussed for some time, resulting in a declaration not to sell their land or any portion of it at that time. The Indians were not drawing any supplies or annuities from the Government, and were supporting themselves principally by agriculture and stock raising in which industries they had become capable of earning their own living expenses, and accumulating a moderate surplus.

In 1887, about thirty-five years after the Treaty of 1851, which was made at Fort Snelling, the traveler journeying through a large portion of the Sisseton reserve would have found little, except the tawny complexion of the people and the frequently awkward pronunciation of the English language, to remind him that he was traveling through a country inhabited by Sioux Indians, and that all the improvements he witnessed were the result of their voluntary industry.

It would seem that these tribes of the Sioux had been cast in a different mold from the other tribes of the nation. They may not have excelled in intelligence but they appeared to be endowed with an enterprise and ambition that is not found in any of the other tribes, though closely followed by the Yanktons and Santees after the Indian wars of 1862-5, who made commendable progress, but failed apparently to achieve as much, and advance as far in civilization, as the Sissetons and their companion tribe. These people, however, had a competent Indian leader, a native of their tribe, Gabriel Renville quite well educated, a Christian, who devoted himself to the work of promoting the moral, intellectual and industrial interests of his people. In 1887 they were in a position to look out for themselves without the protection and parental aid of the Great Father who had not therefore entirely withdrawn his guardianship. The Indians were then living under a republican form of government of their own making, based on the plan of our state governments, with a constitution patterned after the Constitution of the United States. Their treaty with the United States was declared to be the supreme law of their government. The power of their government was distributed between three distinct departments—legislative, executive and judicial. Sisseton Agency was the capital, and there the Legislature met annually in January. This body was made up of two houses, a Council and a House of Representatives. The Council was composed of the old sub-chiefs and head men, but a new Council, composed of one member from each of the ten political precincts into which the reservation had been divided, was elected in November, 1887, for the term of four years, and every four years thereafter. Two representatives from each district were elected for the term of two years, one of which was elected in April of each year, while the councilmen were elected quadrennially in November. Every male person of the tribe over twenty-one years of age had one vote. The executive power is vested in a principal chief, who is thereby the governor. Gabriel Renville had been chosen to this exalted position with a life tenure, but after his death a principal chief is to be chosen for four years. The duties and powers of the office are the same as usually belong to the executive of a state, with the pardoning power and the authority to veto the acts of the Legislature. He may be impeached the same as the governor of a state.

Chief Renville possessed executive ability of a high order. He did not speak English, but was so well educated in the Sioux language which had been reduced to a written form by Missionary Riggs, that he was able to express himself most clearly and eloquently in his native language. He delivers a written message to the legislative bodies annually recommending such measures as he deems advisable. The judicial power is vested in a Supreme Court and justice of the peace. The court consists of five members who are elected every two years. In April each year each of the ten districts elects one justice of the peace and one constable. The constitution also provides for one assistant principal chief who succeeds to the presidency temporarily in case of the death of the incumbent and this official presides over the Council. The house elects its presiding officer. There is also a general reservation officer called the treasurer, and a secretary, sheriff and attorney. These are all chosen for four years. Offences in which white men are involved are not within the jurisdiction of the Indian court, but are subject to the laws of the United States. It was predicted that within a quarter of a century the members of these tribes would all be enrolled as citizens of the United States. Their children were all taught in English speaking schools, though all would also learn the Indian tongue in their family life. Those of the tribes who had been converted to Christianity, which included a fair proportion, were divided between the Presbyterian and Episcopal denominations, the former having the greater number.

The Sisseton Indian reservation, as is well known, was located in the very midst of not only an excellent farming country that abounded in superior natural attractions, but was surrounded by the white settlements which were growing more populous every passing year. The Sissetons were reliable friends of the whites, many of them well on the road to become thoroughly civilized and practically all in favor of living and working like white people, wearing the garb of the whites, earnest in supporting schools and many of them devoutly religious. But with all this in their favor their large reservation was an obstacle to the proper development of that portion of the territory situated in its central portion measuring north to south, and lying directly on the Minnesota boundary line, hence it was for the interest of the white settlers numbering in 1889 many thousands, in that part of the territory, to secure the opening of the reservation to settlement and to civil government. The Indians did not object to this, but rather favored it, but had hitherto been unwilling to make any treaty of cession owing to an old claim they held against the Government growing out of the Indian troubles in the War of 1862 and later known as the Little Crow war. Efforts had been made to negotiate with them, but without success, and in May, 1889, the community of Watertown took the matter up and sent a committee to Milbank to meet the Indians, and endeavor to arrange satisfactory terms. This committee was headed by Gen. H. R. Pease. They met the Indians in council at the Big Coulee on the 21st of May and adjourned to a beautiful grove. A big feast preceded the proceedings, which were opened with a prayer by Rev. Charles R. Crawford, a half brother of the head chief of the Sissetons, Gabriel Renville. After prayer General Pease stated the object of the council to be to ascertain their views in regard to opening their reservation.

Mr. D. W. Diggs, acting as stenographer to report the proceedings, Chief Gabriel Renville was the first to speak, Rev. Mr. Crawford interpreting. The chief said in substance:

I don't feel that I made friends with the white man to-day. At the time of the war in 1862, our people made friends with the whites, and protected them from the Indians.

all heart. We stand between the hostiles. We suffered a great deal. After that the Government took our annuities and we have suffered from it. Many years we had worked hard to get what belonged to us, and when the bill was made out the Government had taken it in two years. That was not right. We never thought to keep this reservation for our lifetime. If your customer owes you and asks for more credit, you won't trust him till he pays up what he owes. If the Government pay back annuities, and then asks us to sell our land, the question will be what price you shall pay for it.

In answer to the question, "What do you think the Government ought to pay for the land," Renville replied:

I can't say. When commission and Indians get together, they talk it over.

Being asked what the Indians claimed, Renville formulated it as follows:

First, they want their patents issued, securing to them their land in severalty.

Second, they claim that under the treaty of 1851 there is due them, in annuities cut off in 1862, the amount as adjusted and admitted by the interior department of $305,987.37, and for the two years left out of the account, the amount of $36,800, making a total of $342,787.37.

Third, according to the treaty of 1851 the survey of our land is wrong. The amount of land taken from us by this is about forty-eight thousand.

These are the specific demands the Indians make of the Government. They also claim that there is due them from the Government, as pay for Chief Renville and twelve of the scouts for five months' service performed by direction of General Sibley in 1863 and 1864.

Renville also suggested that he thought that all the Indians who are twenty-one years old when the treaty is made should receive 160 acres of land. "The bill gives this amount to all twenty-one or over at the date of the bill's passage, with eighty acres to those between eighteen and twenty-one, and forty acres to all under eighteen." Renville added, in conclusion, "That when the claim is settled they want the money paid in cash, and not in shoe pegs and overalls."

Michael Renville, a gray-haired man of sixty-five, next spoke, saying:

You have heard about the mistake of the surveying. I will not speak further of that. When you come here and make friends with us, we are pleased. The Indian suffers from mistakes—he don't know how to correct them. Now that South Dakota has come in as a state, we have one to go to to right our wrongs. The Indians have taken their land in severalty. They are waiting for patents. The Indians are anxious to get patents. We are willing the surplus land should be sold. We don't expect to keep the reservation. We want to get the benefit of the sale. If the Government will pay what they owe, we will be pleased with the opening. There will be left over allotments 880,000 acres. If the Government pays what they owe, and pay what they agree per acre, we will be pleased with the opening. When the Government asks me to do anything, I am always willing to do it. I hope you will try to get the Government to do what is right. If the Government will do this it will benefit both the Indians and the whites. (The speaker held up a half dozen keys, all in a perpendicular position, separated, and said) "we all stand this way. (He then pressed the keys against one another) we will be as one key. When the reservation is opened we meet as one body. We be as one."

The committee appointed to work for the opening of the reservation consisting of Gen. H. R. Pease, A. S. Crossfield, and D. W. Diggs went to Washington, accompanied by Chief Gabriel Renville, Governor Mellette, and Renville's interpreter, Rev. Chas. R. Crawford, where they arrived about the 20th of June.

The committee presented the matter to Secretary Noble of the interior department, by whom they were courteously received, and were informed that the commissioner of Indian affairs, Mr. Morgan, had recommended that a commission be appointed to visit the reservation and arrange for sale of the surplus lands, when it was expected the patents for lands taken in severalty would be recorded and ready for delivery to the Indians. The commission would probably be appointed by the 15th of July.

A commission composed of Eliphalet Whittelsey, secretary of the board of Indian commissioners, C. A. Maxwell, chief of the land division in the office of Indian affairs, and D. W. Diggs, of Milbank, S. D., was appointed in November.

1889, to negotiate with the Walpeton and Sisseton for the sale of their surplus lands. The Whittelsey commission completed their mission and agreed upon a treaty whereby about a million acres of the Sisseton reserve in Roberts County was to be sold to settlers at $5 an acre. The Government agreed to pay communities of $300,000 at once, with a bonus of $18,400 per year for twelve years, and ratified a bill for right of way against the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Company. Every resident Indian regardless of age or sex, was to have 160 acres allotted.

YANKTON RESERVE OPENED

The Yankton Indians whose reservation was in Charles Mix County had nearly all selected their lands in severalty in 1889, taking up that portion lying nearest the Missouri River. The remainder of the reservation was to be opened to the occupation of white settlers under rules and regulations prescribed by the general land office. This movement on the part of this tribe was practically voluntary. They had become civilized Indians, lived in houses, and were mainly engaged in agricultural pursuits and stock raising, and could support themselves, but they owned the portion of the reserve not needed for their use, some 200,000 acres, which would yield them a large sum when it was disposed of. Lands were appreciating in price at that time.

MANDANS AND GROS VENTRES

The Northwest Indian Commission concluded a satisfactory agreement with the Gros Ventres, Mandans and Arikaree Indians at Fort Berthold, in January, 1887. These Indians ceded to the United States all that portion of their reservation lying north of the 48th parallel of latitude, and also the larger portion of the territory lying between the Missouri River and the Fort Buford military reservation. The Indians agreed to take lands in severalty on their diminished reserve.

DEVIL'S LAKE INDIAN RESERVATION

About one thousand Sioux Indians in charge of Major McLaughlin had a small reservation of a half million acres on the south bank of Devil's Lake, which the white settlers of Benson, Eddy and Ramsey counties thought should be thrown open to settlement. There was twice as much land as the Indians could use and immigration was flocking in rapidly. The Indian population at the time was of the best of that race, having been for many years under the wise and kindly care of Fort Totten authorities and excellent agents with the best of Christian influences supplied by the Catholic societies, but they lacked enterprise and seemed to have reached the termination of their upward ascent in the scale of civilization. Congress had already been memorialized by the Legislature to provide for extinguishing the Indian title. The Devil's Lake reservation consisted of about three hundred square miles or about a quarter million of acres, and there were 937 Sisseton, Walpeton and Cut Head Sioux who would be entitled to allotments, which would take half the land. The Indian bureau was not inclined to favor any treaty but preferred that the reservation take its course under the recent severalty act.

EXEMPTIONS—CONGRESS APPEALED TO

At the first session of the Dakota Legislature, convened in March, 1862, a law was enacted entitled "An act exempting property from execution, writ of attachment, or any other final process of a court," and also three other enactments of like character, governing and enumerating exemptions. These laws defined what should constitute a homestead, enumerated the real and personal property that should be exempt, and was considered a very liberal law in favor of a debtor. Its purpose, as avowed at the time it was enacted, was to protect the citizens of Dakota, who were as a rule people of very moderate fortunes, from their outside creditors until such time as by industry and frugal living they could discharge their obligations without impairing their business or means of gaining a livelihood. The estimated money value of the personal property exempt under the law was $1,500. A supplemental act passed at the same time declared that all property of whatever value or amount acquired by any party during his or her residence in the territory should be exempt from levy, seizure or sale by virtue of any execution, writ of attachment, or any other final process of a court, founded upon any debt, demand or liability, contracted or incurred without the limits of the territory.

The purpose of the enactments was to give the poor and worthy time to accumulate sufficient worldly wealth to enable them to discharge their old obligations without taking their "coats off their backs," or depriving them of the means of transacting whatever business they were engaged in here in the territory. It was anticipated that the law would be largely modified as soon as conditions favorable to citizens of the territory would justify it. It was further urged in justification of the measure that it would encourage the coming to Dakota of thousands of worthy unfortunate people in the states, who had met with reverses which they were unable to repair in their old home and who would seek an asylum from the rapacity of remorseless creditors in a territory where their accumulations would be protected from seizure for their old debts until such time as they were able to cancel all such obligations, and leave them in a situation to conduct their business affairs to advantage. Whether it served to attract any considerable number of people to the territory is doubtful, but it is certain that it did not deter anyone from coming that wanted to come. The law, however, was, in time objected to by many in the territory, as an injury to the credit of our home merchants and business men generally and the legal fraternity was largely inimical to it; indicating that in the judgment of many people the time had arrived when the law could be materially modified without injury to the worthy people of the territory, and at the same time remove from the statute book all ground for reasonable complaint against the homestead and exemption system of the territory. There had been attempts made to change it at former sessions, but these modifications were not material. At the session of 1874-75, the Legislature enacted a law, introduced as a bill by a member of the Council, which was innocently entitled "An act making the conveyance of homesteads not valid until the wife joins in said conveyance." This bill defined the homestead, and provided for its conveyance according to the terms of the bill, but a section was added—section 20—which provided that "chapter 37 of the laws of 1862, and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed." This section 20 repealed the highly prized exemption laws, but it had not been observed by any of the members, nor by the governor when he approved it on the 14th of January, 1875. The Legislature adjourned, sine die, the following day.

Early in February, as Hon. S. L. Spink, a prominent Yankton lawyer, was looking over the list of new laws enacted, he discovered that the old exemption law had been repealed, and when he had made his discovery public, the local newspapers shortly announced that "a wave of passionate excitement was spreading outward to the remotest corners of the territory, carrying to each toiling homesteader the dire intelligence that the law no longer protects the fruits of his labor from the rapacity of merciless creditors."

A public meeting was held at Yankton following the exposure, which was attended by nearly every able-bodied citizen of the place; a number of speeches were made all representing that the repeal of the exemption law was a calamity much more serious than the grasshopper plague, which, the season previous, had partially destroyed the crops and entailed such destitution upon the people that the territorial authorities had been compelled to issue a public appeal for relief. One speaker, General Beadle, stated that he had recently attended the Fort Dodge seed convention, which had been held to provide means for furnishing small grain seed to the farmers of the Northwest who had been rendered destitute by the grasshopper raids of the previous season. He had "also labored to secure the charity of the people in behalf of Dakota's poor, and now to return and find that such a demon of destruction as this had been turned loose upon the people, was a fit subject for tears."

Another speaker, Mr. Spink, stated that in the protection of personal property from seizure, all the western states and territories had adopted the broadest policy, the amount of exemption to individuals ranging from $500 to $2,500. In Dakota $1,500 worth of personal property had been put beyond the reach of creditors, previous to the enactment of the last Legislature which had repealed the law. A few had deemed it too liberal, but no previous Legislature had been willing to submit to a reduction. We were all inviting people within our borders where they could be protected from the results of previous misfortunes from the rapacity of unscrupulous creditors. A large proportion of our farming community had gone largely into debt for machinery and their crops had been cut off, which placed them in just the situation where foreign creditors could now strip them of all their possessions. With this new law enacted there were 50,000 men in Dakota who could not live here. It took his last horse, his last cow, his last cookstove—all he had to carry on his back for support.

Another prominent lawyer, Bartlett Ford, who spoke, gave it as his opinion that the law exempting personal property had been fully repealed, though he had not had an opportunity to examine the authorities at length. He said that the more devilish scheme could have been devised to take from the poor orphan its last dollar of money and last crumb of bread." He was of the opinion that the Congress of the United States would annul this act of the Legislature.

Another speaker, Doctor Burleigh, stated that "to get up some morning and find that several of Dakota's counties had been suddenly swallowed up by an earthquake would have been but of passing consequence to him when compared to the surprise and indignation which the discovery of this act of the Legislature had occasioned." He had not the least doubt but that "it affected virtually the repeal of all our exemption law, for when a law was repealed its amendments went with it—that was a settled principle."

Hon. George H. Hand, the secretary of the territory, stated that in his opinion the law exempting personal property was fully repealed, and placed Dakota in a position unlike that of any other state or territory, and "the only way out of it was to appeal to Congress to help us out." He further stated that the bill had been brought to the governor for his signature during the closing hours of the session when he was overwhelmed with business. It was not possible for him to examine it in detail. Its title recommended it. The governor had already started for Washington where he would endeavor to induce Congress to nullify this law. Mr. Hand further stated that he was "not prepared to say whether the bill was passed through carelessness or with premeditated intent. The words 'thirty-seven' and 'May 12th' in the repealing section were in his opinion in Moody's handwriting in blanks left when the original section was drawn. The original bill was introduced in the Council by Mr. Sheafe, of Union County, and contained only about a dozen lines, all in accordance with the title. It was made over in the House and entirely changed." It was discovered that there were but two votes against the bill on its final passage in the House, and these were cast by Ole Sampson and Mr. Anderson, of Yankton County.

A committee consisting of General Beadle, W. S. Bowen and J. R. Hanson had been appointed to draft resolutions or rather a statement of the case for presentation to Congress, with the view of inducing that body to nullify the repealing act of the Legislature. The committee reported the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, The Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, at its last session, passed an act to provide that the conveyance of homesteads should not be valid without the wife's signature; and,

Whereas, This act appeared by its title and general purpose to be one which all good citizens might endorse and approve; but when examined it proves to be technical, changing methods by which homesteads may be claimed and placing difficulties in the way which are unusual and unnecessary; that there appears to have been added to the bill sections written by another hand, perhaps after the preceding sections had been acted upon, and not by regular amendment but in an illegal and extraordinary manner; and,

Whereas, One of these added sections, the last of the law, was so written with blank spaces left for references for laws to be repealed, and were in turn filled by another hand, so that it repealed chapter 37 of the Laws of 1862, and cleared from our laws all amendments thereto by any subsequent assembly, and it thus, insidiously, by numbered references, and without any notice in the substance thereof or title, but with the deceptive appearance and false pretense that it was in furtherance of the main body of the law, swept from our statutes every law or provision of law protecting the personal property of our citizens from sale under execution or any final process of a court, thereby leaving our people in this time of calamity and general suffering without any protection from creditors for even the smallest part of the necessities of life; and the utter destitution thus produced in personal property and consequent forced abandonment of the homestead, would leave that also subject to the officers of the law; Therefore,

Resolved, That we hold the knowing and responsible authors of this act as guilty of a gross violation of legislative duty, and a dishonorable betrayal of the public trusts confided to them; of fraud upon the legislative body and the dearest rights and present necessities of our people; of a heartless disregard of the trials of our needy settlers under the privations of the grasshopper visitation; and there is no escape from an acknowledgment of their guilt but by a plea of ignorance, carelessness, or gross incompetency for the duties before them.

Resolved, That since this outrage was not discovered until after the adjournment of the Legislature, and since its effects are most disheartening to our citizens and destructive of the most vital interests of the territory, already crushed by unusual and unprecedented difficulties; and since there is no other alternative; we most earnestly pray Congress to relieve us by abrogating and annulling section 20 of said act of our assumption; and that this may be done at its present session.

Resolved, That these resolutions be published and transmitted to our delegate to Congress, and he be requested to use every proper effort toward securing the early repeal of the law in question.

Signed by W. H. H. Beadle, chairman; J. R. Hanson, W. S. Brown, Yankton County; U. S. Weston, Union County; S. R. Dix, Hanson County; S. F. Andrews, Turner County; J. M. Blanding, Richland County; Fred J. Cross, Minnehaha County; Luman N. Judd, Ben Homme County; R. R. Briggs, Clay County.

MOODY'S REPLY

Col. G. C. Moody, one of the members of the House from Yankton County, and reputed author of the act repealing the exemption law of 1862, was the target for much unfriendly criticism throughout the territory. In answer to the charges, he claimed that the exemption law of the territory had not been repealed, though none of his brother lawyers agreed with him. Moody enjoyed the reputation among both the members of the bar and the people of being one of the ablest lawyers in the territory, and he was usually found connected as counsel with all important cases; but his statement regarding the effect of the homestead law with its clause repealing the law of 1862 was not credited. Finally, Mr. Moody, in self-defense, gave out a public statement concerning the bill and its effect, in which he explained his view of its effect as a repealing measure; and asserted that all the indignation expressed against himself was the result of wrong information regarding the matter. In his statement the accused legislator says, in part, in explanation:

It is claimed by those who favor the view that the law of 1866 is repealed, that the repeal of the statute of 1862 necessarily repealed the statute of 1866, because in terms the statute of 1866 purported to be an amendment of so much of the statute of 1862 as related to personal exemptions. This proposition I most emphatically deny to be correct. The repeal of a statute does not necessarily operate as a repeal of the amendments thereto. Sometimes the repeal of a statute operated, not as a repeal of, but to render nugatory and useless the amendments; for instance, where there is not enough left of the amendments when the law itself is wiped out, to constitute an intelligible provision. I insist this is the true construction. Each amendatory act as it is made constitutes an act in itself, separate and independent, and if there is enough of it to constitute a law of itself, in other words, if it is full and complete in itself, it will stand, notwithstanding the repeal of the original act. A contrary doctrine would lead to absurdities. Legislation upon any subject which has before been legislated upon by that body is simply an amendment of the former legislation, no matter in what form it is put. And these gentlemen would have us take care and never repeal a former law because it would operate as a repeal of all the later laws upon the same subject.

Now, applying this principle to the question under discussion, we find that in 1862 the Legislature enacted an exemption law, the first seven sections of which related to homestead exemptions, and the last two (eighth and ninth), related to exemptions of personal property. This law so far as it relates to homesteads, was crude, imperfect, incomplete, and unjust, under which the grossest frauds could be perpetrated upon the settler, and the most serious wrongs upon the family of the homestead claimant. In 1866 the Legislature passed another act amending the sections relating to personal exemptions, enlarging their provisions, using the not infrequent form, "be amended so as to read as follows," and making a perfect and complete law on that subject, which in effect repealed so much of the law of 1862 as related to such exemptions, as it substituted another law in its place containing the provisions of the law of 1866 and other amendments. In the session of the last session enacted a more liberal, more definite and more complete homestead law, and in terms in the same act, repealed the whole of the law of 1862. Now, if the law of 1866 being complete in itself, being a law in itself, and a law in its own right, its repeal, was not repealed by repealing the law of 1862, inasmuch as it related to a different subject and is the law governing exemptions of personal property, the term "repealed" cannot claim otherwise is absurd. The form of the amendatory act in the case of New York says in several cases, only "matter in amendment of the former act," and does not relate back to and become incorporated in the original law, but the amendments fall with the repeal of the original act, and in the case of New York, the form of enactment is very frequent, and when certain acts are repealed, the law has, so far as I have been able to find upon examination, followed the same course.

the repeal of the original act repealed, by implication, and by operation of law, the amendatory act; but it is left for the wisdom of this territory blessing this city by its presence, to make this new discovery.

CONGRESS TO THE RESCUE

In the meantime a messenger, the governor has hastened to Washington and laid the matter before Delegate Kidder, who forthwith entered upon the task of procuring from Congress an enactment that would save the territory from the dire calamities that might result from a loss of its personal exemption law, if it had been lost, and in due course and within two days before the session of Congress came to an end, the following was enacted:

An Act to declare the true intent and meaning of the 20th section of an act passed January 14th, 1875, by the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota, entitled "An Act making the Conveyance of Homesteads not valid unless the wife joins in the conveyance." Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

That the 20th section of the act named in the title shall not be construed as an absolute repeal of chapter 37 of the laws of Dakota, approved May 12th, 1862, but only as repealing so much of said chapter 37 as is inconsistent with the first named act, and no other effect shall be given to said 20th section. Approved, March 2, 1875.

And thus the controversy over the repeal of Dakota's exemption law was quieted. The question as to whether the law of 1866 was or was not repealed by the law of 1875, does not seem to have been satisfactorily answered by the enactments of Congress, as that body on the eve of adjournment doubtless felt Dakota was having troubles enough with its grasshopper plagues without being disturbed by doubts as to its personal exemptions; and the foregoing declarative act of Congress was sufficient to settle the question as far as the exemption law of the territory was concerned, whether it was enacted in 1862 or 1866. That the claimed offense of Representative Moody was not considered a serious one, is shown by the action of the Dakota bar three years later, which gave its unanimous endorsement to Mr. Moody's application for appointment of United States judge in the Black Hills district, and the appointment quickly followed.

A LIST OF POSTOFFICES IN 1874

A list of the names of the postoffices established in Dakota Territory up to the close of the year A. D. 1874 will indicate quite clearly the progress of white settlement of Dakota up to that time. Such list is given herewith:

Armstrong County—Milltown. Ashmore County, now Dewey—Cheyenne Agency. Bon Homme County—Bon Homme, Choteau Creek, Clarno, Edwinton, Hawlyek, Marshton, Mineral Springs, Scotland, Springfield, Tabor, Wanari. Brookings County—Medary, Lake Village. Buffalo County—Crow Creek. Burbank County—Worthington. Burleigh County—Bismarck. Cass County—Fargo, Elm River, Haggart's, Norman, Trysil. Charles Mix County—Platte Creek, White Swan, Greenwood. Clay County—Alsen, Bloomingdale, Bluff Center, Burbank, Glenwood, Greenfield, Lincoln, Lodi, Meekling, Riverside, Saybrook, Vermillion. Cragin County—Dewey. Davison County—Firesteel. Grand Forks County—Frog Point, Goose River, Grand Forks. Hanson County—Rockport, Rosedale. Howard County—Fort Buford. Hutchinson County—Olivet, Maxwell. Lake County—Madison, Wicklow. Lincoln County—Canton, Eden, Fairview, Harrisburg, Maple Grove, Pleasant Home. McCook County—Rochester. Minnehaha County—Dell Rapids, Lake City, Pennington, Pleasant Valley, Republican, St. Olaf, Silver Creek, Sioux Falls, Skunk Lake, Split Rock, Valley Springs. Moody County—Brookfield, Marshall, Flandreau, Sealsville. Morton County—Fort Abraham Lincoln, Fort Rice. Pembina County—Pembina, Wahalla. Ramsey County—Fort Totten. Richland County—Fort Abercrombie, Wahpeton, Stutsman County—Jamestown, Sully County—Fort Sully, Todd County—Fort Randall, Ponca Agency, Turner County—Centerville, Childs-town, Finlay, Lost Lake, Middletown, Ohio, Spring Valley, Swan Lake, Turner, Union County—Elk Point, Gothland, Jefferson, LeRoy, McCook, Richland, Sioux Valley, Spink, Texas, Virginia, Yankton County—Lakeport, Marindahl, Norway, Oakdale, Odessa, Utica, Weston, Yankton, Ziskow, Gayville.

Postoffices also at Sisseton Agency, now Roberts County; Spotted Tail's Agency, Beaver Creek, Neb.; Red Cloud Agency, White Clay Creek, Dakota Territory.

DAKOTA'S FIRST DAILY NEWSPAPER

The Daily Press and Dakotian began its career at Yankton as a morning newspaper on Monday, April 20, 1875, under the ownership and management of W. S. Bowen & Co., the "Co." representing Mr. G. W. Kingsbury. It was the first daily paper to be published in the territory, designed as a permanent enterprise.

Dakota Territory was thinly populated, while Yankton was a town of about three thousand people. As a business proposition, there was not such inducement as would justify the publishing of a daily paper at Yankton with the telegraphic news at a cost of $150 a month. But there was an early future that seemed to justify the project, in which the community of Yankton as well as the territory was vitally interested. This promising future was based on the early opening of the Black Hills country to white settlement. The United States Government was about to conclude a treaty with the Sioux Indians who held the title to the hills, and General Custer with his famous Seventh Cavalry had made an exploring and investigating visit there the year previous, and found the country rich in natural resources, including gold and pine forests. As the people of Dakota became apprised of this, they very properly assumed that there would be a large immigration to Dakota in consequence, and visions of prosperity on a large scale haunted the minds of our pioneers. Word came from abroad of hundreds of organizations forming for the purpose of going into the gold region, and as a rule they would come by way of the Missouri River route.

Yankton people and interests had been working to secure the lawful opening of the Hills country for over ten years, having information from the most reliable sources that gold was abundant in the region. Its early opening to settlement promised great benefit to commercial Yankton. It was the nearest railroad point to the Hills, and steamboats were then carrying passengers and freight to all points on the upper river including Fort Pierre where stage lines and freight trains would connect, and make the overland distance of 150 miles to Rapid City, in much less time than it could be made by any other route. The entire trip over land from Yankton could also be made through a country abounding in wood, water and grass the entire distance. Yankton had been well advertised as an outfitting point and there was a substantial expectation that there would be a large immigration by the Yankton route.

This was the situation, and the business and growth that would come to Yankton as a result of the immigration to the gold fields was the chief factor in encouraging the establishment of the Daily Press and Dakotian at that time, though considering the number of parties who were in a position to assist the enterprise, the home support was very liberal and cheerfully given.

Yankton, however, did not secure the advantage and benefits her location and facilities entitled her to, not however, through any lack of intelligent energy or foresight. The emigrants did not come in overwhelming numbers. The Hills had not been lawfully opened. The army guarded the reservation, and in 1875 arrested and turned back a large number that attempted to invade the domain. Competition sprang up. The Union Pacific Railroad made Cheyenne, Wyo., an outfitting point, and a first class daily stage line was run on the route from Cheyenne to Custer City, while the intrepid enterprising stage line was wholly turned in the direction of fostering their route which had the advantage being in great part north of the great Sioux reservation.

The Daily Press and Dakotian, however, managed to maintain itself, but was more a source of expense than profit. In October, 1875, it changed from a morning to an evening paper, making a saving in telegraphic tolls that was a material aid in bringing the receipts and expenditures nearer together. It again revived the morning issue in 1876, but returned to the evening class after a few months trial, and has continued to be an evening paper from that date.

GRASSHOPPER RAID DESTROYS THE CROPS

The Territory of Dakota was visited by myriads of grasshoppers, or more properly red-legged locusts in the summer of 1874, and a large proportion of the growing crops were destroyed. Immigration had been quite active during the two preceding years, and thousands of new homesteads had been taken and new farms opened, by very worthy, industrious people, who as a rule were dependent upon the products of their labor for the support of their families, and had not accumulated a sufficient surplus during their brief residence in the territory to tide them over the coming winter.

Dakota was not alone in this misfortune. The farmers of the neighboring states of Iowa, Nebraska and Minnesota had suffered in an equal or greater proportion, so that during the winter following the distress became so general through the settled portions of the new Northwest as to resemble somewhat a national calamity.

The winter season of 1874-75 was unusually severe, and prolonged, with an unusual amount of stormy cold weather, and considerable snow, which added to the difficulties of the newcomers because of the prevailing scarcity of fuel on the prairies, and found a very large number living in claim houses, without sufficient fuel and dependent largely upon the prairie hay to supply warmth for their households.

This growing destitute condition became known to the older settlers who had laid by a store of fuel and provisions for the winter, and a great deal of relief was afforded by them to their unfortunate neighbors, but as the season advanced it became apparent that the resources of this generous class would be insufficient to carry the burden through the winter, and they were driven to make the situation public, and ask the authorities of the counties to come to the rescue. The response was immediate, and had the affliction been an ordinary one, no doubt the county aid would have proved sufficient to meet the emergency, but as time passed the ranks of those needing help were recruited rapidly, and the conviction was forced upon the officers in charge of county affairs, that they would be unable alone to stem the tide of destitution, which almost daily grew more acute and in a measure appalling.

RELIEF SOCIETIES FORMED

During the earlier season of the appeals for aid, every organized county in the territory had organized some form of relief societies, and had taken some account of the families and people needing help.

The "Dakota Southern Relief Association" had been organized at Elk Point early in the winter of 1874-75 and had been quite active in securing and distributing supplies to the needy in all the counties during the winter. It was in charge of Rev. Geo. W. Freeman, of the Baptist Church. Full reports were made and published giving the receipts and disbursements of this association.

An organization was perfected at Vermillion, January 12, 1875, under the title of the Clay County Aid and Relief Society with M. D. Thompson as president and W. O. Devay, as secretary, with a full corps of vice presidents. "Its purpose was to canvass the whole of Clay County and put forth every effort to alleviate the suffering of our unfortunate poor." A committee was appointed and the following appeal authorized to be issued:

Whereas, In the providence of God our people have been visited by that scourge of plagues, the grass-hoppers, and have lost everything they endeavored to raise, and consequently are undergoing great want and suffering, and many, unless we can in some way relieve them, must starve ere they can procure another crop, and we find that our local supply is totally inadequate to relieve one tenth the demand; we therefore, in the name of humanity, of those who are able to give, to help us. We now request that clothing, and money to purchase many essential things; and shall need seed even within a few weeks.

At a meeting in Lodi, same county, held about the same time, the speakers, H. H. Rudd, J. L. Fisher, Hon. James Curtis and Elder D. W. Chamberlain, told the people assembled that from their own knowledge, gleaned from personal investigation, there were many people in the county who must have assistance now or starve. They must have food and clothing to carry them through the winter.

In all the counties sufferers were urged to make themselves known to the relief committees and their immediate wants would be provided for.

The citizens of Turner County formed a relief association, with G. W. Shelley, as president; C. M. Peir, secretary, and J. H. Shurtleff, treasurer. The association issued a stirring appeal, which in part recited that:

Territorial pride and moral heroism, as well as a want of concerted action among the people, has delayed our appeal until the obligations of a common humanity impels us to this action, for notwithstanding we possess an excellent soil and climate, and our people have not been wanting in their labors, we are now smitten with a common scourge, and great destitution prevails throughout the entire county. Many families are now burning hay that they need for their cattle, while quite a number haven't even bread, and nothing but the most urgent effort will save the people. We want partially worn clothing, bedding, boots and shoes of all sizes, stockings and stocking yarn, breadstuffs of all kinds, and are getting that a little money will go a long way in obtaining fuel, medicines, and a little refreshment for the sick.

Vale P. Thielman was appointed to take charge of supplies.

Minnichaha County organized the "Minnichaha County Aid Society," with Artemas Gale, president; E. A. Sherman, secretary; and J. D. Cameron, treasurer. The association adopted a preamble and resolutions as follows:

Whereas, The ravages of locusts this last summer have caused a state of destitution in this county which should be met by deeds of charity and organized efforts to relieve, therefore,

Resolved, That we organize a society, the object of which shall be to extend relief to the suffering throughout our county, and to provide, if possible, some method by which seed grain can be procured by those who are unable from their own means to plant or seed their land.

A vice president was named for each township in the county with authority to organize town associations.

At Firesteel, Davison County, a meeting of the settlers was held and the Davison County Relief Association was organized. A committee of seven, consisting of Luke W. Lowell, F. Hair, R. P. Cady, M. B. Rice, and H. C. Green, was appointed to take general charge of measures for relief. It was estimated that twenty families were suffering for food, fuel and clothing; and that seed grain for at least five hundred acres would have to be provided.

A meeting of the citizens of Bon Homme county was held at the court house in Bon Homme, on January 20, 1875, for the purpose of organizing relief. The number of families in said county, who were suffering because of the failure of their crops in the season of 1874 by grasshoppers, was estimated at 1,000. S. F. S. Young was chairman, and George T. Rounds, secretary. The following committees were appointed to canvass the several townships in the county for relief:

the number of persons who are destitute of the necessities of life; and report the same to the chairman of the relief committee which is now organized at Yankton, on or before the 30th of the present month (January.)

The canvassers appointed were Joseph Zitka, for township 94, range 58. Joseph Stephonek, for township 95, range 58. Benton Fraley, for township 93, range 58. George T. Rounds, for township 92, range 58. John Stafford, for township 90, ranges 58, 59, and 60. C. A. Paddock, for township 94, range 59. This committee was instructed to ascertain, as nearly as possible, the amount of grain needed to seed the land of destitute farmers, and report the same to the chairmen of the meeting. The committee was also instructed to receive all donations and distribute them. Hon. Benton Fraley was elected chairman of the committee. By order of the meeting the committee was styled "The Bon Homme Relief Committee."

The settlers in the western part of Bon Homme County assembled and drew up an appeal "for persons who had suffered from the ravages of locusts the past season, and are undergoing great want and suffering, it being mid-winter, and they being destitute of the necessities of life, and our home supply being entirely inadequate to furnish the necessary relief." The appeal was addressed "to the friends of humanity in more favored localities." The appeal was signed by Luman N. Judd, chairman and register of the United States land office, Springfield; James E. Russell, A. M. Young, L. H. Mabie, E. W. Wall, committee.

Hanson County settlers held a mass meeting at Rosedale, and found after careful inquiry that there were thirty families in the county needing aid. This number meant more than 50 per cent of the population, that section being among the most recently settled portions of the territory. This county was relieved through the territorial society and also by the United States army committee.

The Legislature that met the same winter, January, 1875, enacted a law to "provide relief for the grasshopper sufferers" from the scourge of the year previous. The bill was introduced by Representative Harlan, of Clay County.

THE FIRST BOND BILL

The act was entitled:

An Act to provide assistance and seed grain to those settlers in the territory who are needing aid by reason of a failure of crops.

Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

Section 1. That there be and there is hereby appropriated out of the funds provided in this act, the sum of $25,000, or such sum as the act shall provide by the issue and negotiation of the bonds hereinafter mentioned, for the assistance and to provide seed grain for those settlers in this territory who are needy by reason of a failure of their crops in the last harvest, resulting from the grasshopper visitation or other calamity.

Sec. 2. To provide such fund there shall be immediately issued the bonds of this territory to the amount of $25,000, in denominations of $500, bearing date the first day of January, 1875, with interest payable semi-annually on the first days of January and July in each year, running for ten years, with interest at 8 per cent per annum, and principal and interest payable at the Fourth National Bank in the City of New York.

Sec. 3. Such bonds shall be executed for the territory, and under the seal thereof, by the governor, and shall be attested by the secretary, and shall be negotiated by the commissioners hereinafter appointed, at not less than ninety cents on the dollar, and the proceeds thereof deposited with the said Fourth National Bank of New York City, to be drawn upon the order and under the direction of the said commissioners for the purposes herein provided.

Sec. 4. Gov. John L. Pennington, Judge J. P. Kidder, M. D. Thompson, T. M. Sargent, and J. A. Potter, are hereby appointed commissioners for the purpose of distributing the funds herein provided, and they, or a majority of them, are authorized to purchase with such funds, from time to time, seed grain and other articles of necessity to the destitute settlers herein mentioned, and to distribute the same where most needed, according to the best evidence which shall come to their possession.

Sec. 5. Before making any distribution of such seed grain or other necessary articles, in any case, they shall require a statement under oath, or other satisfactory authentication from the applicant, of the existence of such necessity, and shall have power to make any and all needful rules and regulations to carry out the provisions of this act, and for a faithful distribution of such necessary articles to the really destitute.

Sec. 6. Such commissioners shall, in making their distribution in any county, call to their assistance the county commissioners of such county, and it shall be the duty of the county commissioners to render such assistance as they shall be thereunto required by such commissioners herein appointed, and such commissioners may employ and pay any necessary and proper assistance in and about the discharge of the duties herein imposed.

Sec. 7. Such distribution shall be made in time for the seeding in the spring of 1875, and if there should be any surplus of the funds herein provided remaining after making such distribution, such surplus shall be paid into the treasury of the territory to be used as other funds of the territory are used.

Sec. 8. Provided for the levy and collection of a sinking fund tax, sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds, and after five years an additional fund sufficient to pay said bonds at maturity.

Sec. 9. Authorized the territorial treasurer to pay the interest falling due on the bonds out of any moneys in the treasury in case there was not sufficient of the bond funds to meet said interest payments promptly.

Sec. 10. Provided for the making of itemized reports by the commissioners, to be filed with the treasurer of the territory and by that officer submitted to the succeeding Legislature.

Sec. 11. Authorized the governor to appoint other commissioners in case any or all those appointed in this act, failed to act.

Sec. 12. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval: Provided however, that the persons receiving aid under the provision of this act, when they are of age, competent to contract, shall execute and deliver to the said commissioners their promissory note for the amount of the aid they may receive respectively, payable to the Territory of Dakota, dated January 1, 1875, and payable five years after date at the treasurer's office of said territory, which note shall be turned over to the said territorial treasurer with the report herein provided for, and shall be held and collected when due by such treasurer, and if not paid at maturity it shall be the duty of the district attorney of the proper counties to collect the same and pay the money into the treasury, and whatever moneys shall be received upon said notes shall be used exclusively for the redemption of the bonds herein provided. And provided further, that there shall be exempt from the process issued upon a judgment or in an action upon said notes, no more than three hundred dollars in value of real property, and $200 in value of personal property. And provided further, that no more than $50 in value of such necessities and grain shall be distributed to any one family.

Governor Pennington vetoed the bill, in very emphatic and caustic terms, as will be seen by a perusal of his veto message, which follows:

Executive Office, Yankton, D. T., January 15, 1875.

To the Council of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

Gentlemen: I return herewith, without my approval, Council Bill No. 78, entitled "An act to provide assistance and seed grain to those settlers in the territory, who are needing aid by reason of the failure of crops. It would be but a poor compliment to the majority of the Legislative Assembly to suppose that they were in earnest in the passing of this bill, or that they even suspected that the bonds provided for therein to be issued, would ever be put upon the market."

In the first place I do not think there is any warrant of law or precedent for the issue of territorial bonds; and in the second place, if the right to issue them was unquestioned, the recent attempt of the Legislative Assembly of Dakota to pass a repudiating measure would prevent the possibility of their being negotiated at even ten per centum of the dollar.

(The governor had reference here to the bill passed by the same assembly making it unlawful for the authorities of Yankton County to levy any tax for the purpose of paying the interest on its railroad bonds, issued in 1872, and which the governor had already vetoed.)

I am satisfied there is some destitution in the territory, but not near so much as a raw panic-stricken members of the Legislative Assembly would induce the world to believe. But very few cases of destitution on account of the destruction of crops by grasshoppers have been made known to this office, and while satisfied that some destitution does exist in certain parts of the territory, I believe that it could all have been provided for by systematic relief, and I did hope the Legislative Assembly would have presented a general bill for that purpose. My hope, however, seems not to have been well founded. The hungry ask for bread and I can only offer them a stone. You propose to issue territorial bonds, and as the money will be loaned by authority of law, in the sum of $25,000, to persons in need of aid, and for such loan to be repaid with a proviso that they shall not be sold for less than 10 per cent in the dollar, and in the face of the fact that there are not more than a half dozen states in the Union where the bonds will sell at such a figure. No southern or western state bond now commands a command 60 cents on the dollar. We have never before sold our territorial bonds, and the good name of a territory, being put upon the market.

Even were the bond you propose a marketable loan, it is still a bad loan.

signed up, and put upon the market and sold within less than sixty days, which would be too late to relieve such of your fellow citizens as are now suffering for food, and who must be provided with seed grain by the 1st of March, or lose the chance of making a crop the present year. And besides, in your eagerness to put a 90 per cent territorial bond afloat, you forget to make any appropriation for the preparation or printing of the same, nor did you name any one whose duty it would be to have it done.

Confirmed in my own convictions, that the issue of such bonds would be of doubtful authority, I telegraphed to the secretary of the interior as to our right to issue, and as to his opinion of the policy of doing so even if we have the right, and received the following reply, dated Washington, January 12th:

"My judgment is against the expediency of issuing territorial bonds."

C. DELANO, Secretary of Interior.

If in the opinion of the members of the Legislative Assembly, any considerable amount of destitution exists, and they earnestly desire to relieve it, I most respectfully submit that in my humble judgment it might be done:

First. By a direct appropriation from the territorial treasury of a few thousand dollars;

Second. By an act authorizing the county commissioners of the various counties to issue warrants to relieve the destitution in their own county, and assess and collect a direct tax to pay the same;

Third. By a direct appeal to Congress for an appropriation to relieve the destitute;

Fourth. By an appeal to the general public with a true statement of our condition as near as it can be ascertained, a plan which has been so successful in Kansas, Nebraska, and elsewhere, whose citizens have suffered from loss of crops.

I am exceedingly anxious that such of the people of the territory as are destitute, and by no fault of their own, should be speedily relieved, and I am and have been anxious to cooperate with the Legislative Assembly in some feasible plan for that purpose; but assured as I am that nothing can possibly be accomplished by issuance of bonds, as proposed in this bill, I am constrained to withhold from it my signature.

Should the Legislative Assembly adjourn without some definite action whereby relief may be reasonably expected, I shall not hesitate to appeal to the sympathies of a charitable public to prevent starvation on account of the lack of food, and to enable the unfortunate to seed their land the present year.

JOHN L. PENNINGTON, Governor.

The bill was taken up upon its return by the governor to the Legislature, and passed through both houses by a vote of more than two-thirds, the required number, and became a law; but no attempt was made to carry it into effect, because of the limit fixed on the price of the bonds, which was said to be fatal to their negotiation. These were the first bonds authorized by the Legislature of Dakota, and as the territory was rapidly growing and practically out of debt, a market could have been found for them because of the object to which their proceeds would have been devoted. The Legislature adjourned without further action.

After the adjournment of the Legislature the governor became convinced that the situation, among the rural settlers particularly, was one that called for immediate and energetic measures of relief, and the Legislature having neglected to enlarge the powers of the county boards or authorize a direct appropriation from the territorial treasury, he was forced, much against his inclinations, to issue an official appeal to the public. The governor had been among the few that believed the situation was not so serious as represented, and had been accustomed to speak of the reports as founded somewhat on a mistaken apprehension, and that it would be taken care of by the people without advertising the adversity of the people to the outside world and possibly frighten away many who had prepared to remove to the territory. He appeared to realize that he had erred in his estimate of the misfortune, and after the Legislature adjourned issued the following statement, entitled:

AN APPEAL TO THE GENERAL PUBLIC

Executive Office, Yankton, D. T., January 22, 1875.

The fact cannot be disguised that there is considerable destitution in various parts of the territory, caused mainly, we have reason to believe, by the destruction of crops by grasshoppers last season. There is destitution reported and we have appeals for aid from Brookings, Lincoln, Turner, Union, Clay, and Bon Homme counties; and there are, or doubtless will be instances of destitution and suffering in other sections of the territory before the winter is over.

We are assured that there are families in all the above named counties, even on the prairie, that need help in food and clothing immediately, and that there are many who cannot have help to procure seed grain, or they will not be able to make crops the present year.

Most of the people who settle in Dakota are very poor when they arrive, and the loss of one crop falls very heavily on them, in many instances rendering it impossible for them to sustain life. The feeling is buoyant and sanguine, however, and there is a universal determination to continue the struggle, and to plant again, with hopes for a better crop this year, provided aid can be secured to sustain life and procure seed.

Much has already been done by local aid committees, to aid the destitute, and our people look with hope to weather the storm and not be compelled to call on the outside world for help, but they find they cannot do it. Not having the benefits of a state organization, and being but a dependency of the general government, a newly settled and sparsely populated country with no great accumulations of wealth, we have not the facilities for helping ourselves, as older communities possess. We have no money in the territorial treasury, and no way of raising any for an emergency.

The Legislative Assembly has adjourned without making any provision to aid the destitute, if we except the passage of a bill for the issuing of territorial bonds to the amount of $25,000 for that purpose, with a proviso that they should not be sold for less than 90 cents on the dollar; and intelligent business men being almost unanimous in the opinion that it would be impossible to negotiate them at that price, the commissioners named in the bill have determined not to issue them at all.

Under these circumstances and for these reasons, we earnestly appeal to the sympathies of a charitable public for aid for such of the settlers of Dakota as are in want. Donations of food and clothing, and of grain for seeding purposes, and of money to purchase such articles, will be acceptable, and will be promptly and faithfully distributed to the destitute and needy.

After consultation with a number of leading citizens from different parts of the territory, the following well known gentlemen have been selected to constitute the Territorial Relief Committee, with headquarters at Yankton, to whom all donations may be sent.

Yankton County—Ex Gov. N. Edmunds, Maj. E. J. Dewitt, Charles Eisenman; Clay County—M. D. Thompson, W. O. Devay; Union County—Rev. G. W. Freeman; Minnehaha County—E. J. Cross; Lincoln County—G. W. Harlan; Turner County—Rev. J. J. McIntire; Cass County—Alex. Mellench; Bon Homme County—F. W. Barber; Burleigh County—Hon. E. A. Williams.

JOHN L. PINNINGTON, Governor.

Attest: Geo. H. Hamond, Secretary.

We, the undersigned, citizens of Dakota Territory, recognizing the necessity for aid, cheerfully endorse the above appeal:

J. P. Kiddler, Associate Justice; A. H. Barnes, Associate Justice, Wm. Pound, U. S. Attorney; J. H. Burdick, U. S. Marshal; J. A. Potter, Mayor of Yankton, M. Hoyt, Rector of Christ Church; L. D. Farmer, C. E. Sanborn, Cashier First National Bank.

The territorial committee named by the governor received liberal donations and distributed them judiciously and impartially, keeping an itemized record of their receipts and disbursements, which was published after the labors of the committee were concluded.

FORT DODGE RELIEF CONVENTION

In the interest of the farmers of Dakota, Iowa, Nebraska and Kansas, who had been deprived of their crops in the season of 1877 and were as a consequence in a destitute and suffering condition, a convention of representatives from this territory and the states named was held at Fort Dodge, Iowa, on the 2d day of February, 1878, and called the "Seed Convention." The convention was summoned by the "Iowa Executive Relief Committee." The representatives from Dakota were: Gen. W. H. D. Beadle, of Yankton County, M. D. Thompson and W. O. Devay, Clay County; Rev. G. W. Freeman, Union County; and J. J. McIntire, Turner County. Geo. H. Perkins, editor of the Sioux City Journal, was one of the delegates from Iowa.

General Beadle, speaking for Dakota Territory, told the convention that the speakers there had at first mistaken their duty as to making an appeal for aid, but now there was no further question as to the necessity for relief and the citizens were fully aware of the responsibility in caring for the poor settlers. The action required assistance was clearly defined. He first mentioned Bon Homme County, the north half of Clay County, Turner County, the west half of Lincoln County, and the north portion of Brookings County. The speaker did not name Yankton, Minnehaha and Brookings counties, which were destitution was found to exist later, but which had not been made public at this time. The speaker said that there was a great deal of pressing need already.

Rev. J. J. McIntire, speaking for Turner County, said: "No individual gathered so much as a bushel of potatoes. There was not enough corn gathered in the county to fatten a pig. Oats were cut green, and perhaps five hundred bushels were saved in the county. Of wheat harvested, the average was four bushel to the acre, but they found by taking into account the fields not cut or threshed, the average of the crop sown was reduced to two bushels to the acre."

Committees were appointed to set forth the wants of the various states and Dakota, for seed, as that seemed to be the most pressing need of the farmers, and to supply which the convention was called. The Dakota Committee consisted of the delegates heretofore named from that territory; and later in the session the committee, through Chairman Beadle, reported that from a full, careful and close estimate of the least amounts required to relieve suffering and supply seed to the needy in the territory, they concluded to submit the following recommendations:

"There are 1,500 families who need immediate help of food and clothing, much of it to be continued until late in the spring, and one-half this number will require seed, or the lands must lie idle and further suffering follow. We need 17,000 bushels of seed wheat, 5,000 bushels of oats, 1,000 bushels of seed corn, 500 bushels of beans and 2,000 bushels of barley. And if this is supplied the wheat to be so much reduced. The total cost of this seed will be about twenty thousand dollars." The general added: "Our people are brave and determined, but suffering generally before they ask at all. Our delay was dangerous, and our necessities so pressing that we pray our relief may be swift; and all good people everywhere are asked to remember our cold and hungry who are under a northern sky in a very cold winter, and whose only light of hope is their expectation of this immediate relief help." The committee recommended that Messrs. Beadle, Devay, Freeman, McIntire, Rev. T. H. Judson, of Bon Homme County and Rev. H. D. Brown, be assigned to fields for the solicitation of help, bearing our endorsement, and that their credentials shall show that they act for all Dakota, but that they will forward special donations when requested.

M. D. Thompson, Vermillion, was designated to receive general supplies; and ex-Gov. Newton Edmunds, Yankton, all contributions of money.

The soliciting committee for Dakota was assigned the Territory of Iowa north of the Northwestern Railroad as the field wherein they might work, and Nebraska and Kansas solicitors were given the territory south of that line.

General resolutions were adopted by the convention appealing "to a Christian and prosperous people to in some measure take the sufferings of the unfortunate home to themselves, thereby to be stimulated to continue their earnest and praiseworthy efforts in raising supplies of food, clothing and seed for the unfortunate in the broad extent of the country afflicted."

The Government of the United States joined the relief forces during the winter, and Congress appropriated $150,000 to purchase food for the grasshopper sufferers on the frontier, to be disbursed through the war department. The frontier included Nebraska, Iowa, Minnesota, Dakota, Wyoming and Montana. The appropriation was for food only, and was to be disbursed by the war department.

Gen. Alfred Terry, who was in command of the Dakota Military District, which included Minnesota, had a census taken of the persons needing aid in Minnesota and Dakota, and found 14,310 to whom rations should be issued. The report did not state the number in Dakota separately, but the list of counties receiving aid shows this approximately. The officers who made the enumeration reported, however, that the destitute situation had been greatly exaggerated, that they had rejected a number of applications after investigation. The Government supplies were given only to those who were in actual need at the time, and the amount given to each person was estimated to furnish food for twenty-five days. This distribution was made during March and April, as follows:

Union County received 21,600 pounds of flour, and 10,800 pounds of bacon. There were 226 families consisting of 1,140 persons enrolled.

Clay County received 17,312 pounds of flour, and 8,656 pounds of bacon, for 173 families of 930 persons.

Yankton County received 11,200 pounds of flour, and 5,600 pounds of bacon for 122 families of 607 persons.

Bon Homme County, 9,037 pounds of flour and 4,518 pounds of bacon, for 94 families of 460 persons.

Turner County, 6,400 pounds of flour and 3,200 pounds of bacon, for 73 families of 331 persons.

Hutchinson County, 387 pounds of flour and 193 pounds of bacon, for 21 persons.

Hason County, 587 pounds of flour and 293½ pounds of bacon, for 29 persons.

Armstrong County, on James River, 275 pounds of flour and 137 pounds of bacon, for 14 persons.

Devon County, 525 pounds of flour and 262 pounds of bacon, for 27 persons.

Dry weather had added to the grasshopper depredations in most sections, and injured the growing vegetation.

Minnehaha County, 1,050 pounds of flour and 524 pounds of bacon, for 54 persons.

Lincoln County, 1,100 pounds of flour and 540 pounds of bacon, for 60 persons.

Brookings County, 1,250 pounds of flour and 540 pounds of bacon, for 70 persons.

Deuel, Richland, Cass, Pembina, Stutsman and Burleigh were counties not reported but were said to have been supplied in measure from the military forts in the vicinity of each of those counties.

The only reference to the northern part of the territory that we find in the proceedings of the territorial relief committee appointed by the governor was a letter from Hon. A. McLench, of Cass County, to Delegate Kidder, in Congress, as follows:

Fargo, D. T., April 3, 1875.

Hon. J. P. Kidder: Will you please inform me whether there are any funds appropriated by Congress for Dakota farmers who lost their crops by grasshoppers. We have a few in this county who are in need of seed, and if they can be supplied it would be a great help to them. If we could get, say, from three hundred to five hundred dollars it would be all I think that would be needed.

Yours respectfully,

A. McLENCHE.

Delegate Kidder spread the letter before the territorial relief committee, and Mr. McLench was allowed $250 by that body.

The work of relief was attended to by the territorial and county committees with diligence and thoroughness. The cities of Northern Iowa, including Sioux City, organized associations and distributed many carloads of goods through the afflicted sections of Dakota, through the medium of the committees. It was not learned that any fatality resulted from destitution or starvation, the aid reaching the needy in time to succor them. The Federal Government aid was most timely, and taken altogether there was that sincere good samaritan spirit manifested on every hand, that when the time of planting came, the general feeling was one of good cheer and thankfulness that so many of the people of Dakota had been rescued from a perilous situation. And in early spring the Black Hills emigration thronged the river settlements and aided materially by its disbursements in giving a buoyant tone to business. The only exception to this general good feeling was among many of the occupants of the Missouri bottom lands between the James and Big Sioux rivers. The ice in the Missouri broke up about the last of March; a number of gorges formed, backing the water up stream and overflowing the lowlands. Traffic on the Dakota Southern Railroad was suspended for a fortnight, owing to the insecure condition of the thoroughly saturated roadbed, which in places gave way under the weight of a locomotive. The Big Sioux wagon bridge was carried away by the flood and a portion of the farmers along the Lower Sioux, Vermillion and James experienced considerable damage from high water, delaying their farming operations, which added to the prevailing destitution, might have had serious results but for the indomitable fortitude and grit of the people, who refused to become discouraged.

The committee in charge of the territorial relief bureau discharged their duties with scrupulous fidelity, and gave out frequent reports of the donations received and how disposed of. Considerable seed grain was procured by this organization to enable the destitute farmers to seed their grain in the spring. Among the principal donors were the Margaretta Relief Society, Cashuta, Erie County, Ohio, which sent $78.05 cash, and Venice in the same county, forty-three barrels of seed grain, besides barrels of dried fruit, sacked wheat, beans, etc. The Chicago Board of Trade contributed, cash $1,170.50. The Detroit Chamber of Commerce, $1,020; and the Detroit Relief Committee, $500. The total cash contributions were $4,321.57; the total cash disbursements, $4,102.20. The committee stated that $4,000 of the cash was due to the efforts of General Beadle. The general visited Chicago and Detroit and many points east, delivering addresses, explaining the conditions here.

In certain localities the young grasshoppers, hatched from the eggs that had been deposited in Dakota soil during the visitation of the year previous, had some damage in the early season of 1875, but when their wings were grown they departed. Inasmuch as the territory had suffered from a previous visitation of this scourge in 1804, and it may occur at some future period, it is well that Dakotans should obtain whatever information they are offered regarding the insect, though there has been no general depredation from this cause in the territory since 1874.

Doctor Harris, the entomologist, and author of "Insects Injurious to Vegetation," in 1874 gave out a minute and interesting description of the insect, and also something of its history. Professor Harris called the Dakota insect the red legged locust, a more destructive pest than the grasshopper. He says:

The red legged insect was first discovered by DeGeer from specimens sent to him from Pennsylvania, and Doctor Harris claims to have retained the scientific name that DeGeer gave to it. It is the Gryllus (locusts) erythrossus of Grucelin, and the Arcyrdium fermur-rubrum of Oliver. It appears to be very generally diffused throughout the United States.

The following description was taken down in the prairies west of the Souris, in Northern Dakota, "where the insect surrounded us in countless millions, and the air from 9 o'clock until 4 o'clock was filled as with flakes of snow." Dimensions of the male insect,—length of body, 1 inch; with wings closed, $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches; length of wing cases, 13 lines, of wings 12½ lines. Color of head, bluish green; of thorax, bluish green, with two lateral black lines parallel to the sides of the thorax and a half line apart. These marks on the female are distinct. Abdomen—Color of segments, pale bluish green with whitish blue margin; upper portion of end of segment, dark brown; especially the superior segment; wing cases, ash-colored, with brown spots. Legs—Upper section of posterior legs, brownish white, with two dark brown spots; outside of the leg, red; inside tibia, rose colored, and fringed with two rows of spines. Forelegs, yellowish brown.

The female differs from the male in the color of the cheeks, thorax, and upper portion of the abdomen, these parts being of a brighter green. Legs deeper rose-color; underside of abdomen, yellowish white. Length of the insect, thirteen lines.

The first authentic account of the appearance of extraordinary swarms of locusts in Rupert's Land, according to Professor Harris, assigns the last week of July, 1815, to this event. Every green herb in the settlements of the Red River of the North was stated to have been destroyed by these destructive insects. In 1819 the young brood hatched from the eggs deposited the preceding year appeared in the spring and consumed the growing wheat crops. Early in 1819 the pestilence disappeared, but in what manner is not stated, but it is probable that as soon as their wings were grown they migrated East.

In 1857 the locusts appeared in myriads over a large part of North America. They destroyed nearly all the vegetables cultivated at Fort Randall, the new military post then recently built on the upper Missouri in longitude 68° 29', latitude 43° 4', and extended their ravages well into the State of Iowa. During the same year they devoured the crops in parts of Minnesota, and advanced so far to the northeast as the Lake of the Woods, where they were seen on Gaden Island in August. During the autumn of the same year they appeared on the White Horse Plains, north of the Assinaboine, where they deposited their eggs. The swarms of this insect must have extended as far west as the south branch of the Saskatchewan, and covered the country in a greater or less degree between the Lake of the Woods and the south branch above mentioned, a distance in an air line of 560 miles; the perfect insect of 1857, or the young brood in 1858, having been observed nearly continuously over that wide extent of country. The ascertained limits of this mighty army of insects in 1857 extended from the 24th to the 112th meridian, and from the 41st to 53d parallel of latitude, from the settlements in Utah Territory to near the Valley of the North Saskatchewan, and from the Lake of the Woods to the foot of the Rocky Mountains.

During the month of September, 1857, I saw the female engaged in laying her eggs. They did not limit themselves to the prairie soil in forming a nest, but riddled the decayed trunks of trees, the thatch of houses and barns, the wood of which they were built; everything, indeed, which they could penetrate with the little blades provided for that purpose. The appearance presented by bare patches of soil, such as the road near the settlements, suggested the idea that a vast number of worms had risen to the surface and then retired again after loosely closing the aperture they had made. When in the act of preparing a nest for her eggs, the female was observed to introduce her abdomen into the soil by repeated thrusts to its full length, and then slowly withdrawing it, eject her eggs, to the number of ten or twelve, in the form of a half cylinder, loosely covering the orifice after the operation was completed.

In the spring of 1858 the young brood were seen at Prairie Portage, hopping over the newly fallen snow, at the latter end of April. It was thought by the settlers that the cold weather, which followed the warm days in the early part of the month when the eggs hatched, would have destroyed the young brood, but it did not appear to have created any sensible diminution in their numbers. The extraordinary vitality of the eggs of insects is well known, but when we reflect that the eggs of the red legged locusts are exposed in Rupert's Land to a temperature lower than that at which mercury freezes, or below than 40° below zero, as well as constant alteration of temperatures from the freezing point to below zero in the early spring months, their capacity to resist these influences cannot fail to be regarded as one of the most wonderful features in the life of this insect.

The females have not a long projecting pioneer, like the crickets and grasshoppers, but the extremity of the body is provided with four short wedge-like pieces, placed in pairs above and below, and opening and shutting opposite each other, thus forming an instrument like a pair of nippers, only with four short blades instead of two.

When one of these insects is about to lay her eggs, she drives these little wedges into the earth; these being opened and withdrawn, enlarge the orifice, upon which the insect again drives them down deeper than before, and repeats the operation until she has formed a perforation large and deep enough to admit nearly the whole of her abdomen.

IN AID OF IMMIGRATION

Dakotans, beginning with the earliest white settlers, were wide-awake to the importance of immigration, and duly impressed with the necessity of laboring discreetly to secure it. The early pioneers of the Territory of Dakota found themselves surrounded on all sides save the west, by communities clamorous for immigration, and with more or less effective organizations for securing it. Millions of acres of public and vacant lands invited immigrants to Minnesota, Iowa, and Nebraska; and even the British provinces on the north soon joined in an earnest and intelligent crusade for a greater population; so that whatever immigration reached Dakota was compelled to resist the attractions of other fertile sections nearer the markets of the world, and doubtless as valuable for cultivation as those Dakota had to offer. The growth of the territory in early days was, therefore, less than moderate. There were years, particularly during the Indian wars and grasshopper scourges, when it was estimated that the territory lost, instead of gaining, population, and during these years the people were so handicapped by poverty, that they could afford to give no aid to immigration work. The feeble efforts made were as a rule backed financially by a few fortunate ones among the federal officials or business men who had business relations of a profitable character with the Government. The New York colony of 1864 was secured through the efforts of Governor Edmunds, Surveyor General Hill, and Dr. W. A. Burleigh, at that time United States agent of the Yankton Indians. The early legislatures were uniformly averse to creating any debt against the territory for any purpose, not because of any parsimonious disposition, but influenced altogether by the straightened circumstances of their constituents, they avoided taxation. Our immigration interests continued in this condition until 1870, there having been a turn in the financial condition of the people during the years 1868 and 1869, which increased the amount of taxable property, and furnished a small surplus to the credit of the territory. Prior to this, by limiting appropriations to the payment of the salaries of the territorial officers—the auditor, treasurer, and superintendent of public instruction and the purchase of necessary supplies for these officials, the territory had managed to keep out of debt. There had been considerable immigration to the territory in 1868 and 1869 which continued through 1870, so that when the first biennial session of the Legislature convened in December, 1870, there was manifest an optimistic sentiment among the members, and the discussion of railroad facilities and immigration were prominent among the topics talked about, and the prevailing opinion seemed to favor an organized effort to secure a proportion of the annual emigration that sought the west each year from the older Eastern States and from foreign countries. This sentiment found expression in a law providing for a commissioner of immigration, and appointing James S. Foster, who had led the New York colony to Dakota in 1864, and who had since been engaged in immigration work in connection with a real estate and loan business, to the office of commissioner. An appropriation of $500,000 was given to the commissioner to be used at his discretion during the succeeding two years. His work during the following two years was reasonably successful, considering the limited means at his disposal, and in 1872 he was elected to the same position, and another appropriation of $500.00 was made by the Legislature of 1873, for the succeeding two years. Mr. Foster's first official report was submitted to the Legislature of 1875, as follows:

Office of Commissioner of Immigration,

Yankton, D. T., December 10, 1874.

To the Honorable Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

Gentlemen: The two years last past have been years of prosperity to this territory. A flood of immigration has been constantly pouring into the territory from the states and settling in every portion of our fair domain, adding fully 10,000 to our population. Gratifying as this result is, we have still greater reason for congratulation in the fact that the German Russians, now coming to this country, have, after thorough investigation of the sections, decided to locate in Dakota. About five thousand of this emigration has already arrived and settled mostly in Yankton County, Bon Homme, Turner and Hutchinson counties. From this source alone we may reasonably expect 5,000 immigrants per annum. Considerable immigration has also arrived in Dakota from Norway and other European countries during the last year.

The limited appropriation for immigration purposes would not allow the commissioner to employ salaried agents in New York City, or to proceed to the Old World to induce immigration to our section. Still, several agents have been employed in England, Norway and Sweden, without pay, other than a nominal sum for postage and printing. General passage tickets to and from the old country have been furnished such agents.

The people of this territory have also contributed liberally for printing and expense money of agents sent to New York and other places to induce immigration to Dakota. Their efforts have generally proved successful. I respectfully recommend that the bureau of immigration be recognized by the providing for a board of immigration, to be composed of several members residing in different sections of the territory, each member representing a district composed of several counties contiguous to each other. This method would allow all parts of the territory to be heard, and probably several different nationalities would be represented. Such a board would be more efficient than a single commissioner, because it would call forth the united support of all the people, because all could be represented.

I also recommend an annual appropriation of such a sum of money for the expenses of the bureau of immigration as the Legislature in its wisdom may see fit to allow, confidently believing that any sum, well expended, would yield ample remuneration to the territory.

Respectfully submitted,

JAMES S. FOSTER,

Commissioner of Immigration.

Agreeable to the recommendation of the commissioner, a law providing for a territorial board of immigration was passed by the Legislature of 1875, which provided for the election, at each bi-ennial election in the territory, of two commissioners of immigration, one to be known as superintendent; and it was also provided that the Legislative Assembly in joint convention, should elect three other commissioners of immigration, one from each judicial district, who together should constitute a body politic under the name of the territorial board of immigration.

The law provided that the board should meet once in six months on the first Mondays of February and August, at such places as the board might designate; the superintendent to be chairman. An office should be kept by the superintendent at such place as the board might select. The law prescribed the duties of the superintendent and members of the board in a general way, and pointed out the character of the work expected of them. An agent of the board was to be appointed in each organized county, who was to report to the board. An appropriation of $3,000 a year for each of the years 1875 and 1876 was incorporated in the law. The superintendent was given an annual salary of $800 exclusive of the appropriation, and the other members were to have such compensation for their time and expenses as the board should determine.

Hon. Fred J. Cross, of Minnehaha County, was appointed by the law, superintendent; and Hon. Jacob Brauch, of Yankton County, commissioner; to hold said offices until the first Monday in February, 1877, and until their successors were elected and qualified.

In accordance with this law, which was approved January 5, 1875, the appointed and elected members of the board met at Yankton, and organized on the 5th of February, 1875. Those present were Superintendent Cross, chairman; Commissioner Brauch; J. M. Wahl, of Lincoln County; Vale P. Thielman, of Turner County, and S. G. Roberts, of Cass County. J. M. Wahl, was elected auditor of the board, and Vale P. Thielman, secretary.

The following named persons were appointed county agents:

First Judicial District—A. O. Kingsrud, Elk Point; R. U. Rassmussen, Clay County; W. S. Smith, Lincoln County; Charles McDonald, Minnehaha County; M. D. L. Pettigrew, Moody County; C. W. Wright, Madison, Lake County; C. H. Stearns, Medary, Brookings County; E. H. Wilson, McCook County; H. H. Herrick, Gary, Deuel County.

Second Judicial District—Rev. J. J. McIntire, Finlay, Turner County; Ex-Gov. Newton Edmunds, Yankton County; A. Ziemert, Bon Homme County; A. Sheridan Jones, Olivet, Hutchinson County; J. D. Flick, Rockport, Armstrong County; Joseph Ellis, Wheeler, Charles Mix County.

Third Judicial District—J. J. Jackman, Bismarek; Hector Bruce, Grand Forks; A. Sargent, Goose River, Traill County; W. R. Goodfellow, Pembina; D. Wilmot Smith, Breckenridge, Minn., for Richland County; Merrick Moore, Jamestown, Stutsman County; Col. D. D. Marsh, Washington, Barnes County; J. A. Hanson, Fargo.

A seal for the board was adopted, with the words, "Bureau of Immigration, Dakota Territory," inscribed thereon.

Yankton was selected as the location of the office of the board, provided the city would furnish free of rent an office for the superintendent with fuel, stove and shelving. In case Yankton would not comply with these requirements, the office was to be located at Canton, which had already proposed to furnish the equipment.

Appropriations were then made for printing immigration pamphlets, as follows: Two hundred dollars for pamphlets in the English language; $300 in the German language; and $200 in the Norwegian language. Mr. Brauch was appointed to assist in preparing the German pamphlet; and Mr. Wahl to assist in the preparation of the Norwegian; the work to be done without delay. Commissioner Brauch was selected to visit the Atlantic seaboard to induce emigration to Dakota, and $800 was appropriated for his use. Two hundred dollars was set apart for Commissioner Wahl who was also to visit the Atlantic seaports; and $200 was diverted to defray the expenses of Commissioner Roberts in an eastern trip for immigration purposes. The remainder of the session was occupied in making rules for reports; ordering various items of stationery; allowing bills for expenditures already made, and on the third day the board finally adjourned to meet at Yankton at its next annual meeting in 1876.

This board entered upon its duties at an auspicious time. North Dakota was already attracting many people; the opening of the Black Hills was a topic that had gratuitous advertising in the public journals throughout the country; and foreigners, particularly the German Russians, were landing on our Atlantic shores, thousands in number every week. At the same time the foreign emigration increased in large ratio, the efforts of Dakota's neighboring states to secure it were strongly reinforced, and all were represented by experienced men at our principal emigrant ports and in European countries.

This board, however, was able to give a good account of its stewardship, and did very effective work, directly and indirectly bringing into the territory many thousands of settlers. Yet it does not appear that the board met with popular expectation, and some unfortunate disagreements among its members impaired the harmony of the organization. Superintendent Cross was elected superintendent to succeed himself in 1876, and James Holes, of Cass County, came forward to succeed Mr. Brauch. But the Legislature that met the following winter, 1876, repealed the entire law, and left the board of immigration stranded. (H. R. 1876) office was finally closed March 8, 1877. No further legislation regarding immigration was had at that session.

SONS OF TEMPERANCE

A grand division of the sons of temperance was organized at Yankton on the 10th of December, 1874, by Deputy Most Worthy Patriarch James R. Cary, of Iowa. The following delegates were present and vouched for:

Vermillion Division, No. 1—H. J. Owens, H. J. Austin, Wm. L. H. Owens, Springfield Division, No. 2—R. T. Wood, Geo. W. Sterling, Bon Homme Division, No. 3—David Devoil, Elk Point Division, No. 4—Alexander Hughes, Rev. J. P. Coffmann, Yankton Division, No. 5—H. H. Smith, Lodi Division, No. 6—E. B. Crew, Sioux Falls Division, No. 7—E. A. Sherman, Canton Division, No. 8—Geo. P. Keeler.

The election of officers of the grand division resulted in favor of the following named: Alexander Hughes—grand worthy patriarch, Geo. W. Sterling, grand worthy assistant, Wm. L. H. Owens, grand scribe, H. H. Smith—grand treasurer, Rev. J. P. Coffmann, grand chaplain, Geo. P. Keeler, grand conductor, E. B. Crew, grand sentinel.

There was much business transacted pertaining to the important work of the association. The grand deputy, Mr. Cary, who had traveled extensively in the territory, made an address, showing the progress the temperance forces were making in the nation; claiming that Dakota was a very promising temperance field.

TO CARE FOR THE BLIND

In April, 1875, the Territory of Dakota closed a contract with the authorities of Minnesota, under which the latter state undertook the care and education of Dakota's blind people. The Blind Asylum of Minnesota was at St. Peter, and the rates charged were $5 a week for board and tuition. Patients who were able to pay their own expenses were required to do so, and those not so fortunate had their expenses defrayed from the territorial treasury.

MASONIC GRAND LODGE

Representatives from the various Masonic lodges of Dakota met at Elk Point on the 24th of June, 1875, for the purpose of organizing the Grand Lodge of Dakota Territory. There were but five subordinate lodges in the territory at that date, to-wit, viz:

St. John's Lodge No. 166, Yankton, the oldest lodge; Incense Lodge, No. 257, Vermillion; Elk Point Lodge, No. 288, Elk Point; Silver Star Lodge, No. 345, Canton; Minnehaha Lodge, No. 328, Sioux Falls; and the lodge at Springfield was chartered about that time but not early enough to permit of its participating in the organization of the grand body.

The delegates effected a preliminary organization, and adopted a constitution and general regulations; and elected the following officers:

Most worshipful grand master, Thomas H. Brown, Minnehaha Lodge; deputy grand master, Franklin J. Dewitt, Yankton, St. John's Lodge; grand senior warden, C. G. Shaw, Incense Lodge, Vermillion; grand junior warden, H. H. Blair, Elk Point; grand treasurer, George H. Hand, St. John's, Yankton; grand secretary, Mark W. Bailey, Silver Star Lodge, Canton.

The grand master elect then appointed the following subordinate officers:

Grand chaplain, J. C. Damon, Vermillion; grand senior deacon, W. H. Miller, Jr., Canton; grand junior deacon, O. P. or Elk Point or Sioux Falls; grand Tyler, D. W. Hasson, Elk Point; grand marshal, L. Congleton, Yankton; grand sword bearer, S. H. Stafford, Canton; grand senior steward, Thomas Robinson, Vermillion; grand junior steward, C. F. Mallahan, Elk Point; grand pursuivant, P. W. McManus, Elk Point.

A number of the appointive officers being absent, it was decided to postpone the installation to a later day; and a committee was appointed to select a place and name the date when the installation should take place. This committee fixed upon Vermillion as the place and the 21st of July as the date for the ceremony. Accordingly the grand lodge assembled at the Baptist Church at Vermillion on date named where the most worshipful past grand master of the Grand Lodge of Iowa, Bro. T. S. Parvin, then secretary of the Grand Lodge of Iowa, in ample form, constituted the Grand Lodge of Dakota Territory, and installed the foregoing brethren of the order into their respective offices.

The names of the lodges remained the same, but their numbers were changed: St. John's being No. 1; Incense, No. 2; Elk Point, No. 3; Silver Star, No. 4; Minnehaha, No. 5.

The following are the names of the first officers of the august body:

Grand master, Thomas H. Brown, Sioux Falls; deputy grand master, E. J. Dewitt, Yankton; grand senior warden, Calvin G. Shaw, Vermillion; grand junior warden, H. H. Blair, Elk Point; grand treasurer, George H. Hand, Yankton; grand secretary, Mark W. Bailey, Canton; grand chaplain, J. C. Damon, Vermillion; grand senior deacon, Wm. H. Miller, Sr., Canton; grand junior deacon, O. P. Weston, Sioux Falls; grand tyler, D. W. Hasson, Elk Point; grand marshal, Leonidas Congleton, Yankton; grand senior steward, Thomas Robinson, Vermillion; grand junior steward, J. A. Wallace, Elk Point; grand sword bearer, C. F. Mallahan, Elk Point; grand pursuivant, P. W. McManus, Elk Point.

ODD FELLOWS GRAND LODGE

The Odd Fellows of Dakota Territory met in delegate convention at Yankton, on Thursday, the 10th of August, 1875, and organized the Grand Lodge of Dakota Territory.

Those present were Rev. J. H. Magoffin and M. P. Ohlman, Yankton; A. Siebrecht, Fort Randall; R. R. Briggs, Vermillion; J. A. Wallace, Elk Point, J. P. Knight, Fargo.

The organization was effected by the election of E. W. Miller, Elk Point, grand master; Norman Leonard, Yankton, deputy grand master; A. Siebrecht, Fort Randall, grand senior warden; J. P. Knight, Fargo, grand junior warden; R. R. Briggs, Vermillion, grand secretary; Fred Schmauber, Yankton, grand treasurer. William Blatt, Yankton, grand representative to the grand lodge of the United States.

The installation ceremonies were held at Yankton on the 13th of October following, under the direction of the grand representative, William Blatt, when the following delegates were present:

Dakota Lodge, No. 1, Yankton, Fred Schmauber, Zina Richey, N. Leonard, Echo Lodge, No. 2, Fort Randall and Springfield, E. St. Clair, E. D. F. Poore, A. Siebrecht, H. A. James. Vermillion Lodge, No. 3, J. F. Curtis, J. P. Kohler, R. R. Briggs. Elk Point Lodge, No. 4, J. F. Hughes, W. J. Conly, E. W. Miller. Humboldt Lodge No. 5, Yankton, H. Protenhauer, M. P. Ohlman, William Blatt. Northern Light Lodge, No. 6, Fargo, J. P. Knight, James H. Magoffin, Charles Eisenman.

After installation, Grand Master Miller made the following appointments: Chaplain, Rev. James Magoffin; marshal, J. F. Curtis, confessor, Fred Schmauber; herald, E. St. Clair; guardian, M. P. Ohlman, who were then installed.

Committees were appointed and the territory was divided into five districts numbered from one to five. The affair closed with benediction and address.

DAKOTA'S FAIR AND CLOUDY DAYS OF 1875

The grasshopper raid of 1874 was pronounced to have commenced abroad somewhat and tended to discourage immigration, and to retard ful tendency of that fortuitous event, a territorial fair was proposed to be held in 1875 that would largely counteract the damage inflicted upon Dakota's reputation by the migrating insects. It would be said of Dakota in the home and foreign sections that were sending settlers to the West—"a people who can hold territorial fairs could not be plagued by grasshoppers," and at the same time the patriotic spirit of the people would find a most commendable expression and ample vent in the transfer of the fair exhibit to the Dakota department in the Grand Centennial Exposition.

Congress enacted a law in 1872 authorizing the President to appoint a centennial commission to take charge of the celebration of the centennial of the 100th anniversary of the signing and promulgation of this country's Declaration of Independence, to be held in Philadelphia in 1876. The bill provided that the commission should consist of two members from each state and territory, which commission was to organize and conduct the exhibition. The President appointed S. L. Spink and George Alexander Batchelder, commissioners for Dakota Territory. The exhibition was to open April 19th and close October 19, 1876.

Congress decided to make no appropriation of national funds for the event, but instead incorporated a centennial board of finance auxiliary to the commission, and provided for the issue of stock to the amount of $10,000,000 in 1,000,000 shares of $10 each, to be divided among the states and territories according to their population. The amount of the stock assigned to the Territory of Dakota was $3,800 only; and the terms of subscription required the payment of 20 per cent or $2 on each share at the time of subscribing; 20 per cent the following May; 20 per cent in July; 20 per cent in September; and the final 20 per cent in November. Subscription books were opened at Mark M. Parmer's bank in Yankton, in June, 1873, and remained open until March, 1874, at which time the stock was all taken, partly by citizens of the territory and partly by military people and other Government officials. The purpose of the law was to induce as many of the people as possible to become stockholders. John A. Burbank and M. K. Armstrong were the incorporators or members of the board of finance for Dakota.

TERRITORIAL FAIR AND CENTENNIAL

Preliminary to the making of an exhibit of the resources of Dakota Territory at the exposition an association was formed at the capital of the territory in August, 1875, to promote the holding of a territorial fair, and to do whatever could be done to forward the work of making a creditable agricultural and mineral exhibit of the resources of the territory. The harvest was abundant in 1875—surpassing the best that had been accomplished since the organization of the territory. As an instance of the bountiful yield of the grain fields, a Lincoln County farmer produced wheat that yielded thirty-five bushels to the acre, and his oats averaged 109½ bushels. One field of forty acres in Clay County was claimed to have produced an average of fifty bushels of wheat to the acre. Though these yields were exceptional, the production throughout the territory was largely in excess of any crop theretofore garnered. The fair organization, or rather the preliminary steps thereto, were taken at Yankton, August 23, 1875, when a meeting was held which was attended by the following named citizens:

Franklin J. Dewitt, Joel A. Potter, Newton Edmunds, W. A. Burleigh, C. F. Rossteuscher, William Miner, O. A. Albee, E. P. Wilcox, Frank Hefner, Wm. P. Dewey, Wm. M. Powers, William Blatt, Hermann Buerdorf, Lott S. Bayless, A. J. Sweetser, A. J. Faulk, H. B. Wynn, Jas. B. Wynn, Samuel Buckwalter, Simon Eiseman, Charles Eiseman, A. W. Howard, H. O. Anderson, Jas. A. Hand, John Ross, Chas. Williams, John Becker, Chas. Wallbaum, John Bates, W. S. Arnold, M. T. Woolley, C. J. B. Harris, Frank VanTassel, John Treadway, F. J. Cross, A. F. Hayward, W. W. Brookings, W. S. Bowen, G. W. Kingsbury, Maris Taylor, James Taylor, George Henckel, A. Schandeln, Fr. Schmauber, E. Iverson and M. A. Baker.

No formal organization was had at this gathering. The proposition to hold a territorial fair was, however, unanimously supported. The meeting was adjourned to the evening of the 21st, when it reconvened. Ex-Governor Edmunds, of Yankton, was elected chairman, and Melvin Grigsby, Sioux Falls, secretary. A number of encouraging agricultural and immigration speeches were made. The important results that would flow from a public exhibition of the products of Dakota soil and Dakota pastures, at this time of abundance and general prosperity, and the influence it would have in inducing settlers from the older states to come in and people the vacant lands of the territory, were eloquently and convincingly stated; and it was finally and formally, by a hearty and unanimous vote:

Resolved, That it is the sentiment of this meeting that a territorial fair ought to be held, and can be held this fall.

Resolved, That the exhibits to be made at the fair shall furnish the basis for a collection to be displayed at the United States Centennial Exhibition to be held at Philadelphia in 1876.

Resolved, That a committee consisting of Judge Lott S. Bayless, Wm. Pitt Dewey, Mark M. Parmer, Maris Taylor, W. W. Brookings, Gov. John L. Pennington and G. W. Kingsbury, be appointed to devise a plan and suggest ways and means for carrying the project into execution, and also to confer with citizens of other parts of the territory, either in person or by letter, and invite their co-operation and solicit their attendance at a meeting to be held in this hall on Friday evening, August 27th, for the purpose of perfecting an organization and devising plans for an exhibition the present season.

A subscription list was opened at this meeting, and the amount of $172 subscribed.

The meeting then adjourned, and on the Friday evening following, a much more numerous body of citizens assembled at the same place and elected Judge Lott S. Bayless, chairman, and Nathan Ford, secretary. Speeches were made and letters read promising hearty cooperation. A number of representatives from other counties were present. The following resolutions, which provided an ample basis for the enterprise, were introduced by Judge Brookings, and adopted without dissent:

Resolved, That the citizens of Dakota proceed to organize and hold a territorial agricultural fair, at Yankton, occupying two days, at a time to be fixed by the executive committee.

Resolved, That an executive committee of seven, consisting of Mar. Pitt Dewey, Judge L. Congleton, G. W. Kingsbury, M. T. Woolley, J. W. C. Morrissey, Judge R. S. Williams, and Adolph Schandeln be elected at this meeting for the purpose of making all necessary arrangements that in their discretion shall be required to carry out this plan successfully; and that said committee have power to fill vacancies in their number.

Resolved, That Nathan Ford be elected secretary of said executive committee.

Resolved, That the executive committee provide for a woman's department in the fair, and request the women to hold a meeting and elect from their number suitable committees to take charge of their department.

Resolved, That Mark M. Parmer, A. J. Swetser, and Chas. F. Seiborn be appointed a finance committee for the purpose of obtaining contributions to insure the success of the fair; M. M. Parmer to be chairman and act as treasurer, and pay out moneys ordered by the executive committee.

Resolved, That Hon. George H. Hand, of Yankton, Hon. John L. Kelley, of Chicago, Hon. George Stickney, of Union; Hon. C. B. Valentine, of Turner, Mark W. Kellogg, of Lincoln; L. D. F. Poore, of Bon Homme, J. R. Brink, of Armstrong, Lester F. Whitson, of Charles Mix; A. S. Jones, of Hutchinson, Melvin Grigsby, of Minnehaha, F. P. Hanson, of Hanson; S. G. Roberts, of Cass; Col. C. W. Kingsbury, of Burleigh; J. C. Davidson, of Davison; C. W. Wright, of Lake; M. D. L. Patterson, of Moody; J. H. Codrington, of Brookings, be hereby chosen a committee to prepare articles for the permanent organization of a territorial fair, association and agricultural show, to present the same at a meeting to be held at Yankton, S. D. M., on the 27th of August, for final action thereon.

Resolved, That all moneys and profits that may be left after paying the expenses and premiums at said fair, be placed in the hands of a committee consisting of Spink, of Yankton; Hon. F. J. Cross, of Minnehaha; and Hon. J. W. Hoffman, of Union counties, and be used for the purpose of aiding and securing a proper representation of Dakota at the United States Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia in 1876.

The amount of $300 was subscribed at this meeting, which then adjourned, and the active work of preparing for the exhibition was taken up. J. W. C. Morrison was elected chairman of the executive committee. This committee fixed the dates for the fair to be held on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, September 29th, 30th, and October 1st. The railroads of Iowa and Minnesota pledged low rates for the occasion.

The fair grounds were selected on a 40-acre tract of Picotte's, where a race track was laid out and temporary structures erected and tents provided for the exhibition and to accommodate the people.

Fine weather greeted the people on the opening day of the important event, and Yankton was filled with visitors who had come in from every quarter. A meeting of the fair society was held and the following imposing array of officers elected and appointed:

President—Hon. John W. Turner, Turner County. Vice Presidents—E. B. Crew, Clay County; Byerk Peterson, Yankton County; George Stickney, Union County; Hugh Fraley, Bon Homme County; Henry Maxwell, Hutchinson County; Daniel Shearer, Armstrong County; Samuel Bloom, Hanson County; John Head, Davison County; A. B. Wheelock, Lincoln County; Artemas Gale, Minnehaha County; C. W. Lounsberry, Burleigh County; A. McHench, Cass County; Geo. Winship, Grand Forks County, and D. M. Kelleher, Stutsman County. Marshal—W. H. H. Beadle, Yankton. Secretary—Nathan Ford, Yankton. Treasurer—Mark M. Parmer, Yankton.

Superintendents and Awarding Committees: Class A, Cattle—G. P. Bennett, Union. Awarding Committee: E. B. Foster, Rockport; L. Bothun, Sioux Falls; G. W. Kellogg, McCook, Union County. Class B, Horses—A. C. VanMeter, Clay County. Awarding Committee: Col. C. T. Campbell, Scotland; C. K. Howard, Sioux Falls; I. N. Martin, Canton County. Class C, Sheep—Jerry Gehon, Lincoln County. Awarding Committee: Knud Larson, Vermillion; Bligh E. Wood, Springfield; Jacob Max, Yankton. Class D, Swine—G. L. Whitmarsh, Turner County. Awarding Committee: C. F. Mallahan, Elk Point; C. H. McDonald, Sioux Falls; Newton Edmunds, Yankton. Class E, Poultry—Dr. J. L. Phillips, Minnehaha County. Awarding Committee: Daniel Shearer, Milltown; N. J. Wallace, Elk Point; W. W. Aurner, Swan Lake. Class F, Fruits and Flowers—Mrs. Newton Edmunds, Yankton County. Awarding Committee: Mrs. M. W. Sheafe, Elk Point; Mrs. Charles Presho, Milltown; Mrs. A. J. Faulk, Yankton. Class G, Farm Products—Alfred Brown, Scotland, Bon Homme County. Awarding Committee: A. S. Jones, Olivet; Peter Jordan, Vermillion; Daniel Unruh, Childstown, Turner County. Class I, Agricultural Implements—Jacob Brauch, Yankton. Awarding Committee: H. H. Rudd, Lodi; John E. Maxwell, Olivet; Jerry Gehon, Canton. Class K, Manufactures—D. B. Cooley, Yankton. Awarding Committee: H. E. Bonesteel, Springfield; A. F. Shaw, Sioux Falls; E. W. Miller, Elk Point. Class L, Domestic Arts and Manufactures—Mrs. H. C. Davidson, Springfield. Awarding Committee: Mrs. Geo. A. Keeler and Mrs. J. M. Wahl, Canton; Mrs. Clark Tarbox, Lakeport. Class M, Sewing Machine Work—Mrs. H. M. Fisher, Yankton. Awarding Committee: Mrs. J. L. Phillips and Mrs. A. Gale, Sioux Falls; Mrs. George P. Waldron, Yankton. Class N, Fancy Work—Mrs. N. J. Cramer, Yankton. Awarding Committee: Mrs. M. Grigsby, Sioux Falls; Mrs. W. S. Bowen, Yankton; Mrs. G. W. Kellogg, McCook. Class O, Fine Arts—Mrs. W. M. Bristoll, Yankton. Awarding Committee: Mrs. L. D. F. Poore, Springfield; Mrs. Wm. VanEps, Sioux Falls; W. S. Bowen, Yankton. Class P, Miscellaneous—Rev. Stewart Sheldon, Elk Point. Awarding Committee: Rev. J. H. Magoffin, Yankton; Mrs. J. P. Kountz, Bon Homme; H. H. Blair, Elk Point; Mrs. H. H. Blair, Elk Point; Mrs. D. M. Inman, Vermillion. Class Q, Baby Show—Mrs. Oliver Shannon. Awarding Committee—J. W. Turner, F. J. Dewitt, J. A. Kent, Joel A. Potter, J. Shaw Gregory, W. A. Burleigh, J. P. Kidder, Mrs. B. E. Wood, Mrs. B. C. Cogan; Mrs. Geo. W. Rounds, Bon Homme. Class R, Driving and Trotting—T. W. Brishine, Yankton. Class S, Flour and Meal—R. B. Hunt, Yankton. Awarding Committee: C. W. Beggs, Elk Point; P. H. Turner, Springfield; Chas. E. Prentice, Vermillion. Admission, single ticket, 25 cents; family ticket, good for the season, $1.

There were 250 persons who made entries for articles for exhibition and as contestants for premiums, the latter largely paid in ribbons and cards and certificates. There were about twenty-five hundred articles exhibited in the various departments. The weather was favorable, and the exhibition provoked so much favorable feeling and comment that it was resolved to make it a permanent event, to be held annually. The laws of the territory made no provision for the organization of an agricultural society, such as was thought expedient; but a society was duly organized at the close of the fair and the following officers elected: John W. Turner, president; Judge Granville G. Bennett, of Clay County, vice president; Miles T. Woolley, Yankton, secretary; L. D. F. Poore, Bon Homme County, treasurer. The directors were Alfred Brown, Hutchinson County; J. L. Fisher, Clay; D. P. Bradford, Bon Homme; Wm. K. Hollenbeck, Turner; F. B. Foster, Hanson; P. H. Risling, Yankton; G. W. Kellogg, Union; S. L. Spink, Yankton; H. H. Rudd, Clay.

The officers of the society were authorized to name the time and place for holding the fair thereafter, but no change was made in the place for a number of years, and an annual exhibition was quite regularly held at Yankton.

The actual expenses consumed most of the receipts and contributions, and the remainder was turned over to the board of centennial commissioners, and selections were made of a number of articles with a view of adding them to the collection of mineral and forest exhibits of the territory to be made at the centennial exhibition.

VERMILION SCOURGED BY FIRE

While the people of Dakota generally were devoting themselves to the relief of a large number of farmer settlers who had lost their crops by the grasshopper raid of the year previous, a most disastrous fire occurred in the City of Vermillion, practically destroying the business portion of the town. Above thirty business buildings were burned on the 13th of January, 1875, leaving but three standing. The county officers were kept in rented buildings, and the county treasurer lost $3,000 in cash and all the books and records. The city had no adequate water supply or fire organization, and a stiff northwest wind prevailing, placed the town at the mercy of the flames. The principal losers were the Doctor Lyons' estate; J. W. Grange & Bros.; Hayward & Son; Hodgins Bros.; J. Becket; Emmlay & Morrison; Hornick & Walls; C. C. Russell; Prentiss & Newton; Geo. H. Pratt; R. D. Tyler; Samuel Jones; Thompson & Lewis; Pratt & Devay; W. H. I. Owens; Geo. Ashard; Hans Gunderson; J. N. Ward; D. Stephens; N. Hanson; J. N. McComer; W. P. Carr; C. H. Fine; Wm. Deming; F. C. Ludbs, Cal. Shaw; John L. Jolley; W. K. Hollenbeck; C. N. Chitt; Doctor Burdick; F. B. Crawford. Insurance rates had been so high, owing to the exposed situation of the town, that the property owners and business men had carried only a small amount of indemnity.

MINNEAPOLIS VISITED

An excursion party made up of Minneapoli professional and commercial men and others engaged in manufacturing, reached Dakota Territory on the 15th of January, 1875, stopping at Yankton on the 22d of the month. The object of the excursionists, who were not only the representatives of business included those occupying official stations, was to see this country of the Dakotas during the growing season, having in mind future commercial intercourse with Dakota, which was regarded as the most important grain producing region tributary to the young grain metropolis and flour manufacturing center of the United States.

This was the budding period of great enterprises, when the foundations were being laid for stupendous commercial associations and its kindred industries: when men were building better than they knew; when the most sagacious, and far-seeing, and optimistic, failed to grasp the wonderful development which the future had in store for the Northwest.

Minneapolis was just beginning its remarkable career, and its destiny was in the hands of men singularly well-equipped to make the most of the natural resources of the grain gardens of the world.

An address of welcome was presented to the city's guests upon their arrival, by Governor Pennington, after which they were taken in carriages and given a view of the town and its surroundings, and were also treated to an exhibit of the agricultural products of the territory, a fine variety having been collected for the occasion which were donated to the visitors and taken by them back for exhibition in the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce. At the conclusion of the carriage ride, a frontier luncheon was provided at the Merchants Hotel, which was greatly enjoyed by the guests and the host; after which the party was escorted to the depot, where an address, in acknowledgment of the courtesies shown the visitors, was made by the Hon. W. D. Washburn, the eminent Minnesota statesman and head of the leading flour manufactory in the United States. With this address, the ceremonies ended and the visitors departed.

Dakotans were, at this time, seeking the aid of their more influential neighbors on the east, in the construction of railroads and in the promotion of routes to the Black Hills, and this visit of representative Minnesotians was viewed as the beginning of an intercourse that would be mutually advantageous. While the benefits of this intercourse were not immediate, and were never of great importance to the extreme southern portion of the territory, the development of Dakota generally was promoted and a bond of mutual interest established that has continued to be an important factor in all the great enterprises that have marked the progress of the Dakota commonwealth.

That the Sioux Indians were the discoverers of gold in the Black Hills region seems reasonably certain, but at what time there is no definite information. They knew the value of the metal but did not know any method of mining it. They were known to have nuggets of gold in their possession, and exchanged it for merchandise, during the first half of the last century, at Fort Laramie, and also at some of the trading posts on the Missouri River. These nuggets they had found in the numerous streams issuing out of the hills, and while they could detect the metal in the beds of the creeks, they had no knowledge of its existence in placers or in quartz veins. Father DeSmet, the renowned Jesuit missionary devoted his life work from 1840 to near 1870 to Christianizing the Indians. Like Paul of old, he was never a charge upon his people but contributed generously to their relief in times when disease and starvation assailed them. The reverend father knew of the existence of gold in the Black Hills but he was prone to avoid any allusion to the value of the country, concerned as he was with the religious and moral welfare of the people who claimed it and had a possessory title to the soil. The secret was revealed to him by the Indians, and he preserved it as to the locality of the gold fields, until the time came when it could be revealed without detriment to the red man, though he had for prudential reasons, let it be known to a few intimate friends, that a valuable gold field existed in the Northwest; that it was upon Indian territory, and was not known to the white people. He was not, however, the least tempted to get gain from his knowledge, nor would he willingly permit others to disturb the peace of his Indian people by going to the Black Hills in quest of it. It is contended that he was instrumental in inducing the Indians to a policy of absolute secrecy as to the existence of gold in their territory, and cautioned them against revealing it.

gold they found in the streams out of the country. He told them that if the white people learned of it they would come in and possess the country.

It was claimed by the early pioneers of Dakota that the Indians were under a solemn obligation not to reveal the existence of gold there under penalty of death. The obligation was religiously observed. In confirmation of this it is related that in the year 1857, in June, at the great Sioux camp at Lake Traverse and the Big Stone Lake, at the council which elected Sitting Bull war chief of the Teton, a law was enacted by the tribes of the Sioux there represented, subject to the rule of the supreme chief of the nation, Black Moon, as follows:

That any Indian who should show the gold fields in the Black Hills to white men, should die, and the whites thus made aware of the presence of gold there should also die, for fear that the country would be taken from them.

After the death of Father DeSmet, which occurred in 1870, and after the agitation for the opening of the hills had become nation wide there appeared in a Washington paper a letter from Colonel VanVliet to Thurlow Weed, one of the famous New York statesmen who flourished with Seward and Greeley before the Civil war, giving the substance of a conversation had with Father DeSmet some twenty years prior to the date of VanVliet's letter, in which the reverend father had, in confidence, acquainted VanVliet with the existence of a platinum deposit in the Sioux country, between the Yellowstone and the Cheyenne River, which DeSmet had visited. This letter brought out a confirmatory letter from John B. Stolley, of Washington, a life-long friend of DeSmet. Stolley's letter bears a Washington date, April 26, 1875, and was as follows:

Sir: Colonel VanVliet's letter to Thurlow Weed, published in the Republican of the 24th of April, reminds me of a similar interview I had in this city with Father DeSmet, in 1864. I had been honored from my boyhood with the confidence and friendship of the reverend father, and in this interview, while speaking of my business prospects, he said if he were at liberty he could tell me where I could realize quickly a large fortune; that in one of the Indian reservations there existed very rich gold deposits of which the whites were ignorant; that the Indians had shown him large nuggets of the ore they had picked up in the beds of streams, and he believed that this place would some day prove to be the richest gold field in the world. He told me this in confidence, and said that he had cautioned his children, as he called the Indians, not to show these nuggets to white traders, who would thereby be tempted to overrun the reservation and drive out the Indians. Father DeSmet had but a short time previous to this interview been in the Black Hills country, and it was to that locality, I have no doubt, that he referred. As the existence of gold in the Black Hills is now a matter of notoriety, I feel absolved from any obligation of secrecy to my deceased friend in making public the above statement.

JOHN B. STOLLEY.

The communities that had settled at three or four points along the Missouri Valley in the earliest days of Dakota's occupation by the whites under the Yankton treaty, were the first to become informed in a general way of the mineral and timber resources of the Black Hills; and the first who made efforts and expended time and money, memorialized Congress, and organized expeditions to explore the country. Yankton people led in these organizations and efforts. A number of persons, more or less familiar with the Black Hills country, and also on friendly terms with Indians, who had been in and out from that region, resided at Yankton or made Yankton their abiding place when they were not absent in the Indian country.

In 1804 came the first authentic report to the pioneers of the Missouri Valley in Dakota, regarding the gold bearing character of the Black Hills country. The "squaw men"—those whites who had Indian wives, had learned of the existence of gold there, and claimed to have seen specimens of the valuable metal in the possession of Indians who had obtained them in the hills. Some of the older traders along the Upper River were also in possession of information regarding the mineral deposits in that section, but made no effort to acquaint the people with the facts, probably influenced by their own interests, which would have been jeopardized by the incoming of a large body of white people. While the auriferous character of the country had been mentioned by an occasional exploring party sent out under the patronage of the Federal Government, the subject had not attracted much attention until the Indian campaign under General Sully in 1864 had directed attention to that quarter and unsealed the lips of those who had reliable information regarding the valuable resources of that section.

Among the possessors of this "open secret" may be mentioned Charles T. Picotte, Colonel Galpin, Colonel Culberson, and Maj. William P. Lyman, all of whom had their information from first hands, and to their discreet friends spoke of it with unqualified confidence. Picotte was a Sioux half breed and was born at Fort Pierre, well educated, grew up in the Cheyenne country, and traded with the Black Hills Indians for ten or twelve years prior to 1870; Galpin was the second husband of Mrs. Picotte and one of the confidential councillors of the Sioux chiefs; Culberson was a trader with a Sioux wife; and Lyman was the son-in-law of the famous Strike-the-Ree. M. K. Armstrong, who published the early history of Dakota in 1866, became the confidential agent of Picotte at Yankton, and it was undoubtedly from Picotte that he derived much of his most valuable information concerning Western Dakota including the mineral and other resources of the Black Hills; and the same authority contributed much valuable information respecting the western part of the territory which was given in the first message of Governor Jayne to the first Legislature. The parties named were all pioneers of Yankton except Galpin and Culberson who were frequent visitors. It is to be expected, therefore, that Yankton people, from the earliest years of the settlement of the territory would manifest a lively interest in the Black Hills country and did not relax their efforts to secure their exploration.

The Black Hills Exploring and Mining Association was the name given to an organization at Yankton, in January, 1861, headed by Byron M. Smith, Maj. W. P. Lyman, M. K. Armstrong, W. W. Brookings, Newton Edmunds, William Miner, J. Shaw Gregory and others. It was the first citizens organization in the United States having the exploring of the Black Hills country as its purpose. A number of public meetings were held during the winter, and a membership enrolled that included half the adult male population of the village. Its object was well explained in its title, and those who made up its active membership were deeply in earnest, and were such men as an initial movement of this kind could be confidently entrusted to. They were not all practical miners, but they were practical frontiersmen, and whenever the time arrived to move forward they would be accompanied by a number of experienced Californians who had panned out gold in the gulches of that country. The hills and adjacent country extending to the Missouri River was regarded as Sioux Indian country, though at the time of which we write there had been no treaty stipulation affecting it, or declaring it to be an Indian reservation; but it was known as Indian land and that the Indians professed to regard it with peculiar veneration, and above all price, and would listen to no proposal for disposing of it.

No movement appears to have been made toward starting the expedition formed by this association during the year 1860. General Sully's second campaign (in 1864) had been successful, the hostile Sioux Indians were in a subdued if not peaceful condition; and the Government had undertaken to make peace treaties with the Sioux during the years 1865-1866; wagon road expeditions were at work under the patronage of the Government to open roads from the Missouri to Montana by way of the Niobrara route and also from the mouth of the Big Cheyenne River to its forks near the base of the Black Hills, thence westwardly to a connection with the Niobrara road, and many of the members of the association were engaged in that work. It was not known at this time that the Government would interpose the slightest opposition to the expedition, and there was no part in postponing a forward movement.

During the following winter, 1866-67, the association was revived under the Smith's leadership, and widely advertised. Preparations were made for an stantial basis for carrying out the project, and during the spring of 1867, there had assembled at the rendezvous at Yankton, about one hundred men, well armed, equipped and provisioned. Nearly all were ex-soldiers of the Civil war, and their white tents composed an orderly laid out village on the bank of the Missouri. The spring season was late and the grass tardy in starting, which delayed the forward movement. A portion of the new membership of the association had come from the Southern States, and from Pennsylvania and Indiana. The larger portion were Dakotans and Nebraskans, from the various settlements along the river, and all were impatient to be on their way.

During the spring, it had been given out and was generally known that Mr. Smith had been promised a military escort for his party, and the delay in starting was presumed to be partly due to the non-arrival of the troops; but there must have been some misunderstanding regarding this escort feature, for early in June, when the departure of the expedition was daily expected, the camp of the enterprise was thrown into the greatest consternation by the announcement that General Sherman had issued a letter virtually forbidding the invasion of the Sioux country. The correspondence relating to this unfortunate turn to his plans was furnished to the members of the expedition by Governor Faulk, to whom the official letters of the military authorities had been addressed. The first communication is from Sherman to General Terry, as follows:

Headquarters Military Division of the Missouri,
St. Louis, Mo., May 27th, 1867.

General: I have your letter of May 22d, with the enclosures, relating to an expedition getting up at Yankton for the Black Hills. I agree with you perfectly that we are not in a position to permit an invasion of that region, for no sooner would a settlement be inaugurated, than an appeal would come for protection. Now there is no other section of country in which the Sioux can take refuge except in that which Mr. Smith proposes to explore. You may, therefore, forbid all white people going there at present, and warn all who go in spite of your prohibition, that the United States will not protect them now, or until public notice is given that the Indian title is extinguished.

W. T. SHERMAN,
Lieutenant-General Commanding.

To ALFRED H. TERRY,
Brevet Major General, U. S. A., St. Paul, Minn.

Headquarters Department of Dakota,
St. Paul, Minn., June 1st, 1867.

To His Excellency, A. J. FAULK,
Governor of Dakota Territory.

Sir: I have the honor to forward to you, enclosed, a copy of a letter from Lieutenant-General Sherman, to me, and to request you to bring it to the attention of the parties at Yankton, who are engaged in organizing for the exploration and settlement of the Black Hills. I respectfully suggest to your excellency that a proceeding more inimical to the safety of the inhabitants of Eastern Dakota, could hardly be devised. The Sioux place the highest value upon the region of country in question. They look upon it as their last refuge from starvation. When all other sources of food fail them they can there find game. They have repeatedly announced their determination to repel by force any attempt to take possession of it. It is unceded Indian territory, and although I am not so familiar with the law affecting such territory as to have a fixed opinion on the matter, I have supposed that whites have no legal right to enter upon and occupy it. The proposed expedition will, I feel sure, seriously complicate existing difficulties, and bring on hostilities which will be likely to extend to the settled portions of the territory. The expeditionary party may be able to protect themselves, although of this I think there is some doubt, but that it will be practicable to commence settlement there until some arrangement is effected with the Indians, I do not believe. No military protection can be given at present, nor will it be given until settlement is authorized by the extinguishment of the Indian title.

I address you on the subject because I know you must be interested in the safety of the people of the territory, and also as the readiest means of conveying to the persons engaged in organizing the proposed expedition a warning that the military authorities will not protect them in an invasion of land still held unceded by the Indian tribes.

Very respectfully,
Your obedient servant.

ALFRED H. TERRY,
Brevet Major-General, U. S. A., Commanding.

The expedition was not absolutely forbidden, but the position of the military authorities put the exploring enterprise in the light of an unlawful marauding expedition—a sort of piratical excursion which did not meet the favor of the members, and after a week or more of discussion, the larger part of the members resolved to disband and abandon the project.

This result was very gratifying to the army officials, who felt that they would have been required to halt the expedition whenever it invaded the Indian country, a duty not altogether agreeable when enforced against respectable citizens of the Government, though this was not suggested in the letters given.

While the members of the association did not feel that the Indians would make any formidable opposition, they were convinced that the expedition would be regarded with such disfavor by the Government authorities, that it would be unable to accomplish any commendable or praiseworthy purpose, and would probably terminate in failure.

Mr. Smith made no further effort to explore the country, but a number of the party who came in from the East, remained in the territory, anticipating a favorable turn in the treaties proposed, that would enable them to carry out their plans.

In support of the statement made that the Government authorities had promised an escort of military to the expedition, the following brief correspondence is given, which shows that contrary counsels existed in the war department. Edwin M. Stanton was then secretary of war, and it would appear that he had overruled or countermanded the warning proclamations of Generals Sherman and Terry. Dr. W. A. Burleigh was then delegate to Congress. Correspondence follows:

War Department, Ordnance Office,
Washington, D. C., June 10th, 1897.

HON. W. A. BURLEIGH, Yankton, Dakota Territory.

Sir: In confirmation of the telegram to you of this date, I have now to inform you that in pursuance of instructions from the secretary of war, endorsed on your letter to him of the 29th ult., General Augur has this day been requested to cause two mountain howitzers, with implements complete, and 200 rounds of ammunition—one-half canister and the other shells—to such person as you may designate, and who will receipt for the property, and you are requested to correspond with the general, or with Major Ede, the ordnance officer at Omaha, in case of General Augur's absence.

Respectfully, your obedient servant

A. B. DYER,

Brevet Major-General, Chief of Ordnance

Headquarters Department of the Platte,
Office Chief Ordnance Officer,
Omaha, Neb., Jun. 11th, 1897.

HON. W. A. BURLEIGH, Yankton, Dakota Territory.

Sir: The secretary of war having directed the issue of two mountain howitzers, and 200 rounds of ammunition for same, to a party of citizens organizing at your place for the exploration of the Black Hills of Dakota, I am directed to have the issue made at Fort Randall, and communicate with you on the subject. The commanding officer of that post has been directed to furnish you or any one you may designate, with the guns and ammunition. Be pleased to communicate with him on the subject.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LOUIS R. FLETCHER,

Captain and Brevet Major Ordnance Corps.

This incident of Smith's expedition had caused some confusion in the conduct of the war department, but the matter was quieted by yielding to the views of the generals in charge of the western military districts, who were apprehensive of serious trouble with the Indians following in the wake of any sign of that country at the time, whether supported by the army or furnishing their own protection.

The following copy of a letter from Gen. John Pope, then commander of the Department of the Missouri, relates to a matter showing that the war department had designed opening the Black Hills region prior to the making of the Laramie treaty of 1868:

Headquarters Department of the Missouri,
St. Louis, March 8, 1866.

To the Governor of Dakota Territory.

Sir: I have the honor of acknowledging the receipt of a memorial from the Legislature of Dakota Territory, asking the secretary of war to establish a military post on the north base of the Black Hills in that territory.

Whilst your letter transmitting this memorial to me does not invite a reply, I think it not improper to inform you that last year all preparations were made to establish the post referred to, but a panic in Minnesota forced me to divert the forces designed for its establishment to another part of the country.

It is my purpose as soon as the season opens to place as large a military post as the force at my command enables me so to do, on or near the upper waters of the Big Cheyenne, at the northern base of the Black Hills, with a view to open that country to explorers, and to constitute one of the posts on the route via Powder River and the Big Horn Mountains, to Montana. The post will be established as early as practicable in the spring.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN POPE,
Major General Commanding.

HAYDEN'S BLACK HILLS REPORT

Dr. F. V. Hayden, the eminent scientist, who fifty years ago, was professor of geology in the Philadelphia Academy of Sciences, and was also connected with the Smithsonian Institution at Washington, paid Dakota a visit in August, 1866. He proceeded to Fort Randall, where he obtained a few troops for a body guard and companions, and then made an excursion to the Bad Lands and Black Hills of Western Dakota. He returned in October, following, having been very successful, and halting a few days at the capital, was prevailed on, by Governor Faulk, an enthusiastic believer in Dakota's marvelous natural riches and wonders, to deliver an address, giving an outline of his observations and discoveries during the summer. A synopsis of the address is given herewith, for even at this late day, when so much has been learned of the country he visited, now inhabited by thousands of intelligent people, with their cities, churches, colleges and railways, to say little of their world famous gold mines, his story will be found as entertaining and instructive as it did when he told it to a gathering of charmed pioneers, in the capitol building at Yankton, nearly fifty years ago. At that time the people of this outpost and this border land of civilization, were beginning to feel an interest in the Black Hills, while the business men of Yankton particularly were anticipating great benefits from that region, when it should be opened up, because of their proximity, which seemed to give them a favorable advantage as the outfitting and starting point for emigration. It was not at that time known that there would be any interdiction of this emigration by the general Government, which had, at least tacitly, consented to the occupation of the Salmon River and other sections in Montana and Idaho, by thousands of gold seekers.

The meeting at Yankton was held on the evening of Thursday, October 6th. Governor Faulk presided and M. K. Armstrong was the secretary, the meeting being held under the auspices of the Dakota Historical Society. Professor Hayden proceeded in substance, as follows:

In 1853 I made my first tour of exploration in the Northwestern territory, in connection with the military expedition under General Harney. Nebraska was then a wilderness, with no permanent white settlements above Fort Leavenworth. I made the scientific explorations under Lieutenant Warren, in 1856-7, and under Captain Reynolds, in 1859-60. These explorations extended through the Platte River country, the region of the Black Hills and Bad Lands, and the great valleys of the upper Missouri and Yellowstone, comprising nearly nine years of scientific research in the territory of the Northwest.

My present brief journey to the Black Hills country was prosecuted for the purpose of collecting shells and fossils from the shore of that ancient ocean, which long ago, in by-gone ages, rolled through the upper regions of Dakota, with its lower confines ranging from the Black Hills to the great bend of the Missouri River above the Crow Creek Agency. I have returned with seventeen large boxes of choice collections. Leaving Fort Randall on the 2d of August, with two teams, four camp men and five soldiers, and an Indian guide, I proceeded up the Niobrara River and crossed over to White River at a point about two hundred miles from Laramie. The Niobrara River rises near the foot of Raw Peak, which is a spur or distant outburst of the Rocky Mountains. The Niobrara is one of the least valuable rivers in Dakota [at this time the Niobrara River, from its mouth to its junction with the Kcha Paha, formed a portion of the southern boundary of Dakota], having a shifting channel with quicksand bottoms and falling shores. The country is in some places relieved with a scrubby growth of dwarf pines, while the strong winds which sweep over the country furrow out the dry plains and pile up the sand in heaps and ridges, called the "Sand Hills." But even these dry arid hills are the occasional resort of the Indian, embracing as they do narrow valleys of good bunch grass and spurs of timber.

The Bad Lands, which I entered on White River, are not entirely destitute of vegetation, as generally supposed, but are about two thirds covered with grass. White River, which rises near the source of the Niobrara, is very thick and muddy, with a sort of lime held in solution coming from the Bad Lands. This stream is quite large near its source, with numerous fine springs and wooded brooks making into the river, its Indian name being the "Flesh Colored River." The White River Valley is one of the most beautiful in the West, having an abundance of wood and grass, and is a favorite planting ground of the Indians. Beyond the White River is the Big Sheyenne, with the Black Hills clasped between its two arms or forks. These celebrated hills are a distant outburst of the Rocky Mountains, and are at their base about four thousand feet above the level of the sea, while some of the highest peaks, such as Harney's and Bear's Peak, are 7,500 feet above the sea. This upheaval of hills is about eighty miles in length by forty in width, lying southeast and northwest.

The Sheyenne River is no larger at its mouth than just below the forks, two miles further west, which is occasioned by the thirsty dryness of the air and climate, which drinks off or absorbs the rivers of the plains.

From one-third to one-half of the Black Hills are covered with an abundant growth of young, thrifty pines, many trees from three to four feet in diameter, and from eighty to one hundred feet without a limb. The hills are abundantly watered by small streams of pure cold water, running through small, beautiful valleys of inexhaustible fertility. Rain showers are very frequent in the vicinity of the hills. Spring is much earlier in the Black Hills than in Southern Dakota. On the 6th of March, 1855, I went from Fort Pierre to Bear's Peak and found a flower in bloom on the sunny hill-side, and herds of antelope quietly grazing like flocks of sheep. The Indians said "Young Spring was born." Six months crops can be grown in the Black Hills. From the characteristics of the climate, I believe that grasshoppers will never carry their devastations into that region. The isothermal line brings the Black Hills climate on an equal temperature with that of the plains six degrees further south. The Black Hills form an anti clinal axis or an upheaved isolated knot of the great Rocky Mountain chain. A syn-clinal axis is formed by the sinking of the earth's crust. The Black Hills were lifted up by the heat of the earth seeking vent. The great plains rise one foot to the mile in approaching these hills, but near their base their ascent is twenty feet to the mile. In the formation of these hills, as in all mountain ranges, the unstratified rock are heaved up in a broken and confused mass from below, and are destitute of all traces of animal life. Intermingled with these rocks and in the layers of vegetation, the gold bearing formations which are developed in the Black Hills. Little particles or grains of gold can be found in almost any little stream in the vicinity of these hills. But gold is not always found in paying quantities where "color" is raised. While there is every indication of rich gold deposits in these hills, my explorations have been more for the purpose of collecting old fossil remains than glittering dust.

Above the primary or unstratified rocks come the stratified formations, first one and broken in the Black Hills like the layers of an onion, the first of which are the Silurian or gold bearing rocks. Next comes the carboniferous or coal measures. We are far from the west rim of the great coal basin. No coal need be looked for in this vicinity except at great depth. The triassic or red beds are next found in the Black Hills. They have all been burned at some distant period and contain no fossils. This is a connecting link in the great geological chain of the globe, and was first found on this continent in the Black Hills, and was added to that of England. Gypsum beds are found in the Black Hills, five feet in thickness, and will yet prove of value to the people of the Northwest. The triassic rocks are also there and form a distinct phase of the geological world. It contains a new form of life, a new species of fossils, but contains no mineral. One species of life never passes from one formation to another. Each formation is in itself a new world, a new leaf in the geological age and history of the globe. Now appears the cretaceous or chalk period, which is better represented in the chalk bluffs of the upper Missouri River than anywhere in North America. Next comes the tertiary period. The Rocky Mountains and Black Hills raised their watery heads from the great ancient ocean of the Northwest. The waters began to recede, the dry lands appeared, and the great Missouri River began to wind its devious course from the mountains to the gulf. This was the end of the tertiary and the beginning of land in the Northwestern territories. As the briny sea began to recede, the waters formed into bays or estuaries. Nearly all of upper Dakota was a fresh water lake, and now forms a great light colored basin formed by the decay of the leaves and trees of great forests which were dotted on and settled on the land. The drying lakes. This coal is yet new, and is called in the land "brown coal," and is

A vast forest once covered all of Dakota, equal to the giant forests of Brazil. Palm is found only within the tropics in the present age of the world, but I have found a palm leaf impression in the Yellowstone, sixty-four inches long. What a wonderful history of the world's ages is here traced in the rocks and valleys of your own territory! The written history of France or Mexico is not half so reliable as the world's manuscripts received impressed in the plains of the Northwest. Think what vast forests must have formed these lignite beds—eight feet of wood forming one of coal.

During that period many extinct species of animals roamed through your territory. The animal kingdom was intermingled—no distinct families. There are eight different species of horse and one small "dog horse," and several kinds of camel. There was one kind of elephant one-third larger than any now living; a large species of mastodon, turtle, sea-horse, etc. Text-books in all our Eastern colleges now contain plates and lessons on the wonderful races of extinct animals that once inhabited your territory. This should be called the Old World instead of the New. Asia and Europe are two geological periods behind our own New World of the West, and while you as citizens of Dakota are residing upon the shores of this ancient ocean, may you succeed in building up a young state that will sparkle in the galaxy of the Union.

Speaking informally, the professor said that his profession called him to visit the abodes of antiquities, to search after the fossilized remains of departed ages. Wherever the field that possessed relics of the ages past, there it was his duty and delight to journey and study his lessons of this world's formation from the book of Nature, indelibly and plainly written by the finger of departed time. Dakota possessed such a field. The Bad Lands and Black Hills of Dakota contained treasures of as great value to the geological student as were possessed by any known region on the habitable globe, and the day would come when the "spectacled antiquarian" of Germany, and students from all portions of Europe, would make an annual pilgrimage to the Bad Lands of Dakota. The professor alluded to the inexhaustible forests of pine in the Black Hills, and said the Big Sheyenne River with its branches provided a reliable channel for the transportation of this timber to the settlements on the Missouri River.

The following sketch was written by another valid authority, and forms a fitting supplement to the valuable address of Doctor Hayden, then recognized as the highest authority in matters pertaining to those regions of the Rocky Mountains which he had explored and studied:

The geological formation of the Black Hills and Bad Lands is a subject that should excite the profound interest of the people of the country, and especially those of Dakota. The Mauvaise Terre or Bad Lands is a name given to a strange belt of country running along the eastern base of the Black Hills, nearly due north to the Yellowstone River. They cover an area of about two hundred miles in length by from fifteen to thirty miles in width, but are not continuous. Peaks of the Black Hills have been ascended to the height of 7,500 feet above the sea level, while the long deep basin of the Bad Lands, at the foot of the hills, is sunken in many places to a depth of 1,000 feet below the level of the surrounding plains. Peaks and castellated towers of every conceivable shape, size and color arise from the bed of the Bad Lands to a level with the adjacent prairie. Coal seams, many feet in thickness, are found shelving from the sides of these elevations, while the great floor of the basin is covered with a light porous soil, composed apparently of a combination of ashes, cinders, and dust. Specimens of petrified lizards, turtles, fern leaves, and the trunks of fallen trees with the stumps of the same, sixteen feet in diameter, standing where they grew, have been found there by General Harney, Lieutenant Warren, General Sully, Professor Hayden, and others.

The adjacent Black Hills, which are covered by pine forests, are composed of the same formations of stratified rocks as are found in the gold bearing gulches of the Wind River Mountains, situated about two hundred miles further west, in which coal oil springs have been discovered where petroleum issues in large quantities from the fissures of the rocks.

The most learned of modern geologists agree in their conclusions that the oil bearing strata of rock are to be found most abundant in the Devonian system of the earth. Some very good authorities claim that they have traced the real source of petroleum or rock oil down deep into the old Silurian systems. The upper and lower Silurian systems are deposited immediately below the Devonian formation, and the great coal deposits are met with in all countries next above the Devonian series.

This system is known in geology as the period in the earth's formation which corresponds with the third day of creation in the Book of Genesis, when the Creator first caused vegetation to appear on the earth, when He said: "Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after its kind, whose seed is in itself."

Lecoute, one of the first of modern geologists, says:

It is now universally admitted among geologists that coal is entirely of vegetable origin. The same author states that during the deposition of the Devonian system, and previous to the coal period, there lived none but aquatic animals of low order; but that a thin crust of mud and earth, were prepared, by heat and moisture, to produce the astonishing thickness of the vegetation of that period. A seam of coal is overlaid by black slate and underlain by fire clay. In the black slate were found the finest impressions of leaves and other smaller parts of trees; in the fire clay which underlies the coal seams are found in the greatest abundance the roots of plants, and not unfrequently the stumps of trees with their roots attached precisely as they grew. And what is still more remarkable and singular, trunks of trees are not unfrequently found almost entire, standing erect, with their roots still in the fire clay, their trunks passing through the coal seam, and far into the overlying strata of shale and limestone.

Parties who accompanied the expedition of General Sully in 1864, noted this resemblance of this description of natural coal measures to that of the Bad Land on the Little Missouri River. It has been asserted by distinguished geologists that the basin of the Bad Lands is the ancient bed of a great coal field, the upper seam of which has been burned out by self-ignited fires, and the same layer underlies all the territory between the Missouri and the Yellowstone. In the early part of the last century the trapper and Indians told of the region of the Bad Lands being on fire, emitting an offensive smoke and the sound of rumbling thunder from the earth. These phenomena were mentioned by Lewis & Clark in 1805, and Hunt and McKenzie in 1811.

Humboldt accounted for this by attributing the cause to an escape of hydrogen from subterranean beds of burning coal. Parker, who crossed that region in 1835, says:

The Thunder Spirits appear to have closed their labors. In passing the Black Hills we heard none of those successive reports resembling the discharge of several pieces of artillery, mentioned by some authors.

Instead of the subterranean thunder and fire reported by the earliest explorers of that region, we find in the journals of later travelers a description of the silent and mysterious ruins of the Bad Lands.

If this theory of the origin of the Mauvaise Terre proves true, it is safe to predict that petroleum springs or Rock Oil, will yet be found in the most accessible quantities at the eastern base of the Black Hills. Here, in the upheaval of this mountain range we shall undoubtedly meet with the oil-bearing rocks of the Devonian and Salurian systems which have been elevated through and above the surrounding coal field that borders immediately upon the base of the mountains. Eminent geologists inform us that the source of the petroleum oils are to be found in the bituminous, Devonian and Salurian limestones. The oil wells of the United States are for the most part sunk in the sandstone which forms the summit of the Devonian series.

The oil wells of Pennsylvania and Ohio are sunk in the Devonian sandstones which are supposed by Doctor Newbergh, to be only reservoirs in which the oil accumulates as it rises through fissures from a deeper source. Geology accounts for the existence of oil springs on the theory that the oil probably rises from the carboniferous (Devonian) limestones, and being lighter than the water which permeates at the same time the porous strata, it rises to the highest portion of the formation, where the petroleum of a considerable area accumulates, and slowly finds its way to the surface through vertical fissures. Professor Allen states that the coal bearing rocks may always be looked for in the vicinity of oil springs, and that the crude petroleum as it issues in a natural state from oil springs is a dark liquid of an exceedingly strong and disagreeable odor, and nearly equal to the artificial tarry oil.

Captain Bowieville, in 1834, found one of these natural reservoirs of oil, about 10 miles to the west of the Black Hills, which the Indians called the "Great Oil Spring."

It was found at the foot of a sand bluff, where the oil exuded in a stream of the color and consistency of tar, with a strong offensive odor. The Indians used it as an ointment for the galled backs of their horses, and as a balsam for their own pains and aches.

In the same region also are situated the numerous hot springs described by Lewis and Clark, McClellan and others. A similar description was also given in 1811 of the burning mountain of anthracite coal on Powder River, and of the Stinking Springs on the Big Horn, discovered by one of Captain Lewis's hunters in 1806, who gave such an account of its gloomy terrors, its hidden fires, smoking pits, noxious steams, and the all pervading smell of brimstone, that it received the name of "Colter's Hell."

Doctor Hayden, the geologist, who accompanied Lieutenant Warren to the Black Hills, says:

Passing over the granite and azoic rocks, we find that the Potsdam sandstone, or the lowest member of the Silurian period, is quite well developed in the Black Hills. Thus at the junction of the metamorphosed azoic and Silurian rocks gold becomes accessible.

Specimens of gypsum, rock salt and iron pyrites were picked up by some of Harney's troopers when passing along the base of the hills on their journey from Fort Laramie to Old Fort Pierre in 1855.

THE BAD LANDS

Mr. Chas. H. Bates, of Yankton, who had been engaged in surveying the public lands of the territory since 1870, both east and west of the Missouri River, and for the past ten years as allotting agent for the Dakota Indians, in a letter written from an allotting camp in the Bad Lands of Southwestern Dakota, says:

The most noted "Bad Lands" in the United States are located between Pine Ridge Agency and the Black Hills. We are now working in the most rugged part of them, being camped about nine miles south of the noted Sheep Mountain. A good description of their origin, with fine photos, is given in "The Geography, Geology and Biology of South Central South Dakota," by E. C. Perisho. Gratis, from the "U," Vermillion, South Dakota. These Bad Lands start about twenty-five miles north of Pine Ridge Agency and extend all along the Big White River in the northern part of the reservation. Interior and Scenic are located in them. They follow down the south fork of Cheyenne River, and for several miles below the junction of the Belle Fourche. There is an extensive break between these bad lands and the bad lands of the Little Missouri River, in the northwestern part of the state, with considerable breaks of bad lands at the heads of the Moreau and Grand rivers, but the bad lands of the Little Missouri do not develop their grandeur until in North Dakota, and their immensity, both perpendicularly and horizontally, till north of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and from there to the mouth of the Little Missouri, near Fort Berthold. General Sully came up to the edge of these bad lands west of the Killdeer Mountains in 1864, and he described them as appearing like "Hell with the fires out and still smoking."

The smoke was caused from burning lignite beds, and some are still burning, or were when I was there twelve years ago. I have been generally over all this country and assure you a word picture can give you but a faint idea of it.

Evidently the bad lands of the Little Missouri were formed by the burning of lignite beds, followed by erosion by the elements, and the fossils are vegetable. I have stepped a petrified pine stump, standing in place, that was three big steps across, more than ten feet. I measured a lignite bed in the Little Missouri country that showed a perpendicular face of fifty-four feet solid lignite above the water in the creek, and no knowing how much deeper it was. The bad lands along the Big White and Cheyenne rivers appear to be formed entirely by the elements, and it is going on very noticeably. The fossils are mostly marine, and some animal. Judging from some of the fossil bones I am well pleased that the animal does not exist at the present day.

CAPTAIN DAVY'S EXPEDITION

Capt. P. B. Davy, of Blue Earth City, Minn., reached Yankton about the 25th of November, 1867. This gentleman was an experienced frontiersman and explorer, a very intelligent man and brimful of energy and enterprise. In the season of 1866, he had led an expedition, numbering 400 persons, from Fort Abercrombie, on the Red River of the North, across the Dakota and Montana plains, to the gold fields of Montana, which had been eminently successful, and he had just returned from that journey overland by a more southern route, for the purpose of discovering a shorter and better equipped route than the one he had traversed in 1866. He stated that he had found an excellent route all the way from the gold fields to Yankton, and he had determined to lead a party to the Black Hills during the season of 1868. With this purpose in view he had formed an organization with headquarters at Yankton. These statements and much more were made at a public meeting held in Yankton. M. K. Armstrong had joined the expedition and was made the secretary and general agent. Captain Davy spent the following winter at home and in traveling through Minnesota recruiting for his proposed enterprise having Yankton for his rendezvous and starting point.

Notwithstanding the interdiction by the military arm of the Government, of Byron Smith's expedition, Captain Davy felt secure in having the approbation of that department. The peace commission appointed to select a large reservation for the Sioux Indians, it was claimed, had finally agreed upon the country north of the Big Cheyenne River, leaving the Black Hills outside of that reserve. Everything promised well until about the latter part of April, 1868, when Governor Faulk received a communication from Colonel Stanley of Fort Sully and in command of the Dakota military district, which read as follows:

Headquarters Department of Dakota,
In the Field, Omaha, Neb., April 30th, 1868.

BREVET MAJ.-GEN., D. S. STANLEY,

Colonel Twenty-second Infantry, Commanding District of Southeast Dakota, Fort Sully, D. T.

General: The brevet major general commanding has received information that an expedition for the exploration and settlement of the Black Hills is being organized at Yankton. The country which it is proposed to explore is unceded Indian territory, and such an expedition therefore if made will be made in violation of law. It is especially important at this time that this territory should be preserved inviolate, as it is the region selected by the Indian Peace Commission for a reservation for the Sioux and other Northern tribes. The brevet major-general commanding, therefore, directs that you prevent the proposed expedition, using force if necessary. Should you find that troops will be needed, you will take them from any of the posts in your district at your discretion. It will be desirable to notify at once the originators of the expedition, that they will not be permitted to carry their design into execution.

I remain, General, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. H. GOWEN,

Aide-de-Camp.

Official copy respectfully referred to his excellency, Governor Faulk, for his attention.

The prohibitive edict from the military authorities was a great disappointment to Captain Davy and about three hundred men who had prepared to go with him, and who had been led to expect the favor of the military branch of the service. Davy, however, took his disappointment philosophically, and evidently was much more concerned for those he had induced to join his expedition, than for his own interest in the enterprise. He had enlisted over three hundred young men, some of whom had given up good positions to join him; others had made business arrangements for a year's absence, and all had purchased teams, arms, ammunition, and suitable clothing, and some their provisions. These parties were very much disappointed, and gave very emphatic vent to their indignation. But there was no appeal from the military authority, and the Black Hills expedition for 1868 was a closed chapter. A portion of Davy's men afterwards took passage by steamboat for Montana. The citizens generally shared the indignation of the miners, and felt that Dakota's interests were being sacrificed to enable the Pacific Railroad Company to secure all the benefits accruing from opening and settling the Northwest. The Union people had for some time been suspected of hostility to the Missouri River route to Montana, they wagon roads from their Wyoming towns to Montana and Idaho, and were ready to tap the Black Hills whenever the law would permit. Indignation, however, availed nothing. The prohibitive decree was not modified, and the Black Hills were not explored by Captain Davy, and no further attempt was made to launch an expedition in that direction, by Yankton people, until the interest in the subject was revived by the Custer expedition of 1874.

The edict forbidding the forward movement while temporarily delaying the exploring of the country, served to intensify popular interest in the matter, and aroused a sentiment throughout the nation favorable to the opening of the hills, and at the same time it set afloat innumerable reports regarding the mineral wealth of the country. A sample of these reports which was ingeniously made to fit the situation and give it a creditable coloring, is here related:

A Sioux Indian of the Oglala band was in the hills hunting eagles for their feathers, and afterwards took a large package of the feathers out to Fort Laramie where he traded them with the post trader for ammunition. While at Laramie he reported that on one of his hunting trips he shot a badger near his hole, and on going up found the ground covered with large nuggets of gold which the badger had dug out in making his nest. The Indian filled a small buckskin bag, used as a tobacco pouch, with the nuggets, and started out for Laramie, intending to trade it for some good horses. On his way out he met a small band of Brule Sioux and told them his gold story, which instead of surprising and pleasing them, threw them into a terrible rage. They stripped the Oglala of his gold and his clothes and gave him a severe beating; killed his horse, and told him they would certainly kill him if he told the story of finding the gold. The Indians said the whites would never be allowed to enter the country.

The military authorities, General Sheridan in command, gave out a statement late in August, 1874, that no person would be permitted to visit the Black Hills without permission of the secretary of the interior, who was in charge of all Indian agencies and reservations. The commanding general's statement apparently awakened a keener desire on the part of the public to visit the gold regions, and the interior department found its correspondence greatly increased by the numerous applications made for permission to visit the hills. Probably nine-tenths of the parties seeking a way to that country at the time were taking advantage of the short routes from the Missouri River in Dakota, of which there were at least four, all good practicable routes, with wood and water, by which the eastern slope of the hills could be reached within the distance of one hundred and fifty to two hundred miles. In fact, there were no other practicable routes, these in Dakota having been laid out by the Indian trails, trader's journeys, and scientific exploring expeditions, under authority of the Government, during the fifty years preceding. Along the Missouri River in Dakota being the region where these emigrants rendezvoused, the governor of the territory, Pennington, addressed the secretary of the interior on the subject, and received from that official a reply which stated the whole case, and wound up by virtually declaring that no one had authority to grant the permission asked for, and denying in advance all applications for permission. The official letter follows:

Department of the Interior,
Washington, D. C., Sept. 8, 1874.

Sir: I acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 27th ult., referring to the associations that are forming for the invasion of that part of the territory embracing the Black Hills, notwithstanding existing treaties with the Sioux Indians, and requesting such suggestions for the guidance and benefit of citizens of the territory as may be considered appropriate by the department; and in reply would say that the second article of the treaty between the United States and the different tribes of the Sioux Indians, concluded April 20th, 1868, agrees that the following district of country, to-wit, viz: "Commencing on the east bank of the Missouri River, where the 46th parallel of north latitude crosses the same, thence along low water mark down said river bank to a point opposite where the northern line of the State of Nebraska strikes the river; thence west across said river and along the northern line of Nebraska, to the 104th degree of longitude west from Greenwich; thence north on said meridian to a point where the 46th parallel of north latitude intercepts the same; thence due east along said parallel to the place of beginning; and in addition thereto all existing reservations on the east bank of said river, shall be and the same is set apart for the absolute and undisturbed use and occupation of the Indians herein named, and for such other friendly tribes or individual Indians, as from time to time they may be willing, with the consent of the United States, to admit amongst them; and that the United States now solemnly agrees that no persons, except those herein designated and authorized so to do, and except such officers, agents and employees of the Government as may be authorized to enter upon Indian reservations in the discharge of duties enjoined by law, shall ever be permitted to pass over, settle upon or reside in the territory described in this article, or in such territory as may be added to this reservation for the use of said Indians; and henceforth they do and will relinquish all claims or rights in and to any portion of the United States or territories, except such as is embraced within the limits aforesaid, and except as hereinafter provided."

The foregoing section prescribes who shall be allowed on this territory, so set apart for Indians, and expressly states that none others shall be allowed to pass over, settle upon or reside therein. The only power to alter this provision is that which made the treaty, and then it must be done with the consent of the Indians.

What is known as the late exploring expedition of General Custer, was merely a military reconnaissance of the country for the purpose of ascertaining the best location, if in future it should become necessary to establish there a military post.

On the 22d of June last, in a letter to this department, the honorable secretary of war wrote on this subject as follows:

"It is well known to the department that, at various times, settlers in the adjacent country have contemplated an expedition to the Black Hills, and the department has uniformly discountenanced such movements; but it has now almost become a military necessity that accurate knowledge be possessed by the army as to this portion of our territory, and for that purpose only is the present expedition (Custer's) undertaken."

The question of opening up this country to settlement rests with Congress, and until action has been taken by that body, this department has no discretion in the matter, but is required and will endeavor to prevent, any violation of any provisions of the treaty before mentioned. All applications to visit the Black Hills country will be denied.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

B. R. Cowan, Acting Secretary

To Gov. J. L. PENNINGTON, Yankton, Dakota.

In 1874, with the view of discouraging the immediate opening of the hills "treaty or no treaty," as many urged, certain high officials gave out public statements that "nothing yet had been discovered in the Black Hills to warrant the excitement or the claim that gold had been discovered there in paying quantities; that many of the gold stories afloat had been manufactured for selfish purposes; and even in 1875, after Professor Jenney's scientific expedition had reached the hills and began its investigations, the professor's first reports, probably unofficial, were said to have been purposely clouded with skeptical notions about the existence of the yellow metal in paying quantities. But it was too late for the Government to gain anything by taking such a position, for it had in its possession the reports of its unbiased officers, establishing the existence of gold and other valuable resources in the hills country.

Lieutenant Mullen, U. S. A., who with a small expedition explored a portion of the hills country in 1853, reported that he found "gold in such abundance that he was afraid to tell his men for fear that they would desert him." Mullen had been in the California placer mines, and asserted that they were by no means equal to the Black Hills.

From a letter written by Lieut. G. K. Warren, whose explorations in the Northwest were among the most valuable, we quote. The letter was published in January, 1858:

The rocks that comprise the Black Hills have been upheaved during geological periods long preceding the present, and were probably in existence, somewhat as we now see them, when what is now the prairie was a vast expanse of water. The great obstacle to opening these hills will be found in the hostility of the Dakota Indians. We were the first expedition to penetrate this region and alarm them with the dread of approaching civilization; they seriously threatened to kill us all for simply coming to look at it. They told us that they (all the Dakotahs) had a grand council to convene and pledged that if they saw no white man should come there any more, they would let place him there and kill him. We gave it up they must die, and they had better die than let our nation be killed. They said, "you would you do with me," the chief said, "I have seen your country and I tell you I will do as I please." You have no more to do with me than I have with you. The right was in the President, who had sent me here, and I had that over them."

should not come. And they made it a condition for not molesting us, that we should make known their feelings to the whites, and to the Yanktons, who if they sold their land should not come there to live.

The secretary of the interior, in his annual report for 1868-69, after a general review of the natural advantages and resources of Dakota, says: "The Black Hills, situated in the southwest part, contain gold, silver, copper and coal. Large forests of pine also exist in this locality adapted to building purposes."

This in a Government document, officially given out five years before the Custer expedition, indicates that the existence of gold in the Black Hills was not then a subject of doubt at Washington.

Yankton was the nearest town to the hills of any importance, and the best and shortest routes lay from that city. A number of old frontiersmen made their residence there, men who were personally familiar with the best natural routes west of the Missouri, leading to the mountain region. These routes were three or four in number—the Niobrara route; the White River; the Bad River via Old Fort Pierre, and the Big Cheyenne, the latter surveyed by Commissioner Brookings in 1865, for which the Government treated for the following year, agreeing to pay the sum of $25,000 for the road. It is probable that some of the earliest private exploring parties or prospectors who invaded the hills were from Montana, where gold was discovered on the Salmon River as early as 1859, and was soon peopled by an enterprising and adventurous class of prospectors from California. There was little evidence of any considerable body of miners having visited the hills prior to the two or three years before they were formally purchased of the Indians and thrown open.

The agitation of gold in the Black Hills had reached to nearly every portion of the United States, and it was apparent as early as 1872 that a public sentiment was forming throughout the country so widespread and determined that the Government would find it necessary in the interest of peace, to arrange a treaty with the Indian owners for cession of that country. The time had come when the proclamations of civil and military officials were in danger of being disregarded. Expeditions were forming as far east as Massachusetts, of such numerical strength that their leaders felt rather like inviting, instead of avoiding a conflict with the Indians, and the sentiment was outspoken that Government troops would never go so far as to use their weapons upon American citizens who were engaged in exploring and developing the valuable mineral resources of the country—resources that the Indians could not develop, and were valueless in their hands. So acute had the situation become in April, 1872, that Major General Hancock, then commanding the Department of Dakota, issued an important communication to the people of Dakota and the Northwest, which was designed to allay the growing popular feeling by a statement of the situation, and also to engender doubts regarding the existence of paying gold deposits. The general's letter follows: (Since the expedition formed in the '60s, the Sherman-Laramie treaty of 1868 had been made.)

Headquarters Department of Dakota,
St. Paul, Minn., March 26th, 1872.

Letters are being received at these headquarters from various parts of the United States, making inquiries in regard to the reputed gold discoveries in the section of country west of the Missouri River known as the Black Hills of Dakota, and asking if expeditions, presumed to be now in process of organization, will be permitted to penetrate that region.

The section of country referred to is set apart as an Indian reservation, by treaty with the Sioux, and the faith of the Government is understood to be pledged to protect it from the encroachments of, or occupation by, the whites. Accordingly any parties or expeditions which may organize for the purpose of visiting or "prospecting" the region in question, will be engaging in an unlawful enterprise, the consummation of which it will be my duty, under the law and my instructions, to prevent, by the use, if necessary, of the troops at my disposal. In this connection I may mention that I am just in receipt of an official letter from General Stanley, in command, subordinate to me, on the Missouri River, in which he refers incidentally to the Black Hills gold reports, in which he says no gold had been found there.

If you will give publicity in your columns to the statements herein contained, I do not doubt it will be the means of saving many worthy people from incurring useless expense.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
W. S. HAXCOCK, Major-General U. S. A., Commanding

And about the same time the executive of Dakota Territory put forth a warning proclamation, in words following:

By the Governor of Dakota Territory. A Proclamation.

Information having reached the office of the executive of said territory, through various sources, to the effect that combinations of men have been and are now being made with a view of entering and occupying the region of country known as the "Black Hills of Dakota," which is within the reservation belonging to the Sioux Indians, under the plea that the said Black Hills country has valuable mineral deposits, as well as quantities of timber fit for lumber;

Now, therefore, I, Edwin S. McCook, secretary and acting governor of the Territory of Dakota, by the direction of the President of the United States, through the Hon. Columbus Delano, secretary of the interior, do hereby warn all such unlawful combinations of men, of whatever locality or under whatever plea or excuse operating, that any such attempt to violate our treaty stipulations with these Indians, or disturb the peace of the territory by an effort to invade, occupy, or settle upon said reservation, will not only be illegal and liable to disturb the peace between the United States and said Indians; but will be disapproved by the Government. And if such efforts are persisted in, the Government will use so much of its civil and military force as may be necessary to remove from this Indian territory all persons who go there in violation of law.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the territory. Given at my office in the City of Yankton, this 6th day of April, 1872.

EDWIN S. MCCOOK (Seal).

Secretary and Acting Governor of Dakota Territory.

It was the impression in official circles that a few arrests of these invading parties, showing that the Government was in earnest in its efforts to protect the Black Hills from white invasion, would be all that was necessary to be done to put a quietus on the encroachments upon the forbidden soil. Theretofore the simple edict of the captain in command of the Dakota district had been sufficient to effect the disbandment of well organized expeditions, having the Black Hills as their goal, at Yankton and probably at other points, before any attempt was made to enter upon the forbidden ground, and why would not the same authority be respected at this time? The answer must be found in the invincible determination of that portion of the American people who had set their hearts on going to the Black Hills, and would not be deterred by official proclamations, or the danger, always imminent, of being waylaid and massacred by the hostile Indians, though in the beginning of the invasion, and for several months following, the Indian element of hostility was not apparent, but rather from motives of savage policy, one of encouragement to the invaders.

The soldiers at the frontier military posts knew of the existence of gold in the Black Hills before the Custer expedition. In the year 1872 a band of eighteen enlisted men deserted in a body from Fort Randall, and forming an expedition started for the Black Hills. They were followed and captured, and returned to the post.

There was no sentiment apparent at this period among the supporters, in Dakota, for exploring the hills, in favor of any movement that would bring about a serious conflict with the Government authorities, who, particularly the military, were generally credited with a friendly personal feeling for the movement for opening the gold country; but at the same time this friendly sentiment would not deter them from performing the duty imposed upon them. It was conceded that the Government could not do less than it was doing to protect the integrity of its treaties, and maintain its honor and authority. The annual report of Lieutenant General Sheridan, commanding at the time the Dakota district which was included in his department, which report is given in full in the appendix relating to the inauguration of the Indian peace policy, is satisfactory.

that the sentiment and influence of the army favored the early opening of the coveted country.

Dakotans can justly claim a preponderant share of whatever credit is due for the final opening of the Eldorado to white settlement. Though all efforts to explore the country were in violation of treaties, yet there will be a common pride felt in the fact that to the enterprising and adventurous spirit of Dakotans is due the earnest agitation of the subject for more than ten years before the country was reclaimed; and this agitation was based on actual knowledge of the natural riches of the country. Expeditions were formed by the early settlers for the purpose of exploring the hills only to be prohibited from their purpose by the authority which all law-abiding American citizens are in duty bound to respect and obey; and finally the people of the territory concluded to change their tactics, and instead of efforts at exploration, which availed nothing, public meetings were held at various points which memorialized Congress and the President, urging the speedy acquisition of the country by treaty. Memorials, which appropriately supplemented the petitions, passed for the same purpose by the Territorial Legislatures, were prepared and adopted by public assemblies, and forwarded to the territorial delegate in Congress. These memorials contained the most reliable information regarding the auriferous deposits of the country, its forestry resources, and its natural wealth generally. This movement by the people was not without its beneficial results, and doubtless hastened the favorable action subsequently taken.

However, the claim was made by the representatives of the Government having charge of such affairs, that the Indians would not listen to any proposition whatever looking to the ceding of country; and adding, in the face of the evidence furnished in the memorials prepared under authority of our popular meetings, that too little was actually known of the resources of the region to justify any haste on the part of the Government. Notwithstanding this negative attitude assurances from high authority were given Dakota's representatives, that as soon as the disposition of troops would permit, a military expedition, under an experienced officer, would be sent to the Black Hills for the purpose of exploring the country. These assurances later found expression in the famous Custer expedition of 1874.

Custer's Seventh Regiment of Cavalry was withdrawn from the Department of Texas in the latter part of the winter of 1872-73, and assigned to duty at Fort Abraham Lincoln, opposite the new Town of Bismarck, on the Missouri River in Dakota. In the spring following (1874), a military expedition was organized composed of the Seventh Cavalry under command of Custer, for the purpose of exploring the Black Hills country.

While the northern Sioux contended that the expedition was in violation of the Sherman treaty, it was unofficially reported that the southern tribes, particularly the Red Cloud people, though their chief had been consulted and had assented to it, and the fact that not the least opposition was manifested by any tribe would support this statement. The treaty of 1868 provided in effect for the exploration of the reservation domain if undertaken by the Government.

BLACK HILLS SURROUNDED BY CIVILIZED COMMUNITIES

The locality occupied by the Black Hills was a magnetic factor in drawing the intrepid and wealth-seeking Anglo-Saxon to explore it. Never before in the history of our country had a rich gold field covering such an ample area been discovered in the midst of civilized settlements. It had happened that the Black Hills had become surrounded, practically, by an enterprising, aggressive and industrious population before it was generally known that it contained valuable mineral deposits. Custer's expedition in 1874 had been the means of publishing to the world what had before been only an open secret in the settlements bordering it and among the Indians, and many thousand people were simultaneously moved by a kindred impulse to visit them. The auriferous hills were not remote from civilization, but practically surrounded by it. The distance to Harney's Peak from the settlements on the Missouri River was in the neighborhood of two hundred and two hundred and fifty miles. It was no hardship even to those known as "tenderfeet" to make the trip. It was a matter of a week's journey, and but for the Indians and military police, would have been regarded by many who undertook it as a pleasure excursion.

CUSTER AT YANKTON

The Seventh Regiment of United States Cavalry, commanded by Gen. Geo. A. Custer, came into Dakota Territory on the Dakota Southern Railroad from Sioux City to Yankton, and camped at the capital city a number of weeks, preparing for their long march to Fort Rice. The regiment reached the railroad terminus in Dakota on Wednesday, April 6, 1873, all save two companies that had been detached and sent by way of Minnesota around to Fort Lincoln. The camping ground selected was just east of the Rhine Creek fronting the Missouri River, not a mile from the city, and behind it, stretching away for a mile to the highlands, there was a verdant carpet as level as a floor affording a perfect and ample plat for the daily exercises of the troops.

The subordinate officers with the regiment were "Colonel" Stebbins, Joseph G. Tilford, Col. A. K. Hart, Col. Wm. Thomson, Maj. E. M. Smith, Capt. Geo. W. Yates, Capt. Thomas H. French, Capt. Owen H. Brown, Capt. Moylan, Bvt. Lt. Col. T. W. Custer, Capt. Thos. M. McDougall, etc.

J. Nowlan, Lieut. Edward S. Godfrey, Lieut. Algernon E. Smith, Lieut. Donald McIntosh, Lieut. Edward G. Mathey, Lieut. James Calhoun, Lieut. Frank M. Gibson, Lieut. William T. Craycroft, Lieut. Charles Braden, Lieut. C. DeRadio, Lieut. Benj. H. Hodgson, Lieut. W. Larned, Lieut. Geo. D. Wallace, Lieut. Charles A. Varnum, Lieut. H. M. Harrington, Captain Nowlan, regimental Q. M., and Lieutenant Calhoun, acting adjutant. The ten companies numbered about eight hundred men with forty laundresses. There were about seven hundred horses and two hundred mules. The regiment had been somewhat scattered through the South, with headquarters at Louisville, Ky., previous to coming to Dakota.

A DAKOTA BLIZZARD

Gen. George Forsythe, of Sheridan's staff was in Yankton at this time awaiting the arrival of the steamer Far West which was to take him on an observation trip up the Yellowstone River for the purpose of selecting sites for military posts. He was not connected with the Seventh Cavalry in any capacity.

Custer's regiment had been in camp for nearly a week or until the notorious April blizzard swept down upon the southern half of Dakota. It had been unpleasant and snowing moderately for nearly two days, Sunday and Monday, but changed on Tuesday, the 15th, to a storm of intense blizzardy proportions and continued to rage for about forty hours. It was not dangerously cold, but the wind was terrific and the snow filled the air threatening suffocation and death to any living being exposed to it. Custer's people, including the women, were all at the camp, which had only tents for shelter, except one small log cabin near by. Within three hours after the blizzard began on the 15th the snow had piled up to a depth of two feet and drifts had formed of prodigious size blocking up the roads. It was the heaviest snowfall as well as the latest snowstorm ever known in the territory, and is to this day referred to as the Custer storm. The people in town felt that there must be great suffering in the camp, particularly among the women and children, but the problem was how to relieve them. No animal would face the storm for one minute, there was no track or trail to follow, and the blinding snow made it very difficult to see any object two rods away. But it would never do to let those people suffer and make no effort to rescue them. A rescue party was organized by Hon. Judson LaMoure. The rescuers started out holding a long rope to which was attached a light stage coach on runners and they succeeded in reaching the camp after a two hours struggle, though the distance was not over a mile. But they lost their way a dozen times, and finally found what they were blindly groping for. And just in the nick of time; for many of the women were in a perishable condition, nearly covered with the snow, and hysterically bemoaning their sad fate. Sleighs of some sort were extemporized, the women and children bundled into them, and with the aid of the soldier boys the most remarkable cavalcade that ever entered a Dakota town moved toward Yankton. As soon as the residences were reached in the lower town the suffering people found the "latchstring out," they were taken into a half hundred homes and kindly cared for. Mrs. Custer, and the wives of other officers, were among the rescued, but waited until all the others had been taken, when they were given a sleigh ride such as they had never before "enjoyed," and landed safely at the hotel. Fortunately the temperature had not been severe, and there were no serious frostbites; but the fright and apprehension of perishing, so long entertained, had affected the minds of some of the rescued, who, if the rescue had been much longer delayed, might have lost their reason.

All over the northern states severe storms prevailed, and unseasonably late ones, during this spring of 1873.

The Seventh remained in camp at Yankton until the 12th of May, and afforded new and grand entertainment for the people of the city.

Yankton tendered the grandest reception to the regiment it had ever extended, which was truly appreciated; and the general extended an invitation to the territorial officials and the citizens to visit and inspect his camp and witness a review of the troops. The governor and his staff and the other officials went down to the grounds horseback, in uniform; it was said that these garments had taxed the wardrobes of many of Custer's officers, which was apparent where a lean man had secured a fat man's coat, and vice versa. This occasion was highly enjoyed—for a long time after.

The officers of the regiment held a meeting at Camp Sturgis (as it had been officially named), some time after the snowstorm. General Custer occupied the chair, and Lieut. C. W. Larned was secretary. The proceedings that will most interest Dakotans were the adoption of the following resolutions:

Whereas, The exigencies of the service having called the troops of this command from their late field of duty in the southern states, where for more than two years they have encountered the extreme heat peculiar to the "Sunny South," and having assigned them to duty in the Department of Dakota for intended service in the remote Valley of the Yellowstone, and along the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad; and,

Whereas, Immediately following their arrival in the territory, and before timely warning was received, or due preparation could be made, the troops of this command found themselves in the midst of, and exposed to, the rigors of a snow storm, which in terrible severity, extent, and duration was without parallel, even in this latitude, and so pronounced by the oldest residents in this territory, a storm which imperiled the lives of all who found themselves exposed to its full force, and of such blinding effect as rendered it beyond the ability of either man or beast to brave its power except for a few brief moments; and,

Whereas, In this terrible emergency and when in a condition of comparative helplessness, and when, without assistance, a large proportion of the lives of this command must have been lost by exposure, the citizens of Yankton, acting in concert and harmony with the territorial officers, hastened to the relief of this command, and by extending the hospitality of their homes, the freedom and use of their legislative and other public halls, to the officers and men of the Seventh Cavalry, and by granting the use of their stables, workshops and other buildings, as shelter for their horses, they undoubtedly preserved the lives of a great number belonging to this command, besides saving to the Government the value of the public animals amounting to many thousands of dollars; therefore, be it,

Resolved, That in acknowledgment of the noble generosity, the unbounded and universal hospitality, the unvarying and constantly repeated kindness with which every member of this command was treated by the territorial officers of Dakota and the citizens of Yankton without a single exception; we, the officers of this command, representing not only ourselves, but our wives and sweethearts, and all who are dear to us, and representing also the sentiment which we know is shared by every soldier and member of this command, although feeling that mere words however combined would fall short of expressing the extent of our obligations; yet we desire in this feeble manner to convey to the territorial officers of Dakota, and to the citizens of Yankton, our heartfelt and lifelong gratitude, for extending the helping hand to us in our hour of need, and rescuing us from a position surrounded with great peril and privation; and should our duty on the frontier of this young and growing territory bring us in armed conflict with the traditional enemy of the frontiersman—the barbarous red man—our arms will fall with redoubled force when we remember that each blow struck is a blow in defense of the homes and firesides in and around which we have been treated with such generous care. Be it also,

Resolved, That while the territorial officials of Dakota, resident in Yankton, and the citizens of Yankton and vicinity, seemed to vie with each other in their efforts to defend us from the storm and in sharing the comforts of their homes with us, and while the names of a large number who exerted themselves in our behalf are not in our possession, yet there was one whose prompt, efficient aid constantly tendered from the commencement to the termination of our embarrassment, and whose personal relief and exposure incurred in his manly and determined efforts to save from suffering all who were exposed to the storm, have indelibly impressed his name upon the memory of every officer and man of this command, and to him, Gen. E. S. McCook, secretary of Dakota, we tender our hearty and united thanks. To Messrs. Judson LaMoore, Arthur Linn, J. C. Blodgett, H. N. Coffey, man, L. E. Field, and C. A. Marshall, and to many others whose names have unfortunately escaped us, our grateful acknowledgements are also due, for their personal labors and exertions in our behalf.

G. A. CUSTER,

Brevet Major General U. S. A., Chairman.

CHAS. W. LARNED,

Lieutenant Seventh Cavalry, Secretary.

A number of the officers were accompanied with their wives, including General Custer, Mrs. Hart, Mrs. Yates, Mrs. Goffrey, Mrs. James Callahan, Mr. Gibson, all of whom were imprisoned by the storm.

The people of Yankton may not have regarded the storm so seriously, but they were not in the same plight as the military people who experienced the terrors and ferocity of the blinding hurricane with its avalanche of snow, almost unprotected; and those who have ever witnessed such a warring of the elements will not be apt to criticize the military people or accuse them of any exaggeration in their formal resolutions. The thought may occur to the reader that this boisterous storm-king, so invincible in its strength and power, foreshadowed the melancholy doom which awaited the gallant, though possibly, imprudent leader, at the Little Big Horn, three years later. Custer had a large part in some of the most important affairs of the Territory of Dakota, and his Black Hills expedition in 1874 opened the way to El Dorado that neither Indian treaties or military proclamations could materially obstruct.

On the 7th of May the Seventh broke camp and started on its journey overland to Fort Rice. The steamboat Miner accompanied the regiment, carrying the laundresses as passengers, and the camp equipage and supplies for the troops and animals. The Miner kept along with the regiment on the entire trip, laying up at night abreast of the military camp. Mrs. Custer and the wives and families of the other officers were passengers on the Miner, and their destination was Fort Rice.

Concerning the purpose of the Government in sending the Seventh Cavalry and a little later ten companies of infantry from the Department of the Platte, six companies of the Eighth Regiment and four of the Ninth to the District of Dakota for service in the field against hostile Indians, the reader should be reminded that in the spring of the year before (1872), the Government organized two expeditions for the protection of the engineers surveying the route for the Northern Pacific Railway west of the Missouri River, against the hostile Indians, who were in large force, and defiant to the extent that they had declared war against the extension of the road west of the Missouri River. The expedition from Dakota was under the command of Gen. D. S. Stanley, of Fort Sully, and colonel of the Twenty-second Infantry, and the expedition from the West under Col. E. M. Baker, major of the Second United States Cavalry, from Fort Ellis, Mont. Baker's command consisted of cavalry, artillery and infantry, and a number of scouts. Stanley started out from Fort Rice with a force of 800 infantry and a battery of Gatling guns. The plan was that the two armies should meet at or near the mouth of Powder River, on the Yellowstone, unite, and proceed to chastise the enemy. Colonel Baker was attacked one morning when within a few day's march of the Powder River rendezvous, by an army of five or six hundred Sioux. His advance guard held the Indians in check until the main body came up, after which the Indians were driven into the woods with considerable loss. The civil engineers whom Baker was protecting concluded that under the circumstances it was not advisable to go further with the survey in face of the rapidly increasing number of the Indians, and the colonel then set out upon his return to Fort Ellis, constantly harassed by the enemy.

General Stanley, upon reaching the mouth of Powder River, delayed a few days to await Colonel Baker's arrival, but failing to hear from him, returned to Fort Rice. The savages claimed a victory because they had defeated the object of the expedition by their attack of Baker, thus preventing the uniting of the forces.

It was about this time, 1872, that the notorious Indian, Sitting Bull, came into prominence as a leader of the turbulent and implacable Sioux, and was able to array, on special occasions, several thousand of his race and nation, in war against the Government. Nothing further was done by the military in 1872, but preparations for a much more formidable expedition to take the field in 1873 were completed, and Custer's regiment was ordered from Texas to take part in it.

One of the principal objects of General Forsythe's trip up the Yellowstone in 1873, was to test the navigability of the river as far up as Powder River, a distance of 235 miles. The steamboat Key West commanded by Capt. Grant Marsh had been selected for the expedition, which was sent out at the expense of the Government by request of General Sheridan then in command of the Department of the Missouri. The Yellowstone had become the theater of the most important military movements undertaken for a number of years, and it was very essential that it be known whether the Yellowstone channel could be depended upon for the transportation of troops and supplies for the soldiery. The journey was made in May and June. The Key West took on about one hundred soldiers at Fort Buford, in order to be prepared for emergencies. The steamboat was drawing twenty-six inches on leaving Buford. The usual spring rise of the river had not yet occurred which was considered fortunate, the purpose being to get the navigable condition during the season of low water. The boat went through to within two and one-half miles of Powder River in six days; here she encountered Key West Falls and decided not to undertake the ascent over them which might result in serious difficulty. These falls could be largely improved by the removal of some of the rocks in the channel, and would not be a serious obstruction during an ordinary boating stage later in the summer and fall. The return trip was made in five and a half days and the report of the general was so favorable that Sheridan decided that the steamboat should take an important part in the Indian campaigns in the Yellowstone Valley.

Later in the summer of 1873 Gen. George Forsythe, of Sheridan's staff, made a steamboat reconnaissance of the Yellowstone River as far up as the mouth of the Big Horn. He was also authorized to select sites for two military posts which Sheridan had recommended for construction in that country and for which an appropriation was then pending in Congress but failed of becoming a law. Had the posts been built as recommended at that time, it is quite probable that it would have had a favorable influence in preventing the gathering of such large numbers of Indians as were encountered and which overthrew Custer and his men. General Forsythe was an experienced Indian fighter. It was related of him that when a young officer, while in command of a small force of only twenty-eight men, in camp on the Arickaree fork of the Republican River in Colorado, he was surrounded and attacked by 1,000 Indians. Being cut off, he set to work, cut the canteens of his soldiers in two, extemporizing shovels, and with these threw up breastworks, behind which, though seriously wounded, he succeeded in defeating the Indians and rescued his force.

The Indian troubles which were marked by almost continual warfare in the Yellowstone country, extending from 1872 to 1877, having their most tragic culmination in the massacre of the lamented Custer and his men, were not due to the opposition of the Indians to the opening of the Black Hills, but to their inextinguishable hostility to the extension of the Northern Pacific Railroad west of the Missouri. Their opposition to this enterprise was implacable, and they must have realized that it knelled the doom of their free nomadic life to which they had been born, and to which they clung with a persistency which impelled them to undergo the supreme sacrifice rather than yield the country to the demands of civilization and fate. Sitting Bull himself was another Tecumseh. He was every inch an Indian, and rightly interpreted the destiny of his race in the events that had transpired since he became a man capable of noting the tendency and effect of civilization in the domain so long held by the Indian race, where they had enjoyed unmolested freedom, though at times seriously burdened by privation, by famine, contagion, and the incessant small wars in which Indian was pitted against Indian. The savage life was the only one they knew, and they viewed the change which civilization would force upon them as more to be dreaded than all the afflictions which were inseparable from their barbarous condition, hence their long and bitter struggles in the face of continual and certain defeat.

Many of this implacable class among the Sioux were in time left to perish, perished from privation and disease and the torment of murdered relatives.

out with stoical firmness to the end, which came to him many years later, after his return to the United States, in a characteristic manner.

The military expedition of 1873, formed for the purpose of affording protection to the surveying parties of the Northern Pacific Railroad, west of Bismarck, was organized by General Terry, commanding the Department of Dakota. Gen. D. S. Stanley, of the Twenty-second Infantry, was placed in command. The expedition rendezvoused at Fort Rice in early June, and was made up of ten companies of the Seventh Cavalry under General Custer; ten companies of infantry from the Eighth and Ninth Regiments, under Lt. Col. L. P. Bradley, of the Ninth; five companies of Stanley's regiment, the Twenty-second; four companies of the Seventeenth Infantry, under Major Crafton, of the Seventeenth; seventy-five scouts; and also ten scouts who were with Stanley the year before; two rodman rifled guns. The expedition was provided with sixty days subsistence, and arrangements had been made for further supplies at a depot to be established on the Yellowstone by General Forsythe, who was then en route by steamer Key West to the Yellowstone to select sites for two military posts. The expedition got away from Fort Rice about June 15th, and very soon thereafter it entered upon an active campaign, which kept the troops employed during the entire summer.

Early in August, General Custer, with Scout Bloody Knife and a squadron of cavalry, were detailed by General Stanley to go ahead and look up the route, and having advanced about two miles from camp, to a point two miles below the mouth of the Big Horn, they halted to wait for the train. Shortly after a large band of Indians appeared and made demonstrations toward the camp as though intending to attack; they were easily driven off, but proved to be a decoy for a large number in the woods in ambush, waiting for the troops whose route would be in their direction. Finding that the ruse had failed, the Indians to the number of 300 boldly advanced on Custer, who had but eighty men, under Captain Moylan, and began firing. They also fired the grass. A serious skirmish took place during which the ammunition of the cavalry gave out but the Indians did not observe this and gave up the fight. Two Indians were killed and three cavalrymen who imprudently ventured too close to the enemy.

Three days later, Custer having been reinforced, was attacked by 800 Indians near a timbered strip. The troops returned the fire, and a battle lasting two hours followed, both parties using the trees as covers. About three hundred of the Indians then crossed the river above and below Custer's camp, and endeavored to gain the bluffs on the river. The cavalry were dismounted and desultory firing lasted for some time, the Indians protected by the ridges and timber. Finally Custer ordered a charge, when the troops mounted and pursued the Indians who fled in great disorder for eight miles. Happily the train with the main body of the escort arrived under Stanley, and joined in the running fight which was quite a battle at times, but the Indians finally disappeared and must have lost a good many of their number. This battle occurred within two miles of the mouth of the Big Horn. Custer and Lieutenant Ketchum had their horses shot under them. Lieutenant Braden was badly wounded in the thigh. Private Tuttle, Custer's orderly, was killed, and twenty of the soldiers wounded. The loss of the Indians, estimated by Custer, was forty killed and wounded. The Indians were all well armed with heavy rifles of the latest pattern, and had an abundance of ammunition. Some were dressed in clothes procured at the Grand River Agency and were supposed to be under the command of Sitting Bull. It was also suspected that they received their arms and ammunition from Fort Peck above on the Missouri River. The expedition was at Ponney's pillar on the 15th of August, and returned to Fort Lincoln in October, where it disbanded.

THE CUSTER EXPEDITION A SHERIDAN SUGGESTION

Gen. Phil Sheridan was in command of the military division of the Missouri in 1874, which included the Department of Dakota, and in his annual report to the War Department made in October of that year, he wrote as follows concerning the origin of the Custer expedition:

The condition of Indian affairs in the Department of Dakota has been somewhat quiet during the past year. In this department are located a majority of the hostile bands of Sioux Indians, some of them on reservations along the Missouri River, some in M.B. River farther north near the boundary of British America, and the rest roam scattered valleys of the Big Horn, Yellowstone and Powder rivers, occasionally coming into Red Cloud and Spotted Tail's agencies to draw rations and other supplies. With the exception of an occasional dash about Fort Lincoln to steal stock, a raid or two in Montana in which a few lives were lost, and an attack once in a while upon the poor Mandans and Peorias, comparative quiet has existed.

The condition of affairs may be owing somewhat to the very limited extent of exposed frontier in this department, which compels the Indians to seek for plunder and scraps in the Department of the Platte, where the frontier lines of settlement have progressed to a much greater extent, and are more exposed than in the Department of Dakota.

In order to control the Indians making the raids toward the south, I had contemplated for two or three years past to establish a military post in the country known as the Black Hills, and in my last annual report recommended the establishment of a large post there, so that, holding an interior point in the heart of the Indian country, we could threaten the villages and stock of the Indians if they made raids on our settlements. With this view, I mentioned the subject in the presence of the President, the honorable secretary of the interior, the honorable secretary of war, and the general of the army, last fall and meeting with a favorable response from the secretary of the interior, who has exclusive charge of Indian affairs, I set to work to make a reconnaissance of the country about which dramatic stories have been told, especially by Father DeSmet.

I first thought that Fort Laramie, which is not much more than one hundred miles from the Black Hills, would be the best place to start the reconnaissance from, but on visiting Fort Laramie last fall, and again in the winter, I found the condition and temper of the Indians such as would probably provoke hostilities.

I then turned my attention to Fort A. Lincoln, on the Missouri River, at the end of the Northern Pacific Railroad, where most of the Seventh Regiment of Cavalry, under command of Lieut.-Col. Geo. A. Custer, were stationed, as the most suitable place to start from, although the distance was three times as great as from Fort Laramie. On visiting Fort Lincoln in the spring of 1874, I found everything favorable, and two or three Indian guides had been secured by General Custer, with whom I had previously communicated, who stated that the route to the Black Hills was practicable. I then returned and secured the necessary authority for the reconnaissance, and directed General Terry to organize the expedition and put Colonel Custer in command, whom I thought especially fitted for such an undertaking.

The reconnaissance was successful. The country of the Black Hills was found to be much better than was expected, with plenty of good timber and considerable gold, at high altitudes, and abundant supply of water and grass. Some gold was found near Custer's Peak, but of its abundance there is at present no reliable information. Such information could not be given by an expedition such as that of Colonel Custer's, to prospect and determine its quantity. The color of gold can be found almost anywhere in the now existing western territories, but often its quantity is confined to the few localities which make the color. I have for five or six years past believed there were extensive deposits of gold in the country west of the Black Hills, extending as far west as the Old Crow Reservation in Montana, and as far south as the Wind River Mountains of Wyoming, embracing the valleys of Powder River, Tongue River, Big Rosebud, Big Horn, Little Rosebud, and Wind River. It is possible that it may exist in quantities of local or national importance, and the valleys of some of the rivers named, especially of the Wind River and the Big Horn, are of great agricultural importance, having good soil and the greatest abundance of timber and water.

The country of the Black Hills examined by Colonel Custer is, I am fully satisfied, of great value for its timber, and it contains some gold and silver, but the reconnaissance of Custer reconnaissance were not sufficient to establish its existence in large quantities.

I again recommend the establishment of a large military post there, for the reasons given in my last report, viz., better control of the Indians.

CUSTER'S PEAK, OF THE BLACK HILLS.

The official order for the Custer expedition was issued by Brigadier-General Terry, commanding the Dakota military district, July 1, 1874, as follows:

In pursuance of instructions from the Secretary of War, to the Major-General of the Missouri, an expedition will be organized at Fort A. Lincoln, in Dakota, for the purpose of reconnoitering the route from the Missouri River to the Black Hills.

and exploring the country south, southeast, and southwest of that point. * * * The expedition will consist of the six companies of the Seventh Cavalry now stationed at Fort Abraham Lincoln, the four companies of the same regiment now stationed at Fort Rice; Company I, Twentieth Infantry; and Company G, Seventeenth Infantry, and such Indian scouts from Forts Abraham Lincoln and Rice as the commander of the expedition shall select. Lieut. Col. George A. Custer, of the Seventh Cavalry, is assigned to the command.

The expedition will start from Fort Abraham Lincoln as soon after the 20th of July as practicable; Lieutenant Colonel Custer will proceed by such route as he may find to be most desirable to Bear Butte, or some point on or near the Belle Fourche, and thence will push his explorations in such direction or directions as in his judgment will enable him to obtain the most information in regard to the character of the country, and the possible routes of communication through it.

Lieutenant Colonel Custer will return to Fort Abraham Lincoln within sixty days from the time of his departure from it. Should, however, any unforeseen obstacle render it necessary or advisable for him to return from any point of his contemplated march, even before the Belle Fourche is reached, he is authorized to do so.

Capt. William Ludlow, chief engineer of the department, will report to Lieutenant Colonel Custer, as engineer officer of the expedition; he will be accompanied by his civil assistant and three enlisted men of the engineer battalion.

The transportation was supplied by fifteen six-mule teams and wagons and two ambulances.

Custer prior to starting out sent word to the Sioux Indians of his intention, but assured them that his mission was one of peace and good will, and he did not wish to be molested or compelled to use force to accomplish the objects of his journey. The distance from Fort Lincoln to the base of the Black Hills was estimated at about three hundred miles.

The Indian scouts accompanying Custer came largely from the Santees whose reservation was in Nebraska, opposite the Town of Springfield, Dak. As the Custer expedition was on the eve of starting out it was discovered that the Indian scouts promised had not been furnished. As they were considered indispensable, and as the Santees were known to be well acquainted with the country, an order for thirty-five scouts was received by telegraph. The men were in line the same day, and as there was no time to be consumed in an overland march, the scout squad was taken to the terminus of the railroad at Yankton, where it arrived at 9 o'clock the same evening. In the meantime Missionary Hinman, at the Santee Agency, who had the affair in charge, had arranged for a special train to Sioux City. They reached St. Paul the next afternoon and Fort Lincoln two days later.

The Custer's expedition as organized, consisted of ten companies of the Seventh Cavalry, five of which were under the immediate command of General Custer, and five under the command of General Forsythe, of General Sheridan's staff; two companies of infantry commanded by Maj. L. H. Sanger; a battery of three Gatling guns and one rodman, commanded by First Lieut. Josiah Chance; a detachment of United States engineers under Colonel Ludlow; and sixty Indian scouts commanded by Lieutenant Wallace.

The staff appointments were Lieutenant Calhoun, acting assistant adjutant general; Capt. A. E. Smith, quartermaster; Asst. Surg. J. W. Williams, chief medical officer, assisted by Acting Assistant Surgeon Allen, of Fort Rice, and Bergen, of Iowa. Col. Fred Grant, aide-de-camp of Sheridan's staff, accompanied as an acting aid. H. N. Ross and William McKay, both practical miners and explorers, were the gold miners of the expedition. Louis Agaard, who intermarried with the Sioux, and who had been in the country thirty years, was the guide and interpreter. Charles Reynolds, a famous scout and hunter, was also a guide.

The expedition got away from Fort Lincoln about the 20th of June. Custer's official communications, three in number, addressed to the head of the military department, at St. Paul, were sent out from his most important camps, the first from Prospect Valley, before reaching the hills. These communications are given herewith in order:

Headquarters Black Hills Expedition.

Prospect Valley, Dakota Territory, July 15, 1874.

Longitude 103 degrees and 40 minutes west. Latitude 45 degrees and 20 minutes north.
To Assistant Adjutant General, Department of Dakota, St. Paul, Minnesota.

Sir: This expedition reached this point yesterday, having marched since leaving Fort Lincoln 227½ miles. We are now 170 miles in a direct line from Lincoln, and within two miles of the Little Missouri, and within about twelve miles of the Montana boundary, our bearing from Fort Lincoln being south sixty two degrees west. After the second day from Lincoln we marched over a beautiful country. The grazing was excellent and abundant. Wood sufficient for our wants and water in great abundance every ten miles, when we struck the tributaries of Grand River we entered a less desirable portion of the country, nearly all the streams flowing into Grand River being more or less impregnated with alkali, rendering the crossings difficult. We found a plentiful supply of grass, wood and water, however, even along this portion of our route.

Upon leaving the headwaters of Grand River, we ascended the plateau separating the watershed of the Little Missouri from that running into the Missouri, and found a country of surpassing beauty and richness of soil. The pasturage could not be more timber is abundant, and water both good and plentiful. As an evidence of the character of the country we have marched since leaving Fort Lincoln on an average over seventeen miles a day, one day making thirty-two miles; yet our mules and beef cattle have constantly improved in condition, the beef cattle depending entirely upon the excellent grazing we have passed over. The health of my command is something remarkable, not a sick man being on the sick report; everyone seems to be not only in good health, but in excellent spirits. Between the forks of Grand River we discovered a cave to which the Indians attach great importance. The cave extends about four hundred feet under ground, beyond which point it was not practicable to explore it. Its walls and roof are covered with rude carvings and drawings cut into the solid rock, apparently the work of Indians, although probably by a different tribe than either of those now roaming in this region. Near the cave was found a white man's skull, apparently perforated by a bullet. It had been exposed to the atmosphere for several years. As no white man, except those belonging to this expedition, is known to have passed anywhere near this locality, the discovery of the skull was regarded with universal interest. The cave was found to contain numerous articles of Indian equipments which had been thrown into the cave by the Indians as offerings to the Great Spirit. I have named the cave Ludlow's Cave, in honor of the engineer officer of the expedition. Our march thus far has been made without molestation on the part of the Indians. We discovered no signs indicating the recent presence of Indians until day before yesterday, when Captain McDougall, Seventh Cavalry, who was on the flank, discovered a small body of about twenty Indians watching our movements. The Indians scampered off as soon as discovered. Yesterday the same or a similar sized party made its appearance, and was seen by Captain Connelly, rear guard, along our line of march. Soon after several signals of smoke were sent up, which our Indian guards interpreted as conveying information to the main body of our presence and movements. Our Indian guides think differently, however, and believe the Indians mean war. Should this be the case, they will be the party to fire the first shot. Indians have been seen near camp today.

Mr. Grinnell, of Yale College, one of the geologists accompanying the expedition, discovered yesterday an important fossil. It was bone, about four feet long and twelve inches in diameter, and had evidently belonged to an animal larger than an elephant. Beds of lignite coal, of good quality, have been observed at different points along our route by Professor Winchell, one of the geologists of the expedition.

I do not know whether I will be able to communicate with you again before the return of the expedition.

G. A. Custer.

Custer's second dispatch was transmitted after reaching the hills, and embodies a most entertaining and valuable, though brief description of the country, at the same time bearing testimony to its agricultural and mineral worth.

Headquarters Black Hills Expedition.

Eight and One-Half Miles Southeast of Harney's Peak, August 2, 1874.

Via Fort Laramie, W. T., August 8, 1874.

To Assistant Adjutant General, Department of Dakota, St. Paul, Minnesota.

Sir: My last dispatch was dated July 15th and sent from Prospect Valley, Dakota, longitude 103 degrees and 40 minutes, latitude 45 degrees and 20 minutes north. Four Indian scouts left as bearers of the dispatch as soon as their departure could be effected by the darkness. After leaving that point this expedition moved in a southwesterly direction until it reached the Valley of the Little Missouri, in which we moved twenty miles, finding this valley almost destitute of grazing. Along our line of march I collected 100 kegs filled, and a supply of wood placed in the wagons, and left the valley for a better camp ground. During our passage of the Valley of the Little M.

entered and were about to leave the Territory of Montana; our course was nearly due south. After a further march of about nine miles we arrived before sundown at a point capable of furnishing us good grazing, and water for our animals, having marched over thirty miles since breaking camp in the morning. From this point to the Valley of the Belle Fourche we found the country generally barren and uninviting, saving a few isolated places. We reached the Belle Fourche on the evening of the 18th of July, encamping where good grass, wood and water were abundant, and at a point a short distance above that marked "15" on Reynolds' map, just west of the line separating Dakota from Wyoming. The following day was spent in camp. On the 20th we crossed the Belle Fourche, and began, as it were, skirmishing with the Black Hills.

We began by feeling our way along the outlying ranges of the hills, seeking a weak point through which we might make our way to the interior. We continued, from the time that we ascended from the Valley of the Belle Fourche, to move through a very superior country, covered with the best of grazing and an abundance of timber, principally pine, poplar and several varieties of oak. As we advanced, the country skirting the Black Hills to the southward became each day more beautiful. On the evening of the 22d we halted and encamped east of and within four miles of the cave, "Inyan Kara." Desiring to ascend that peak the following day, it being the highest on the western range of the Black Hills, I did not move camp the 23d, but taking a small party with me, proceeded to the highest point of this prominent landmark, whose height is given as 6,600 feet. The day was not favorable for obtaining distant views. I decided on the following morning to move due east and attempt the passage of the hills. We experienced considerable delay by fallen timber which lay in our pathway. With this exception, and a very little digging, rendered necessary in descending into a valley, the pioneers prepared the way for the train, and we reached camp by 2 o'clock, having marched eleven miles. We here found grass, water and wood of the very best quality, and in great abundance. On the following day we resumed our march up this valley, which I explored for several miles the preceding evening, and which led us by an easy ascent almost southeast. After marching nearly twelve miles we encamped at an early hour in the same valley. This valley, in one respect, presented a most wonderful as well as beautiful aspect. Its equal I have never seen, and such, too, was the testimony of all who beheld it. In no private or public park have I ever seen such a profuse display of flowers. Every step of our march this day was amid flowers of the most exquisite colors and perfume; so luxuriant in growth were they that the men plucked them without dismounting from the saddle. Some belonged to new or unclassified species. It was a strange sight to glance back at the advancing columns of cavalry, and behold the men with beautiful bouquets in their hands, while the headgear of the horses was decorated with wreaths of flowers fit to crown a Queen of May. Deeming it a most fitting appellation, I named this Floral Valley. General Forsythe, at one of our halting places chosen at random, plucked seventeen beautiful flowers, belonging to different species, and within a space of twenty feet square. The same evening, while sitting at our mess table, one of the officers called attention to the carpet of flowers under our feet, and it was suggested that it be determined how many different flowers could be picked without leaving our seat at the dinner table. Seven beautiful varieties were thus gathered. Professor Donelson, the botanist of the expedition, estimated the number of species in bloom in Floral Valley at fifty, while an equal number of varieties had bloomed or were yet to bloom. The number of trees, shrubs and grasses was estimated at twenty-five, making the total flora of the valley embrace 125 species.

Through this beautiful valley meanders a stream of water so cold as to render ice undesirable even at noonday. The temperature of two of the many springs found flowing into it was taken and ascertained to be 44° and $44\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$ F. respectively. The next morning, although loath to leave such an enchanting locality, we continued to ascend this valley until gradually, almost imperceptibly, we discovered that we were on the crest of the western ridge of the Black Hills, and instead of being among barren heaths, as might be supposed, we found ourselves winding our way through a little park whose natural beauty may well bear comparison with the loveliest portion of Central Park. Favored as we had been in having Floral Valley for our roadway, to the crest of the Black Hills, we were scarcely less fortunate in the valley which seemed to rise to meet us on the interior slope. A running stream of clear, cool water, the counterpart of that we had ascended the day before, flowed at our feet and pointed out the way before us, while along the banks grew beautiful flowers, surpassed but little in beauty and profusion by their sisters who had greeted us the day before. After advancing down this valley about fourteen miles, our course being almost southeast, we encamped in the midst of grazing whose only fault, if any, was its great luxuriance. Having preceded the main column, as usual, with an escort of two companies of cavalry, K and C, and Lieutenant Wallace's detachment of scouts, I came upon an Indian camp fire still burning, and which, with other indications, showed that a small party of Indians had encamped there the previous night, and had evidently left that morning in ignorance of our close proximity. Believing that they would not move far, and that a collision might take place at any time unless a friendly understanding was arrived at, I sent my head scout, Bloody Knife, and twenty of his braves, to advance a few miles and reconnoitre the valley. This party had been gone but a few minutes when two of Bloody Knife's young men came galloping back and informed me that they had discovered the Indian lodges a few miles down the valley, and that Bloody Knife, as directed, had concealed his party in a wooded ravine, where they awaited further orders. Taking a company with me, which was afterwards reinforced by the remainder of the scouts and Colonel Hart's company, I proceeded to the ravine where Bloody Knife and his comrades lay concealed, and from the crest beyond obtained a full view of the five Indian lodges, about which a considerable number of ponies were grazing. I was able to place my command still nearer to the lodges undiscovered. I then dispatched a guard, the interpreter, with a flag of truce, accompanied by two of our Sioux scouts, to acquaint the occupants of the lodges that we were friendly disposed and desired to communicate with them. To prevent either treachery or flight on their part, I galloped the remaining portion of my advance and surrounded their lodges. This was accomplished almost before they were aware of our presence. I then entered the little village and shook hands with the occupants, assuring them, through the interpreter, that they had no cause to fear, as we were not there to molest them. I invited them to visit our camp, and promised presents of flour, sugar and coffee to all who would accept. This invitation was accepted. At the same time I entered into an agreement with their leading men that they should encamp with us a few days, and give us such information concerning the country as we might desire; in return for which service I was to reward them with rations. With this understanding I left them. The entire party numbered twenty-seven. Later in the afternoon four of the men, including the chief, One Stab, visited our camp and desired the promised rations, saying that the entire party would move up and join us the following morning as agreed upon. I ordered presents of sugar, coffee and bacon to be given them, and to relieve them of their pretended anxiety for the safety of their village during the night, I ordered a party of fifteen of my command to return with them and protect them during the night; but from their great disinclination to wait a few minutes till the party could saddle up, and from the fact that two of the former had already slipped away, I was of the opinion that they were not acting in good faith. In this I was confirmed when the two remaining ones set off at a gallop in the direction of their village. I sent a party of our scouts to overtake them, and request them to return. Not complying with this request, I sent a second party with orders to repeat the request, and if not complied with then to take hold of the bristles of their ponies and lead them back, but to offer no violence. When overtaken by our scouts, one of the two Indians seized the musket of one of the scouts and endeavored to wrest it from him, failing in this, he released his hold, after the scout became dismounted in the struggle, and set off as fast as his pony could carry him, but not before the musket of the scout was discharged. From blood discovered afterward it was evident that either the Indian or his pony was wounded. I hoped that neither was seriously hurt, although the Indians have their own bad faith as the sole ground of the collision. One Stab, the chief, was brought back to camp. The scouts galloped down the valley to the site of the village when it was discovered that the entire party had packed up the lodges and fled, and the visit of the four Indians to our camp was not only to obtain the rations promised them in return for future services, but to cover the flight of the lodges. I have effected arrangements by which the chief, One Stab, will be with us as a guide three days longer, when he will take his departure and regain his band. He claims to belong to both Red Cloud's and Spotted Tail's agencies, but has been to neither for a long time. He has recently returned from the hostile camp on Powder River, and represents that the Indians lost ten killed in their fights with the Bozeman exploring party.

The creek which led us down into the interior of the Black Hills is bordered by high bluffs, on the crests of which are located prominent walls of solid rock, presenting here and there the appearance of castles constructed of masonry. From this marked resemblance I have named this stream "Castle Creek." The direction of Castle Creek having commenced to lead us more to the northeast than we were prepared to go, and the valley having become narrow and broken, I left this water course and ascended the valley of a small tributary, which again gave us a southeasterly course. After a march of fourteen miles we encamped on a small creek furnishing us an abundance of water and grass. The direction of this creek was nearly east. On the 30th I moved in continuation of our previous course, and through a fine open country covered with excellent grazing. After a march of over ten miles we encamped early in the day about five miles from the base of Harney's Peak, finding water, grass and wood abundant, with springs of clear, cold water running through camp. On the following day the command remained in camp, except the exploring parties sent out in all directions. With a small party I proceeded to Harney's Peak, and after great difficulty made the ascent to its crest. We found this to be the highest point of the Black Hills. From the highest point we obtained a view of Bear Butte in the eastern part of the plains, to the east far beyond the Cheyenne River. Our party did not reach camp till near 1 o'clock that night, but we were amply repaid for our labor by the magnificence of the views obtained. While on the highest point we drank the health of our veteran after whom the peak was named. On the next day, August 20, we rode about twenty miles simply to obtain fresh grass, still keeping near the base of the Black Hills. This morning I dispatched two companies under Colonel Hart in a southeasterly direction to extend our explorations of the south fork of the Cheyenne River. Tomorrow, August 21, at 5 o'clock I will set out with five companies of cavalry and endeavor to reach the stream in a southwesterly direction from Harney's Peak, at the hills' base.

carry this dispatch to Fort Laramie, will go with us as far as we go in that direction, when he sets out alone to reach his destination, traveling mainly by night.

The country through which we have passed since leaving the Belle Fourche River has been generally open and extremely fertile. The main portion, or that passed over since entering the unexplored portion of the Black Hills, consists of beautiful parks and valleys through which flows a stream of clear, cold water, while bounding these parks or valleys there are invariably found unlimited supplies of timber, much of it being capable of being made into good lumber. In no portion of the United States, not excepting the famous Blue Grass region of Kentucky, have I ever seen grazing superior to that found growing in this hitherto unknown region. I know of no portion of our country where Nature has done so much to prepare homes for the husbandmen, and left so little for the latter to do as here. In the open and timbered spaces a partly prepared farm of almost any dimensions, of an acre and upward, can be found here. Not only is the land, cleared and timbered, both for fuel and building, conveniently located, with streams of pure water flowing through its length and breadth, but Nature oftentimes seems to have gone further and placed beautiful shrubbery and evergreens in the most desirable locations for building sites. While on Harney's Peak I could contrast the bright green verdure of these lovely parks with the sun-burned and dry yellow herbage to be seen on the outer plains. Everything indicates abundance of moisture within the space enclosed by the Black Hills.

The soil is that of a rich garden, and composed of a dark mold of exceedingly fine grain. We have found the country in many places covered with wild raspberries, both the black and red varieties. Yesterday and today we feasted on the latter. It is no unusual sight to see hundreds of soldiers gathering wild berries. Nowhere in the States have I tasted raspberries of equal flavor to those found growing wild here, nor have I ever seen them as large or in as great profusion. Wild strawberries, wild currants, gooseberries and wild cherries are also found in great profusion and of exceedingly pure quality. Cattle would winter in these valleys without other food or shelter than that to be obtained from running at large. As there are scientists accompanying the expedition, who are examining into the mineral resources of this region, the result of whose researches will accompany my detailed report, I omit all present reference to that portion of our explorations until the return of the expedition, except to state what will appear in any event in the public prints, that gold has been found in several places; and it is believed by those who are giving special attention to this subject, that it will be found in paying quantities. I have upon my table forty or fifty small particles of pure gold, in size averaging a small pin-head, and most of it obtained today from one pan full of earth. As we have never remained in our camp more than one day, it will be readily understood that there is no opportunity to make a satisfactory examination in regard to deposits of valuable minerals. Veins of lead and strong indications of silver have been found. Until further examination is made regarding the richness of the gold, no opinion should be formed. Veins of what the geologists call gold-bearing quartz crop out on almost every hillside. All existing geological or geographical maps of this section have been found incorrect. This will not seem surprising when it is remembered that both have been compiled by guess-work and without entering the country intended to be represented. The health of the command continues excellent. I will begin my northward march in four days from this date. I do not expect to arrive at Fort Lincoln until the 31st of August.

G. A. CUSTER,

Brevet Major General, Commanding Expedition.

Postscript.—10.30 P. M., August 3d.—I left our main camp at Harney's Peak at 6 o'clock this morning, with five companies of cavalry, and after a march in a southerly direction for forty-five miles, reached the south fork of the Cheyenne River at the mouth of a creek flowing from the north and emptying into the Cheyenne midway between the mouths of Hot and Horsehead creeks. From this point Reynolds, the scout, sets out, in one hour, with this dispatch for Fort Laramie. I reached here at 9 P. M., and will proceed to Harney's Peak by a different route tomorrow morning. The country between here and Harney's Peak is generally open and rolling, and excepting the southeastern portion, covered with excellent grass.

G. A. CUSTER,

Brevet Major General, Commanding.

The third dispatch gives further testimony regarding the valuable natural resources of the hills country, and tells of his return journey. The third communication follows:

Headquarters Black Hills Expedition.

Bear Butte, D. T., via Bismarck, August 15th.

To Assistant Adjutant General, Department of Dakota, St. Paul, Minnesota.

My last dispatch was written on the 2d and 3d instant, and sent from the south fork of the Cheyenne, from a point on the latter nearest to Fort Laramie.

On the morning of the 4th instant I began my return march to our main camp, near Har-ney's Peak, arriving there by a different route on the 6th. On the morning of the 7th the expedition began its march northward, Bear Butte being our next objective point. We advanced without serious obstacle until within ten or twelve miles of Bear Butte, when we found our further progress barred by a high range of impassable hills. We attempted to effect a passage through some one of the many valleys whose water courses ran directly through the hills in the desired direction, but in every instance we were led into deep broken cañons impassable even for horsemen. Through one of these I made my way on foot, and from a high point near its mouth obtained a view of the plains outside. Retracing my steps, I placed the command in camp in a fine valley, in which it had halted, and devoted the remainder of the day to a further search for a practicable route through the hills. The result decided me to follow down a water course which led us first toward the south and afterwards toward the east. This stream proved to be Elk Creek, the valley of which, as well as the stream itself, proving at least equal in beauty and extent to any passed through during our march. We camped twice on this stream, and as far as we proceeded on its course, we had a most excellent road; but finding that like nearly all other streams leaving the hills, its course would take us into a cañon which could be made barely practicable for our wagons, I searched for and discovered a narrow gap in the rocky wall which forms the northern boundary of the valley, and which was conveniently large enough to allow our wagons to pass through. A march of an hour up a gradual ascent and through a pine forest brought us to a beautiful park containing thousands of acres and from which we obtained a fine view in the distance of our old acquaintance, the plains. Here we pitched our tents for the last time in the Black Hills. Nearly everyone being loath to leave a region which had been found so delightful in every respect. Behind us the grass and foliage were clothed in green of the freshness of May. In front of us, as we cast our eyes over the plains below, we saw nothing but a comparatively dried surface, the sunburnt pasturage of which offered a most uninviting prospect both to horse and rider, when remembering the rich abundance we were leaving behind us. A march of twenty-six miles, gradually bearing northward, brought us to the base of Bear Butte, at which point I concluded to remain one day before beginning our return march.

I propose to return by a different, although not perhaps a shorter route, than that adopted in coming to the Black Hills. I am induced to make this change in order to cover a larger extent of unexplored country within the limits of our explorations, and particularly to enable us to locate as much as possible of that portion of the Little Missouri of which nothing is now known. I expect the expedition to reach Fort Lincoln on the 31st of August. The health of the command has been, and is, most excellent.

This expedition entered the Black Hills from the west side, penetrated through the eastern and most southern ranges, explored the major portion of the interior, and passed out the most eastern ranges which form the boundary of the Black Hills. From the fact that in all our principal marches through the Black Hills we have taken without serious obstacle a train of over one hundred heavily laden wagons, it may be inferred that the Black Hills do not constitute the impenetrable region heretofore represented. In entering the Black Hills from any direction, the most serious, if not the only obstacles, were encountered at once near the outward base. This probably accounts for the mystery which has so long existed regarding the character of the interior. Exploring parties have contented themselves with marching around the exterior base, and from the forbidding aspect of the hills, as viewed from a distance, inferred that an advance toward the interior would only encounter increasing obstacles.

In regard to the character of the country enclosed by the Black Hills I can only repeat what I have stated in previous dispatches. No portion of the United States can boast of a richer or better pasturage, purer water, the natural temperature of which in midsummer as it flows from the earth is but 12° F. above the freezing point, and of greater advantages generally to the farmer or stock raiser than are to be found in the Black Hills. Building stone of the best quality is to be found in inexhaustible quantities. Wood, fuel, and lumber sufficient for all time to come. Rains are frequent, with no evidence in the country of either drouth or freshets. The season, perhaps, is too short, and the night too cool for corn, but I believe all other grain could be produced here in wonderful abundance. Wheat would particularly yield largely.

There is no doubt of the existence of various minerals throughout the Hills, as the subject has received the special attention of experts who accompany the expedition and will be reported upon in detail. I will only mention the fact that iron and plumbago have been found and beds of gypsum of apparently inexhaustible extent.

I referred in a former dispatch to the discovery of gold. Subsequent examination at various points confirm and strengthen the fact of the existence of gold in the Black Hills. On some of the water courses almost every particle of early produced gold in small paying quantities. Our brief halts and rapid marching prevented anything but a very cursory examination of the country in this respect, but in one place, and the only one with our knowledge, where so great a depth was reached, a life was dug right feet into the earth. Miners report that they found gold among the roots of the grass, and from the surface to the lowest point reached gold was found in paying quantities. It has been the expert to find gold in the Black Hills, as men with no former experience have discovered it at an expense of but little time and labor. As an evidence of the turage to be found in this region, I can state the fact that my beef herd, after marching upwards of six hundred miles, is in better condition than when I started, being now as fat as is consistent with marching conditions. The same may be said of the mules of the wagon train. The horses of the command are in good working condition. I have never seen as many deer as in the Black Hills; elk and bear have also been killed. We have had no collision with hostile Indians.

CHAPTER LXIX

THE ARMY VAINLY OPPOSES RUSH TO THE BLACK HILLS

1875

CUSTER'S REPORTS AWAKEN WIDESPREAD INTEREST—A STATEMENT FROM THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT—THE GOVERNMENT AUTHORITIES INCLINE TO TREAT FOR THE HILLS COUNTRY—THE INDIANS WILLING BUT WANT MANY MILLIONS—FIRST WHITE INVADERS START FROM SIOUX CITY IN 1874—IN 1875 THE RUSH OVERFLOWS ALL IMPEDIMENTS—DAKOTANS HOLD A BLACK HILLS MEETING—INDIAN DELEGATIONS CALLED TO WASHINGTON—PRESIDENT GRANT TALKS TO THE SIOUX—EFFORTS TO AGREE UPON A TREATY FUTHLE—DAKOTANS SUBMIT A STATEMENT COVERING THE INTERESTS OF THE PUBLIC—SPOTTED TAIL AND OTHERS SUBMIT THEIR VIEWS—RIGHT REVEREND BISHOP HARE WRITES A LETTER.

Custer's expedition and the official reports of the general, together with those of the scientific gentlemen who accompanied him, confirmed all former reports of the auriferous character of the country, and furnished much more of a valuable nature, that made the acquisition of the country appear more desirable than had been the case previous to his expedition. The information obtained from his observations and practical investigations was relied upon as authentic, and its effect was to arouse a popular desire, manifold more ardent and aggressive than heretofore, to possess the country. It was the first discovery of an extensive gold field in the United States in such proximity to the settled portions of the country and easy of access. No obstacles were in the way of its occupation except its Indian ownership, and up to this time these proprietors of the land had held it as sacred soil, priceless, and the Government had promised by its treaties to protect them in such ownership though they occupied but a small portion of it and then only temporarily and occasionally.

The discovery of gold gave California a population of about a quarter million in two years time; and a like discovery led the rapid settling up of Colorado and Montana. The Montana prospectors spread abroad through the mountainous portions of that territory, and were conjecturally among the first to venture clandestinely to the Black Hills. It did not need Custer's expedition to settle the fact of the existence of gold in paying quantities in the minds of the people of the then frontier of Dakota, Wyoming, and Montana, for it was through them and their influence and agitation that the Government took up the matter of securing the country for white occupation.

The Indians held title to the country but its material resources were of little value to them, and useless to the world, while the Indians held it. They knew nothing of mining; all they knew was the fact that the hills were a gold-bearing country and were coveted by the whites for that reason. They knew that gold was among the most valuable commodities, at least so generally considered, and they had concluded that the Black Hills were worth an immense amount of money—millions, tens of millions—scores of millions, at the same time knowing that of the amount expressed by the term millions.

The Government had made a treaty promising to respect a limited Indian possessory occupation of the hills region, and made the treaty tionably in good faith, but in this instance it would seem that it had counted without its host; and the only just remedy for the situation was a further agreement with the Indians for the relinquishment of their title to the country.

This was then the situation shortly following the return of Custer and the preliminaries for the accomplishment of this purpose were planned and set to work. The Government having quietly concluded that a cession of the hills country was demanded in the interest of the public welfare, it proceeded to the execution of its plan, which is revealed in pages following.

The bureau of Indian affairs, which at that time was under the direction of Edward P. Smith, commissioner, issued a circular to the various Indian agents in Dakota in April, 1875, as one of the early steps to acquaint the Indians with their absolute dependence on the Government for their material support and indicating a stricter enforcement of existing treaty stipulations. The following gives the text of the circular:

Department of the Interior,
Office of Indian Affairs,
Washington, D. C., April 13, 1875.

Sir: It is the settled policy of the Government to induce the Indians to recognize, in a practical way, at the earliest day possible, the inevitable necessities which are upon them to abandon their nomadic habits and enter upon some calling by which they may eventually become self-supporting.

To this end Congress has incorporated a clause in the act making appropriations for the Indian service for the present fiscal year, which requires "all able-bodied male Indians between the ages of eighteen and forty-five to perform service upon the reservation for the benefit of themselves or of the tribe, at a reasonable rate, to be fixed by the agent in charge, and to an amount equal in value to the supplies to be delivered."

By the treaty of April 10, 1868, the Government stipulated to provide each Indian over four years of age, who should remove to the reservation, with meat and flour for the term of four years after removal. That provision has now expired. Therefore, whatever supplies may hereafter be furnished these Indians by the Government will be in the form of a gratuity, and the Government assumes the right and recognizes the duty to so manage this gratuity as to make the most of it in the way of civilization and material benefit for the Indians.

So far as practicable, therefore, you will be expected to bring the Indians under your charge into conformity with the requirements of the law above referred to. There is mingled with the different bands of the Sioux a class of persons to whom this law has special application. These are mixed-bloods and white men who, being married to Indian women at the time of the treaty of 1868, were thereby incorporated into the tribe, and those, if any, who have subsequently been adopted by the tribe with the consent of the United States Government. Of this latter class, namely, the whites who have intermarried, the first requirement will be that the parties claiming to be married, shall go before a clergyman, or priest, or Indian agent, and make acknowledgment of such marriage, unless such parties have heretofore been formally married and be able to produce a certificate to that effect, and such acknowledgment or certificate must be a matter of agency record.

All able-bodied males, belonging to this class as well as mixed-bloods, must make returns in labor for any favors received from the Government by way of supplies or clothing; and you will therefore notify them, fixing the day upon which this order will go into effect, in any event not later than June 1st, that hereafter there will be no free issue of rations or goods to themselves or families, and that you will open an account with each person or head of a family, to whom you will issue rations and goods only in payment of labor, and also only to the extent of their pro rata share.

They should be encouraged to select land and erect upon it a home and expend in farming, fencing and other improvements such labor as they may be able to perform. If instead of this, or in addition to this, they shall desire to perform labor for the benefit of the agency or of the tribe, the same kind of credit shall be allowed them.

You will notify all your Indians of the change in their claims upon the Government for supplies, by this expiration of the treaty stipulation, and that before long they will all of them be brought to the same requirement as is now laid upon the white men and half-breeds among them, and that therefore they will find it greatly to their interest to be undertaking in every possible way such efforts as will secure for themselves a home and land for cultivation.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDW. P. SMITH,
Commissioner.

The authorities had reached the conclusion that the country must be obtained and thrown open to the whites. The only question was as to the best method for securing the peaceable assent of the Indian owners. It was deemed essential that the Government should know the disposition of the Indians regarding a sale of the property; and in order to ascertain their sentiment, the Indian agents at the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies, in the southern part of the territory, were instructed to canvass the subject with their people, who were more directly interested in the matter than the other Sioux tribes.

The result of the inquiry indicated a willingness to consider a proposition from the Government; but the Indians had observed so much of the determined efforts of the whites to get into the country regardless of any agreements; and they had also been informed of many recent gold discoveries by these adventurers, fabulous amounts of gold that had been taken out, all of course greatly magnified, that they were disposed to largely exaggerate the value of the country; so that Spotted Tail himself with all his influential counselors had concluded to demand many millions for the property; but just how many they had not determined, evidently feeling that they would set the price too low, and having but a vague comprehension of the meaning of the word "million." Mingled with the Indians were a number of white men, who are referred to in Commissioner Smith's letter, who had married Indian women, and who, working somewhat secretly, urged the Indians to sell and to demand a large cash payment—the latter being made of the first consideration. This effort of the agents at Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies led to a grand council of the Indians of all the Sioux tribes for the purpose of considering a sale of the hills. None but Indians were admitted to the council which had been convened by a committee of Indians appointed for that purpose. At this council, after listening to the remarks of every Indian who wished to express himself, it was resolved to make a treaty with the Government for the peaceable relinquishment of the hills in return for a few or many millions of money, and also of assurances of abundant rations and clothing for an indefinite time, but long enough to cover the lifetime of the Indians then living, old and young.

It was therefore plain that nothing stood in the way of a purchase of the hills but an agreement as to the price; the amount to be paid in cash, and the further amount required for clothing and provisions.

THE SIOUX CITY INVADERS

Although the Government had made known its determination to protect the hills country from invasion by whites until it could be lawfully opened to settlement; and after Custer's expedition in 1874, had established military camps and patrols at various points on the Indian reservation for the purpose of intercepting all invading parties, a few bold adventurers managed to elude the vigilance of the military in the fall of 1874 and the following winter. The first party to undertake a journey was organized at Sioux City, in September immediately after Custer's return to Fort Abraham Lincoln, and while the tidings of great gold discoveries, exaggerated a thousand fold, more or less, were flashing over the country and stared at the reader of metropolitan papers in bold headlines. As related by Mrs. Annie D. Tallent, in her excellent and reliable volume entitled "The Black Hills, or Last Hunting Grounds of Dakotahs," published in 1880, this expedition appears to have been an outgrowth of a much more formidable expedition partly organized under the leadership, associated with others, of Charles Collins, then a famous newspaper publisher at Sioux City, which organization was forbidden from entering the Black Hills or of trespassing upon the territory of the Sioux Nation under pain of arrest and forfeiture of property. As Collins and the other leaders were thereafter closely watched by the Government, it became necessary for the party of which Mrs. Tallent was a member, and whose adventures she charmingly and vividly describes to observe the utmost secrecy in their negotiations and departure. This expedition started from Covington, Nebraska, for Sioux City on the 6th of October, 1874, and left on the Nebraska known as the Gordon-Witcher party at the time, though Mrs. Tallent states that its leader at the start and for some time after was Mr. Thomas H. Russell, Gordon and Witcher being selected as leaders after the party had reached beyond the settlements, Gordon especially being better acquainted with the country than any of the others. It passed through the settlements as an ordinary emigrant train bound for the O'Niell settlement in Nebraska, and did not throw off its assumed purpose as long as the habitations of the pale faces were in the van of their line of march. This concealment of the real purpose was deemed necessary to escape the vigilance of the United States troops who were on the lookout for parties who might surreptitiously endeavor to reach the Black Hills. The names of those composing this party, as given by Mrs. Tallent were: Capt. Thomas Russell, Lyman Lamb, Eph. Witcher, Angus McDonald, B. B. Logan, Dan McDonald, Red Dan or Black Dan McDonald (there were two of the same name and they were distinguished by the color of the shirt they wore), James Dempster, James Powers, J. J. Williams, Thomas Quiner, John Gordon, J. W. Brockett, Newton Warren, H. Bishop, Chas. Long, Chas. Cordiero, Moses Arons, R. R. Whitney, Harry Cooper, David Akin, John Boyle, Chas. Blackwell, Thos. McLaren, Henry Thomas, D. G. Tallent, Annie D. Tallent and Robert E. Tallent, a son then nine years of age. There were twenty-eight in all. This party went in during the forepart of its journey on what was mistakenly called the Niobrara route. Their route was chosen for the purpose of avoiding observation. They did not strike the Niobrara for two or three weeks after starting, and they crossed that river above the Keba Paha, and thereafter moved over on to the Sioux reservation, and appear to have been governed in their future selection of a route, by their desire to avoid the troops and the Indians. This they were enabled to do, meeting with no Indians until they crossed the south fork of the Cheyenne, and this interruption only cost them a liberal donation of provision and tobacco, the Indians being friendly Cheyennes. The party reached French Creek, Black Hills, two or three miles from Custer's abandoned camp, on December 23d, having been two months and three weeks on the way. Much of the route they traveled was covered by deep snows, at times the weather was dangerously cold, and altogether the journey had been quite arduous and marked by much privation and suffering, though their equipment was all that experience and a liberal expenditure could provide. The motive power of the train was sturdy oxen, young, hardy and capable of great endurance, but they reached the hills sadly bereft of their youthful appearance and shorn of their strength. One member of the party died en route. The first industry that engaged the attention of the party of this first white settlement in the Black Hills, was the building of an ample stockade of upright pine logs, sixteen feet high, and within the enclosure seven comfortable log cabins. This stockade and the cabins became quite famous the following and subsequent years when the whites poured into the country.

John Gordon and Eph. Witcher left the party on French Creek during February, 1875, and performed a perilous journey through to the Missouri River, reaching Yankton, March 10th, with two saddle horses and one pack animal, where they gave out the intelligence of their successful trip to the Black Hills, what their party had done in the mines, hindered by frozen ground, and the improvements they had made. They exhibited considerable placer gold as proof of the richness of the diggings. They were twenty-five days coming out, taking a circuitous route and wading through deep snows to avoid the Indians. Their party had built Fort Defiance in Custer's Gulch, and had worked at prospecting whenever the weather permitted. The winter had been quite favorable for prospecting. Their gold was in nuggets and dust, with which they designed to purchase supplies, and at the same time recruit a large party in order that their settlement might the better be protected from Indian raids, which were looked for during the ensuing spring and summer. They succeeded in obtaining a year's outfit of supplies, a transportation train, and a large company of recruits, and were well on their way to their destination when they were overhauled by a com-

Resolved, further, That Governor John L. Pennington, Hon. Jefferson P. Kidder, delegate to Congress, Hon. M. K. Armstrong, ex-delegate, and Governor Newton Edmunds be and are hereby respectfully requested to personally represent Dakota at Washington City, and use all proper efforts to secure the just interests of the territory in the treaty with the Indians for the opening of the hills.

The necessity of some representatives acquainted with the situation of the communities of Dakota with reference to the Black Hills is apparent when it is considered that, as the treaty was finally made, the Indians were given a broad reservation east of the hills extending to the Missouri River; covering the country from the southern boundary of the territory to the Cannon Ball River; and unless there had been a determined effort made by Dakotans, there would have been no provision in the agreement or treaty for public roads along the best routes from the Missouri to the gold fields, and Dakotans would have been shut off from all communication with the western part of their own territory except by the roundabout journey by way of the Union Pacific, or by some route to be opened possibly through Northern Nebraska; and it was more than apprehended that there was a movement on foot, backed by influential parties, to neglect any recognition of the Missouri River routes in the interest of the Union Pacific Railroad.

INDIANS VISIT WASHINGTON

The next step taken by the Government was in April, 1874, by securing a deputation of leading Indians to visit Washington for the purpose of making a treaty. The Indians selected for this purpose were chosen with regard to their representative capacity and influential character. The delegation was in charge of Dr. J. J. Seville, agent at Red Cloud Agency; Maj. E. A. Howard, agent at Spotted Tail or Brule Agency; and Maj. H. W. Bingham, at Cheyenne Agency; with Louis Bordeaux and William Garnett as interpreters. The names of the Indians follow:

Oglalas—Red Cloud, Little Mound, Man-Afraid-Of-His-Horses, Conquering Bear, American Horse, Sitting Bull (not the chief of the Custer battle), Shoulder, Tall Lance, Fast Thunder, Hole-In-The-Day, Yellow Jacket, Black Bear, Iron Horse Face, Pawnee Killer, Bad Wound and his wife, Ba-pink-leu-tah.

Brules—Spotted Tail, Swift Bear, Crow Dog, Crazy, In-The-Lodge, King Thunder, Cut Nose, White Horse, Under-The-Cloud, High Eagle and Fast Thunder represented the Minneconjeaux or Rippling Water band.

Cheyenne Agency—Lone Horn, Long Mandan, Bull Eagle, Red Skirt, Charger, White Swan, Spotted Elk, Rattling Rib, and Duck.

The Indians left about May 10th and reached Washington on the 18th and on the 10th called formally on the Great Father, President Grant. In this interview, which was intended as a friendly call only, Lone Horn or Lone Horse, a chief of the Cheyennes, unexpectedly voiced the attitude of the Indians regarding the relinquishment of the Black Hills, in these words:

Lone Horse:

I am glad to see the Great Father and shake hands with him. These are my people, but they are not chiefs, but soldiers, and they can fight. This is a great country. It once belonged to me, but is not mine today. I own a great country out toward the setting sun; but the white people now want to take it away from me. I never claimed this country before, but I claim it today, and I own it all alone, and I shall not give it up without talking to you about it. I don't want to talk to these other men.

Here the President interrupted the speaker and told him not to make any further remarks at the time, but to defer until the great council to be held with Secretary Delano. Lone Horn was becoming somewhat excited and agitated; he was evidently anxious to make a favorable impression on the Great Father, but had not digested his remarks in advance. He was obliged to stop, and the interview ended with some diplomatic words from the Great Father. The Indians were disappointed that they had not been permitted to have a more general talk.

PRESIDENT GRANT SPEAKS TO THE SIOUX

At a later day the Indians were presented to President Grant in his private office. While the negotiations were conducted by the secretary of the interior, the present occasion seemed to demand that the Great Father himself, as the President was termed by them, should initiate the negotiations by informing the Indians of the object in bringing them to Washington and of the purpose of the Government to make a treaty for the transfer and relinquishment of the Black Hills. The room was filled with Indians, who had been given especial attention with the design of making the occasion impressive to their minds, as the President intended to make them a speech pregnant with their welfare and desired that they should receive it as indicating the plans that had been formed for their government in the future. Many western governors were present, including Governor Pennington of Dakota. The President, through an interpreter, addressed the Indians as follows:

I want to say to the Indians today something about the object of bringing them here, and a few words for them to think about, but nothing for them to reply to, at present. I have always been a friend to the Indians, and am very anxious to do what I think best for their good. The country where they now live, as they must be well aware, is entirely incapable of supporting them, should the Government cease to give them aid. By the treaty of 1868, clothing was granted to them for thirty years, and provisions for only five years. The food and provisions, therefore, which has been given to them for the last two years have been a gratuity on the part of Congress. These may be taken from them at any time without any violation of the treaty. They intend now to make some arrangement with the Indians by which they and their children will be secure in the future.

As I said in the beginning, it must be evident to the Indians, if the supplies of food should be withheld by the Government, it would be entirely impossible for the Indians to live where they are. Another thing I would call their attention to is this: They must see that the white people outnumber the Indians now at least two hundred to one, taking all the Indians within the territory owned by the United States. This number of whites is increasing very rapidly; that before many years it will be impossible to fix any point within the limits of our territory where you can prevent them from going. It will become necessary that white people shall go from one place to another, whether occupied by Indians or not, the same as they go from one state to another. For this reason it is very desirable that, while they have friends here to look after their interests, they should be situated where they would be able to get support beyond any contingency. I do not propose to ask them, without their consent, to leave their homes where they were born and raised, but I want to point out to them the advantages to themselves and their children if they will accept such arrangements as may be proposed to them. There is a territory south of where they now live where the climate is very much better, where grass is much better, and where game is more abundant, including large game, such as buffalo, where there is good pasture for animals, and where teachers can be sent among the Indians to instruct them in the arts of civilization, and the means of self-preservation and support.

This year we have had great trouble in keeping white people from going to the Black Hills in search of gold, but we have so far prevented them from going. Every year the same difficulty will be encountered until the right of white people to go to that country is granted by the Indians, and may in the end lead to hostilities between the white people and Indians without any special fault on either side. If such trouble should occur and become general, it would necessarily lead to withholding, for the time being at least, the supplies which the Government has been sending. All this trouble we want to avert, and I want to see the Indians well provided for in such a way that the arrangements will have to be respected by my successor, and by other administrators in the future. For the Indians think of what I have said. I don't want them to say anything today. I don't want them to talk. I have said I don't want them to say anything today. I want them to talk among themselves, and be prepared to hear from the secretary of the interior and the commissioner of Indian affairs, who are authorized to speak for me, and will be governed by my advice. This is all I want to say to them.

The Indians present were all of the Dakota tribes, led by Red Cloud, Spotted Tail, and they were quite disappointed at not having been given the opportunity to speak before the Great Father. They had prepared to make a speech.

things which they believed the Great Father would be glad to hear, and it was now plain that they were not to be given that privilege, but must bestow their eloquence upon his subordinates. Grant, however, was averse to a harangue that consumed valuable time and was productive of no profit to either party. But it had been arranged to have a talking council later, after the Indians had had time to consider the President's proposition for their removal to the Indian Territory, which was the aim of the administration at this time. While the Indians represented in this project were all Dakota Indians, the treaty they would be called upon to make affected the interests of Montana, Wyoming and Nebraska, and a sort of an organization, unofficial, had been formed at the capitol, made up of representatives, governors, delegates to Congress, and prominent citizens, that held regular meetings and mapped out the features they desired in the new treaty; so that the Black Hills was not the only subject of importance that was to be disposed of by the treaty. The Black Hills, however, was the most important, being of special interest to a multitude of people who anticipated profit from its acquisition. The other subject of leading interest to the Indians was the proposition to remove the Sioux to the Indian Territory, which met with a chilly reception among the aboriginal representatives.

The Dakota delegation of citizens who attended to the interests of the territory in this matter was represented at the various councils by the governor, John L. Pennington; the delegate, J. P. Kidder, and Gen. W. H. H. Beadle. Feeling that the interests of the territory might be jeopardized if they became entangled with the claims of adjoining territories, this delegation prepared and filed with the secretary of the interior, just prior to the formal council with the Indians, the following statement:

To Hon. Columbus Delano, Secretary of the Interior.

Sir: We, the authorized representatives of the people of the Territory of Dakota, and commissioned by them to confer with you and others in authority in reference to negotiations with the chiefs of the Sioux Indian tribes, for the extinguishment of the Indian title to that portion of what is currently known as the Black Hills country within our territory, respectfully represent that we believe, as do the people of Dakota and the Northwest generally, that there is gold and other valuable minerals in the Black Hills—whether in large or small quantities, we are not informed and do not undertake to say; but certainly enough has been discovered, especially as to gold, to warrant a very general impression, which prevails throughout the country, that it exists there in paying quantities; and also to warrant a respectful appeal to the Government to use all honorable and the most expeditious means to abrogate the treaty of 1868-69, and to extinguish the Indian title to so much of the Black Hills as is supposed to abound in mineral wealth. After the excitement caused by the reported discoveries of gold by parties accompanying the expedition of General Custer, last summer, nothing will satisfy the people of the country but the actual extinguishment of the Indian title to the Black Hills, and the opening up of the right of way from all available directions, so that all who desire to do so may go in, examine, prospect and decide for themselves as to the existence of mineral wealth, and the adaptability for pastoral pursuits and agricultural purposes of that now famous country.

While we have no desire in this connection to ask for any exclusive privilege, or to advertise our own territory, or to reflect upon or to decry other sections, it must be remembered that nearly or quite all of the mineral discoveries that have been made in the Black Hills have been found in that portion embraced in the Territory of Dakota, and mainly in the vicinity of Harney's Peak; and hence the people of Dakota not only respectfully petition the Government to extinguish the Indian title to said territory, but they also respectfully urge that the amplest right-of-way to reach it, from Yankton, Fort Randall, Bismarck and other available and desirable points on the Missouri River between Yankton and Bismarck, be provided for in whatever treaty may be made. These wishes, we are assured, are shared by all the people east of the Missouri River, many of whom intend, as soon as they can do so lawfully, to penetrate the mysteries of that comparatively unknown land. The distance from Chicago to Yankton, capital of Dakota, over the Illinois Central and the Dakota Southern railroads, is 500 miles, and from Yankton to Harney's Peak, by land, is not more than two hundred and fifty to three hundred miles. Fort Randall, seventy miles above Yankton, may be made by steamboat on the Missouri River, from whence Harney's Peak may be reached, over excellent roads, in from two hundred to two hundred and fifty miles. We mention these facts to show that this is the shortest, most direct and feasible route to the Black Hills, at least from the country south and east of the Missouri, so they may avail themselves of its advantages.

We do not propose or desire to interfere in any way with the duties of the Government authorities in the matter of this treaty. Only respectfully to present the views and wishes of the people whom we represent in reference thereto. We have not approached any of the chiefs of the Sioux tribe now in the city, or tried in any way to influence their action in favor of our own territory, or against the interests of any other territory or state, nor will we do so. We only pray that the interests of all sections be fairly and equitably considered, and that no injustice be done to Dakota by closing the natural routes leading to the Black Hills through it, whereby people who go there will be compelled to go around and come in the back way. We wish, so far as we and the people are concerned, to leave the subject with this statement of facts to those whom the law has clothed with the power and authority to make and ratify treaties.

JOHN L. PENNINGTON, Governor.
J. P. KIDDER, Delegate in Congress.
W. H. H. BEADLE.

It had become apparent that in case a treaty was agreed upon, it would reserve to the Indians all their old reservation east of the Black Hills, extending to the Missouri River, and it was vitally necessary to the interests of Dakota's settlements that a provision should be incorporated in the treaty granting the right-of-way for wagon roads from the river across the reservation to the Hills. It was for the purpose of securing this stipulation that the Dakota delegation filed their brief. There had been rivalry between the steamboat interests and the people of the Missouri River settlements on one side, and the Union Pacific Railroad and its Nebraska towns on the other side, for the transportation business to Montana, for some years, and it was known that the parties interested were watching this Black Hills treaty, apprehensive that their opponents would take any advantage in the shape of overland routes that the situation might offer; at the same time the Missouri River interests, resting upon the superiority of the routes from their points, made no effort whatever to interfere with the opening of highways from any and all directions.

The formal council that followed with Secretary Delano satisfactorily disclosed that the Indians had resolved to make no treaty unless they could have a cash payment immense in amount and out of all proportion to the value of the hills, and it was openly charged that the Indians had been governed in this matter by outside influences. Early in June it became apparent that they would sign no treaty on any basis satisfactory to the Government, and it was finally agreed that they would return to their homes and consider the proposals made to them by the Great Father; and that later in the season the Great Father would send a commission of eminent men to them with authority to make a treaty. The inducements offered by the Government had failed to awaken the slightest favorable response; the inducements the Indians had expected would be offered, including a large money bonus, were utterly lacking, and the average temper of the red proprietors of the hills country was one of undisguised indignation that they had been brought to Washington on such an unremunerative errand. Spotted Tail had, throughout the visit, conducted himself with becoming dignity and decorum, and had won the confidence of the President and many prominent officials by his manly and consistent bearing, and more by the ability he had displayed in directing the negotiations, wherein it was discovered that he was thoroughly informed of his subject and placed himself on the broad platform of right and wrong, and urged only that the Government treat the Indians from that viewpoint. The evening before leaving Washington a farewell interview was had with Secretary of the Interior Delano, during which the secretary urged the Indians to accept some minor proposition regarding hunting on Nebraska lands, and in reply to Delano, "Old Spot," as he was familiarly called, made a great speech, which was preserved by the official stenographer. The aged chieftain said:

My Friend: I wish to tell you a very few things in a very short time. You say that the Great Spirit made you and that you pray to the Great Spirit. I, also, am made by the Great Spirit. The Great Spirit made me well, and placed me in that country and placed the animals that live in that country for food. I think I listen to the words of the Great Spirit. He told me it was wrong to steal, and I never steal another man's country.

the country which He gave me. The Great Spirit never told me to take another man's country without pay. If the Great Spirit had given you the same sense of right that He has me, we could get along very well side by side, each people holding its own country. When you have spoken to me about the hunting on the Republican, you have spoken about something that concerns me; but when you speak about the Big Horn country, that belongs to the Crows. You remember that when the treaty was made by Generals Sherman, Sanborn and Harney, they gave me the country in which I now live. They fixed the bounds for it. You have spoken about the Black Hills. They are in the center of our country, and all the different tribes of the Sioux are surrounding the Black Hills and guarding them zealously. On both sides of this discussion we are men, and it is well to consider well before we talk about it at all. Let the matter rest. Let the President consider it in his own house, and the Indians in their own land; but in the meanwhile keep those people out who want to go in there. As you have a country here, in the center of which is a house for the government of your people, in the same way I hold the Black Hills in my country. Whenever you buy something that belongs to another, it is your habit to pay a great price for it, even though it is a small thing. We have the same regard for our country. It is all the same everywhere; whoever plants in the soil, that which grows up is his to eat. I have the same regard for my country; it is a good country. I have been here with these people. We are very few, and we could not come to a conclusion here, but we will take this matter home and consider it, and bring back an answer about the Black Hills. It is not worth while mentioning that now, but it will take a heap of money.

The claim made at the time by well-meaning friends of the Indians that it was an outrage to dispossess them of the Black Hills country, which furnished them with game, fuel and grazing, and material for constructing their winter dwellings, was founded almost entirely on a fictitious knowledge of the situation, for it became well known that the Indians had never selected any portion of the Hills for their abode, not even in winter, when they could have made good use of the game and fish and fuel, and had the protection of the forests of pine which abounded. The reason for this was found in the ingrained superstition of the Indians that the hills were an enchanted region, the abode of many evil spirits, and some good ones probably, who inflicted various punishments of sickness, suffering, tempests and electric shocks on those who disturbed the solitude of their mountain-abode. Small parties of Sioux invaded the foothills in summer, and from such incursions probably came the discovery of gold by the Indians in some of the numerous creeks flowing down from the Hills into the Cheyenne; but they made no attempt to live there, though for two or three generations they had known of its mineral riches and its wealth in wood, grass and flowing streams abounding in food—fish and valuable fur-bearing animals, which were discovered in surprising abundance by the first white invaders. The Indians knew the value of the hills to the white man for its gold, which they supposed to be manifold more abundant than it was found to be, and which, through their superstitious dread and lack of knowledge, they were unable to secure, except as some individual in rare cases had detected and taken a nugget out of the streams. One good sized nugget found in this way naturally excited the cupidity of every Indian who knew of it, and led to the search for more, only to end in disappointment as a rule, for the glittering metal was chary of exposure, and seldom exposed itself to the eye in flowing streams, and then only when it had found lodgment upon a rock. Being so much heavier than the earthy creek bed, it found a place beneath the surface and usually worked its way to the bed-rock, which the Indian knew nothing of. But he knew that the forests of pine and the flowing creeks so abundant would be highly prized by the whites, and on this resource, as well as its mineral wealth, he expected to receive a sum beyond his ability to compute, when he came to sell it. It was a colossal nest-egg, which the rulers and chief men of the Sioux tribes looked upon as the source of abundance to them whenever the whites came to buy it, hence to some extent the apparent sacredness with which they professed to regard it, and which appealed so strongly to the good Quakers, whose knowledge of the true inwardness of the savage redman was largely a reflection of their own innate excellence—of a humanitarian spirit that had led them to discover virtues in the aboriginal race which were foreign to the great majority, and only occasionally detected in a very few, who, however, seldom made any effort to hide their light from those in search of it.

The letter following, from the Episcopal Bishop of Nebraska, clearly reflects the sentiments of those who opposed any interference with the Black Hills for sentimental reasons. Bishop Hare had been in charge of missionary work among the Sioux of the territory for many years prior to his election as Bishop of Dakota. It is not at all remarkable, however, that the bishop, with thousands of others less familiar with the Indian character, failed to realize that so long as the Indians were supported by the Government and left free to follow in the steps and methods of their fathers, they would make no substantial advance toward the civilization of the whites which would prepare them to become self-sustaining, self-reliant, and fit them for the duties of American citizenship. As President Grant tersely expressed it "the time had come when the Indians must choose between an industrial life and starvation with extermination."

BISHOP HARE'S LETTER

Philadelphia, Friday, June 25, 1875

To the Editor of the New York Tribune.

The recent visit of a large delegation of Sioux chiefs and head men to New York will, perhaps, gain a few words of appeal, hearing which under other circumstances I might not hope to get. I should not presume to seek it, but that residence among the Sioux and frequent trips through the country as a missionary bishop of the Episcopal Church, and two journeys into the vicinity of that part of the country known as the Black Hills, have made me familiar with some facts that may not be generally known.

The Sioux chiefs represent people numbering about thirty-five thousand, who in the past have been among the fiercest of the meat eating tribes of the Northwest. The chiefs are all of them famous themselves for prowess in the past years upon the warpath. They accepted, some years ago, however, treaty relations with our Government; and may be said, all things considered, to have observed in a commendable degree the obligations then assumed. They stand therefore midway between the northern Sioux, some ten thousand in number, who yet maintain an attitude of utter independence, and those Sioux on the Missouri River who have begun to erect houses, till the ground, and wear the white man's dress, and who have been gathered into schools and churches, and have learned to read and write.

No one who has mingled among the Sioux Indians can doubt that, however tardy in the progress of his wishes their present condition may be, it is strikingly advanced to what it was a few years ago. Civilization has been effecting slow but sure victories, missions have been advancing, children are being gathered into schools, and Christian women engaged in the mission work are today living undisturbed in districts where, but five years ago, how many men, except squaw-men, would have dared to show their faces.

But unfortunately for the trust and quiet such effects engender, and in which they flourish, the Sioux, like Naboth in sacred history, and the poor man in Naboth's parable, own something very dear to them which a more powerful neighbor covets. It is the country known as the Black Hills of Dakota. The Indians' attachment to it is a passion. And well it may be, for this district is the kernel of their men, the yolk of their life. While the rest of their reservation is a "dry and thirsty island where no waters," the hills country is reported as abounding in "fountains and wells that spring out of valleys and hills." While many of the streams outside of the hills I know to be in summer noisiously rapid, turbid and alkaline, the streams in the hills are said to be, even in the hottest weather, deliciously cool and always sweet and deliciously crystal clear. While most of the rest of their land is sun-baked, and blasted by scorching siroccos, these hills are reported as attracting frequent showers. While much of the rest of their land is utterly denuded of all soil, and the famous "Mauvaise Terres," or Bad Lands of Dakota, occupy large stretches of it, the soil of the valleys in these hills is reported to be rich and deep and carpeted with grass and flowers; and while much of the rest of their reserve is utterly treeless, and the people seek in vain, as I know by experience, for wood enough to heat water to make a cup of coffee with, these hills are well covered with elm and oak, and pine. In the opinion of four gentlemen, all of them familiar with the country, with whom I conversed a few days ago, the timber (the only fuel for the Indians in a country where the country is so dry, and the mercury ranges from 10° F. to 100° F. below zero for weeks together) will, at the present rate of consumption, have all disappeared in less than ten months from the hills. Manifestly no one needs this tract of land so much as the present owners, the Sioux.

But what right has an Indian? Three years ago an expedition was sent to the Black Hills, partially organized in Dakota, for the purpose of ascertaining upon this territory the rights of the executive in this instance acted with great discretion. A proclamation was issued, and the said evil disposed persons of the determination of the Government to purchase the and troops were set in motion to deal effectively with the marauders. Thus checked, rapacity slumbered until a year ago, when a military expedition, having penetrated the Black Hills and inflamed our cupidity with stories of its wealth, bands of reckless adventurers began to invade the Sioux country—thus far, thank God, only to be captured by the military. Many others hover on its border; our cities, from the Missouri to the Atlantic, are placarded with, "Gold, gold, gold! Ho, for the Black Hills." And the excitement and the pressure are so great that even the President of the United States, to whom I would pay a grateful tribute as the friend of the Indian, thinks it wise to succumb, and to direct the storm which he cannot resist, and is obliged, with other friends of the Indians, in the effort, to see that the evil is done as gently as possible, to play what may seem to be to some, particeps criminis.

The only plea which the proposed effort to obtain the country from the unwilling Indians can make with any force is this: That civilization having driven the game from the plains, the Indians have been made dependent for their food upon the bounty of the white man's Government, and that being "beggars," they must not be "choosers." Whether this apology will avail, in view of all that the white man has already taken away from Indians, let the kind and just determine.

The other plea under which the proposed effort seeks cover, viz., that barbarism has no right to hold back vast areas of land from the tillage of the needy settler, is in this case entirely without point. The chief sinners in this line are not Indians, but white speculators, who have bought up land and hold it by the ten-thousand acres, to the exclusion of the needy. And in the next place, it is an entire mistake to suppose that the area occupied by these Sioux Indians is vast. Their reservation proper, adding in their neutral lands which bound it on the south and west, is only about four hundred miles square. Their reservation proper is not 250 miles square. Of this, as I have shown, a large portion of it is an utterly inhospitable waste. In God's name, I ask, may not the Sioux, who number some thirty-five thousand souls, enjoy the occupation of the pitiful remainder? That they will willingly surrender it, driven to the wall, as they already are, is, I fear, a fond hope. But if they will, manifestly we should be willing to pay them so liberally and judiciously that the loss of this part of their land shall redound to their good. As, however, these Indians are a brave and warlike people, as they love their homes passionately, and as all the past has revealed to them that the white man has no pity, we should not be surprised if, insisting now upon buying with money what the Indian does not wish to sell, we drive him to frenzy, our covetousness end in massacre, and we pay for the Indians' land less in money than in blood.

WILLIAM H. HARE,
Missionary Bishop of Niobrara.

The bishop's argument and description of the great reservation was a most powerful plea in favor of the proposition to remove the Sioux to the Indian Territory. The bishop must have known that the Indian never inhabited the Black Hills for reasons which could not be overcome, and his portrayal of the barren and worthless quality of the great reservation shows it unfit for the habitation of human beings. With due allowance for the sacred character of the bishop's position and profession, there will be many who will regard his letter as an utterance prompted by a selfish purpose, mingled with a prejudice against the prevailing policy of the Government.

The subsequent occupation of the same country by the whites, and their success in industries, is a sufficient answer to the reverend gentleman, who, it would seem, was somewhat more zealous to create in the public mind a distrust of the value of the country than a desire to give the region such a description as the facts would warrant, presuming that he possessed the information that he claimed to have.

PROFESSOR JENNEY'S SCIENTIFIC EXPEDITION

A second expedition to the hills under General Custer was organized in 1875 and rendezvoused at Fort Rice; but the order assembling its forces was countermanded, and Custer was given employment with his troops in the Yellowstone country, where the northern Indians, under Sitting Bull, continued their hostilities, based on their opposition to the extension of the North Pacific Railroad west of the Missouri.

Custer, at this time, was not in high favor with his superior officers. He had been writing letters to eastern newspapers that reflected somewhat upon the official management of affairs in the Indian country and at the military posts, and was said to have been responsible for exposing the disgraceful conduct of Secretary of War Belknap, in connection with army sutlerships. Custer was inflexibly opposed to every form of intrigue or corruption in the service, and felt it his duty to make his discoveries public. His offense, if it was an offense, consisted in the method employed in bringing the matter before the public—the sentiment of his brother officers inclining to the opinion that he should have preferred his charges and complaint through the authorized military channels instead of through the columns of the public press.

It was also claimed in connection, that Custer became somewhat incensed because his course had been unfavorably criticized and some official indignities added, and resolved to win his way into the hearts and confidence of his countrymen at the first opportunity. The opportunity came when he met Sitting Bull on the Little Big Horn, June 25, 1876. But he was denied the achievement he may have ardently hoped for and the laurel crown that would have been his with a victory gained by his Spartan band over twenty times their number; and did not survive to receive the plaudits which their heroism and their melancholy fate invoked.

Another military expedition to the hills was not favored by the friendly Sioux in the southern portion of the territory, and the Government was doubly interested at this time in keeping peace with the people it was then engaged in treating with; the Government was also more interested in knowing more definitely the extent and richness of the gold deposits than in any matter that could be promoted by a display of military force, it having virtually determined upon securing a treaty of relinquishment of the hills country in case the extent of the mineral resources of the country would warrant extraordinary efforts and a liberal bonus to secure it.

There was furthermore an important collateral reason why the United States Government authorities desired to open up the Black Hills, provided gold should be discovered in paying quantities, and this reason was doubtless considered before Custer was sent into the region in 1874, and would have gone again in 1875, but for prudential reasons it was thought more advantageous, and would be more agreeable to the Indians, to send the 1875 expedition under the peaceful emblems of the Interior Department as a scientific expedition solely, which could accomplish the same purpose that would be secured by the military.

The Government at this time was operating its finances on a paper basis; the domestic business of the country was being transacted altogether with paper money; the suspension of specie payments which took place during the Civil war was still in force, though the war had been over for ten years, and already there was much clamor and agitation for a resumption of specie payments. Montana had produced nearly twenty-five millions in gold since the war, and nearly all from its placer mines, and in case the Black Hills country should prove equally as extensive and rich in the precious metals, the product would be an important item in supplying the specie needed to restore and sustain specie payment resumption. This underlying purpose undoubtedly had much to do with the laxity in enforcing the edicts against trespassing emigrants and miners, who were the best of all mediums through which to discover the fact of the existence of the precious ore in paying quantities, and also the extent of the deposits.

The Government, while it desired to occupy the hills with its civilized people in case the gold deposits were sufficiently abundant to justify emergency measures, had before it the difficulties of coming to an agreement with the Indians, who had a vastly exaggerated opinion of its value because of its gold, therefore the official reports, or rather semi-official news, given out by the departments were at times slightly discouraging, and seldom as optimistic as the known facts would justify; but were calculated to influence Spotted Tail and the influential Sioux leaders to be more moderate and considerate in their demands for the country, in case the Government concluded to buy it.*

Accordingly, a Black Hills geological, topographical and astronomical expedition was organized under the direction of the Interior Department early in May, 1875, for the purpose of further explorations and investigations of the gold field country. Notwithstanding the favorable report of General Custer in 1874, there appeared to be some question as to the extent of the gold bearing field as well as its richness, and for the purpose of obtaining more definite information needed before consummating the proposed treaty, this expedition was found needful. Walter P. Jenney, of the Columbia School of Mines, Washington, was placed in charge as the mineralogist and geologist, assisted by an astronomer and topographer. As the hills country, speaking generally, had been but imperfectly explored and mapped, it was said that a large portion of its auriferous area was in Wyoming, and if such should prove to be the case they were already a part of the public domain and open to settlement.

* Specie payments followed the opening of the Black Hills in a little more than two years, at which time the Homestake was operating, and the Hills country was producing gold at the rate of half a million a month.

The secretary of the interior, in an official communication to Professor Jenney, stated that the boundary line separating Dakota from Wyoming (the 104th meridian of longitude), was supposed to run near the center of the Black Hills country.

This expedition went into the hills under the protection of a military escort composed of six companies of cavalry and two companies of infantry, under command of Col. H. L. Dodge, starting from Fort Laramie, May 25th. Their first camp in the hills was made on Castle Creek, where they found a little gold, and where an astronomical observation was taken which favored the probability that the valuable gold-bearing earth was almost wholly in Dakota. French Creek was explored and gold found in limited quantities. Jenney's party and Colonel Dodge's forces established a permanent camp on French Creek called Camp Harney, and close by they discovered the stockade miners had built earlier in the season, but not then occupied, the miners having been removed from the country by Captain Mix. There were, however, about one hundred miners found in different near-by localities.

This expedition traversed a large portion of the southern and most accessible portion of the hills; and in view of the importance attached to the country by the Indians, made a special effort to locate anything and everything that had the appearance of occupation by the native owners or by whites, and were able to find but one locality that indicated the presence of Indians. This was near the headwaters of Castle Creek, where a lodge-pole factory was found that bore traces of having been in use the year before.

Jenney's first reports were discouraging. He was diligent in investigation, sinking scores of prospect holes on various creeks—those where the miners had worked and in new ground, but found little at first to justify the sanguine reports that had been given out. It was charged at the time that he purposely underestimated the deposits, desiring to meet the views of the Interior Department, whose desire just at that period was to discourage the unlawful immigration which was every week increasing and growing to be a difficult and most exasperating problem.

Advices from Jenney's camp on Spring Creek, July 17th, to the commissioner of Indian affairs, were more encouraging. He says:

I have discovered gold in paying quantities in gravel bars on both Spine and Rapid creeks, from twenty to thirty miles northeast of Harney's Peak. The deposits are the richest yet found in the hills, and are very favorably situated. There is a good head of water in the streams, amply sufficient for working purposes. The gold is derived from quartz lodes of enormous dimensions in a belt of clay, slate and quartzite, twenty miles in width, crossing the hills in a northwesterly direction. At this point the clay from the bed of the stream near camp yields from four to eight cents to the pan or coarse scale gold, and several pieces of about the value of a dollar have been found by the soldiers. I am engaged in prospecting the value and extent of the region; about two hundred miners have deserted French Creek and followed me here. They are journeying into the hills from all directions, and are receiving every assistance in prospecting the country. No matter how valuable the mines may be, the future great wealth of the Black Hills will be its grass lands, farms and timber. The soil is deep and fertile and the rainfall greater and more regular than any other region west of the Allegheny Mountains.

He said that about three hundred miners were at work on the creeks, and that he estimated that there were about eight hundred whites in the hills. The French Creek and Rapid Creek diggings were about thirty-five miles northeast of Harney's Peak.

French Creek was being deserted—a good many miners were leaving, discouraged with the poor prospects.

It was not an uncommon comment upon these authentic reports which were frequently appearing in the public prints, that the Government would now issue another edict declaring its "unalterable purpose" to keep the whites out of the hills but had done practically nothing to prevent the trespassers if they came up from the Union Pacific Railway, and this fact being generally known, the greater rush was naturally from that direction; but in view of the paramount importance of harmony at this time (late in July and during August) when the confidently expected treaty was being negotiated at the various Indian agencies or with the great body of the Sioux, it became necessary to impress the Indians that the Government was determined to protect them in their rights and property, and to that end the military people now became active in enforcing the prohibitive edicts.

Professor Jenney appears to have been deeply impressed with a belief that the source of the placer deposits was to be found in rich quartz veins farther north, and governed his prospecting in that direction. He was followed by many experienced miners who had worked in other gold fields, and had one or more such miners engaged with him in this expedition, one of whom claimed that where "there were limestone ridges or belts on the east side of any country, and on the west gypsum, there was, lying between these formations, gold in greater or less quantities." This was true in California, Montana and Arizona, and seemed from the limited investigation of Jenney's party to be again verified in the Black Hills. Rich diggings had already been reported from farther north toward Bear Butte, and already preparations were making for a movement of the expedition, with Colonel Dodge and his command, in that direction. Camp Harney, in Custer's Gulch on French Creek, was abandoned late in July, and the camp removed to a point on Rapid Creek near the place where Jenney had been prospecting.

He left Rapid Creek August 13th for the north to the vicinity of Bear Butte, where Camp Terry, the third permanent camp, was established on the south fork of Bear Creek. The gold prospects in this region were reported encouraging by the geological corps. Rich diggings, said to have been discovered sixty miles north of French Creek, were located in this district. The command moved west August 21st from Camp Terry to Camp Bradley, on Inyan Creek, situated near the base of Inyan Kara. Bear Lodge, thirty miles north of Laramie Peak, was said by the Indians to contain gold, to ascertain which Professor Jenney and the scientific corps, with Lieutenant Coale and a cavalry escort, left for that region to determine not only the existence of the precious metals, but whether Bear Lodge was a mountain or a mountain range. Professors Jenney and Newton geologized Bear Butte, Crow Peak, Spear Fish Canyon or as it was called, Grand Canyon, and Red Water Valley, and reported immense deposits of carboniferous limestones extending from east to west, but no mineral of any kind was discovered. Here the work of the expedition closed.

Jenney's official report, published on succeeding pages, will give an account of his investigations after abandoning Rapid Creek.

CROOK INDUCES MINERS TO WITHDRAW

A permanent military camp had been established in the hills in May, 1875, near Harney's Peak, by General Crook, and placed in command of Colonel Dodge, and in July the War Department issued orders anew that no one not authorized by the existing treaty, was to be admitted to the hills during the pendency of the making of a treaty which was then in progress. The military commanders were instructed to enforce the order. The emigration was at that time active from Union Pacific points which had not been so vigilantly patrolled as the routes leading out from the Missouri River.

No move appears to have been made to remove the miners or to interfere with their operations until General Crook, late in July, in a wise and temperate manner succeeded in getting the trespassing parties together, numbering many hundred, at Camp Crook, where he read to them his judiciously worded edict, requiring their removal. He gained his point and at the same time won the confidence and esteem of the large number who had in an unlawful manner made their way into the country. The willingness of the people to give cheerful obedience to the mandate of authority requiring them to abandon the country, would indicate that they were men of character, good citizens and law-abiding, and furnishes evidence that the Government would have met with no serious opposition from the trespassing class had there been an earnest and determined purpose to keep the country free from white invaders. But the policy of the Government does not indicate much more than a desire to make an apparent effort in this direction as a matter of good policy; and further that the Government had determined to acquire the hills country and open it for white occupation.

General Crook's proclamation to the trespassers follows:

Whereas, The President of the United States has directed that no miners or other unauthorized citizens shall be allowed to remain in the Indian reservation of the Black Hills, or in the united territory of the west, until some new treaty arrangements have been made with the Indians; and

Whereas, By the same authority the undersigned is directed to occupy said reservation and territory with troops, and to remove all miners or other unauthorized people who may be now or may hereafter come to this country in violation of the treaty obligation;

Therefore, The undersigned hereby requires every miner or unauthorized citizen to leave the territory known as the Black Hills, the Powder River, and the Big Horn country by or before the 15th day of August, next.

He hopes that the good sense and law-abiding disposition of the miners will prompt them to obey this order without compelling a resort to force. It is suggested that the miners now in the hills assemble at the military post about to be established at Camp Harney, near the stockade on French Creek, on or about the 10th day of August; that they then and there hold a meeting and take such steps as may seem best to them by organization and the drafting of proper resolutions to secure to each, when the country shall have been opened, the benefit of his discovery and the labor he has already expended.

General Crook,

Brig. Gen. U. S. A., Comd. Dept. of the Platte

Camp Crook, Dakota Territory, July 20, 1875.

The miners manifested a willingness to comply with the proclamation, and forthwith held meetings in their various districts, at which, by resolution, they agreed to accept the conditions; and further resolved to protect the claims already taken for the use of the men now holding them for forty days after the hills shall be lawfully opened.

FOUNDING CUSTER CITY

A mass meeting was held at a point called Custer City, on French Creek, on the 10th of August, 1875, which was attended by 100 miners, who had been ordered to vacate the hills under the late proclamation of General Crook, and were getting their property and affairs in as good shape as possible, in order that it might be preserved for them when they returned after the hills were lawfully opened. General Crook was present with his troops, and assisted the miners with his counsel in the work before them. The miners expressed themselves subsequently by resolution, returning thanks to the military authorities for their courtesy and moderation in executing their disagreeable duty. Prior to their presumed temporary abandonment of their camp, the miners organized and passed the resolutions following:

Resolved, That we, the miners of the Black Hills, do hereby organize at Custer City, on French Creek, in Custer's Platte, and that the land now claimed by us to be owned by the miners of the Black Hills, that a committee be appointed elected to make laws, etc.; that we have one president, one marshal, one town clerk, one treasurer, to be elected as directors by the voters of said town; the salary of each to be agreed upon by the town directors, the said officers to be elected on the 10th day of August, 1875, and their term to expire July 1, 1876. That the building now erected by the miners be occupied as the city hall to do business in, and to be under the control of the town directors. The clerk shall be in duty bound to remain until the 11th of August, 1875, to make record for each and every miner's town lot, and shall be held responsible for said record. That at the present he shall make no charge for the same.

Resolved, That the lots be distributed among the miners in space of 50 feet front, by 150 feet deep, to be drawn for at the general meeting on August 10, 1875.

Resolved, That each owner of a lot shall have four house logs on said lot on or before the first of May, 1876, and that $50 worth of improvements be made on said lot on or before June 1, 1876. Neglect of the same will leave the lot at the disposal of the city authorities.

Resolved, That all streets running east and west, commencing at the city hall, as No. 2, or Third Street, be known by numbers; and the avenues, commencing at Crook Avenue, City Hall corner, be known as Crook, Custer, Harney, Dodge and Pennington avenues.

A committee consisting of Messrs. Osborn, Gay and Swearingen directed the drawing of town lots in the afternoon. Officers of the town were elected, and a committee of six persons was selected to remain in the country, with the consent of General Crook, and protect the property of the miners, until the country should be legally opened. This was done with the consent of General Crook, who promised to apply to General Sheridan for permission to have the same carried out.

The next day the miners started out of the country, going to Laramie.

The stockade erected by the miners was within 100 yards of the cavalry camp of General Custer when he was in the gulch in 1874. The stockade was 80 feet square, constructed of heavy timber, 14 feet high from the base of the trench in which the logs were set, and 11 feet in height in the clear. The timber with which the wall was built was cut by the miners during the previous winter and the temperature became so frigid at times that the mercury congealed, meaning that it was 40° below zero. Strict precautions were taken by the miners to prevent freezing. During the work of its erection the miners occupied a number of tents in a finely sheltered ravine. The logs were hauled or "skidded" over the snow. There were four or five bastions connected with the stockade, each five feet square. The miners must have been impressed with imminent danger from the Indians. The timbers composing the wall were sharpened and the logs pinned together, thus forming a defensive bulwark that could easily have been defended against a thousand Indians armed only with rifles. It would have required cannon balls to have made an opening in the walls. Within the structure were a number of well built log cabins, strong and well adapted to camp life in the hills country. The only way of ingress was through a strong gate of six-inch logs. After the miners were taken out, a band of Indians, presumably, gained entrance to the stockade and cabins, and carried off a number of wagons and a quantity of cabin furniture. The structure stood within thirty feet of French Creek, where the dirt "yielded pay in every pan."

FIRST MINING DISTRICT

The first mining district formed in the Black Hills was organized by a company of Dakotans operating on French Creek, on the 29th of May, 1875. It was called the Cheyenne Mining District. Mr. Z. Swearingen, of Yankton, was president of the miner's meeting that organized the district, which was described as follows:

Beginning at a point on French Creek known as the stockade, running west to the headwaters of said French Creek, thence north to the summit of the hill, thence east along the said summit to a point north of the stockade, and thence south to the stockade, including all the streams, springs, and waters within said description.

Each citizen of the United States was given the right to hold a placer claim of twenty acres square. No holder of a claim was allowed to empty his sluices or tailings, or deposit strippings upon any land or claim held by another person, without written permission of such holder. Every miner to have the right to make a drain ditch through the land opening his own for the purpose of drainage, provided he does not cause damage to such adjoining claim or claims.

Every miner shall have the right to hold 1,500 feet of a claim on quartz lodges, with all the dips, depths, spurs, angles or accretions and 150 feet of surface land on each side of the crevice of said claim.

Eight persons forming a company may hold 100 acres for mining purposes only. Claims must be recorded within ten days from day of discovery. Every claim shall be represented every thirty days from the 1st of May to the 15th of November of each year. The recorder was allowed $1 for recording the certificate. Z. Sweeringen was elected president of the district, and William H. Costell, recorder.

B. H. JENNEY'S OFFICIAL REPORT

Professor Jenney's official report of his Black Hills survey in 1875, was submitted to the secretary of the interior November 11th, as follows:

In compliance with your request for preliminary statements respecting the mineral and agricultural resources of the Black Hills in Dakota and the work done under my direction during the past summer in exploring and mapping that portion of the territory, I have the honor to make the following report in brief: In accordance with instructions received from you under date of March 27th, I fitted out the expedition at Cheyenne, Wyoming, and proceeded to Fort Laramie, where I was joined by an escort of six companies of cavalry and two companies of infantry, under command of Col. R. I. Dodge. My party consisted of Henry Newton, assistant geologist; A. F. McGilchuddy, topographer; Capt. H. P. Taylor, astronomer; and W. H. Root, head miner, assisted by a number of prospectors, laborers and practical miners.

The expedition left Fort Laramie May 25th, and reached the southern base of the Black Hills on June 3d, after a march of about one hundred and thirty-five miles, and camped upon the east fork of Beaver Creek, when the work of exploring the hills was immediately entered upon and continued unceasingly until the return of the expedition to Fort Laramie October 23d, nearly five months.

The Black Hills of Dakota are located between the two forks of the Cheyenne River, and occupying an area included between the 103d and the 105th meridians of longitude, and the forty-third and forty-fifth parallels of latitude; they extend about one hundred miles in a northerly direction, with a breadth of from forty to sixty miles. The 104th meridian, which is the boundary between Wyoming and Dakota, passes through the central portion of the hills, leaving the greater area in the Territory of Dakota.

Without entering into details regarding the manner of working, or the general outline of the history of the expedition, how on reaching the hills I found miners prospecting in several creeks; how, after a month's work, gold was found in paying quantities in Spear and Rapid creeks; how the miners poured by hundreds into the hills, and accompanying me, and gave great assistance in prospecting the country; I will briefly state such results as the work will tend to throw light on the probable future value of the region.

That portion of the hills that may be designated as Harney's Peak, or Harney's Peak, is wholly in Dakota, and extends about fifty miles north and south, with an average breadth of nearly twenty miles, covering an area of not less than 800 square miles. The valuable gold deposits, however, are found in the valleys of the streams which drain that area, the gold being derived from the disintegration of the quartz lodges which are very numerous in the rocks of that region. The most extensive and valuable deposits of auriferous gravel discovered during the past season were in the valleys of Spear and Rapid creeks, and their tributaries, where in almost every case the gravel bars are very advantageously situated for working, and many natural circumstances contribute materially to the ease and certainty of the gold they contain.

Timber of suitable size and quantity for the construction of buildings and bridges is abundant. The water supply is in most localities ample, and the fall of the streams is generally great to enable the water to be readily carried along the banks of the creeks, and the gravel bars and deposited gravel.

While as yet there have been discovered in the Black Hills no deposits of coal sufficiently rich in gold to be profitably worked in the present season, and the coal is so yet there are many bars in the Harney's Peak gold fields, all of which are now being worked by Castle and Rapid creeks, and the valleys of the streams, and the hills are now fully worked by gangs of miners, with abundant prospectors, and the moderate capital required to be employed. But little has been accomplished in prospecting the numerous secluded portions of the hills in this season, but undoubtedly contain gold. I have procured about one hundred and fifty

The Bear Lodge gold field, situated in the extreme northwestern portion of the hills, is wholly in Wyoming and entirely separated from the Harney Peak region. It does not exceed fifty square miles in area; the gold deposits are small compared with those on Rapid Creek, and are remarkable for the absence of quartz in the gravel, the gold being derived from the disintegration of feldspar porphyry carrying irregular masses of iron and manganese ores. It is difficult to determine the agricultural resources or climate of the Black Hills by the observation of a single season, especially as I could gain but little information respecting the severity of the winters or the prevalence of early and late frosts. The Black Hills rise like an island from an ocean of grass covered and treeless plains, watered by occasional and scanty supplies of rains, and the winds in passing over these plains gather some moisture, which they part with as rain, and being chilled by contact with the colder and more elevated region of the central portion of the Hills. The result of this is the prevalence of frequent though not heavy rainfalls, giving to the hills a most peculiar climate. There is scarcely a day from May to August without one or two showers, yet owing to the dryness of the atmosphere the climate is found to be very healthy. During the past season, after August 1st, very little rain was expected or experienced, and some of the smaller streams contained water only in pools. That this is a remarkable rainfall in a region where the average fall does not exceed ten inches for the whole year does not appear, but I can only judge by observation on the growth of plants and trees.

The abundance of trees and the coarseness of their grain, as well as the growth of plants on the dry hillsides exposed to both sun and wind, tend to show that the season which I witnessed was by no means a very anomalous one, though the amount of rain may have been somewhat greater than usual. The area of land suitable for cultivation, from the mountainous character of the region, is limited as compared with the vast area embraced in the hills, but the soil along the streams and in most of the valleys is deep and fertile, and will be sufficient for the requirements of the population which the hills will support as a stock raising community. I should, from the observation I have had the opportunity to make, judge that at least one-twentieth of the 3,000 square miles embraced in the Black Hills may be fairly described as arable lands, and that near these lands lying near the streams and continuing through the hilly country, are large tracts of land forming the surface of the hillsides which, while not arable, will afford fine grazing, largely enhancing the lands to which they are contiguous. Among the rock areas of the Harney's Peak range and in the northern portion of the hills, there are regions where the grasses are comparatively wanting, but generally throughout the whole area of the hills a luxuriant growth of the finest grasses is to be found, even covering the ground under the shade of the pine trees upon the elevated divides upon the streams. The abundance and fine quality of the grasses and the shelter afforded to stock by the densely timbered slopes and deep valleys will make it a region well adapted to stock raising purposes.

The timber of the hills is a variety of pine known as yellow or heavy pine. The grain of the wood is straight, rather coarse, splitting readily, and where the trees have escaped the action of fires, and violent gales, good straight logs, free from knots, and from forty to sixty feet in length and from twelve to twenty-four inches in diameter, can be obtained in abundance. Spruce of good quality is found among the canons of the interior, and white birch, oak and elm, of medium size, among the hills on the eastern slope.

The water throughout the hills is excellent in quality, mostly derived from springs among the limestone or the granitic or schistose rocks. Only in localities among the foothills is it contaminated by alkali.

There was no evidence found that the Indians ever lived in the hills or ever visited them, except in the spring to cut lodge poles or occasionally stop and hunt deer among the foothills while passing from the agencies to the upper Missouri. The only reason advanced for the cause of their not living in the hills is the prevalence of severe thunder storms, and the frequency of trees being struck by lightning.

WALTER P. JENNEY, Geologist.

Professor Jenney's expedition was the last of the efforts made by the Government to explore the hills country. And the removal of the large body of prospectors who were found there by General Crook in 1875 was the final effort of the Government to prevent emigration to the mining regions. These important events occurred in 1875, and the following winter and early spring of 1876 witnessed the going in of many thousands of whites, unmolested, save by small bands of Indians who were incited to pillage and kill, not to deter the emigration so much as to possess themselves of the emigrant's animals, and other property. The opportunity afforded could hardly have been more inviting from the Indian viewpoint. The army was disposed to keep its hands off on the ground that the whites emigrating were trespassers, deliberately so, and had been forewarned that they must protect themselves. This turbulent and sanguinary condition prevailed until the treaty was approved in February, 1877. Soon thereafter we find a small force of troops stationed there to protect the surveying crews operating for the Government.

There is nothing in Jenney's report to show that he reached the Whitewood region in which Deadwood and Lead are located, though he was gradually working up to that region when he turned off to the west and went into Bear Lodge District, Wyoming. The first mention the writer has been able to find of Deadwood and vicinity is about mid-winter, 1875-76. We learn that miners are working in the gulch with good success, and have started a town about this time called Whitewood at or near the mouth of Whitewood Creek. It would appear that the advance guard of the miners who were with or following Jenney going north, broke away from him at the Little Rapid when the professor turned west, and set out northerly twenty-five or thirty miles, when they struck into the Whitewood district, where they found gold in great abundance. Pearson's statement supports this view, which is herein given. Here we get the first Deadwood news about the 20th of February, 1876, but it appears to be quite well authenticated that placer mines were being worked in the Deadwood Creek in the late fall of 1875. Mr. J. B. Pearson, a Dakotan, claimed to have been the pioneer who discovered gold on Deadwood Creek, and the man who named the creek and the district.

Mrs. J. B. Pearson, of Yankton, received a letter from her husband, who had been in the Black Hills since the summer of 1875. He sent a most encouraging account of his discoveries in the hills, and sent a sample of gold to give emphasis to his claim. He reports that he was located on Deadwood Creek, a stream discovered and named by himself, and afterwards found to be one of the richest gold bearing streams of the hills, and partially surrounded by the most extensive and valuable quartz mines in the country. Pearson had operated there since the fall before, and states that he can take out from $25 to $30 a day. Mr. Pearson had been a resident of Yankton for some time before going to the hills in 1875.

Mr. Z. Swearingen was sent out from Yankton to the Black Hills quite secretly early in the month of April, 1875. He was employed by a company to make the trip, for the purpose of gaining reliable information concerning the gold deposits with the view of establishing business enterprises in connection with the hills country in case the prospects of a permanent gold camp would justify it. He was a man of high character, perfectly trustworthy, and an experienced gold miner, having served an apprenticeship in California and Colorado. He went out with the J. B. Pearson party, elsewhere referred to, but he was the only one of the party entrusted with this mission. His instructions were to return as early as practicable after he felt satisfied that he had made an adequate investigation to justify either a favorable or unfavorable opinion. He reached Custer in about ten days and from the first day met with success in his prospecting that surpassed his expectations which had been formed from his career in the gulches of California and Colorado. He spent six weeks at various "diggings" and in prospecting on a half dozen creeks, and returned to Yankton about the middle of June, brim full of enthusiasm. He brought back specimens of placer gold that he had taken out with the pan, and a sack of quartz specimens bearing gold, and unhesitatingly gave it as his opinion that the Black Hills was the richest mineral region he was ever in.

Freight and passenger carrying lines from the Missouri River to the Black Hills grew out of the favorable reports made by Swearingen, who without any necessary delay arranged his affairs and returned to Custer. Gould, who took a prominent part and a successful one in the development of the French Creek diggings and the founding of Custer City.

THE ALLISON TREASURY COMMISSION

The Indians realized that the whites were determined to locate on their lands, and their leaders, counselled and abetted or prompted by the

them, had concluded to let it go (with every show of reluctance they were capable of assuming, or with a view of "making the best of a bad bargain," but without war or hostile opposition), and to demand an enormous price for the property in cash, which because of their imperfect knowledge of values, they expected to receive, for many of them were under the impression that the hills were largely composed of gold and when the white men owned it, with their superior knowledge regarding mining, they would literally shovel nuggets from the earth.

The visit of the Sioux to Washington in 1875 had apprised them that the Government contemplated their removal to the Indian Territory, and they were advised to consider it; it also revealed a willingness on the part of the Indians to treat for a cession of the Black Hills country. Their general conduct, however, was unlike that habitually displayed by the Indians when visiting Washington; they were disposed to be arrogant, and paid little attention to proprieties in their behavior. They appeared to feel that they were masters of an important situation in which they held the whites and the Government at their command. It was suspected that some of the interpreters used their positions unfaithfully and to the prejudice of the Government in explaining to the Indians the attitude of the Great Father. The Indians were sent home to think over the propositions made them, and to consult their people, and were informed that a commission would visit them later in the summer empowered to make a treaty.

Without undue delay the President next appointed a treaty commission, composed of eminent men, worthily noted for their ability as statesmen and law-makers, but with two or three exceptions, wholly without experience in Indian affairs or with Indians, and only one of them, Hinman, thoroughly qualified for this mission, which was one of the most important that had ever confronted the United States in its Indian intercourse. The gentlemen selected for this mission were three United States senators, namely: Allison, of Iowa; Howe, of Wisconsin; and Morrill, of Maine; ex-Representative Comingo, of Missouri; Rev. S. D. Hinman, of Dakota; Gen. Alfred H. Terry, U. S. A.; and Bishop Haven, Georgia, who were authorized to go into the Sioux country in Dakota, and make a treaty for the cession of the Black Hills region. Two companies of cavalry accompanied the commission which selected the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies in Dakota as the chief council grounds. After settling a few important preliminaries regarding the place for holding the grand council, a point on Shadron Creek was selected as affording the best accommodations and likewise being best suited to entertain the 15,000 Indians who had been summoned to the council; or rather who had put in an appearance for about twenty-five thousand had been summoned, including all the Sioux belonging to the nation who had an interest in the Black Hills country. The grand council opened on Saturday, September 18, 1875. Representing the Government as commissioners and employees of the commission were United States Senators Howe and Allison, as before named, but there appears to have been a change in the personnel of the body since it was first named, the others at the council being Delegate Jefferson P. Kidder, Dakota; Rev. S. D. Hinman, Santee; Hon. A. Comingo, M. C., Independence, Mo.; Hon. W. A. Ashley, Beatrice, Neb.; H. W. Bingham, United States agent, Cheyenne Agency; G. P. Beauvais, St. Louis, Mo.; J. S. Collins, Omaha. Accompanying as secretaries and stenographers were Evan T. Howe, Wisconsin; J. F. Allison, Dubuque, Ia.; Albert Swan, Fort Dodge, Ia.; and James R. Porter, Omaha. General Terry was also present as a commissioner, and in command of the military forces. A report had been current that the Indians—5,000 hostile warriors from the north who were among the visitors and bitterly opposed to any treaty of cession, intended to kill a commissioner, and there was some anxiety felt not only by the whites present but also by Red Cloud, Spotted Tail and numerous other friendly chiefs who knew the disposition and recklessness of the northern crowd, and through their spies were kept informed of the intentions of the unfriendly element. There was cause for anxiety where so numerous a body of Indians were assembled, all fairly well armed. The friendly Indians, however, outnumbered the hostiles more than two to one, and were as safe as the soldiers in case of trouble on this occasion. The various tribes, even the peaceable ones, were divided in sentiment regarding a sale of the gold region, but the canvass that had been had, revealed that a large majority were willing to make a treaty of cession provided the sale price could be satisfactorily divided among the tribes. These questions perplexed the commissioners, who had not reached an agreement as to the best course to pursue in their negotiations; but as a preliminary proposition Commissioner Allison opened the council with a tentative proposition to the Sioux to lease the Black Hills and pay an annual rental therefor. He also stated that the Government would buy the territory and asked the Indians to put a price on it. He stated that the object in leasing would be, in case the yield of gold would not justify the payment of a large sum of money, the contract could be cancelled and the land restored to the Indians.

This proposition was received by the chiefs with manifestations of disappointment, and the chiefs requested that several days be given them to consider; but the commissioners rejoined that they should meet at 10 o'clock the next day and would then expect an answer.

No formal answer from the chiefs was attempted the following day; there was, however, a very emphatic disapproval, not only of the proposition submitted, but also of any agreement for the sale of the hills, which came from the large number of Indians scattered around the council grounds; an opposition of such alarming nature that not only the military were placed by General Terry in readiness for trouble, but Spotted Tail and Red Cloud undertook to array the well disposed of their own people in such a manner as to resist any attack of the hostile element who, it was understood, were bent on the massacre of the entire commission. It is claimed that Chief Young-Man-Afraid-of-His-Horses took his rifle on his arm at this time and appeared before the hostiles and declared that the first Indian who raised his hand to create trouble would die in his track. After the apprehensions of trouble had in a measure subsided, the Indians, on the 26th, submitted a proposition at the formal council. The Indian proposition was made by Red Cloud, who had selected Red Dog, of the Cheyennes, as his spokesman, who opened the council, and was followed by Spotted Tail for the Brules, and Little Bear for the Cheyennes; Spotted Bear also spoke for the Cheyennes.

Red Dog said:

The Great Father picked you wise men to make a treaty with the Indians. You came here with troops several days ago and this troubled our people. All the young men and head chiefs have reached the conclusion that the great difficulty being experienced was in getting proper interpretation. I want one of our own people to write down all that is said and he thereupon grasped a half-breed boy from the crowd of spectators and seated him at a table. And then proceeded: Six generations of Indians have been fed by the Government and our people now want a guarantee of food and clothing for seven generations more and then the Indians will be ready to make a treaty. We want pay for the gold already taken out of the Black Hills, and want to sell only such portion of the hills as gold has been discovered in and for relinquishing my right therein I want a light wagon, a span of horses, six work cattle, one gun and ammunition for each head of a family; and also that in future when the annuity goods come we want to be furnished a duplicate bill of them, so that some of our own people can examine it. When all these things are done we will then think about what you have to say to us.

Red Dog then retired. Spotted Tail was the next speaker, and said:

Yesterday when we called on you, you were drunk, and you tried to throw water over my head today. I breathe the free air of heaven amongst my own people and you do not talk to you what I did not wish to say yesterday. If you want our land we want a definite line, and insist that the southern boundary of the Indian reservation be changed to the line of the North Platte River. We also want back pay for what has been taken out of the Black Hills. We will only dispose of that portion of the Black Hills which is not

I mean we will not dispose of the Big Horn and Powder country, as suggested by the commissioners, and we do not want any other road through the reservation to the Black Hills except the one the thieves traveled by (meaning General Custer's trail from Bismarck). We don't want roads running through the Black Hills or through the reservation. I will speak about the rights of the half-breeds and squaw men another time.

Little Bear, a chief of one of the tribes from the Cheyenne Agency, was the next speaker. He said:

The Great Father has got a safe full of money and the President protects it; so we have our mountains of gold and we will protect it to get rich out of it. When the white men have a good thing they get rich on it. Our people want to get rich on the Black Hills, and want the back pay for the money taken out of the hills by the whites. The Great Father sent you out to hear what we have to say. I want you to report to him that as long as an Indian lives he wants guarantees to be fed, clothed and annuities distributed right. The Great Father does very little for us now. We want to be helped and taken care of forever. We want our agent and interpreters changed, and we want the privilege of selecting new ones ourselves. We want priests and Catholic teachers, because we have had all we want of other kinds.

Spotted Tail here resumed his speech, which appears to have been broken off before he had completed it; he said:

We want to retain the agency here on White River and also on the Missouri River (Whetstone) as long as our race exists. If our people move again, they want to get enough money so they can live on the interest forever, and we want good white men with us; want Catholic priests to teach us the white man's ways of reading, plowing, cultivating the soil, and raising stock. We want the white men who marry Indian women to have the privileges of living in the country, and we further want the troops removed from the agencies and put to watching the white invaders and trespassers who are stealing into the Black Hills.

Spotted Bear, a chief from the Cheyenne country, then took the speaker's place, and said:

It looks bad to see the troops around this council ground while we are trying to make a treaty. My tribe want a good deal for the hills, and we don't want the white people to steal them before we sell them. There are a great many had men on my reservation, and we want Catholic priests to educate our people and make them wise, and we want our Great Father to grant them. We want $70,000,000 for the Black Hills. The whites put their money at interest, and the Indians want to live on the interest of their money. We want to select the white men and half-breeds in our tribe for traders, and have several trading posts. We want duplicate bills of all goods sent to us so that we can examine them. And we want a telegraph operator at the agency so that we can talk with the Great Father quick when there is anything wrong; and we want the soldiers removed from the agency. We also want the Great Father to give every Indian a house, farm, wagon, horses, cattle, and tools.

At the conclusion of this speech the council closed for the day and reassembled the following day for the final session.

A number of speeches were made by the Indians on the reassembling of the council, which consumed the time so that the commissioners concluded to postpone the presentation of their formal proposition for another day. There were also unpleasant rumors of trouble brewing.

Red Cloud was the most important speaker at next day's council, and seemed to have been authorized to sum up the demands of the Indians. There were 300 chiefs in attendance at this council. Red Cloud said in substance:

I consider the hills more valuable in precious metals than the entire wealth of the United States, and I propose to ask a large sum for them, the principal to be put to interest, and get enough interest to keep the whole Sioux nation. We want President Grant to furnish every year to each head of an Indian family, six yoke of oxen, a wagon, span of horses, harness, a bull, cow, a sow, a boar, sheep and rams, chickens, ducks and geese, and also coffee, tea, sugar, side meat, rice, cracked beans, dried apples, and also a house to live in and the necessary articles to furnish the house. The Government is trying to make a white man out of me and every other Indian, and this is the way to do it. We all want the troops removed from the posts near the agencies, and we want the right of appointing Indian agents, employees and traders. We demand the Catholic missionaries for instructing us. God has given our Indians the Black Hills so that we might all be supported from their wealth. We are opposed to any roads to the Black Hills except the one made by General Custer from Bismarck, which is the thief's road. We want all the half-breeds and white men married to squaws treated as Indians. We will only sell such portions of the Black Hills country as contains gold, and we will not sell the Big Horn and Powder River countries.

An Arapahoe chief followed Red Cloud, repeating his demand so closely as to show that the speeches had been rehearsed before delivery. The Arapahoe chief placed particular emphasis in his voice when he said: "All the Indians have consulted together and want Catholic missionaries and instructors."

The council finally took a recess until the following day, Thursday. General Terry personally placed the cavalry in position and sent out videttes and skirmishers to prevent a surprise and quiet unruly Indians; when more as a matter of policy, it would seem, than with any expectation that their proposition would be seriously considered, the commission met with the Indians, thousands of whom had by this date departed, and submitted a written proposal embodying their plan of leasing and purchasing; and with this the council dissolved without much ceremony, and the commissioners departed for their homes the following day. The following, though not a literal copy of this proposal, embraces clearly the substance of the document:

These propositions made this 29th day of September, 1875, by the commissioners of the United States of America to the Sioux Nation of Indians, on the White River near Crow Butte, Nebraska.

Whereas, The commissioners on the part of the United States, and the Sioux Nation having been in a grand council for several days, with reference to the acquisition of certain rights in the Black Hills and the purchase of what is known as the Big Horn Mountain country, the commissioners of the United States, in pursuance of a promise made in grand council on the 27th of September, submit to the Sioux Nation the following propositions in writing: To purchase the license to mine and also as an incidental thereto the right to raise stock and to cultivate the soil in the Black Hills, bounded and described as follows, to-wit: Beginning at the junction of the north and south forks of the Cheyenne River, and embracing all the territory between said rivers lying west of said junction to the 103d meridian of longitude west of Greenwich, the United States agreeing to pay therefor the sum of $300,000 per annum, the United States reserving the right to terminate said license at any time by giving two years notice by proclamation and payment of the full amount stipulated for the time the license may continue, and that at the expiration of said term all private property remaining upon said territory shall revert to the Sioux Nation, and that such an amount of the $300,000 as Congress shall determine, not less than $50,000 annually, shall be expended for objects beneficial for their civilization, and the remainder of said annual sum shall, in like manner, be expended for their subsistence, or, if the Sioux Nation desire it, to purchase the Black Hills as above described from the Sioux Nation, and to allow them for their interest therein the sum of $500,000 in equal annual installments, the whole sum to be annually appropriated for their subsistence and civilization, not less than $50,000, which shall be annually appropriated and expended for purposes of civilization, and the President of the United States shall, under proper restrictions and regulations, regulate the thereto routes to the Black Hills country as follows, to-wit: One from the mouth of the river to the road and the 103d meridian of longitude, one from the east to the mouth of the latitude forty-three and a half degrees until it reaches the 103d meridian, and another from the west not north of latitude forty four; also a branch road from some point on the Yellowstone River to intersect either the eastern or southern route at some point not farther west than the 103d meridian west of Greenwich.

The commissioners furthermore propose to purchase all that portion of what is known as the Big Horn country in Wyoming, which lies west of a line drawn as follows, to-wit: Beginning at the northwest corner of the State of Nebraska, and running in a straight line north direction until it reaches the Yellowstone River, where the 107th meridian west of Greenwich crosses said river; and to pay them for their interest therein the sum of $500,000 annually, ten years, to be paid in good American currency, and to be annually deposited by the President.

Any agreement which may be made shall be in full of all claims against the Sioux Nation, and it shall have been submitted to and agreed to by Congress, and approved by the President of the United States, and any agreement for the purchase of the Black Hills shall be of no effect until it shall have been so submitted to and approved and made public, as is signed in accordance with the twelfth article of the treaty of 1868.

The commissioners propose that, in case of the acceptance by the Sioux Nation of the above propositions, and after the proposed agreement shall have been accepted by Congress, the sum of $50,000 shall be expended for the purpose of distributing the same among the Indian people.

It was afterwards contended that the Indian demand for $70,000,000 for the hills had been made by them under a mistaken apprehension of the amount, or of the meaning of the word "million." That in their vernacular they had no word corresponding that would express that amount, and that they had used the term "million" when they intended to say "a hundred thousand." It was understood that the Indians had been instructed, by interested parties connected by marriage with the tribe, in their demands, which uniformly urged the recognition of certain whites for certain privileges.

Describing the perilous situation at Red Cloud Agency in 1875, when the Allison treaty commission met the Indians representing the entire Sioux nation:

The commissioners had a military guard under the immediate personal command of General Terry. In front of the commissioners there was an open space of fifty feet, where the leading chiefs were seated. Behind the chiefs was a force of United States troops, 500 strong, and still behind these a mounted force of friendly Indians, who rode back and forth in front of the great body of restless, and many of them defiant, redmen, numbering all the way from 5,000 to 10,000, who had come in from the Missouri River agencies and from the northern tribes who were then in war against the Government along the proposed line of the Northern Pacific Railroad west of the Missouri River. These latter were supposed to be watching an opportunity to precipitate disorder and a quarrel, during which turmoil they would execute their plan of massacring the commissioners. The friendly Indians, however, were as resolutely determined to prevent this as were the white troops, and one of the Red Cloud chiefs, noted for his loyalty and daring, caused it to be given out that the first Indian who attempted to fight would be a mark for his rifle. As before related, it was to this assemblage that the commissioners submitted their proposition to treat for the Black Hills—a proposition of such character that did not appear to have the support of a single representative of the Sioux nation. No further proposition was attempted to be made, but the negotiations closed informally with a promise by the chiefs that they would take the proposal under consideration and give an answer in two or three days, evidently not intending to make a reply, but to hold the matter ostensibly open until the commissioners should have time to withdraw to a place of safety, which they did during the succeeding twenty-four hours.

This terminated all efforts at treaty-making for the Black Hills for the time being and until a year later. Immigration, which had been awaiting the result of this treaty council, set in for the hills in greatly increased numbers; but a new danger now confronted the gold seekers—and one fraught with deadly peril. The young Indian warriors abandoned their policy of non-interference with the whites, and for a year following numerous small parties of emigrants were waylaid and massacred, and their property seized. It was estimated that hundreds of whites lost their lives during this period of guerilla warfare.

The current of public opinion held that the commissioners failed because they did not know how to manage the matter; that had they been prepared at the outset with a reasonable agreement to have presented the Indians instead of a tentative proposition, something worth while might have been accomplished. The profitless result of the commissioners' labors left the perplexing problem in a situation not at all improved, and further efforts would be necessary to secure the peaceable relinquishment of the gold fields. A preposterous error was the assembling of such an army of fairly well-armed Indians, many of whom were from the unfriendly camps of the North. It was considered remarkable and most fortunate that the event had not ended in a tragedy.

It is doubtful whether the Government would have assented to the proposed treaty tendered by the Allison commission; and in the light of subsequent events it would have been a lamentable failure in accomplishing the purposes sought by the Government had the proposition resulted in a treaty. It would also have worked great injury to the Indians, involving as it did the payment of large sums of money, which they would soon have squandered, and been left in a destitute condition. There was a power, apparently, behind the planning of that event that designed to have an agreement that would be of great and lasting benefit to the Indian race, and that power had its way.

The Government had been endeavoring, with its army, to keep intruders off the Big Sioux Indian reservation, guaranteed to the Indians under the Laramie treaty of 1868. Numerous parties of adventurers, numbering from a half dozen or even less, to 100, in defiance of the prohibitive edicts of the Government, issued by its military and civil authorities, were seeking to invade the gold region during 1875. In the aggregate these parties numbered thousands, and went in from the Missouri River points, from the Union Pacific Railroad towns, and from Montana. For the purpose of intercepting the interlopers, the military authorities established military camps or patrol stations on all the practicable routes crossing the reserve and patrolled the country, a portion of Custer's famous Seventh Cavalry being engaged in this duty. Many parties were intercepted, arrested and turned back. In some few instances resistance was encountered, when the outfit was practically confiscated, and partially destroyed, and the persons composing the party taken prisoners and escorted to the nearest military posts, where they were paroled after signing an agreement that they would not again attempt to invade the forbidden country until they could do so lawfully.

A case occurred in May, '75, when a company of troops from Fort Randall captured a large train of emigrants that had started from Sioux City, known as the Gordon-Andrews party, and brought a large portion of the party back to Fort Randall. The capture was made by Lieutenant Armstrong. General Sherman had instructed the commander at Randall to require the captured men to sign a parole, as a condition of discharge, agreeing not to make any further attempt to invade the reservation until a treaty was consummated. The party had left Sioux City on the 5th of April, crossing the Missouri River into Nebraska at that point, and following up what was designed to be the Niobrara route, evidently intending to keep south of the Indian reservation. They had considerable difficulty in making headway, owing to the natural obstructions in the route they had selected, and found it necessary to encroach on the reservation grounds in their progress. It was a numerous party, composed principally of young men from eastern and southern points. A list of their names is given, it being by the arrest of this company that the legality of the procedure of capturing the emigrants found its way into the courts of Dakota and Nebraska, resulting unfavorably for the Government:

Edwin F. Hobart, W. H. Pienenor, Albion, Mich.; E. Byres, Pittsburgh; Charles Bodey, James Munroe, Sam Bushnell, Minneapolis; Mide Hadif, Lockport, Ill.; George W. Hemington, Valparaiso, Ind.; Lewis Fuss, Rock Wing, Minn.; Allen A. Spangler, Rockport, Ill.; Loyd Richardson, Ottawa, Ill.; George A. Webster, Dover, N. H.; James Forman, Belle Plaines, Iowa; Willis F. Taylor, Merceus, Ind.; C. W. Pritchard, Richland, Wis.; W. C. Barnes, Orange, Mass.; E. G. Mayfield, Richland, Wis.; James H. Oak, Boonville, Mo.; J. T. Olmstead, Independence, Iowa; Isaac Boat, Battle Creek, Mich.; John A. E. Jack, Nemaha City, Neb.; W. H. McNiel, E. M. Roberts, Burlington, Iowa; J. A. Curtis, St. Louis; L. A. Doble, Eugene L. Smith, Sac City, Iowa; Thomas J. Jordan, Eldon, Iowa; H. R. Copperstone, Youngstown, Pa.; A. P. Kelly, W. Va.; John B. Delaney, Delavan, Wis.; John Marshall, Wheeling, W. Va.; Thomas A. Bur's, Chester, Delavan County, Pa.; C. A. Slammer, Wayne County, Ind.; Joseph Monroe, East Minneapolis; Henry Olmstead, David Williams, Independence, Iowa; Joseph Fuller, Wabasha, Minn.; M. Mitchell, Sioux Point, D. T.; J. S. Nutt, Allen Patterson, Westmoreland, Pa.; O. F. Aldrich, Sac City, Iowa; William F. Dempley, Boston, Mass.; D. R. Amely, Hawatha, Cal.; Andrews, L. M. Lamson, Thomas Phillips, Ben J. Smith, Hood River, Wilson, Sioux City, Iowa; Charles F. Sch., St. Clair, Mich.; J. C. Cincinnati, Ohio; Peter A. Hurst, Richmond, Ind.; Lee Goodland, Ind.

Of the scores of parties who were intercepted and turned back or placed under arrest, there were but two cases that were turned over to the civil authorities charged with a violation of the treaty stipulations. First of these was John Gordon, of Sioux City, leader of the Gordon-Wharton-Andrews party, numbering about a hundred people; a nearly complete list of their names appears in the preceding paragraph. The party was intercepted on the reservation. Gordon proved defiant, escaped, made his way to the hills, was later recaptured and turned over to the United States civil authorities of Nebraska. He was imprisoned, released on bond, and the case came to trial before Judge Dundy, presiding judge of the United States District Court for the District of Nebraska, who, after a hearing, ordered the discharge of Gordon, as the treaty of 1868, under which the Government was endeavoring to exclude emigrants to the hills, was of no legal force or effect, it never having been ratified by Congress, but by the Senate only, which was only one house of Congress.

Charles E. Solis, also a member of the Gordon party, who, with over fifty others, was taken to Fort Randall, where they were offered their liberty on condition that they would sign a parole agreeing not to again trespass upon the Sioux reservation. Solis refused to sign the parole on the ground that the military had no authority to require it. He was taken to Yankton and turned over to the civil authorities, and was placed in the custody of the United States marshal, who locked him up. The case was referred to Washington, but before an answer was received Solis employed counsel, Hon. S. L. Spink, who had his client produced in court and demanded to know the cause of his detention as a prisoner. The court was not prepared to answer. It was a very important matter, and the first case involving the legal status of these trespassers that had reached the judicial tribunals of the Government. There were no precedents for an offense of this character. A thousand Black Hills bound emigrants had passed up the Missouri valley during the season and many more were on the way. The Solis case therefore became of absorbing interest and military witnesses were in attendance from Fort Randall. Solis was a determined man, and possibly a lawyer himself, for he seemed to feel that he had the best end of the controversy. He engaged eminent counsel—Hon. S. L. Spink, Hon. Bartlett Tripp, and Oliver Shannon, Esq. The Government's side was looked after by a very capable United States district attorney, Hon. William Pound. The preliminary examination took place before United States Commissioner Congleton, where the fact was established that Solis had been captured on the reservation, where he had gone in defiance of the edicts of the military authorities; and no effort appears to have been made to prove whether this was an offense against the laws of the United States; still, the good, loyal commissioner, deeming it a case of too much importance to be adjudicated in his court, decided to hold the prisoner to the United States District Court, and fixed his bond at $200. Yankton was the seat of the United States court for the Second District. Solis was again locked up, and on the 27th of May his attorneys secured a writ of habeas corpus and the prisoner was brought before Chief Justice Shannon, where a judicial inquiry was had to determine by what authority he was held in durance. Judge Bennett, of Vermillion, sat with Judge Shannon during the learned arguments, which occupied an entire day, and when concluded the judge took the case under advisement. Judge Dundy's decision had not at this time been announced.

The contention of the United States had been based on two sections of the Revised Statutes, to-wit: Sections 2134 and 5440, as follows:

Section 2134. Every "foreigner" who shall go into the Indian country without a passport from the Department of the Interior, superintendent, agent or subagent of Indian affairs, or officer commanding the nearest military post on the frontiers, or who shall remain intentionally thereon after the expiration of such passport, shall be liable to a penalty of $1,000.

Section 5440. If two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of such conspiracy, all parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $1,000, and not more than $20,000, and to imprisonment not more than two years.

The United States attorney, it seems, had found nothing in the Indian treaties that provided any remedy for a case of this kind and, apprehending that there would be a great many arrests made by the military authorities for an offense similar to that alleged against Solis, had given much research to the law books, anxious to fortify himself for the flood of business which seemed inevitable from the frequent arrests made by the troops, and the continued march of gold-seeking parties up the Missouri valley through Dakota, whose objective point was the Black Hills. It was necessary, therefore, that he should know that he had a solid foundation for prosecuting the interlopers. Accordingly, he took the precaution to telegraph the attorney-general of the United States at Washington for his opinion, quoting to that official the sections of the statutes under which he had proceeded against Solis, and received in reply the following:

Washington, D. C., May 28, 1875.

To William Pound, United States Attorney, Yankton, D. C. T.

Section 2134 does not apply to citizens of the United States. Section 5440 does not apply, as no statutes make a breach of the provisions of the Sioux treaty an offense against the United States.

EDWARDS PIERREPONT, Attorney General.

On receipt of this official information the judge dismissed the action on the ground that his court had no jurisdiction. Solis was set at liberty, and stated that he would bring an action against the military people for false imprisonment; but as nothing further connected with the incident came before the court, it is probable Solis concluded to drop the matter.

Mr. Pound, attorney for the Government, had taken the position, in his argument to the court, that the term "foreigner," in Section 2134, applied to all white citizens and aliens, when caught trespassing upon the Indian reservation.

These court proceedings did not appear to have any influence whatever upon the volume of immigration to the hills; but it may be properly presumed that they had an important influence upon the execution of the prohibitory orders regarding the invasion of the Sioux country by the whites, for it was observable as the season advanced that the vigilance of the military was notably relaxed, and in place of intercepting immigration the attention of the military was given to conditions in the hills, where, it was estimated, about five thousand whites were living scattered at various points in the hills, and engaged in prospecting, and in a few instances engaged in the systematic working of placer mines that were yielding profitable returns.

The exclusion policy had been impotent to keep the invaders out, but the Government's efforts to enforce it during latter part of the season did not extend beyond an occasional mild remonstrance, which called forth no censure from the main body of citizenship. Some elements, unacquainted with the situation, were inclined to take an uncharitable view of the leniency of the authorities, but the vast majority commended the course as wise, humane and best for all concerned. The Government seemed determined to avoid any serious conflict with its citizens, and especially so in view of the almost absolute certainty of an amicable treaty being made with the Sioux for the transfer of the gold fields within a reasonable time. The occasion was one that demanded the exercise of a wise prudence to avoid serious difficulties.

MINERS AT WORK IN NORTHERN HILLS. DEADWOOD FOUNDED

GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS CONCLUDE TO RELAX THE RIGID RULES OF EXCLUSION—REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS—PRESIDENT GRANT'S MESSAGE

AND OTHERS—THE DISCOVERER OF DEADWOOD GULCH—GOVERNOR PENNINGTON DECLINES TO ORGANIZE COUNTIES.

Early in November, 1875, a council was held in Washington, which was attended by President Grant, General Sherman, Secretary of War Belknap, Secretary of the Interior Chandler, General Crook and General Cowan, at which the question of excluding immigration to the Black Hills was discussed, and the result of the conference was given out that the Government thereafter would observe a neutral attitude toward the miners who were crowding the thoroughfare leading to the hills. A party numbering about four hundred had recently left Cheyenne on the Union Pacific Railroad for the El Dorado, and it was stated that the members would not be interfered with by the Government, the conclusion having been reached that the ordinary peaceful methods it had pursued of intercepting these parties and escorting them beyond the reservation, did not lessen the number who were willing to risk arrest, and to adopt a more rigorous policy toward the invaders, under the circumstances existing, was not to be considered. Congress would convene the month following. It was determined to let matters drift until Congress met, when that body was expected to inaugurate a practical plan for meeting the emergency that would have the sanction of law. The authority under which the military arm of the Government had thus far acted were the treaties with the Indians, and as these had failed to be upheld by the courts, and the Indians were making no attempts to stop the immigration, evidently viewing it with favor as a valuable aid to their proposed sale of the domain to the Government, the gold fields were practically opened to the whites in the late fall of 1875, and thousands of adventurous men had already occupied them.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

The report of the commissioner of Indian affairs (Hon. E. P. Smith) to the secretary of the interior treats at length the situation confronting the Government by the persistent disregard of the Government's efforts to prevent the emigration of white people to the gold fields, in utter defiance of the treaty of 1868, and the claimed vigilance of the military. The commissioner says:

One thousand or more miners have made their way into the hills in the face of the most stringent orders of the military. These miners have organized into an association for mutual protection, and have adopted laws and regulations; have staked out and reserved their claims in the right to which they expect hereafter to be protected. In the management of affairs there is but one alternative for the Government, either to increase the military force so as to compel a strict observance of the treaty rights of the Sioux by preventing all intrusion, or to put such restrictions upon the exercise of the large bounty now granted to the Sioux as to form an argument that will be likely to procure their assent to the cession of this country. Unwilling as I may be to confess it, the experience of the past season proves the utter impracticability of keeping American citizens out of a country where gold exists by any fear of a cavalry patrol or by any consideration of the rights of Indians. The occupation and possession of the Black Hills by white men is inevitable, and there exists for making this inevitability an occasion of wrong or injury to the Sioux. If the Sioux were an independent and self-supporting people, able to claim that hereafter the United States Government should leave them alone in possession of their own country, and in yearly receipt until 1868 of such annuities as the treaty of 1868 guaranteed them, there would be a show of wrong, which is not now so clear, in our persistently asking for a portion of their country. As original proprietors of the land, and as occupants in perpetuum by formal contract on the part of the United States, the Sioux would be entitled to be let alone; but unfortunately for the Indians, the facts are otherwise. They are by no means capable of any support. The withdrawal of Government rations for a single season would reduce them to starvation or to a life by marauding. While they are pensioners upon the bounty of the Government in the sum of $1,250,000 annually at the all amounts specified by treaty stipulations, the Sioux are not in a position to be let alone. If the Government is obliged from considerations of humanity and the protection of the frontier, to supply the necessities of these Indians by rations, it may properly be asked if the Government shall have an equivalent in gold fields. A cession produced in this manner would be far preferable to a continuation of the present disturbed condition of affairs.

The secretary of the interior, Hon. Zach Chandler, in whose department Indian affairs were controlled, endorsed the views and also the recommendations of the commissioner:

The peace policy of the Government in dealing with the Indians had been found to work advantageously, and coupled therewith was the industrial system which had been partially established among the Sioux. This had been found to work well wherever the Indians were so environed that the inducements of the chase were taken away, and in their place encouragement given to plant, and raise cattle and horses. The time had come when it became necessary to bring a certain compulsion upon the Indians to induce them to labor, and this the Government was in position to do by requiring the Indians to perform some kind of manual labor in return for the rations and clothing furnished by the Government. The welfare of the Indians, as well as justice, demanded a persistent and firm application of this kind. There can be no doubt whatever that so long as the great bulk of the Sioux Indians are encouraged to occupy their present locations near the Red Cloud and Sisseton Tail agencies, and allowed to roam at will over their vast reservation and westward to the west to the Big Horn mountains and to the Powder River and to the Yellowstone, they can make no progress whatever, and must be fed year after year by the Government.

The failure of the negotiations by the commissioners necessitates the adoption of some measures to relieve the department of the great embarrassment resulting from the early determination of a large number of citizens to enter upon that portion of the Sioux reservation to obtain the precious metals which the official report of the geologists concerning the Government shows to exist therein. The very measures now taken by the Government to prevent the influx of miners into the Black Hills, by means of the dispatch of military troops, operate as the surest safeguard of the miners against the attacks of the Indians. They expel the miners, and, while doing so, protect them from Indians. The miners return as soon as the military surveillance is withdrawn, and the same story is told again and again. Some of the miners have brought suits against the military authorities for arrests, imprisonment, and much embarrassment to both army and the interior department as a result. The preliminary report of Professor Leconte, which has impeded the report of the Indian commissioner, in regard to the geological and agricultural wealth of the Black Hills, indicates clearly the great temptation held out to miners and prospectors to enter that country, and will greatly enhance the difficulties which have already been encountered in the protection of the Sioux in their treaty rights to that territory. The coming summer season will undoubtedly witness a great increase of emigration into that region, and the question urges itself upon the attention of the Government as to how such an influx can be met. It is true that the Indians occupy that country, and under the terms of the treaty made with the United States. It is also true that the Indians are not a self-sustaining people, and that the Government has been appropriating for their support, for the last twenty years, millions of dollars for the subsistence of Sioux citizens. It is also true that the Government is under no obligations to cede to the miners the land which they are seeking for gold. The amount thus appropriated for the support of the Indians is not an advantage. The amount thus appropriated for the support of the miners is not an advantage. The Government is giving without an equivalent what it receives for nothing.

years to come, or they will starve. It is submitted, therefore, under these circumstances, for the consideration of Congress, whether it would not be justifiable and proper to make future appropriations for supplies to this people, contingent on the relinquishment of the gold fields in the Black Hills and the right of way thereto.

President Grant, in his annual message to Congress, December 7, 1875, briefly alludes to the Black Hills problem in these words:

The discovery of gold in the Black Hills, a portion of the Sioux Reservation, has had the effect to induce a large emigration of miners to that point. Thus far the efforts to protect the treaty rights of the Indians in that section have been successful, but the next year will certainly witness a large increase of such emigration. The negotiations for the relinquishment of the gold fields having failed, it will be necessary for Congress to adopt some measures to relieve the embarrassment growing out of the causes named. The secretary of the interior suggests that the supplies now appropriated for the sustenance of that people, being no longer obligatory under the treaty of 1868, but simply a gratuity, may be issued or withheld at his discretion.

EXPEDITION FROM YANKTON

The Black Hills fever prevailed quite generally throughout the towns and settlements of Dakota in 1875-76. In the winter an organization was formed in Yankton, having for its purpose a reconnoitering survey of the best routes from Yankton to the hills. William Leeper, H. C. Ash, who was a deputy United States marshal; W. P. Lyman, A. M. English, Charles H. Bates, Fred Edgar and William James, were selected and employed by the association, with George Heinicke, a surveyor and frontiersman, to make the trip and find the shortest and most practicable route. Parties from Union and Clay counties joined this expedition, which left on the 8th of February, and were joined a day later by a party composed of M. A. Baker, George W. Smith, Al F. Wood, Will Brisbane, Nelson Smith, Frank Coulson and Harry Ash.

A portion of the party, including Messrs. Leeper, Ash, Bates, Lyman, English and James, returned late in March, having gone through to Custer City by a route from near Fort Pierre, quite direct to the crossing of the South Cheyenne, thence to their destination. They found an abundance of wood and water, and considerable cured buffalo grass on the light snow-covered plains.

At Custer Deputy United States Marshal Ash arrested Fritz Drogmond, or Dranghmond, for selling liquor on an Indian reservation, and had not paid his special Government tax, and brought the prisoner back to Yankton for trial, where he was indicted by a United States grand jury the following April, tried, found guilty, and sentenced to pay $30 fine and to be imprisoned twenty-four hours. There were extenuating circumstances connected with the case, and the prisoner from the time of his arrest had conducted himself in a manner that had won the sympathy and respect of the officers of the court, who were all very much gratified at the mild sentence. This was the first legal arrest made in the Black Hills.

A Union County party, led by Charles Brughier, a half-breed son of Theophilus Brughier, made a successful journey to the hills in April, 1875.

W. T. McKay, of Bijou Hills, Dak., who was employed by Custer as a miner to accompany his expedition to the Black Hills in 1874, was a member of the Dakota Legislature the following winter, and talked quite freely of that country. He had visited various points and under instructions from the scientific parties accompanying Custer had prospected for placer gold with fair success on Elk Creek, Box Elder Creek, Swift Water, Burntwood, Putty Creek, Creek of Many Springs, Frenchman's Creek (Custer's Gulch), and right north of Harney's Peak on what he believed to be the Swift Water. McKay, with Maj. W. P. Lyman, of Yankton, led a party of Dakotans to the hills in the spring of 1875.

EXPEDITION FROM BISMARCK

A party of about thirty, headed by H. N. Ross, who was with Custer as a mineralogist and prospector, left Bismarck for the gold fields of the Black Hills in December, 1875. Six months' provisions were taken along, the party intending not only to spend the winter in the auriferous region, but make a permanent settlement unless disturbed in their plans by the military. Benj. C. Ash, formerly of Yankton, with a small force, had preceded this party from Bismarck, for the purpose of laying out a practicable route. The Ash party met with no opposition from the Indians nor military, and found a good route to Hill City, that being one of the thriving camps at the time; and Deadwood and its environs, being at the time either unexplored or not sufficiently known to attract the emigration of that winter. The Ash party made the return trip to Bismarck in seventy-two hours' traveling time; estimated that the length of their road was about two hundred and fifty miles. The names of the Ross party, which started out in December, prior to Ash's return, were:

H. N. Ross, William Boughton, T. G. Jones, William Burcher, J. J. Sutherland, George Anderson, Nathan Brosier, Isidore Belanguet, Joseph Smith, George Catlin, Roger Bacon, George W. Stone, Oscar Brackett, Mike Smith, Adam Cable, William Harvey, Theo. Shenkenberg, John Kennedy, Henry Dion, John McClellan, H. Tousley, Frank Stone, Robert Hams or Harris, Louis Constenois.

The Ash party referred to was composed of Ben C. Ash, J. Dodge, Ed Donahue, W. H. Stimpson, R. R. Marsh.

The outpouring for the Black Hills as early as February, 1876, is well illustrated by the following, published in the Bismarck Tribune of February 8th of that year:

Forty-seven teams, loaded with provisions and passengers, left with the steam sawmill outfit for the Black Hills yesterday and today. Thirty more will leave Wednesday with freight and passengers, among which are several families. California Joe pilots the party, assisted by Ed Donahue and Tom Winston, as scouts. The party is well armed and several are well mounted, so Mr. Lo had better keep clear of the boys. Several teams arrived last evening from Standing Rock, and from up the river, to join the party. At least seventy-five teams and 150 persons will leave during the week. Fred Hollemback goes out with a herd of cows to start a ranch; Joe Pennell, Thos. Madden, Bob Roberts and others go as traders; Wm. Smith and family go to settle permanently. O. Nicholson, of the firm of J. W. Raymond & Co., goes out with a stock of miner's goods to locate and establish a wholesale and retail commission house; George Gibbs to start a blacksmith shop; Thomas Winston, Ed Donahue, W. B. Shaw & Co. are the Black Hills Lumber Company; Mr. Gates sends the mill through on contract for Mr. Hobart, who takes out a large lot of sash and glass. Mr. Hobart also takes a shingle mill. Mr. Downing takes out fresh pork, butter, lard, sausage, etc. The trip will be made in fourteen days.

The two Black Hills parties organized by Scott Goodwin and A. F. Gray left Yankton for the Black Hills, February 24, 1876. The names of the company were A. F. Gray, O. H. Platt, Israel Volin, Drew Palmer, Martin Dutcher, James Gill, Walter Turner, Martin Kilbridge, Alex. Smith, James Magnel, William E. Lyon, George Hughes, Capt. James Hughes, James Cranty, John Hattnel, Mr. Erskine, Martin Kilbride, Mitchell Magnel, Dana Todd, E. L. Hech, Eugene Little, James McCornick, Patrick Rois, Aug. Nichols, Frank Vesina, John Walsh, James Walsh, Peter Lynch, James McKay, James Munkhouse, Milt Brisbane, E. J. Walsh, Matt Murray, John Magnel, Wm. Lortant, L. Smith, S. Smith, W. H. Frederickson, John Crantz, Frank Gill, Joseph Dupans, J. C. Sherman, Aug. Kibs, D. B. Benedict, Scott Goodwin, Wm. Ferguson, Michael Gray, Louis Dewitt, Vincent Earle, George Jones, John Ingwersen, F. Runsvy, J. Enoch, Philson Davis, L. A. Carney, M. H. Kendig, L. P. Mercier, Joseph Llober, Joseph Vyboning, Frank Lenger, R. Whitey, George Ranes, D. Hawley, and J. S. Phillips.

BLACK HILLS CLIPPINGS

In giving place to the letters and other testimonials of early settlers in the Black Hills, the purpose is to give credit to those Dakota foremost in the enterprises, and at the same time furnish testimony from first hands which can be relied upon as authentic.

Nothing of consequence appears to have been heard from any reliable sources regarding the hills country north of the Little Rapid Creek, until late in the winter of 1875-76; but when the earliest information reached the public it appeared that considerable prospecting had been done possibly as early as the fall of 1875 on Whitewood and Deadwood creeks and by far the richest placers in the hills known at the time had been partially opened up and were yielding much gold.

A letter written from "Deadwood Creek, Lost District," March 31, 1876, by Wm. Gay to J. W. Crawford (Captain Jack), at Omaha, gives an early view of conditions in the Deadwood Gulch and the regions in the vicinity of what has since become the richest of the gold producing country. The writer says:

I arrived here yesterday and found everything all right. We had a very hard trip. The snow is about three feet deep and still snowing. There is quite a change here since I left. Instead of eighteen men there are several hundred. There has been a number of discoveries made since I left, both in placer and quartz. The weather has been so cold that prospecting has been very difficult, but wherever it has been tried they got good prospects. Prospects on Deadwood and Whitewood are from ten to twenty-five cents, and as high as $1.30 to the pan, while on some of the side gulches emptying into Deadwood, there has been as much as $5.00 to the pan. There have been a number of claims sold at prices varying from $500 to $4,000.

When I got here the townsites I spoke to you about had all been taken up and all the lots taken. One is at the mouth of Whitewood, and is called Creek City; the other is a short distance below the mouth of Deadwood, on Whitewood Creek, and is called Whitewood City. We are going to lay off a town here on Deadwood to be called Gay City. I will reserve a lot for you. Tell Curran that if he had come over with me he could have had a chance to get a good claim on shares, but they are all taken now. Old Dan had sold his discovery claim before I got here. We have particularly developed some of the ledges we had staked, and two of them proved to be very good. I send you a specimen from the "Giant" lode, owned by Wm. Gay, A. H. Gay, M. J. Ingoldsby, E. D. Haggard, D. Meckles, and J. B. Pearson. We have another ledge that we consider better, called the "Blacktail," owned by the same parties. We propose to start on a prospecting expedition as soon as the snow leaves sufficiently, and if I find anything I will try and give you a show.

The Indians have made several attacks at the mouth of Whitewood, and have succeeded in running off about one hundred head of horses. There have been two men wounded by them, but neither of them seriously. Last night they made an attack at the mouth of Bear Butte Creek and run off seven horses. We expect more trouble with them when the snow leaves, as they, we suppose, will come with more force. As yet none have been seen far in the hills, as they cannot ride in. They have confined their operations to the foothills.

Yours truly,

Wm. Gay,

Deadwood Creek, B. H.

J. B. PEARSON'S STATEMENT

The following statement of a year's experience in the hills from June, 1875, to June, 1876, being prior to the making of the treaty with the Sioux for the Black Hills country. The statement was made to the editor of The Daily Press and Dakota, June 7, 1876, and was the first authentic intelligence given to the public concerning the mineral resources of that portion of the hills, since become famous as the Deadwood mining regions and the Homestake mine. It is probable that the quartz lodes named and mentioned by Mr. Pearson, or a portion of them, subsequently came into the possession of the owners and organizers of the Homestake Mining Company. The General Terry Lode was without doubt absorbed by the Homestake and also the Big Giant. As one of the earliest authentic reports from that country, Mr. Pearson's statement is entitled to a place in history.

Mr. John B. Pearson's mining experience commenced in California in 1852. Since that time he had worked at placer and quartz mining in British Columbia, on Frazer River and Caribou, in Australia, in Idaho and Montana, and was, perhaps, as competent to speak of the mineral resources of the Black Hills as any man living. He had resided in Yankton

HILLS OPENING YEARS AND LATER

Bill); J. B. Omsbinder (Texas Jack); Gene Overton

for many years and was known as perfectly trustworthy and reliable. His wife and daughter remained at Yankton during Mr. Pearson's sojourn in the hills.

Mr. Pearson left Yankton for the Black Hills, May 4, 1875, arriving there August 10th, having been turned back once by the military. He crossed the Missouri River fifteen miles below Fort Pierre, instead of at that place, in order to avoid the soldiers. He was accompanied by Dick Low, Jim Piernan, Thos. Moore, Frank Bryan and two others. They went in with ponies, taking their provisions on pack animals. Struck the hills at the head of Elk Creek, and crossed the range till they came to Whitewood, where he found good prospects—twenty to forty cents to the pan. Remained there for some time subsisting on jerked deer meat straight, and finally in company with one other party went out to the Laramie and purchased six months' supplies, returning to the hills with a train of twelve wagons, a portion of which belonged to men who joined him at that post.

Mr. Pearson, with five companions, namely, Dan McElles, Joe Inglesby, M. Gray and William Gay of Yankton, and Dad Haggart, settled in the Whitewood region in Deadwood. They organized a sort of co-partnership under which they took placer claims and quartz lodes. Their placers were taken as individual property, but their quartz lodes were company affairs. These six remained together until the spring; in the mean time, during the winter, each of the party wrote to friends in Yankton guaranteeing them $100,000 a day. Not doubting but what the Yankton parties would come on, Pearson made two trips during the winter to meet them, but was obliged to return to his cabin disappointed. Finally the party abandoned the hope of inducing their friends there, and believing their own security required more people, they let it be generally known that rich mines had been discovered in the Whitewood region and in a very few weeks their numbers had increased from a half dozen to 3,000 men.

"Actual work did not commence in the Whitewood section until in April, 1876. Since that time about two thousand claims have been located, and 350 of these opened and are now being worked with profit. On the remainder the owners are now at work opening them and will soon begin to realize profits.

"The Whitewood rich gold producing region embraces an area that will average eight miles in width by twenty in length, its largest area extending north and south. It embraces a number of streams and gulches, known as Deadwood, Bob Tail, Gold Run, Tax Run, Split Tail, Cape Horn and others, and has been divided by the miners into four districts, called Cape Horn District, Whitewood District, Lost District, which includes Deadwood, and Gold Run."

Mr. Pearson's operations had been principally confined to Lost District on Deadwood Creek, though he has prospected every section with good success. At present he was working three placer claims and two quartz lodes. His placers are yielding from twenty to forty dollars a day to the man. His quartz lodes are paying nothing, but the prospects are unmistakably good, and he is sinking a 75-foot shaft on each of the lodes. There are about two thousand men engaged in the Whitewood region. Concerning the yield of gold in special cases, Mr. Pearson gave the following:

"Wheeler & Co., Montana men, in Lost District, are taking out from $100 to $700 a day to 8 men.

"Bob Kenyon, in the same district, is taking out $200 to $300 a day with 4 men.

Claim No. 8, on Deadwood, is yielding $80 to $100 a day to 4 men.

"James Scott and Parker & Co., Manitowoc, Wis., parties, have claim No. 2, on Bob Tail in Lost District, and are taking out from $50 to $200 a day to 4 men. They are also running three claims. Dad Haggart sold three placers and an interest in a quartz lode for $25,000.

A claim is 300 feet in length and extends on either side of the gulch to what is known as the second rim of the bedrock. Above these are the hill claims.

Mr. Pearson estimated that the placers in the Whitewood region were at that time yielding $10,000 a day and not one claim in ten is being worked for pay. When the Whitewood region is fairly opened it will employ over five thousand men and will yield a daily average of $100,000. It will take from eight to ten years to exhaust the placers already located, while quartz mining of the most productive character will form a lucrative and be the permanent industry of the country, giving employment to thousands of miners.

Provisions were scarce. When Pearson left the hills there was not to exceed two weeks' supply of provisions on hand and in sight. About twenty parties came with him, all of whom are out solely for supplies. Two parties, Capt. C. H. McKinness and Mr. Wood, came in to Pierre with eight teams each, and have from seven thousand to ten thousand dollars to invest in supplies. Pearson brought in $1,250 in gold dust and turned the greater part of it with Edmunds & Wynn, bankers of Yankton, who shipped it to the United States mint at Philadelphia to be coined.

The comparative value of the Black Hills gold mines Whitewood region was given by Mr. Pearson, in these words:

"It lays over Alder Gulch, Montana, the richest placer mines ever located, because the Alder Gulch was spotted while the Deadwood is regular and continuous, and is the richest and most extensive placer gold field that has ever been struck.

Mr. Pearson brought with him a number of specimens of quartz lodes on the divide between Deadwood and Blacktail. From fifteen to twenty were "located" in that locality and all show good prospects. The specimens are as follows:

Pearson were taken from the Big Giant, Black Tail, Gold Run, and General Terry lodes. The first three named are the property of Pearson and partners, while the latter belongs to another party named in the following note, who sent out a piece of the quartz weighing several pounds to be assayed:

"A piece of ore from the General Terry ledge, situated on Bobtail Gulch, a tributary of Deadwood, Black Hills, Dakota Territory, owned by A. C. Harney, Alex Engle and Manwell Bros. Width of vein twelve feet, pitches west at about sixty degrees, running about northwest and southeast."

The nearest, by far, and most practicable route will be from Fort Pierre to Grindstone Buttes, out about fifty miles, then leaving these buttes to the left, strike the South Cheyenne six miles above the forks, thence to the mouth of Elk Creek and up that valley to its head, thence to Crook City—distance from Fort Pierre to Crook City 140 miles. Crook City is at the mouth of Whitewood and will be the metropolis of that mining region. It is easily accessible by the route mentioned. The distance from Crook City to Cheyenne by the route mentioned is over three hundred miles. Freights can be carried in from Pierre at one-half the price they can be hauled from Cheyenne.

Pearson's party saw no Indians coming out. The miners have not been annoyed by Indians since last February, and do not feel the least alarm from that source. What they want is provisions, mail lines, and good citizens. The miner's laws are very rigid, thorough and rigidly enforced. Bad characters are not wanted there and not tolerated. The feeling among the miners is to stick unless driven out by starvation. They are aware of the great richness of the country and will not abandon it unless driven out by famine.

Deadwood Creek, Black Hills, Feb. 20, 1876.

GEN. C. T. CAMPBELL, Yankton.

Dear Sir: As one of our party leaves for Spotted Tail in the morning, I take this first opportunity I have had to let you know of my whereabouts. Deadwood Creek is a tributary of Whitewood Creek, emptying into it from the southeast, ten miles from Bear Butte. I am located on Deadwood, two miles from its mouth. There is a scope of country here about twenty miles square, taking in Whitewood, Deadwood, Blacktail, Bob Tail, White Tail and Grizzly creeks, which have all prospected good—from 25 cents to one dollar to the pan.

A gentleman just came in from Bob Tail. He got $5.00 in an hour on that creek. We sluiced two hours on this creek and got $21.00; but the weather has been so cold for several weeks that we have not done anything. We hope to be able to get to work in a week or two. We are getting some supplies from Cheyenne and Sidney, but from those points they have to come through the hills and over a very rough country, while from some point on the Missouri River, say Fort Pierre, there could be a good road and much shorter, and I can't see why some of your enterprising citizens are not awake to their interests. We are 350 miles from Cheyenne, and a part of the distance has to be made with pack animals, while from the Missouri we are only 120 miles, and a good road could be made the entire distance.

We have partially located a town at the mouth of Whitewood Creek in the foothills, which is in close proximity to the prairie. I feel confident that we have the richest and most extensive gold fields in the Black Hills, both in placer and quartz. The placer diggings I feel confident, will pay $25.00 a day to the man. I have found several quartz leads that prospect well. I send you a small specimen of gold taken from the crevice of Black Tail Lode, and I would send you some of the ore but have no convenient way of sending it. This specimen I send you came from about five pounds of decomposed quartz taken from the lode. The lode is fifteen feet wide between the walls, and we are down twenty-five feet—and bids fair to be one of the richest lodes in the country. We have several other lodes that indicate silver, but they are not sufficiently developed to state positively as to their richness.

We are sadly in need of a sawmill, and if you know of anyone who has a sawmill I could guarantee they would do well. All the lumber that has been made here has been made by the primitive way of whip-sawing, and for that they charge $150 a thousand.

I am in company with five experienced miners—Mr. E. Haggart, from White Cloud, Kans.; Wm. Gay, from Ohio; M. J. Ingoldsby, from Steubenville, Ohio; J. B. Pearson, from Yankton, Dakota; and Daniel Meckles, from Lancaster, Penn., and they all say it is the best mining country they have ever been in.

We had a very pleasant visit from Captain Kelly, of Yankton, a few days ago. He intends to locate in this gulch. We have a very good cabin and enough provisions to last us until the bad weather is over, but we have no reading matter of any kind. I would like very much if you would send me some papers.

The Indians made us a visit a few days ago and got ten head of horses from the miners. They pursued them but did not succeed in overtaking them. They were supposed to have been from Cheyenne or Standing Rock agencies.

Snow north of us is about three feet deep in the mountains, but on the prairie there is scarcely any.

Very respectfully,

A. H. GAY.

Capt. James L. Kelly, who had resided in Yankton for ten years, a second son of Governor Faulk and formerly adjutant general of the territory, left Yankton in September, 1875, for the Black Hills, in company with Maj. W. P. Lyman, Mr. Mershon, Ben Miller, Washington and Thomas Reed, and others. The party were once turned back by the military, and a portion of them returned to the capital city.

In December, nine of the party who had remained in the vicinity of Fort Thompson reorganized, and on the 22d of that month left the Missouri River for the hills. A day or two after starting Ben Miller received a gun-shot wound which proved to be of such a serious character that Captain Kelly brought him back to Dry Island, where he subsequently died. Captain Kelly rejoined the party on the 27th, and they then took up their march for the land of gold.

Captain Kelly's statement follows:

Leaving the Missouri at Dry Island we struck south through the gap in Bear Hill until we came to the old Whetstone Trail, which we followed to the south fork of the White River, then crossed on to the north fork and followed it twenty miles when we struck northwest to Bad River and followed up stream to the crossing of the Fort Pierre Trail, thence to the south branch of the Cheyenne, which we crossed and traveled one day northwest to Elk Creek, and followed up that valley until we struck Custer's trail, which we followed into the hills as far as Box Elder Creek. This route was chosen as far as we desired to avoid meeting with the military or Indians. The members of the party began prospecting in this vicinity, and in time separated.

The captain stated as to his personal experiences:

I think there is plenty of gold here. I washed out gold getting as high as four cents to the pan. I prospected seven miles south of Whitewood Creek; I also prospected on Deadwood Creek and got good returns. I prospected again on Deadwood, always finding gold. The ground was frozen in almost every instance to the gravel, so that we could not obtain a fair prospect, but the results received satisfied me that gold existed in paying quantities. J. B. Pearson, of Yankton, is located on Deadwood and was doing nicely until the ground froze. He is now waiting for warm weather and has his sluice boxes all prepared. Pearson informed me that he had averaged $1.00 an hour when the weather permitted him to work. Saw Fayette Place on Rapid Creek. He went north to look after quartz leads near Bear Butte. Pearson has located ten quartz leads in the same section. Gold payers have been received from the quartz. I met no other Yankton men, but learned that Bob Todd and the Reeds were located on Rapid Creek. There is an unlimited amount of good quality timber in that country.

It was estimated that there were about two thousand people in the hills. I met about fifteen hundred going in on the Cheyenne route as I came out, and with those who had gone in from the Missouri River routes, there must be not less than seven or eight thousand in the country. Some old miners believed they had struck a big thing; others thought it would cost more to get it out than it would come to. Custer City has about two hundred houses, principally log, though some frames are now being built to be finished. Hill City has 125 log houses completed and under way. Rapid City is a town a mile square, located down on Rapid Creek, where there was a battle when I was away. On Spring Creek, on what is called Allen Bar, seven miles from Hill City, the most gold has been taken out. The Montana company here took out over a hundred dollars week before last. The next to this is Pearson's on Deadwood.

The miners generally expect more or less trouble with the Indians, though they expect at all. A party of Indians had visited camp at the mouth of White River and had a good head of stock. I think the Indians have been accustomed to visit the hills for some time, as I saw a great many old tepee poles.

I believe the Fort Pierre or Randall routes to be the best. Fort Pierre is the nearest point to the hills. A good route exists from either end of the range, with plenty of wood, water and grass. Either of these routes would strike Elk Creek and follow the valley into the hills. I never want to travel the Cheyenne route, as I do not like the timber. At Pole Creek ranch the prospectors find less wood than twenty miles from going in are compelled to haul their fuel for miles. There is very little water without water. I do not think there can be much grain in the range, as the distance from Custer to Cheyenne cannot be run from 20 miles. The reason for this, by way of Cheyenne was because I could not find a route, coming by way of the Missouri and did not wish to come alone. Besides I had carried experiments with prospecting going to Cheyenne well equipped, and being somewhat anxious to see the country and compare it with the Missouri River, I concluded to come out that way. I will return after I have made a visit to my old home in Pennsylvania, which will take a couple of months.

Mr. John R. Brennan, of the new Town of Rapid City, came into the settlements on the Missouri River, in March, 1876, with a company of Dakotans who had come out after supplies by the Fort Pierre route. Mr. Brennan went into the hills in 1875 from Denver City, where he had resided for a number of years as the proprietor of the American Hotel. His business took him to the capital of the territory where he gave out a statement of the conditions in the hills during the winter of 1875-76. He went into the hills in November, 1875, and had spent the winter there mining. Concerning the gold country, he said:

I worked on Spring Creek and found good prospects. There are really only two claims being worked in the hills now—I mean by means of sluice boxes. (Mr. Brennan had no definite information from the Deadwood region at that time.) There are thousands of men sinking prospect holes, but have not got down to work yet. These two claims that are worked are on Spring Creek—one by the Montana company and one by the Florida Bar Company. The former is composed of five men and has been at work all winter. They have averaged $10.00 to the man since they begun, by working six hours per day. When I left they were taking out $90.00 per day. The Florida Bar Company consists of seven men, and is averaging $7.00 a day to the man. There are now between four thousand and five thousand white men in the hills and more arriving every day.

Our party, which numbers five, has sunk sixteen or seventeen prospect holes on Spring Creek. Our best results were obtained after we reached Bed Rock, where we took out from fifty to sixty cents to the pan. Our success created considerable excitement. The bed rock is eighteen feet down. Our folks were running a drain ditch up the gulch when I left.

On Rapid Creek, which is north of Spring Creek, big preparations are going forward for the spring work. There are more men at work on Rapid Creek than any stream in the hills, and I have obtained better prospects on Rapid than in any locality in the hills. Rapid City is on this creek and is the finest location for a town in the hills. The Rapid Creek Valley furnishes an easy natural entrance from the South Cheyenne to the heart of the hills. The valley averages two miles in width and has a good road ready made by Nature. Rapid City has been laid out. It is one mile square, and has streets 100 feet wide.

Black Hills gold appears to be more valuable than the average; it runs from nineteen dollars and a half to twenty dollars an ounce, and a man who can rock out $5.00 a day can sluice $25.00. Gold has been prospected for and found in a space of country 150 miles long north and south, by 80 miles wide east and west, all in the Territory of Dakota.

Gold bearing quartz has been found near Hill City, near Custer City, and in Palmer's Gulch. It is claimed that there is rich quartz in the northern part of the hills. All the miners have great faith in the richness of the northern region. There is snow there now, but there has been but little snow in the region I have described. The hills are covered with timber, and the most of it is white pine, and will compare well with that of Michigan and Wisconsin.

Regarding J. B. Pearson's claim to have been the discoverer of gold at Deadwood Gulch, confirmation is furnished in Mrs. Tallent's Black Hills History. In her chapter giving an account of the first discovery of placer gold in the northern hills, we find this reference to the pioneer party:

Frank Bryant, with a party of six others, namely, John Pearson, Thos. Moon, Richard Lowe, James Peirman, Samuel Blodgett, and George Hauser, seven in all, arrived in the hills from some Missouri River point, in August, 1875, making their first camp at Spring Valley, on their way to the northern hills, their objective point. The party did its first prospecting on a small tributary of Elk Creek, with unpromising results. Frank Bryant was the possessor of a small map, furnished him before starting by Tom Labarge, Charley DeGray, and Lephiere Narcouer (probably Zephier Rencontre, the well known Yankton half-breed, who was the original owner of the townsite of old Bon Homme), all old employees of the American Fur Company, which served the party as a guide to their objective point.

The second place prospected by the Bryant party was at the mouth of Spruce Gulch on what was called on their map, the Chaw-Skaw-Skaw-Walkapalla (afterwards named White-wood Creek), a beautiful stream of clear water, running then about two hundred miners' inches, where was found good prospects on the surface gravel. Fortunately, having a saw in their outfit they whipped out enough lumber to construct eight boxes, twelve feet long each, and commenced sluicing, but not being wholly satisfied with the results of the experiment, they soon began to look around for richer diggings. This party built, at the mouth of Spruce Gulch, the first cabin in the northern hills.

One of the party, Sam Blodgett, who had, while hunting, come upon a gulch which to him looked favorable, after reporting the same to the other members of the party, returned to the gulch with John Pearson to see what could be found, and the first dirt panned by them was taken from the point of the bar, on which now stands the Deadwood High School building. Other bars, for a distance of three hundred or four hundred yards up the creek were also prospected, but as nothing encouraging was found, no locations were made. The places last prospected were on what was later called "Deadwood Gulch." Thus, as far as known, was the first prospecting done on Deadwood Gulch.

About the middle of September (1875) the party left their works on the Whitewood on a fruitless search for richer diggings. Turning their faces toward Terry Peak, they prospected on the way.

After some time spent in prospecting in this locality, the party appears to have become discouraged, and broke up, and nearly all of them abandoned further prospecting and left the hills, at least temporarily, Pearson and Bryant going to Fort Laramie; where the "gold fever" appears to have again attacked them, and they both returned, late in October, Pearson ostensibly going to the southern hills and Bryant to the northern, where he reoccupied the cabin, with W. H. Coder and William Cudney, that had been built by his party earlier in the season. These parties made a placer claim at this point, and posted notices.

Mrs. Tallent's account continues with this reference to further pioneer operations in the northern hills in 1875-76.

J. B. Pearson later went to the northern hills with the Lardner party, and was among the first locaters on Deadwood Gulch, where he continued placer mining until some time in 1876, when, it is alleged, he commenced the erection of the second stamp mill in that vicinity, which was put in operation in April, 1877, operating for the most part on ore from the Black Tail mine, which he had located. He operated his twenty stamp mill for about three years, when he disposed of his property and prospected for a time in the southern hills. In 1883 he became engineer of the DeSmet mill at Central City. Mr. Pearson located what was known as the Giant and Old Abe mines, now the property of the Homestake Company, on December 11, 1875. These are believed to be the earliest quartz mines located in the hills.

It was circumstantially reported in the Deadwood News in October, 1880, that the honor of discovering Deadwood Gulch probably belongs to Dan Meekles, who with a party of seven were sluicing on Castle Creek. This party had packed an old wagon box, in small pieces, of which they had made a sluice box and had undergone great hardships to reach Castle Creek, and after three days' hard work had cleaned up $3.10. Discouraged, they were thinking of returning, when Meekles came into camp and announced that he had discovered a gulch where he could get 50 cents to the pan. The party, loath to believe him, thought they would look it up, and after several days of wandering brought up near the base of Bald Mountain. Going up near the summit at Terraville, they got a view of the surrounding country and going down Deadwood Gulch they camped near where Gayville was to be. Bill Gay panned out the first panfull of dirt and got 50 cents; others tried it with equal success. Convinced that they had struck it, they started in to build a cabin—the first ever built in the gulch. They named it Deadwood Gulch on account of the immense amount of dead timber which filled the gulch. The names of this party were Dan Meekles, J. B. Pearson, Joe Ingoldsby, Wm. Gay, Wm. Laudner, Ed McKay, James Mayer, Harry Gamble, and old man Haggart. They had saddle and pack animals, some tools and a little stock of provisions. Elk and deer were abundant and they had all the meat they wanted. They arrived at Deadwood Gulch November 6, 1875, and the same day staked off their claims, 300 feet long, up and down the gulch, and as wide as the gulch. In a few days they were joined by a party who had wandered around the western part of the hills. This party was from Montana, and had camped where Spearfish City stands. Nearly all of them were delighted with the country and declared that they had found the "El Dorado" and of course, some of whom, R. H. Evans, picked out a ranch and declared he would quit mining and go to farming. Mr. Evans kept his word, for after mining and prospecting for many years, he located a ranch one mile below Spearfish, and became one of the most successful grangers in the country. Shown a treacherous world in a whipsaw, and got out lumber which he sold for $150 a thousand feet.

ulation increased rapidly, and in December, at a meeting held on the 9th, the district was named the Lost Mining District, and William Laudner was elected recorder. In January, 1876, quartz locations were made. The first one was called the Giant; and the quartz district was named Whitewood.

MEMORIAL AND ORGANIZATION

Indicating the orderly and intelligent sentiment of the pioneers of the Black Hills, Independence Day was observed in an appropriate manner at Deadwood, in 1876, and one prominent feature of the proceedings was the adoption of a memorial to Congress urging the extinguishment of the Indian title to the country, and making an exhibit of the population of the country and its varied resources, as follows:

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

Your memorialists, citizens of that portion of the Territory of Dakota known as the Black Hills, most respectfully petition your honorable body for speedy and prompt action in extinguishing the Indian title to and the opening to settlement of the country we are now occupying, developing and improving. We have now in the hills a population of at least seven thousand honest and loyal citizens, who have come here with the expectation of remaining and making this their homes. Our country is rich not only in mineral resources, but is abundantly supplied with timber, and a soil rich enough to produce all that will be necessary to sustain a large population. Your memorialists would therefore earnestly request that we be not deprived of the fruits of our labor and driven from the country we now occupy, but that the Government, for which we have offered our lives, at once extend a protecting arm and take us under its care. And as in duty bound your memorialists will ever pray.

Dated Deadwood, D. T., July 4, 1876.

The memorial was subsequently signed by a large number and forwarded to Washington.

A few weeks later an effort was made to induce the governor of the territory to organize county governments in the hills. Deeming the matter of great importance the governor referred the subject to the secretary of the interior at Washington, and received the following reply:

Department of the Interior, Washington, August 24, 1876.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated the 16th inst., enclosing one to you from Mr. A. H. Simonton, dated at Deadwood in the Black Hills country, who suggests the propriety of organizing county governments in that section of Dakota Territory; and to state in reply that in the judgment of this department no such governments can be legally established in that country. The white inhabitants of the Black Hills are there not only without authority of law, but in actual violation of law, and so long as that section of country is set apart as an Indian reservation, it would be manifestly improper and unlawful to authorize the setting up therein of any form of civil government for citizens of the United States.

I am sir, etc.,

CHAS. F. GORHAM, Acting Secretary.

CHAPTER LXXII

DELEGATE KIDDER'S ZEAL HASTENS THE TREATY

1876

DELEGATE KIDDER'S GREAT BLACK HILLS ADDRESS IN CONGRESS, JUNE, 1876—KIDDER'S IMPORTANT ACTION IN SECURING THE OPENING OF THE HILLS.

In the House of Representatives, June 29, 1876, the House having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2417), to declare the Black Hills in the Territory of Dakota open to exploration and settlement, to secure the right of way thereto and for other purposes, Mr. Kidder, delegate from the Territory of Dakota, said:

Mr. Speaker: On the 28th day of February last, I introduced the following bill.

Be it Enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all that portion of country in the Territory of Dakota, lying between the forty-third and forty-sixth degrees of north latitude, and the 102d degree of west longitude and the west boundary of the Territory of Dakota, is hereby declared to be open for exploration and settlement; and the true intent and meaning of the treaty with the Sioux Indians, concluded April 29th, 1868, is declared to be that men and women are not excluded thereby from traveling over, exploring, or settling upon any portion of said territory included within said boundaries.

Sec. 2. That it shall be lawful for any persons to travel upon, over, or through, on foot or otherwise, any Indian reservation in said territory, for the purpose of arriving at, going to, or reaching any point or place within the boundaries aforesaid, and returning therefrom in the same manner.

Statement of Facts.—The area of the Sioux reservation in Dakota, including addition, is 56,972 square miles, or 35,866,680 acres. The area of that portion of this reservation lying west of the 102d degree of west longitude, which includes the Black Hills is 30,430 square miles, which will leave, after this portion is opened for settlement, as a reservation 25,436 square miles, or 16,276,040 acres. More than one-third of the entire Territory of Dakota is now included in this reservation.

The number of Indian parties to this treaty, as reported by the several agents is, men, women and children, 39,391. If these lands had been assigned to these Indians in severalty, each Indian, squaw and pappoose would have had a title to more than eight hundred and eighty-eight acres. Take from this reservation 30,430 square miles, what this bill calls for, and then there will be reserved for each man, woman and child over four hundred and eighty-two acres; when a white man, including his family, is entitled only to 160 acres, only by pre-emption, homestead and timber culture, to 480. Pass this bill and there will be reserved Indian, estimating six in each family, more than five times as much as we are severally entitled to.

Our Government agreed to subsist these Indians, by stipulation in the treaty four years, but since the expiration of that time (1873), it has continued to feed them until the time of the making of the report of the secretary of the interior for 1875 it had expended for that purpose $3,395,000. The treaty was never approved by Congress.

The statute which authorized the making of the treaty (chapter 25, Statutes at Large, 17, section 2), reads as follows:

"The commissioners are required to select a district of country for the Indians, when so selected and the selection approved by Congress, shall be a district reserved as homes for said Indians," etc.

The treaty was not before the House. The House never made reference to it. It was ratified by the Senate only, and therefore not approved by Congress. The act authorizing the commission to treat with the Indians required it to be approved by Congress, so-called treaty did not become a law.

Authorities in point.—1. A treaty, under the Constitution, is declared to be the supreme law of the land. This, unquestionably applies to all treaties wherever the treaty-making power, without the aid of Congress, can carry it into effect. Until this power is exercised, as where the appropriation of money is required, the treaty is not perfect. This results from the limitations of our Government. The action of no department of government can be regarded as law until it shall have all the sanctions required by the Constitution to make it such. As well might it be contended that an ordinary act of Congress, without the signature of the President was a law (vide 7th circuit of Michigan, 1852, Turner vs. American Baptist Missionary Union, 5 McLain, page 344).

Congress may repeal a treaty (first circuit of Massachusetts, 1855, Taylor vs. Morton, 2 Curtis, Circuit Court, page 454; 2 Black, page 486. An act of Congress can abrogate a treaty provided the subject matter is within the legislative power of Congress (United States vs. Tobacco Factory, 1 Dill).

This treaty then not having been approved by Congress, the House not having acted upon it, is not only voidable but void, and is not binding upon either party, and before I close these remarks I will try to satisfy you sir, that the Indians, allowing their acts to demonstrate their meaning, so regarded it. The authorities on this point are all one way. None can be found contravening the doctrine here laid down.

Again as to the title of the Indians to their reservations. The right of Indians in their land is that of occupancy alone. Possession, when abandoned, attaches itself to the fee without further grant (19 Wallace, U. S. vs. Cook, page 591). The fee is in the United States; this is the title by which they hold their lands. It was so decided by the Supreme Court as early as 1823, in Johnson vs. McIntosh, S. Wheaton, page 574. The authority of this case has never been doubted.

The last point made in relation to the title of the Indians to their lands is not presented to sustain the doctrine in this case that the Indians have abandoned the reservations, because the facts will not sustain it. They have not, in accordance with legal technicality, abandoned it, but the truth is they have never occupied the Black Hills part of it for any purpose whatever, and are now only standing guard at the portal thereof like the "dog in the manger," except that they may also satiate their blood-thirsty appetites in the warm gushing gore of inoffensive victims. This point is presented to show that the equities in this regard are all in the United States. The stipulations of the treaty have been broken on the part of the savages; we are therefore under no obligations to support them or not to occupy this reservation.

For the sake of the argument only we will admit that the treaty was ratified according to law, and is binding upon the parties, and insist that it has been broken by the acts of the Indians in such a way that our Government is in no way under the least obligation to respect it, and it should be regarded by us as null and void.

I purpose now to ventilate this view of the question and inquire—have the Indians lived up to the obligations of the treaty on their part? By article 11, among other things, the Indians agreed that "they will not attack any person at home or traveling, nor molest nor disturb any wagon trains, coaches, mules or cattle, of other persons; that they will not attempt to harm white persons, etc."

We are told by persons who boast of their Christian philanthropy and transcendent love for the Indian, that all of our troubles with these people, the robberies, murders they commit upon the whites, are the legitimate result of our tyranny and oppression of them. How convenient for philanthropic purposes and the advancement of human efforts to benefit these Indians, whether pretended or real, practical or impractical, this may be in excusing the barbarities of the savages, it lacks the essential quality of truth to sustain it, while it tends to engender a false and sickly sympathy in behalf of the Indian race and a prejudice toward our own.

No reliance can be placed in the plighted faith of the North American Indian until he has become civilized and enlightened. The fictions of Cooper and Longfellow have no existence in fact; they are purely imaginary and meretricious. This want of fidelity is shown by their utter disregard of their treaty stipulations and in all their dealings with the white man. See what our Government has done for them, as I have before stated, by way of furnishing the subsistence. What have they done in return? From the day they fixed their cross to this treaty hitherto they have been engaged in predatory raids upon our frontier, robbing and murdering the white settlers, sparing neither age, nor sex, nor conditions in life, committing "such hellish torture as can only be suggested by savage lust." Hundreds, yes, I may with truthfulness say thousands, if we could ever arrive at the facts, of our western frontier settlers, whom this Government of ours is bound to protect, have fallen victims to the frightful forays of these barbarians. Human life and property have not been secure from the midnight incursions, the fatal rifle shot, the tomahawk and scalping knife. More than two hundred American citizens, we know, while employed in lawful pursuits in the Northwest, and on ceded lands, too, have been murdered by the Sioux within the last seven years, and before the attempted occupation of the Black Hills by the whites. Miners, wood-choppers, steamboat men and others, have been ruthlessly murdered by them while in the quiet pursuit of their legitimate business, and our Government at the same time expending millions of dollars annually for the support of these same Sioux, without consideration therefor or expecting to be benefited thereby. In view of these facts (and strange and horrible as it may appear, it is our frontier story. I ask, what kind of a story, if any, have they upon us? I have lived upon the frontier about twenty years, and I have had an opportunity to know as much by ocular observation as a man could possibly have crossed, going westward, the Hudson or Mississippi rivers. To-day, Sitting Bull, and his associate chiefs, who were parties to this treaty, with their two warriors, from each of the bands, holds on the Yellowstone and Powder rivers, hundreds of miles from the nearest white man, shake their bloody girdles of white men's scalps, on some of which the Indians have been not yet coagulated, in the faces of your officers, and bid defiance to your laws and your authority.

Specifications against the Sioux. In 1870 fifteen men were murdered by them, below on the Missouri River just below Fort Peck. The steamer Key West was on the 22nd of these waters in 1871, was fired into and the clerk was shot through the body. Ten men were murdered by them near the present site of Carroll, on the Missouri. Near Fort Lincoln, coln. Bismarck and Fort Berthold, annually since 1868, many white men have been killed by them, and in all over twenty nine. In 1873, above and near Fort Rice, seven men were slain by them. In the fall and winter of 1874-5, thirteen men were killed, a Sitting Bull's party on the Yellowstone River. In Judith Basin twenty-four men were murdered by the Sioux between the years 1870 and 1875. Within the time last named more than one hundred persons have been killed by them on the North Platte and north of it, on the Pacific Railroad, while all along the Missouri down as far as Running Water, where men have been killed by Indians nearly every year. The steamers navigating the Missouri River have been fired into every year since 1864 by the Sioux lying in ambush, and the men have often been killed and wounded. No less than five boats carrying Government supplies on the upper Missouri were fired into in 1871 and several of the crew were killed and many wounded. A year has not passed since this treaty was made that they have not fired into the steamers navigating this river.

Now, sir, I ask anyone to point out to me a rational cause, an excuse even, for the perpetration of these cowardly crimes, and then long and loud denunciation of the white man's inhumanity towards the Indians, and of the eulogies heaped upon the transcendental virtues and fidelity of these robbers and murderers. Again, the Government has paid to various parties since the conclusion of this treaty, on account of the depredations of these Indians on the property of our fellow citizens, the sum of $15,130 24, and it ought to have paid millions of dollars for this purpose, and that sum would not liquidate their indebtedness to us in this respect.

They have never attempted to utilize the country known as Black Hills; never hunted or fished therein, and had it not been for the restless mental activity of our citizens, which is ever seeking unexplored fields in science as well as in geography, and which gave to us the priceless treasures of California and the west coast, the silver of Nevada and Colorado, and acres of Texas, and developed in the Black Hills country golden treasures, these graceless paupers of the nation never would have dreamed of going into it. To them it had no attractions until the white man came and gave to them, in easy plunder, the value of their decorations bleeding scalps, and well have they availed themselves of this opportunity. And yet, sir, this race, these Indians, we have always carefully protected, sheltered, fed; nay, more, invited here to this city, made them the guests of our government, and honored them in as ostentatious a manner as we have ever done to representatives of nations equal to us in all that makes a nation great, "industry and enterprise," made them honored guests, while at their waists hung the scalps of our killed and wounded pioneers who felled the forests, bridged the streams and developed a vast territory, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois; yes, the entire grand West.

Sad to say, we are to have the perpetual heritage of a race devoted to all sorts of crime, principle; senseless to any animation of joy except springing from an act of cruelty, redolent with blood and echoing with the agonized cry of a tortured victim. We are to have the "noble men of the forest," whom we are to pray for, pray for forever while they live, and orphans they make annually, weep, and starve, and die.

Sir, in the face of this and more so horrible that it cannot be spoken, and which is whispered among those who know of their atrocities, I would like to know if there is any obligation, legally or morally, in justice or equity, whereby the full career we owe to God and our country, requires us to adhere to the treaty stipulations. Would I wish to suffer, unless compelled vis et armis, from any nation such treatment, or any other? If a treaty did exist, who suffers from its violations? Most certainly the party who violate it. When the pirates from Tripoli outraged our commerce on the sea, and our flag was insulted not a moment, and demanded and received retribution. Nay, we have no sympathy, born in false teachings, toward him, and therefore we would that they must be taught to know that the pioneers of our country are not to be deceived by wrong from field and forest, blessed by law, and withal, by the sacred rights of the white man, by the yell, tomahawk and shot of the enemy, withal, by the rights of the white man.

Now, sir, these atrocities, depredations and robberies, are not the work of a few nomads of the Indians, but were instigated by the principal chiefs of the various tribes, many of whom have been received into the city of Washington's national hospitality. These chiefs are not ignorant of the laws of the United States, but were conscious that they could not be detected, and therefore they enable them to escape punishment. Need I allude to the instances where conviction and sentence to death have been pardoned by appeal to the executive by those striving to do right, have erred mightily. With these facts before us can any man say they have lived up to their treaty stipulations? No sir. Treaty or no treaty, we shall ever continue to take care of them. The Divine Master said to his chosen apostles: "The poor I leave with you." He must have meant, as to the United States, "Lo, the poor I leave with you as a perpetual heritage." The Black Hills are of no use to them, as I have said before, neither as a hunting or fishing country; but to us, in the west particularly, and to the entire nation, of incalculable value. Opened up by our hardy and industrious people, soon a populous country will be known, and in a shorter space of time than Colorado, with her acknowledged wealth, will come a new state, to add light and beauty to the glorious constellation of states.

Pass this bill and you invite to a healthy, salubrious and fertile country the masses who are dying for want of space in your beautiful cities; deny it and you simply put blocks in front of the "car which westward takes its course." Pass it and you benefit the Indian in spite of himself, for then each one will possess in spite of himself more land than he can occupy and enjoy. Doing justice to our white settlers, to our anxious emigrant, to thousands in the Old World who want to come to our free land, will benefit them and in time it is to be hoped, remove them from "in puris naturalibus" condition to one where the Christian friends who are anxious to help them may hope of success.

The present status of the Black Hills.—That gold is in the Black Hills pioneers have known for more than thirty years. The geological survey of Professor Hayden over ten years ago established that fact. The explorations of Professor Jenney in 1875 were sufficiently thorough to establish beyond a doubt that valuable gold fields exist there. Within the last six months citizens of my territory have gone there comparatively poor, and have returned well off. That more than one hundred thousand dollars worth of gold dust has been taken out of these hills by the people of Dakota alone, been brought home and there sold, is a fact of which I have personal knowledge.

The sentiment which is founded on the great popular idea of inalienable rights, inherent in the bosom of every man who has felled the forests and peopled the plains from one ocean to the other, attempted to open the Black Hills in 1874 and 1875. Squads of men were there inoffensively, quietly, taking the auriferous metal from the "auriferous gulches which furrow its mountain slopes." Whereupon a military order was issued to "put out" these men therefrom, and as they were seemingly slow in getting out, many of them were arrested, confined in military prisons and other bastiles for months, and in numerous instances their wagons and subsistence destroyed by fire. Such acts on the part of those who consummated them were without authority of law, and an outrage upon the rights of peaceful citizens.

But since the explorations of Professor Jenney, and within a few months, the Black Hills have become occupied by a large population of the bone and sinew, the bold and hardy yeomanry of our country. It is estimated that there are at least eight thousand men there pursuing the even tenor of their way, tilling the soil, planting crops, fencing their lands, building houses, making homes for the beloved ones left behind them, and who are anxiously waiting for the blissful moment of reunion with their brave husbands and fathers, and until recently without any interference from our Government. But the Indians wanting new relays for their girdles, and in strict accordance with their custom for the last hundred years, were continually murdering innocent men, women and children, outside of their reservation in the Territory of Wyoming and elsewhere, and committing such nameless crimes the contemplation of which makes humanity's warm life-blood congeal at its source and stand still in its fastnesses, caused this order to emanate:

Headquarters Army, Washington, D. C., May 26, 1876.

I have just been to the President with Governor Thayer. After reading the papers and some discussion, the President said the people who had gone to the Black Hills of Dakota, inside the Sioux Reservation, or who may hereafter go there, are there wrongfully, and they should be notified of the fact; but the Government is engaged in certain measures that will probably result in opening up the country to occupation and settlement. In the meantime the Indians should not be allowed to scalp and kill anybody, and you are authorized to afford protection to all persons who are conveying food and stores for the people already there. I understand that arrangements are now in progress with Red Cloud and Spotted Tail to treat, and meantime the agency Indians should be kept near the agencies. If satisfactory arrangements are not concluded, the new order will be made as to whites who have intruded on the Sioux Reservation.

W. T. SHERMAN, General.

About four weeks ago the United States Indian agent at the Cheyenne Indian Agency on the Missouri River addressed a letter to the honorable commissioner of Indian affairs, stating that three friendly Indians had been killed by men going to the Black Hills over the Fort Pierre route, and that an Indian war was inevitable if travel thereon was not interrupted. Thereupon the following order was issued:

St. Paul, Minn., June 2, 1876.

To the Commanding Officer at Fort Sully, D. T.:

In compliance with instructions from the general of the army, just received from the lieutenant-general, you are directed to take such steps as will prevent emigrants from going to the Black Hills over the Fort Pierre route, and you are further directed to use the troops at your command to enforce these instructions to the best of your ability.

By command of GENERAL FERRY,
REGGLES, Acting Adjutant-General.

Pursuant to which order the commanding officer at Fort Sully stopped all provision trains and men en route for the Black Hills, and forbade their crossing the river there. In a short time hundreds of tons of freight were landed there destined for the gold region, and hundreds of men in charge of the same, but were detained or turned back by the military authorities. This fact being made known to the Government, this order was issued:

Headquarters Army, Washington, D. C., June 8, 1876.

General P. H. Sheridan, Chicago, Illinois:

Judge Kidder, of Dakota, represents that there are about one hundred tons of provisions at Fort Pierre, ready for the Black Hills, and that the commanding officer forbids their going. We have just seen the President, who consents that these provisions may be hauled out, but that no escort can be given. You may instruct accordingly.

The commanding officer should see that the parties who go out with the train are armed and prepared to defend the train and to prevent its falling into the hands of hostile Indians. Judge Kidder has been very zealous in this matter in the interest of his territory.

W. T. SHEPMAN.

The commanding officer of Fort Sully being "hard of hearing," or very slow, or not knowing the order was issued, had not, up to the 20th of June, permitted the provisions to be hauled out, when forbearance ceasing to be a virtue, an order enlarging his instructions was issued in these words:

Headquarters of the Army, Washington, June 20th, 1876.

General Philip H. Sheridan, commanding Division of Missouri, Chicago, Ill.:

In regard to the route to the Black Hills from Fort Pierre, you may instruct that well organized trains may go out and return with provisions, but they can have no military escort. The trains must take their own risk. Instruct the officers accordingly.

W. T. SHEPMAN, General.

Of the result of this order I am not informed. Newspapers inform us that—"We have good evidence that the route to Custer City from Cheyenne is now guarded against Indian depredations by Companies K of the Third Infantry, and H of the Twenty-third Infantry, and that General Sheridan was promised adequate military guard for the Sidney route. We have also good evidence that Captain Tolman's company of the First Infantry is now patrolling the Missouri River in the vicinity of Fort Pierre for the purpose of preventing all travel from Southern Dakota to the hills."

Colonel Townsend, commanding Fort Laramie, announces, among other things that—

"Two companies of cavalry will constantly patrol the road between this post and Custer City for the protection of travelers."

It appears then, relying upon these orders and this information, that there is only one ingress and egress to the Black Hills, and that is by the way of the Union Pacific Railroad. In connection with these facts I desire to state another, that to get to the Black Hills from Fort Pierre via the Union Pacific Railroad the emigrants at Fort Pierre will have to travel over one thousand miles farther than to go direct from there, it being from Fort Pierre only 150 miles to Custer City. Chicago is over three hundred miles nearer the Black Hills via Yankton, Dakota, than it is by way of Cheyenne, Wyoming, and the road through the former territory is very much better. This extra distance then, in order to enjoy the lovely scenery of the gold-bearing hills and the ecstasy of anticipated riches, must be traveled over not only by the good people of Dakota, but by the people of Minnesota, Wisconsin, and other states east of the Missouri River and north of the red parallel.

This I call an outrage upon these people too envious to be borne. We are willing to submit to any general order controlling alike the people on both sides of the Black Hills. We are willing to be excluded from them if all are, but we cannot consent to be excluded ourselves, belittle our intelligence, and smother the inherent right of man to travel, which is implanted in the bosom of every man by him who from the beginning set the scales of justice in equipoise, by remaining silent or passive when a wrong has been perpetrated in a manner that is known to a gazing world.

The Fort Pierre route should be opened at once or the Cheyenne route should be closed. This would be meeting out even handed justice. The closing of this route and the protection of the route from Cheyenne and Fort Laramie by the military, is such an exhibition of favoritism in favor of the latter routes, and the injustice is so flagrant that the people of Dakota feel that they have a right to speak in language that will not be misunderstood, and demand that justice be done them by being placed upon an equality with those residing south and west of the Black Hills.

Only one way to get into the Black Hills? I have been taught to believe that I can start from any place and go to any other place in the world. But I give that up now. One is obliged to start either at Cheyenne, Sidney or Fort Laramie to get into the Black Hills.

It has now transpired that three Indians were not killed, or any Indians, in the vicinity of Fort Pierre, or any Indians east of the Black Hills, by persons going there, as stated to the commissioner of Indian affairs by the Cheyenne agent, and that the agent was misinformed in relation thereto, or he wilfully wrote to the commissioner what was not true, which latter I hesitate to believe. But, believing in the good intentions of those who administer this Government, and their desire to strictly mete out justice to all, I do not hesitate to say that I believe, when the facts in this regard are known to them as I know them, that the order closing the Fort Pierre route will be revoked, or another made closing those from the Union Pacific Railroad. With either we shall be content.

To the unsophisticated these last remarks of mine might seem to be "aliunde," and not pertinent to the issue, but when it is understood that all the facts which surround this reservation should be properly considered before coming to a determination in the premises, and that Dakotans and others east of us who have traveled that way have not only had a fire in front but a fire in the rear, it is a matter of absolute necessity, in order to have ample justice done to us, to state the whole case as it really exists, "without fear, favor or affection."

Results on the Passage of the Bill.—A bill has recently passed the Senate "providing for an agreement with the Sioux Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purposes," which has been transmitted to this House and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, "that bourne whence" it takes a long while to get back, a la other committees. As a dernier resort I am in favor of this Senate bill, but it will take a long while, if it passes this session, to be of any utility to us, as the commissioners authorized thereby cannot report a treaty for want of time until the next session of Congress; and therefore it will be nearly a year before we can reap any benefit therefrom.

We are told to wait until a different policy or a new treaty may enable these Indians to quietly vacate this valuable country; but Young America never waits. It is not the nature of the people of these United States to hesitate to strike the blow while the iron is hot. Remove this dusky cloud title from a portion of the reservation, and thousands of emigrants will flock there annually, not simply as gold-hunters, but as farmers and tillers of the soil. The climate is temperate and salubrious; the soil is rich; forests abound, and the country is well supplied with small streams abounding in fish. There is no portion of the country that presents so many attractions for the emigrant as this bill proposes to open. The passage of this bill will do the Indians no harm, but will greatly advantage the hardy, whole-souled, generous-hearted pioneers. Pass this bill and this rich country is open for exploration and settlement at once, and gives homes to thousands of the homeless. The interests of humanity demand its passage. It will stop the shedding of innocent blood. Men and women will earn their daily bread in quiet, and after the labors of the day lay down to sleep without fear of being awakened by the yell of the bloodthirsty savage or the glare of the midnight conflagration. The sword will be turned into the plowshare, and "the song of the turtle will be heard in the land."

Christianity demands that these lands shall be occupied and possessed by those who believe in protecting one another, instead of those who only delight in slaying pale-faces. The American people, yes, the civilized world, is tired of this sentimental policy for the "poor Indian," which has almost made a continuous graveyard from the Ohio River to the Pacific Ocean.

The time has arrived when the people are not to be deceived by well-rounded sentences, poetical effusions, or charming fictions. Desolated homes, thousands of widows and orphans cry out that these murderers must leave these lands to the quiet possession of those who are able and willing to assist the earth in giving forth its increase, and establishing homes where they can enjoy the sweet comfort of peace and family, and where "the wicked Indian will cease from troubling and the weary laborer reap the rich rewards of his toil in the possession of a secure home and contented family."

During these anxious days when the President and Congress were endeavoring to discover some method by which they could facilitate the opening of the Black Hills to white settlement, it is authentically related that the delegate from the Territory of Dakota, Judge Kidder, called upon President Grant, and asked him if there was no possible way for him to use his executive authority to get the coveted country thrown open to white occupation. Grant knew of no way, but strongly hinted to Kidder if he could get him authority to appoint commissioners to negotiate with the Indians, and money enough to pay them, he would appoint the commissioners immediately and as speedily as possible make terms with the Indians. The session was drawing to a close. During the last hours at midnight a conference committee upon an appropriation bill was in session. Kidder hurried to and fro through the capitol with an amendment in his hand to go into this appropriation bill. He found the committee just as they were ready to close their report, and tired and exhausted as they were, the good nature of the delegate proved successful in getting their consent to put in his amendment. It authorized the President to appoint commissioners to visit the Sioux country, negotiate with the Indians, and make an appropriation to defray expenses. The amendment was substantially the provision of law which governed in the making of the agreement with the Sioux for the Black Hills, in 1876. The bill passed Congress during August, and in September and October the important agreement was made by which the Indians relinquished all claims to the hills country.

TERRITORY EXPEDITION—CUSTER MASSACRE

The Indian Expedition of 1876 that terminated in the Custer massacre rendezvoused at Fort Abraham Lincoln, Dakota Territory, under the immediate command of Brig. Gen. Alfred H. Terry (who was also in command of the Department of Dakota), about the first of May of that year. The force consisted of the Seventh United States Cavalry under the command of Gen. George A. Custer; three companies of the Seventeenth Infantry; four companies of the Sixth Infantry, together with a Gatling battery. Its objective point was the Valley of the Yellowstone and its tributaries wherever he might find the large body of hostile Indians who were known to be gathering near the mouth of Powder River, a tributary of the Yellowstone, in strong force, led by Sitting Bull, Crazy Horse, Bald Eagle, and other hostile chiefs; the numbers of their following being roughly estimated at from five thousand to seven thousand, which probably included women and children. Many young Indians from the upper agencies, professedly friendly and drawing supplies from the Government, were known to be absent from their reservations, and it was conjectured upon reliable indications that they had secretly joined the hostiles for this campaign. Sitting Bull subsequently gave out the statement that the gathering had no hostile signification; that it was simply in conformity to a custom observed by the Sioux who held these annual assemblies for social purposes in order that the young men and young women of the nation might have an opportunity for becoming acquainted with one another, with matrimonial alliances as the chief purpose in view, together with the many pleasures to be enjoyed on such vernal occasions.

The expedition under Terry was one of three to take part in the summer's work, which was planned on a comprehensive scale with the design of ending Indian hostilities in the Northwest.

The steamboat Far West, Capt. Grant Marsh with Clerk Walter A. Burleigh, Jr., son of the distinguished Dakotan, that was to play an important part in the summer's Indian campaign, left its harbor at Yankton, on the 16th of May, 1876, carrying 280 tons of freight. The boat had been selected as General Terry's flagship and was destined for the Yellowstone River as far up as the mouth of the Big Horn, and possibly some distance above. Marsh had been selected for the command because of his experience, his knowledge of the Yellowstone Channel, his courage and trustworthy qualities that fitted him for the important position.

Terry's expedition got away from Fort Lincoln on the 17th of May. General Crook had engaged a portion of this hostile force near the forks of the Rosebud on the 16th of June, and reported the affair as of the most serious character. The Indians were well mounted, in large force, well armed with modern guns, and fought desperately, but could not be brought into a battle, pursuing their tactics of darting out on the troops from behind the natural defenses, which were abundant, and doing mortal injury to a number of soldiers whom they would find separated from the main body, as is usually the case in such affairs. In this series of fights Col. Guy Henry was dangerously wounded and Crook lost nine troopers killed and a much larger number wounded. He had with him about one hundred and thirty Crow and Shoshone scouts, who fought desperately with the Sioux and lost several of their number. It will be noticed that the Indian scouts serving with the Government forces, were none of them from the Sioux tribes, but were taken from tribes that were, and had always been, at war with the Sioux.

It appears from the terms of the Laramie Treaty, sometimes called the Sherman Treaty of 1868 that the Sioux Indians were given for their reservation all that part of the Territory of Dakota south of the Cannon Ball River, practically, and west of the Missouri River, and the Big Horn country in Wyoming and Montana guaranteed to their occupation to roam and hunt in; hence it may be claimed that Sitting Bull and his people were on their own ground, set apart for them by this treaty, when the battle of the Little Big Horn occurred. Sitting Bull claimed that such was the case.

Sitting Bull became famous in our Indian annals, as much so as Powhatan, Tecumseh, or Little Crow, and probably superior to them in intellect. He was a Dakotan born and bred, and a member of the Unkpapa tribe of Sioux or Dakota Nation. He was the most influential Indian leader of modern times, a chief among chiefs, and yet he was never a chief, as the Indians regard that dignity, but was the general of the armies of the Sioux nation—the commander in chief, and the implacable foe to civilization. He was willing that peace should prevail, the condition being that the white man must keep out of the Indian country, the terms of peace were so impracticable, that they amounted in effect to a prohibition of war upon all extension or advancement of white settlement and improvements in the West; and there is little doubt that the great majority of the Sioux shared his sentiments, but were unwilling, following the example of go to the length Sitting Bull required of his followers, to enforce his exclusion policy.

The hostiles who were fighting with Sitting Bull during this summer were said to represent every tribe of the Sioux nation, but not openly. The leading Indians of the southern tribes—the Ogalalas, Brules, Cheyennes and Lower Yanktonnais, were all opposed to hostilities; but they could not control their young men who, because of their Indian love for war and its excitement, secretly made their way to the hostile camps, joined in their forays, and would then return to their agencies, draw their rations, and be ready to repeat the offense. It was claimed that the hostile force in 1876, with Sitting Bull as their leader, constituted the most effective hostile Indian army ever assembled on American soil, and they were as well equipped for battle as were the regular soldiers, many of them being armed with Winchester rifles and needle guns. Sitting Bull's army, independent of the element surreptitiously furnished from the agency Indians, was made up of the hostiles enumerated in the report of General Stanley, given on a preceding page. They disowned all treaties. Sitting Bull was the leader of the force, though denying that he was a war chief.

On the 20th of June, five days before Custer's fatal battle, the hostiles, under Sitting Bull, were reported by General Crook's scouts "as thick as grass" on the south side of the Yellowstone River, near the mouth of the Rosebud River where Sitting Bull's forces were concentrating. They numbered, as near as could be estimated, between three and four thousand fighting men. General Gibbons' command was then encamped on the north side of the Yellowstone, opposite the Rosebud and within sight of the enemy. Gibbons had sent two companies across to attack the Indians, but the Sioux compelled them to return. General Terry's command was then within two or three days' march of Sitting Bull's rendezvous, and reached it on the 22d, but the Indians had then withdrawn up the Rosebud. General Crook at the time, the 20th, was near old Fort Fetterman, about eighty miles distant, on his way to the Rosebud. The plan of the campaign at this time seemed to promise the best of results to the Government.

On the 23d or 24th, Terry's forces from Fort Lincoln had all reached the mouth of the Rosebud, where the steamboat Far West was moored, and was held as headquarters of Terry's expedition. Custer led the first detachment of Terry's expedition composed of his entire regiment, the Seventh Cavalry, and was sent forward from this point, following up the Rosebud on the trail made by Sitting Bull on his departure a few days earlier. After Custer's departure, Terry moved the remainder of his command, accompanied by the Far West, up the Yellowstone to the mouth of the Big Horn; while Gibbons' command marched up on the north side and were ferried across to the south side, by the steamer Far West, the same evening. A camp, however, was established on the north side opposite the mouth of the Big Horn. From this point, General Terry dispatched his second column up the Big Horn, or up Tulloch's Creek, a tributary of the Big Horn and running nearly parallel with it, with the design of intercepting the Indians, or of supporting Custer, who was presumed to have come up with the hostiles, and had possibly engaged them. Terry, with the remainder of his force, marched up the Big Horn, with the view of intercepting the Indians. The Far West also ascended the Big Horn River as far as the mouth of the Little Big Horn, where agreeable to Terry's orders it tied up.

Custer's orders to his majors, just before he separated from them to engage in the fight which ended so disastrously, were substantially these:

Reno was ordered to proceed to the left, and proceed in search of the Indians—the orders were apparently indefinite. Reno's command consisted of three companies.

Benteen, with three companies, was ordered to the left, with similar instructions.

General Custer, with four companies, taking the center.

This disposition was made on the afternoon of June 25th, near the Little Big Horn and it would seem a few miles below where the battle occurred.

This was about the last reliable information from Custer.

Following the distribution of the troops and their departure, we next meet with Reno and his command, who had gone several miles in the direction ordered and meeting with no enemy, had set out on his return, when he reached a point supposed to be about two miles from the Custer battlefield, he met the Indians, who came with such force and fury that Reno was driven back to the shelter of the timber which, fortunately, was not far away. Here Reno made a stand and succeeded in holding his ground, though at considerable loss, until relieved the following day by General Gibbons. Reno in the meantime had been reinforced by the return of Benteen and his command, and then the rifle pits were hastily constructed, and the Indians kept at bay for about twenty-four hours, entailing, however, severe loss upon the troops.

It was early in this engagement of Reno's that the firing was said to be heard some distance away, down the Little Big Horn, and it was presumed that this firing proceeded from the Custer battlefield, and it was further presumed that if Reno had persisted, he could have reached the scene of carnage in time to have relieved Custer. But it also appears that the Indians whom Reno met in such force and fury were, many of them, those who had already been through the Custer engagement, and leaving it victors, had set out on their ponies to wreak a like atrocious slaughter upon the remaining detachments. From all accounts it is apparent that Sitting Bull had kept thoroughly informed of the disposition Custer had made of his forces, and planned, first, to destroy Custer, and then assail the Reno and Benteen detachments, which were widely separated.

It is further apparent that Sitting Bull was apprised of the proximity of Terry's "foot-soldiers," as he called them, and learning of their approach he abruptly changed his plans, and the order went out to the Indians to retreat and save themselves, which the wily medicine chief had already set about doing with much haste and disorder.

Regarding General Custer's movements with his regiment after leaving the main column of the Rosebud, the reader is referred to General Terry's official report, and more particularly to the testimony given in the court martial trial of Major Reno, one of Custer's majors, which is given in the concluding pages in this chapter.

The first intelligence concerning Custer's lamentable and tragic fate that reached the ears of white men, is related in Joseph Mills Hanson's interesting work entitled the "Conquest of the Missouri," based upon the statement of Capt. Grant Marsh, commander of the steamboat, Far West, which was lying at the mouth of the Little Big Horn, moored to the west bank. During the day of the 26th of June the captain and those on the boat were startled at seeing a naked Indian, armed, and mounted on a pony, crash through the bushes which fringed the east bank, and half dismounting and half falling from his animal gestured to be taken aboard. Captain Marsh recognized the Indian as Curley, one of Custer's Crow Scouts, and without delay complied with his request. The Indian was terribly agitated, and piteously weak from exhaustion. It was some time before he could attempt to speak, but moaned, cried, and threw himself upon the deck, mumbling his agony of grief in short Crow sentences. They could neither speak or understand a word of the English language. As Curley's becoming more composed, they drew from his gestures, rather than from one word that he pronounced which Marsh recognized, some sense that an awful calamity had fallen to the troops, and that the soldiers were defeated; which was all that Curley knew at the time, for he had been in the field while the fiercest of the slaughter was going on, and upon his return his statement made a little later and interpreted to him by Curley, who was in the field, and realizing that the white soldiers had been killed, he had fled to Custer and endeavored to persuade him to retreat, but he had been refused.

in which he could disguise himself, and his own pony, and urged him to save himself. Custer, however, refused to desert his troops, and Curley reluctantly left him, and made his own way to the mouth of the Little Big Horn where he found the steamboat, knowing nothing of its being there, it appeared; and was taken aboard, where by gesture, cries and groans, he related the disaster of the previous day.

It was claimed to be a rule among the Indians that they would not kill a scout of the opposing forces, but if caught as a spy, his punishment was death. This may have protected Curley from the Sioux on the battlefield, or he may have taken his chances of not being recognized in the maelstrom of slaughter then occurring when the hostiles were looking only for white foes and giving no attention to persons of their own race.

General Terry was the first to arrive at the Far West after Curley. He came on the 27th, bringing with him the wounded from Reno's command. Upon coming aboard, Terry's first words to the captain were, "This disaster should never have happened." He said no more; but the captain inferred that the original plan of the movement had not been followed, resulting in a terrible misfortune. The responsible parties were not named at this time nor later; but it seemed to be read between the lines of the official reports that temerity had cost a great sacrifice, suggesting that the plan of the movement against Sitting Bull had been frustrated and defeated by precipitate action.

The Custer massacre occurred the 25th. Terry reached the battle field on the 27th, rescued Reno's besieged forces; the Indians retiring on his approach with his "foot soldiers," and breaking up into small bands were able to escape to the west and south, Terry having no force to pursue. He buried the slain of Custer's force, and with fifty-one wounded men from Reno's battalion, borne on litters improvised, he made his way to the steamboat, placed his wounded aboard, and moved to the mouth of the Big Horn. Here, after a day's necessary delay, he dispatched the Far West with the wounded to Fort Lincoln, which carried also the official dispatches of the Custer tragedy. The boat reached Bismarck July 5th, and the first intelligence of the slaughter of Custer and his men was sent out to the world from the Bismarck office. The shocking intelligence created intense feeling throughout the nation. Custer was a favorite of the people. They had learned of his gallantry and courage during the Civil war, and regarded him with admiration due to a hero. He was one of the youngest, in years, of the country's general military commanders, and won his rapid promotion solely upon merit. His professional career had been a succession of victories; and his campaigns against the Indians, though brief, had demonstrated his ability in frontier warfare. He did not regard the Indians as a formidable enemy, and doubtless underestimated their prowess on the battle field, especially where their numbers were so far in excess of the troops as proved to be the case in this, his last battle.

TERRY'S OFFICIAL REPORT

The Custer tragedy occurred on the 25th of June. General Terry's official report furnishes the most reliable intelligence of the carnage, and is here given. It was dated near the battle field which Terry reached the day following the fight:

The reader is here referred to the subjoined official report, and to the testimony given at the inquiry of the military court subsequently held in Chicago, which appears near the close of this chapter, for the facts and incidents of Custer's command after its departure at the mouth of the Rosebud. In the Reno investigation will be found a statement of the march of Custer's column and the orders given by him to his subordinate officers previous to the battle of the Little Big Horn.

Headquarters Department of Dakota

Camp on Little Big Horn River, June 27, 1876.

To Adjutant-General Military Division Missouri, Chicago:

It is a painful duty to report that day before yesterday, the 25th inst., a great disaster overtook General Custer and the troops under his command. At 12 o'clock of the 25th he started with his whole regiment, and a strong detachment of scouts and guides, from the mouth of the Rosebud. Proceeding up that river about twenty miles he struck a very heavy Indian trail, which had previously been discovered, and pursuing it, he followed it, led, as it was supposed that it would lead, to the Little Big Horn River. Here he found a village of almost unexampled extent, and at once attacked it with that portion of his command which was immediately at hand.

Major Reno, with three companies, A, G and M, of the regiment was sent into the valley of the stream at the point where the trail strikes it. General Custer, with his companies, C, E, F, I and L, attempted to enter it about three miles lower down. Finding the river, charged down its left bank, dismounted and fought on foot, until finally, completely overwhelmed by numbers, he was compelled to mount and recross the river and seek a refuge in the high bluffs which overlooked its right bank.

Just as he recrossed the Little Big Horn, Benteen, who with three companies, D, H and K, was some two miles to the left of Reno when the action commenced, but who had been ordered by General Custer to return, came to the river, and rightly concluding it was useless for his force to attempt to renew the fight in the valley, he crossed the river, the bluffs. Captain McDougall, with his Company B, was at first at some distance in the rear with a train of pack mules. He also came up to Reno, and soon this united force was nearly surrounded by Indians, many of whom, armed with rifles, occupied positions which commanded the ground held by the cavalry, from which there was no escape. Rifle pits were dug and the fight was maintained, though with a heavy loss, from about 2 o'clock of the 25th till 6 o'clock of the 26th, when the Indians withdrew from the valley, taking with them their village.

Of the movement of General Custer and the five companies under his command, scarcely anything is known from those who witnessed them, for no officer or soldier who accompanied him has yet been found alive. His trail from the point where Major Reno crossed the stream passes along and in rear of the crest of the bluffs on the right bank for nearly or quite three miles; then it comes down to the bank of the river, but it once diverges from it, as if he had unsuccessfully attempted to cross; then turning nearly at almost completes a circle, and closes. It is marked by the remains of his horses, of men and the bodies of his horses. Some of them dropped along the path; others are found at intervals appear to have been made. There is abundant evidence that a gallant resistance was offered by the troops, but they were beset on all sides by overpowering numbers.

Mr. Bristol and Mr. Reed, a nephew of General Custer, were with him and were killed. No other officers than those whom I have named, are among the killed, wounded or missing. It is impossible as yet to obtain a reliable list of the enlisted men who were killed, including officers. It must reach 250; the number of wounded is fifty.

At the mouth of the Rosebud I informed General Custer that I should take the supply steamer Far West up the Yellowstone to ferry General Gibbons' column, and that I should personally accompany that column, and that it would in all probability reach the mouth of the Little Big Horn on the 26th inst.

The steamer reached General Gibbons' troops, near the mouth of the Rosebud, on the morning of the 26th, at 4 o'clock. In the afternoon at 5 o'clock all the pack animals were across the Yellowstone. The column, consisting of the Second Cavalry, Seventh Infantry, four companies of the Second Cavalry and a battery of the Second guns, marched out to and across Tullachi's Creek, starting on a march of thirty miles, reaching camp at midnight. The scouts discovered the Indian village, supposed to be Sioux, but when overtaken proved to be Cheyenne, who had been driven there. They brought the first intelligence of the battle. Their story was not credible, but was supposed that some severe fighting, perhaps, had taken place, but it was not until the 27th that Custer could have overtaken so large a force as twelve companies of Indians. The scouts had broken camp very early and soon came on and the whole column entered the valley of the Little Big Horn. During the afternoon march we were constantly looking through to what was supposed to be General Custer's position, but the distance and the condition of affairs, but those who were sent out were driven back. The scouts, who, increasing their numbers, were sent in to General Custer's position, but they were driven back.

At 8.40 o'clock on that evening the column had marched twenty miles, and was thirty miles. The men were very weary, and the horses were exhausted. The column halted for the night at a point eleven miles from the battle. In the morning the movement was resumed, and at 10 o'clock the column reached the entrenched position which was reached.

The withdrawal of the Indians from the Little Big Horn, and the retreat of the column was undoubtedly caused by the appearance of the column of the Far West.

Captain Benteen, both of whom are officers of great experience, accustomed to see large masses of mounted men, estimated the number of Indians engaged at not less than twenty-five hundred. The officers known to be killed are General Custer, Captains Keogh, Gates and Custer, Lieutenants Cook, Smith, McIntosh, Calhoun, Porter, Hodgson, Sturgis and Reiley, of the cavalry; Lieut. John J. Crittenden of the Twentieth Infantry, and Civilians Boston, Custer, Arthur, Reed, Mark Kellogg, Charles Reynolds, and Frank C. Mann; also Indian Scouts Bloody Knife, Bob Tailed Bull and Stab.

The Indian village in the valley was about three miles long and one mile wide. Besides the lodges proper, a great number of temporary brushwood shelters were found in it, indicating that many men besides its proper inhabitants had gathered together there. Major Reno is very confident that there were a number of white men fighting with the Indians. It is believed that the loss of the Indians is large. I have as yet received no official reports in regard to the battle, but what is stated is gathered from the officers who were on the ground then, and from those who have been over it since.

ALFRED H. TERRY, Brigadier-General.

The voyage of the Far West from the mouth of the Little Big Horn, with its half hundred suffering wounded troopers from Reno's command to the Yellowstone, thence to Bismarck, was graphically described by one of the voyagers. It provides a leaf of history of thrilling interest, and is here reproduced:

The steamer Far West was moored at the mouth of the Little Big Horn. She had made her way up the Big Horn farther than any other boat. She had performed one feat unprecedented in river navigation in reaching the mouth of the Little Big Horn, and was prepared to perform another unequalled in the annals of steamboating on western waters, an account of which was gleaned from Capt. Grant Marsh of Yankton on his arrival at his destination. The wounded brought down from Reno's command, some fifty-one in number, accompanied by General Terry in person, were placed aboard the boat. Doctor Porter was detailed to go down with them. Terry's adjutant-general, Ed Smith, was sent along with the official dispatches and a hundred other messages. He had a traveling bag full of telegrams for the Bismarck office. Marsh was in command. He put everything in the completest order and took on a large amount of fuel. He received orders to reach Fort Lincoln as soon as possible. He understood his instructions literally, and never did a river man obey them more conscientiously. On the evening of the 3d of July the steamer weighed anchor. In a few minutes the Far West, so fittingly named, was under full head of steam. It was a strange land, and an unknown river. What a cargo on that steamer; what news for the country; what a story to carry to the Government, to Fort Lincoln; to the widows. It was rushing from a field of havoc to a nation of mourners. The steamer Far West never received the credit due her; neither has the gallant Marsh; nor the pilots, David Campbell and John Johnson. Marsh, too, acted as pilot. It required all their endurance and skill. They proved the men for the emergency. The engineer, whose name unfortunately was not given, did his full duty. Every one of the crew is entitled to the same acknowledgment. They felt no sacrifice was too great upon that journey and in behalf of the wounded heroes. A very moderate imagination can picture the scene upon that floating hospital. There were wounds of every character, and men more dead than alive. The suffering was not terminated with the removal from the field to the boiler deck. It continued and ended in death more than once before Fort Lincoln was hailed. Porter watched for fifty-four hours; he stood the test. The Big Horn River is full of islands, and a successful passage even on the bosom of a June rise, is not an easy feat. The Far West would take a shoot on this or that side of an island as the quick judgment of the pilot would dictate. It is no river in the eastern sense of that word; it is only a creek. A steamboat moving as fast as a railway train in a narrow winding stream is not a pleasure. It was no pleasant sensation to be dashing straight at a headland, and the pilot the only power to save. Occasionally the bank would be touched and the men would topple over like ten-pins. It was a reminder of what the result would be if a snag was struck. Down the Big Horn the heroine went, missing islands, snags, and shore. It was a thrilling voyage. The rate was unrivaled in the annals of boating. Into the Yellowstone the staunch craft shot, and down that sealed river to pilots, she made over twenty miles an hour. The bold captain was taking chances, but he scarcely thought of them. He was under flying orders. Lives were at stake. His engineer was instructed to keep up steam to the highest pitch. Once the gauge marked a pressure that turned his cool head and made every nerve in his powerful frame quiver. The crisis passed and the Far West escaped a fate as terrible as Custer's. Once a stop was made, and a shallow grave explained the reason. He still rests in that lone spot. Down the swift Yellowstone like shooting the Lachine Rapids, every mile a repetition of the former. From the Yellowstone into the broad Missouri, then there was clear sailing. There was a deeper and wider channel and more confidence. A few minutes were lost at Buford. Everybody at the fort was beside himself. The boat was crowded with inquirers, and their inquiries were not half answered when the steamer was away. At Berthold a wounded scout was put off, and at Fort Stevenson a brief stop to tell in a word what had happened. There was no difference in the speed from Stevenson to Bismarck. The same desperate rate was kept up to the end. They were approaching home with something of that feeling which always moves the human heart. At 11 o'clock on the night of the 5th of July they reached Bismarck and Fort A. Lincoln. One thousand miles in forty-four hours was the proud record of speed. But there was no boasting. The awful solemnity of the boat's mission precluded even more than a brief reference to it at the time.

So intense and universal was the sentiment for the summary punishment of the Indians for this atrocious slaughter of Custer and his men, that public meetings were held in many places, resolutions adopted calling for the prompt and vigorous prosecution of the war against the savages, and voices were heard at these assemblings of the people favoring the extermination of the race, a proposition that met with surprising manifestations of approval. At the capital of Dakota a public meeting was held on the day succeeding the reception of the shocking intelligence, where resolutions were adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That we have heard with the deepest sorrow of the disaster which has befallen the nation in the slaughter of the gallant Gen. George A. Custer and his entire brave command while discharging the duty imposed on them by the Government of protecting our frontiers and settlements from the outlawed bands of savages which have so long infested our borders and robbed and brutally murdered our defenseless people.

Resolved, That we extend our most profound sympathies to the wives and families of the officers and men of the Seventh United States Cavalry, who bravely fought and heroically died in defense of our frontiers.

Resolved, That the governor of the territory be requested to tender to the secretary of war a regiment of mounted troops to aid in the vigorous prosecution of the present Indian war for such term of service as shall be required by the Government.

A number of excellent speeches were made by prominent citizens of the capital, some of whom expressed a willingness to enlist forthwith as private soldiers for the purpose of protecting the frontiers against what at the time threatened to become a war near home to the settlers of Dakota. After which the meeting adjourned.

Following the action of the meeting, the acting governor of the territory (the governor being absent) sent to the secretary of war the following, by telegraph:

Executive Office, Yankton, D. T., July 7, 1876.

Hon. J. D. Cameron, Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

By the authority of the people of Dakota, and at their request, I hereby tender to the Government a regiment of troops to aid in the vigorous prosecution of the measures adopted by the Government to subdue the hostile Sioux of this territory and the Northwest.

George H. Hays,

Secretary and Acting Governor.

Replying to the tender of a regiment of volunteer cavalry from the Territory of Dakota, General Sheridan replied as follows in telegram to General Sherman, then in command of the army:

To Gen. W. T. Sherman, Washington.

Your dispatch received. I think it premature to think of asking for volunteer cavalry with the attendant expenses. If the six companies of the Thirty-second Infantry are given Terry he will have about two thousand men. Crook, in a few days will have his own, and I send him Merritt's eight companies of the Fifth Cavalry. Together with the regulars will make him over two thousand strong. We are all richly given as a little time. I can only deplore the loss of Custer, his officers and men. I fear it was in unnecessary sacrifice due to misapprehension and an abundance of courage. The letter was extravagantly developed in Custer. * * * There is nothing to be grieved but poor Custer's death, the officers and men with him. The column was sufficiently strong to have defeated the Indians if Custer had waited for a junction with Reno.

Hon. Simon Cameron, the then secretary of war, made a special report to the President concerning the Little Big Horn massacre, on the 17th of July, 1876, the following, in which he states:

The accidental discovery of gold on the western border of the Black Hills, and the intrusion of our people thereon, have provoked the war against the Indians.

cated it by the uncertainty of numbers to be encountered. The young Indian warriors love war, and very frequently escape their agents to go on the hunt or the warpath, their only idea of the object of life. The object of these military expeditions was in the interest of the peaceful sort of the Sioux Nation, supposed to embrace at least nine-tenths of the whole, and not one of these peaceful treaty Indians has been molested by the military authorities. The recent reports touching the disaster which befell the Seventh Regular Cavalry, led by General Custer in person, are believed to be true. For some reason, as yet unexplained, General Custer, who commanded the Seventh Cavalry, and had been detached by his commander, General Terry, at the mouth of the Rosebud, to make a wide detour up the Rosebud (a tributary to the Yellowstone), across the Little Horn and down it to the mouth of the Big Horn, the place agreed upon for meeting, attacked en route a large Indian village with only a part of his force, having himself detached the rest with a view to intercept the expected retreat of the savages, and experienced an utter annihilation of his immediate command. The forces of General Terry and Gibbon reached the field of battle the next day, and rescued fifty-two wounded men, buried 261 dead men, including all the officers, soldiers and civilians who were with Custer's detachment. (The wounded were taken on litters to the mouth of the Little Big Horn, where the steamboat Far West lay awaiting the arrival of General Terry, with Capt. Grant Marsh in command, and were taken down the Big Horn and Yellowstone to Fort Abraham Lincoln.) * * * In the meantime General Crook had also advanced from Fort Fetterman, and on the 18th of June, eight days before the Custer attack, had encountered this same force of warriors at the head of the Rosebud, with whom he fought several hours, driving the Indians from the field, losing nine men killed, one officer, and twenty wounded.

(Signed) CAMERON.

Sitting Bull, on his retreat to the British possessions, was intercepted by General Miles at Clear Creek, a tributary of the Missouri, October 21st. He eluded General Miles, who followed him sixty miles, but was unable to stop him. The Indians divided, partly going toward the Missouri River agencies, but the chief and his followers struck toward Fort Peck, and made the crossing of the Missouri on the 24th of October; Miles was then obliged to give up the chase for the season. Sitting Bull could reach the British line and find a secure refuge on British soil before Miles could cross and overtake him. Miles, however, kept up a vigorous campaign during the winter succeeding, captured many hostile camps and drove the Sioux out of the Northern Pacific country, nearly all who had gone with Sitting Bull making their way back to the Missouri River agencies.

EDMUNDS COMMISSION APPOINTED

Following the Custer tragedy (June 26, 1876) there came a great wave of excitement, and a sentiment that the Indians should be exterminated seemed to be rapidly forming in the public mind. A race that could commit and countenance such a wanton slaughter, it was said, were no longer entitled to any consideration except such as would terminate their career by extinguishing the race. Whatever the defense the Indian might have had could get no hearing amid the general clamor for speedy vengeance. The Indians, in place of gaining a great victory by this atrocious butchery, apparently had accomplished their own defeat—a defeat that left them not only powerless, but without a foot of soil in the United States that they could safely flee to. They were themselves awestruck and trembling with fear as they began to realize their helpless and dangerous situation, and such of them as could do so without running the risk of detection, fled back to their reservations and agencies, and denied that they had participated in the atrocity or were connected with it in any way; and it would have been a difficult matter to prove the contrary, while Sitting Bull, fully aware that his part in the slaughter was well known to the authorities, fled with precipitate haste, with such of his followers as shared his mortal fear, to the British possessions, where they could find an asylum and enjoy the immunity afforded by exiling themselves on a foreign soil.

With the public mind in this inflamed condition, the Government was induced to take action to quiet the general indignation, and at the same time to apprise the Indians that they were no longer to be fostered and supported except by an absolute surrender to the control of the Government, and by agreeing to relinquish all claim to ownership of the soil except such a reservation as the Government might set apart for their future homes. The Custer tragedy was the signal for a summary and radical departure from the lenient policy formerly pursued. Congress was in session at the time, and initiated new methods by providing in the Indian appropriation bill, which passed and was approved August 15, 1876, less than a month after the Little Big Horn atrocity, as follows:

"None of the moneys appropriated for said Indians shall be paid to any band thereof while said band is engaged in hostilities against the white people, and hereafter there shall be no appropriations made for the subsistence of said Indians unless they shall first agree to relinquish all right and claim to any country outside the boundaries of the permanent reservation established by the treaty of 1868 for said Indians, and also so much of the said permanent reservation as lies west of the 103d meridian of longitude; and shall also grant right of way over said reservation to the country thus ceded for wagon or other roads from convenient and accessible points on the Missouri River, in all not more than three in number; and unless they will receive all supplies herein provided for by said treaty of 1868, at such points and places on their reservation, and in the vicinity of the Missouri River as the President may designate, and provided also that no further appropriation for said Sioux Indians shall be made until some stipulation, agreement or arrangement shall have been entered into by said Indians with the President of the United States, which is calculated and designed to enable said Indians to become self-supporting."

With this law to govern its action, the President appointed a commission of eight eminent men, seven civilians and one soldier of great experience in treating and fighting the red men, General Sibley, to negotiate a new agreement with the Sioux Nation that would clear the way for the opening of the Black Hills and leave no just ground for complaint on the part of the Indians. The commissioners so appointed were: Hon. George W. Mannypenny, Columbus, Ohio; H. C. Bullis, Esq., Decorah, Iowa; Hon. Newton Edmunds, Yankton, Dakota Territory; Rt. Rev. H. B. Whipple, Faribault, Minn.; A. G. Boone, Esq., Denver, Colo.; Hon. A. S. Gaylord, assistant attorney general, Washington, Gen. H. H. Sibley, St. Paul, Minn.; J. W. Daniels, Esq., St. Peter, Minn. The members of this commission first met at Omaha on the 28th of August, 1876, eleven days after the law became operative, and proceeded to Red Cloud Agency, also known as the Pine Ridge, where on the 7th day of September they met Chief Red Cloud and the head men of the Ogalalla tribe of the Sioux and the northern tribe of the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, representing 1,000 Indians.

The commissioners here submitted to the Oglalas and others the provisions of the Act of Congress, and certain articles of agreement, as follows:

THE BLACK HILLS TREATY

Article 1. The said parties hereby agree that the northern and western boundaries of the reservation defined by article 2 of the treaty between the United States and certain tribes of the Sioux Indians, concluded April 29, 1868, and amended February 24, 1869, shall be as follows: The western boundary shall commence at the 103d meridian of longitude with the northern boundary of the State of Nebraska, thence south to said meridian to its intersection with the south fork of the Cheyenne River, thence down said stream to its junction with the north fork of the said Cheyenne River, thence up said River to the said 103d meridian, thence east to the mouth of Cannon Ball River, thence down Cannon Ball River, or Cedar Creek, and thence east to the mouth of the said river, shall follow the said south branch to its junction with the main branch, thence thence down the said Cannon Ball River to the Missouri River, and thence east to the Missouri River. The said Indians hereby agree to relinquish and cede to the United States all their country lying west of the reservation, as herein modified and described, and all their claims and demands under article 16 of said treaty is hereby abrogated.

Art. 2. The said Indians also agree to grant the Government the right of way for wagon roads, not more than three in number, may be constructed from convenient and accessible points on the Missouri River, thence to the reservation, and to the vicinity of the west thereof, upon such routes as shall be designated by the President of the United States; and they also consent and agree to the free navigation of the Missouri River.

Art. 3. The said Indians also agree that they will hereafter receive all annuities provided for by the said treaty of 1868, and all subsistence and supplies which may be provided for them under the present or any future act of Congress, at such points and places on the reservation, and in the vicinity of the Missouri River, as the President of the United States shall designate.

Art. 4. The Government of the United States and the said Indians, being mutually desirous that the latter shall be located in a country where they may eventually become self-supporting and acquire the arts of civilized life, it is therefore agreed that the said Indians shall select a delegation of five or more chiefs and principal men from each band, who shall without delay, visit the Indian Territory under the guidance and protection of suitable persons to be appointed for that purpose by the Department of the Interior, with the view of selecting therein a permanent home for the said Indians. If such delegation shall make a selection which shall be satisfactory to themselves, the people whom they represent, and to the United States, then the said Indians agree that they will remove to the country so selected within one year from this date. And the said Indians do agree in all things to submit themselves to such beneficent plans as the Government may provide for them in the selection of a country suitable for a permanent home, where they may live like white men.

Art. 5. In consideration of the cession of the foregoing territory and rights, and upon full compliance with each and every obligation assumed by the said Indians, the United States does agree to provide all necessary aid to assist the said Indians in the work of civilization; to furnish to them schools and instruction in mechanical and agricultural arts as provided for by the treaty of 1868. Also to provide the said Indians with subsistence consisting of a ration for each individual of a pound and a half of beef (or in lieu thereof one-half pound of bacon), one-half pound of flour, and one-half pound of corn; and for every 100 rations, four pounds of coffee, eight pounds of sugar, and three pounds of beans, or in lieu of said articles the equivalent thereof in the discretion of the commissioner of Indian affairs. Such rations, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be continued until the Indians are able to support themselves. Rations shall in all cases be issued to the head of each separate family; and whenever schools shall have been provided by the Government for said Indians, no rations shall be issued for children between the ages of six and fourteen years (the sick and infirm excepted), unless such children shall regularly attend school. Whenever the said Indians shall be located upon lands which are suitable for cultivation, rations shall be issued only to the persons and families of those persons who labor (the aged, sick and infirm excepted), and as an incentive to industrious habits the commissioner of Indian affairs may provide that such persons be furnished in payment for their labor such other necessary articles as are requisite for civilized life. The Government will aid said Indians as far as possible in finding a market for their surplus productions, and in finding employment, and will purchase such surplus, as far as may be required, for supplying food to those Indians, parties to this agreement who are unable to sustain themselves; and will also employ Indians, so far as practicable, in the performance of Government work upon the reservation.

Art. 6. Whenever the head of a family shall, in good faith, select an allotment of land upon such reservation and engage in the cultivation thereof, the Government shall, with his aid, erect a comfortable house on such allotment; and if said Indians shall remove to said Indian Territory as hereinbefore provided, the Government shall erect for each of the principal chiefs a good and comfortable dwelling house.

Art. 7. To improve the morals and industrious habits of said Indians, it is agreed that the agent, trader, farmer, carpenter, blacksmith, and other artisans employed or permitted to reside within the reservation belonging to the Indians, parties to this agreement, shall be lawfully married and living with their respective families on the reservation; and no person other than an Indian of full blood, whose fitness, morally or otherwise, is not, in the opinion of the commissioner of Indian affairs, conducive to the welfare of said Indians, shall receive any benefit from this agreement or former treaties, and may be expelled from the reservation.

Art. 8. The provisions of the said treaty of 1868, except as herein modified, shall continue in full force and, with the provisions of this agreement, shall apply to any country which may hereafter be occupied by the said Indians as a home; and Congress shall, by appropriate legislation, secure to them an orderly Government; they shall be subject to the laws of the United States, and each individual shall be protected in his rights of property, person and life.

Art. 9. The Indians, parties to this agreement, do hereby solemnly pledge themselves, individually and collectively, to observe each and all of the stipulations herein contained, to select allotments of land as soon as possible after their removal to their permanent home, and to use their best efforts to learn to cultivate the same. And they do solemnly pledge themselves that they will at all times maintain peace with the Government and people of the United States; that they will observe the laws thereof, and loyally endeavor to fulfill all the obligations assumed by them under the Treaty of 1868 and the present agreement, and to this end will, whenever requested by the President of the United States, select so many suitable men from each band to cooperate with him in maintaining order and peace on the reservation as the President may deem necessary, who shall receive compensation for their services as Congress may provide.

Art. 10. In order that the Government may faithfully fulfill its obligations in this agreement, it is mutually agreed that a census of all Indians agreeable to the provisions taken, in the month of December in each year, and the names of each head of family and adult person registered; said census to be taken in such manner as the President in Indian affairs may provide.

Art. 11. It is understood that the term reservation herein contained shall not apply to any country which shall be selected under the authority of the United States, as the home of said Indians. This agreement shall not be binding upon either party until it shall have received the approval of the President and Congress of the United States.

Inasmuch as thousands of the descendants of these Indian chieftains and headmen and others are now living in the western counties of the Dakotas, who have been reared in civilized homes and taught in the English language by the common schools, they are able to read and understand this Black Hills agreement, and doubtless many of them will recognize among the signers to the agreement their own ancestors who were influential members of their race at the time their people lived under the tribal organization. They will also be able to judge for themselves that the Government of the United States was mindful of the material and moral condition and welfare of these ancestors and of their descendants, in making the agreement which surrendered the Black Hills country to the Great Father and his Government, a country, though rich in gold and less valuable minerals, was of no practical value to the Indians of that day, who possessed no knowledge of the art of mining. They will now understand that before any great amount of gold or other mineral can be taken from the Black Hills deposits, hundreds of thousands of dollars had first to be expended in finding the gold in the earth and rocks and in building machinery that would separate and secure it.

REMOVAL TO INDIAN TERRITORY

Under Article 4 of the agreement submitted to the Sioux by the Indian Treaty Commission of 1876, the Indians were given the alternative of selecting a reservation in the Indian Territory, and were invited to send a delegation to that country for the purpose of inspecting it. The Government authorities favored the removal of the Sioux from Dakota for a number of reasons: First, that the Indian Territory would furnish them a region better suited to agricultural pursuits, which thenceforth they were expected to follow, peaceably and willingly; and they would also have the advantage of civilized Indians as neighbors, who would be able to render them valuable assistance in their new mode of life. But neither of these inducements appealed with any force to the Sioux, who had yet, in a vast majority of individuals, to overcome their natural disinclination to civilization in any form.

The alternative proposition permitted their remaining in Dakota and accept a reservation east of the two branches of the Cheyenne River, extending east to the Missouri River, surrendering to the Government all their claims to the country enclosed by the Forks, being the Black Hills, and all other lands whatsoever, to which they claimed ownership, except the reservation to be granted under this new agreement.

Before deciding, the Indians were permitted to send a delegation to the Indian Territory to investigate that region. Spotted Tail, head chief of the Brules, and two or three leading chiefs of the Ogalalas accompanied this delegation, which numbered ninety representatives from the tribes. Red Cloud was unable to go. The delegation was taken down in the cars after reaching the railroad, and were in the Indian Territory about two weeks during October and November, 1876. They were well received by the civilized Creek Indians, who were anxious to have them settle in their country, as plainly appears from the speech made to them at Okmulgee, the capital of the Creek Nation, in the council house of the Creek chief, who addressed them as follows:

To the Sioux.

My Brethren: I am well pleased to see you here in the Mus-kogee Nation, brethren of the same race as ourselves. I was told a long time ago of my red brethren the Sioux, that were living in the far Northwest. I had heard of the name of your great chief, and of your leading chiefs. I have heard of your great men, great in war, and great in council. I have heard of your trouble on account of the intrusion of white men on your reservation, in search of gold. I have heard that the United States Government had determined to remove you from your present home, and perhaps it might be to this Indian Territory to the west of us. When I heard that you might possibly come to this territory, which has been set apart for a home for the Indians forever, I was glad. I would like to have all our red brethren settled in this territory, as we have provided in our treaty. We, the Creeks and Cherokees, have the same kind of title and patent for our lands from the United States, which guarantees this territory to us for a home, under our own form of government, by people of our own race, as long as grass grows and water runs. And I think, therefore, we shall live forever on our lands. I should like—and I express the wish of our people—that every Indian tribe should come here and settle on these lands, that this territory may become filled up with Indians, to the exclusion of others who may be inimical to our race and interests. We believe our right to our soil and our government, which is best suited to our peculiar necessities, would be safer if all our race were united together here. That is my earnest wish. Then I think the rising generation could be educated and civilized, and, what is still better, Christianized, which I believe would be the greatest benefit of all. This would be to our mutual benefit and good. I know I express the minds of our people when I give you this welcome to our life of a higher civilization, which is better than the old life so long led by our race in the past.

The Brule Sioux chief, Spotted Tail, made a non-committal reply to this excellent welcoming address, showing that he had not concluded that it was best for his people to abandon their Dakota homes. The diplomatic old warrior said:

My red brethren, we are glad to meet you and listen to your talk. We have come in peace to your country to see it for ourselves, as our Great Father has wished. When men gather all things together for themselves. When he gathers he don't want you to take it away. My country is covered with gold. I have made a bargain with our Great Father to sell it, because the white men came to take it from us to get the gold. I don't know what I am to get for it yet. We have come here to see your country, and see if we will like it. I suppose in the bargain your Great Father gave you the logs to build your houses, and after that taught you to read, so you can talk. Our Great Father has told me of this. He has not fulfilled his promises to us. We have passed through all the Cheyenne and Arapahoe country. We saw no good houses, all shanties, nothing but poor little ones. All the people are poor. My land is covered with gold, and I must have paid for it and be looking at this country. When I get through I want to see my Great Father and talk with him, and then I can tell more about it.

Governor Ross, a full-blooded Indian, and other leading Cherokees, called on Chief Spotted Tail and his delegation at Muskogee, and expressed to them a deep interest in the welfare of their people, and hoped they would decide to make the country they had visited their home to commence the work of civilization.

The visiting delegation then returned to their homes in Dakota, but declared no desire to change their abiding place. Dakota was their home, and they did not desire to be exiled, though so far as they were capable of forming an opinion from their brief sojourn, the Indians they had visited were in a prosperous and happy condition, provided with comfort, clothing, and food, and with fruitful fields, horses, cattle and dogs, and fowls, and, but for the words of the visitors that they would be glad to have them located in the territory, the Sioux had no heart for the change. They loved the strip of country in the west of Dakota, where they had been born, and loved the land better than any other land they had seen, and they had never seen a more fertile and more healthy land in the fertility and softer climate of the Arkansas valley, or the Indian Territory; and nothing more was heard of their going west after their return and the delivery of their speech to them.

Article 4 of the treaty which the commissioners had prepared was not presented to the Sioux except those that belonged to the Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies.

MILITARY OPERATIONS FOLLOWING THE CUSTER CATASTROPHE

General Crook's command was encamped on Heart River in Dakota, about one hundred miles west of Fort Lincoln, on September 5, 1876, from which point he advised the department as follows: "After separating from Terry, August 24th, I followed the Indian trail leading south some two hundred miles, experiencing much delay on account of continuous cold rains. Considerable sickness exists and the troops are generally discouraged. The Indians seem to have scattered in many directions. The troops are on short rations and the horses generally broken down. The command will march to the Black Hills and await supplies there."

In the closing weeks of the Indian campaign of 1876 the hostile Indians divided, and large bodies came south and east, entering the Territory of Dakota, thence into the valley of the Little Missouri. They were followed by General Crook, who on the 15th of September reported from his camp on Owl Creek, Dakota Territory, "that the Indians were returning to their agencies, while a large number made off into the vicinity of the Black Hills, where they began depredations on the emigrant trains and outlying mining camps of the whites, committing many atrocities." The general sent a detachment of troops from Owl Creek to Deadwood for supplies. This detachment, which numbered 150, fell in with a hostile camp near Slim Buttes, in Butte County, D. T., of thirty lodges. An engagement followed, resulting in the capture of the Indian village, which was in command of Chief American Horse, who was among the killed. A number of the surviving Indians were made prisoners, from whom much information was obtained regarding the future plans of the hostiles; and many articles that had belonged to the soldiers who fell in the Custer massacre were also secured, proving that this party had probably been engaged with Sitting Bull.

After the battle of Little Big Horn, June 25, 1876, Generals Terry and Crook spent the months of July and August, with their respective commands, in a vain effort to capture the Indians engaged in that slaughter, or a portion of them. Sitting Bull and his bands had made good their escape, which ended in his safely reaching British Columbia. All the other thousands had scattered, as one of Crook's officers expressed it, "to every point of a circle," and about September 1st General Terry was still on the Yellowstone, and General Crook on the headwaters of Heart River, Dakota. From his camp on Heart River, Crook telegraphed General Sheridan, under date of September 5th, as follows:

I have with me only about two days' provisions, but I shall push out for the Black Hills to try to reach there in advance of the hostiles, or as soon as they do, scouting the country on the march as thoroughly as the circumstances will permit. We have traveled over four hundred miles since leaving our wagon train, our animals are now most jaded, and many of them have given out, while our men begin to exhibit symptoms of scorbutic affections. As things look now, Custer City will probably be the base to operate from. I would like to have 200,000 pounds of grain sent there at once, together with twenty full days' rations of vegetables for the men. I would like to have two companies of cavalry sent across the country from Red Cloud, via Pumpkin Butte, by forced marches, to escort my wagon train from the Dry Fork of the Powder River, by the miners' road, to Deadwood City, in the Black Hills, so as to get it there with all possible dispatch.

GEORGE CROOK,
Brigadier General.

Camp Owl River, Dakota, September 10, 1876.

General Sheridan, Chicago.

Marched from Heart River, passing a great many trails of Indians going down all of the different streams we crossed between Heart River and this point, apparently working their way in toward the different agencies. Although some of the trails seemed fresh, our animals were not in condition to pursue them. From the north fork of Grand River I sent Captain Mills of the Third Cavalry, with 150 men, mounted on our strongest horses, to go in advance to Deadwood and procure supplies of provisions. On the evening of the same day, after near the Slim Buttes a village of thirty-odd lodges of Indians, and lay there that night, attacked the village by surprise yesterday morning, capturing the village, some prisoners and a number of ponies, and killing some Indians.

GEORGE F. CHASE,
Brigadier General, Commanding

BATTLE OF SLIM BUTTES, HARDING COUNTY

The report of this battle submitted by Captain Mills follows:

In Bivouac on Rabbit Creek, Dakota, September 9, 1876.

Lieut. George F. Chase, Adjutant Battalion, Third Cavalry.

Sir: I have the honor to submit the following report of the engagement of this date between my command and a village of thirty-seven lodges under Brule Sioux Chiefs American Horse and Roman Nose at Slim Buttes, Dakota Territory.

My command consisted of four officers and 150 enlisted men, all from the Third Cavalry, being fifteen men from each of the ten companies of the regiment; one chief packer, Thomas Moore, fifteen packers and sixty-one pack mules.

Lieut. Emmett Crawford commanded the detachment of seventy-four men from Second Battalion, and Lieut. A. H. Von Leutwitz commanded the battalion of same strength from First Battalion. The detachment separated from the main expedition on the night of the 7th at camp on the north fork of Grand River, with orders to proceed as rapidly as possible to Deadwood City, in the Black Hills, for rations, the expedition being then in almost destitute condition. Lieut. Frederick Schwatka was appointed adjutant to the detachment. The command marched south at 7 P. M. under the guidance of Frank Guard, chief to the guide, assisted by Captain Jack (Crawford), eighteen miles, and camped because of the utter darkness. Marched at daylight on the 8th through heavy rain and mud when at 3 P. M. the guide discovered on the slope of Slim Buttes some forty ponies grazing some three miles distant. As the commanding general had instructed me to lose no opportunity to strike a village, the command was rapidly put out of sight, when I, with the guides, proceeded to ascertain, if possible, if there was a village and its location. The approaches were so difficult that it was impossible for us to learn anything without being discovered, until dark, when I decided to move back about a mile, and put the command in a deep gorge, wait there until 2 A. M. and attack at daylight. The night was one of the heaviest I ever passed—dark, cold, rainy and muddy in the extreme. At 2 A. M. we moved to within one mile of the village, where I left the pack train, with 125 horses, with twenty-two men to hold them, under command of Lieutenant Bubbs, and marched on. Crawford and Von Leutwitz, each with fifty men dismounted, and Schwatka, with twenty men mounted, the plan being, if possible, for Crawford to close on one side of the village and Von Leutwitz on the other, when Schwatka was to charge through at the bugle's sound, drive in all the stock, when the dismounted men would close on them. But when we were within one hundred yards of the lower end of the village, which was situated on either side of a small creek, called Rabbit Creek, a small herd of loose ponies stampeded and ran into the village. Guard informed me that all chance for a total surprise was lost, when I ordered the charge sounded, and right gallantly did Schwatka with his twenty-five men execute it. Immediately the dismounted detachments closed on the south side and commenced firing on the Indians, who, finding themselves faced in their lodges, the latter drew out, as a drum by the rain, had quickly cut themselves out with their knives and picked up the squaws carrying the dead, wounded and children up the opposite hill, and every thing but their limited night clothes in our possession. Schwatka having run to help the principal part of the herd. All this occurred about daybreak. Lieutenant Von Leutwitz, while gallantly cheering his men, was severely wounded at almost the first discharge of my arm as he fell.

I then turned my attention to getting up the pack train, and Lieutenant Bubbs informed me that from the trails, the actions of the Indians and their number, there was satisfied there were other villages near. I sent two companies forward to look up what I was doing, and requesting him to hurry forward to the village.

The Indians, as soon as they had their squaws and children, and some horses, left the contest and soon completely surrounded us with a strong force of warriors. The battle was almost entirely engaged with the warriors, the Indians, however, were determined to leave the collection of the property and the prisoners, which was very rich, to the main command upon its arrival. As soon as the main command arrived, the wounded had taken refuge in a deep gorge, the Indians and the rebels, however, from its difficulty, left to the coming reinforcements. The Indians were not firing or creeping to points near enough to cause our warriors to feel the danger. Crawford rendered themselves conspicuous by firing their guns, which were not the detachments.

The head of General Crook's column arrived at 1.30 A. M., and American Horse, mortally wounded, his family of some twelve persons, two warriors, a niece of Redelond's and four dead bodies were taken from the gorge, not, however, without loss. About 5 P. M. the Indians resumed the contest with more than double their former force, but were handsomely repulsed by our then strong command. I learn from the prisoners that Crazy Horse, with the Cheyennes, a village of some three hundred lodges, was within eight or ten miles, and that the strength of the village taken consisted of about two hundred souls, too of them warriors.

My loss was: Killed—Private John Winzel, Company A, Third Cavalry. Wounded were: First Lieut. A. H. Von Leutwitz, leg afterward amputated; Sergt. John A. Kirkwood, Company M; Sergt. Edward Glass, Company E; Private Edward Kiernan, Company E; Private William B. Dubois, Company C; Private August Doran, Company D; Private Charles Foster, Company B, all of the Third Cavalry. It is impossible to estimate the enemy's loss, as they were principally carried away, although several were left on the field.

This concluded Captain Mills' campaign as commander of the pioneer party. The Indians, however, continued to annoy the united command now under General Crook's personal supervision. The weather had been rainy and cold for many days, and the entire command had been subsisting on horse meat, without salt, which had been procured from the bodies of the exhausted animals who proved unable to keep their places in the marching column. The capture of the Indian village at Slim Buttes had brought some relief to the half-starved soldiers in a quantity of dried Indian pony meat which proved an agreeable change from the flesh of the attenuated cavalry horse. No body of American soldiers were ever in a more destitute and suffering plight than this army during its entire journey from the Heart River to the Belle Fourche. After crossing this latter stream, which was forded with considerable difficulty owing to the enfeebled condition of the animals and men, an order reached General Crook from General Sheridan at this point commanding the brigade to march southward, through the Black Hills, and directed Crook to meet Sheridan at Fort Laramie without loss of time. It was now September 14th. A train laden with supplies for the famishing troops arrived from the people of Deadwood at this time in response to a requisition Crook had made by advance courier sent some days before. The sun shone warm and bright, and officers and men enjoyed a holiday. General Crook with an escort turned the command over to General Merritt, and on the 15th took leave of his troops and started on his southern journey, passing through Deadwood, where he was given a cordial reception, and on through the hills via Custer City to Laramie, where his conference with Sheridan led to the surrender of the ponies and guns of Red Cloud's refractory people.

The command under General Merritt moved to a camp in the foothills where the Whitewood Creek enters the plains from the hills, an ideal camp, called Centennial Park, and a few days later continued their march to the southern hills, where they were detained some time at French Creek awaiting orders, and finally sent over to the vicinity of the Red Cloud Agency, where the Indians were excited and threatening because of the proceedings then pending for the cession of the territory embracing the Black Hills, which was accomplished that year, in the face of much opposition and danger.

And here the campaign against the Indians, for the eventful year of 1876, finds its termination. It had been the most important, considering its collateral events, of any similar campaign in the history of the United States, and much of it of the greatest importance, bearing upon the material advancement of the great Northwest, transpired within Dakota.

MILES IN PURSUIT OF SITTING BULL

A dispatch from Gen. Nelson A. Miles, of October 27, 1876, who had been pursuing Sitting Bull and had captured large quantities of his supplies, which the fleeing hostiles were unable to remove, reported that Sitting Bull and about one thousand of his followers had escaped, but were in danger of starvation and freezing. Four hundred lodges of Indians from the Cheyenne Agency who had been with Sitting Bull had surrendered, and as a guarantee of their good faith to keep the peace, surrendered five of their principal men as hostages for the good behavior of the remainder. These five chiefs were sent to Fort Snelling, Minnesota, headquarters of the department. The 400 lodges were sent at once to their agency at Cheyenne, where they were to be dealt with as the Government deemed best. They were disarmed. Whether the Government inflicted any punishment upon them does not appear; but the Cheyennes abandoned the war path from that time and Sitting Bull's warrior hosts were never again reassembled.

General Miles did valiant work during the winter of 1876-77, in bringing the refractory red skin bands to a peaceful footing, those who were not then allied with Sitting Bull, but were on an unfriendly footing for various causes, natural hostility toward the pale faces being the principal one. They had all been engaged in the armed opposition to the construction of the Northern Pacific Railway, and many of them participated in the battle of the Little Big Horn. Miles conducted his negotiations throughout the long winter with commendable discretion and before spring dawned had the trails to his camp well beaten down by the refractory element coming to him to surrender and live in peace ever after. It was remarkable that three-fourths of the surrendered people claimed the Cheyenne Agency as their home. Miles was intrepid, and possessed that calmness in perilous difficulties, that never for a moment deserted him or disturbed his sound judgment.

In October, 1877, Gen. Nelson A. Miles in command of the Yellowstone District, with headquarters at Fort Keogh, stated that the hostile Indians, so numerous last year, had disappeared and many ranchmen were settling along the Powder and Yellowstone Valley. Sitting Bull was in Canada. Fort Keogh was a new post, substantially built, in 1876-77, for the accommodation of fourteen companies of troops of all arms. It was located at the junction of the Tongue River with the Yellowstone.

Sitting Bull, after the Custer massacre, had great difficulty in avoiding the pursuing parties. He had no formidable force of Indians with him, but many women and children, and he was so thoroughly acquainted with the country that he was able to avoid the troops whose most vigilant work was in watching the crossing points of the Yellowstone and Missouri rivers. The wily chieftain managed to get across the Yellowstone during the fall and spent nearly all the winter of 1876-77, south of the Missouri.

General Miles discovered his rendezvous early in the spring of 1877, but the Indians managed to elude him and crossed the Missouri early in April at a point where the Milk River enters that stream, and entered Canadian territory at a point near where the Poplar River intersects the international boundary line, about longitude one hundred and six degrees west from Greenwich. It was claimed that Sitting Bull had assurances from the mounted police of the Dominion that no matter how serious his offenses were against the United States Government, that whenever he wanted an asylum north of the international boundary, he would find it.

Sitting Bull, however, was aware that refugees or fugitives from either side of the line could avoid capture by escaping a narrow strip of land, remained in proximity to the boundary, hence Sitting Bull made his way to Wolf Mountain, in her majesty's possessions, where he located his camp, consisting of half-starved and poorly provided with camp equipment. The international boundary line it must be understood, was nowhere visible, but it had for many years been determined approximately. Taking Pembina on Red River as a starting point, the most direct route to Sitting Bull's camp was the trader's trail, which begins at Pembina and terminates in the heart of the Blackfoot country on Wolf Mountain, where Sitting Bull had taken refuge. This trail does not coincide with the lawful boundary, but probably was so for many years. For many years it had been the route of the Blackfoot traders to the plains, and the central road to the plains, the great hunting region of the Rees and Mandans as well as some of the tribes of the Sioux.

a well marked trail. Leaving Pembina it winds across the Pembina Mountains, intersects numerous small rivers and creeks, passes the northern end of Turtle Mountain, in longitude 100 degrees and 50 minutes thence in its westward course crosses the Mouse River, thence across the Coteau du Missouri whence it crosses the Mouse a second time, and finally terminates at Wood Mountain, Canadian territory, in about latitude 49 degrees, 30 minutes, longitude 106 degrees, 20, west from Greenwich. That was about the latitude and longitude of Sitting Bull's refuge. The occasional visits of Sitting Bull or some of his party, to the vicinity of Pembina and to Winnipeg during his enforced residence at Wood Mountain were occasionally mentioned.

INDIAN WAR IN THE BLACK HILLS

Late in the fall of 1876 small bands of Indians began depredations upon the emigrants to the Black Hills, killing a number of small parties and terrorizing the outlying camps and new settlements bordering the hills country. These depredations were of a serious character and called for the establishment of a permanent military force; this was done and Camp Crook was fixed at Crook City, at the point on the north where the Whitewood Creek debouches from the hills and enters the plains country. Indians from Red Cloud's tribe of Oglalas or Cheyennes were charged with these hostilities though from many of the articles captured from the Indian camps it was evident that a number of them had been in the fight against Custer. The military force was a meagre one and was unable to prevent a continuance of the depredations. The Indians were operating in small bands—having no prominent leader, and would dart upon a settler or upon a small party of immigrants—accomplish their purpose, and escape with their booty before the military would be apprised of their proximity. So menacing became this situation that the inhabitants of the northern hills became alarmed for their safety, and Sheriff Bullock being unable to render the necessary protection, appealed to the governor of the territory for authority and for arms with which to arm the militiamen of the hills.

Governor Pennington applied to General Sheridan for protection, alleging that there was not a sufficient military force to guard the exposed border. Sheridan replied to the governor's application, stating that he had no troops he could send, and added that he believed the danger would lessen under the pressure of Crook's forces who would drive the hostiles out of the territory. At this time, however, Crook was behind the hostile force pushing it towards the settlements by way of the Little Missouri and other streams south. Crook continued his march and reached the vicinity of Deadwood in October.

These Indian troubles from 1872 to 1877 were all occasioned by the hostile Sioux, all of whom had their habitation in the Territory of Dakota. Montana and Wyoming furnished the larger portion of the battle fields, which were chosen by the Indians as affording them advantages that were of great value because of their customary tactics in war, which included as a matter of the greatest importance a field wherein they could fight from a number of concealed positions. All their engagements with the United States troops, except the Custer battle, where they had the advantage of an overwhelming force and took Custer by surprise, the red man disclosed this prudent regard for his own safety in the selection of his ground, while at the same time it allowed him the maximum of opportunity to pick off the enemy.

GENERAL SHERMAN IN NORTHERN DAKOTA

Gen. William Tecumseh Sherman, who was then general of the army, visited Bismarek in July, 1877, accompanied by General Terry and a number of his staff officers. From that point or from Fort Lincoln he embarked on the steamer Rosebud, Capt. Grant Marsh, and made a reconnoitering trip up the Yellowstone River, and inspected the new military posts at the mouth of Powder River (Fort Keogh), and also at the mouth of the Big Horn (Fort Custer), where he was met by General Sheridan and General Miles, and escorted to Fort Fetter, whence thence through Idaho, and on to the Pacific coast. General Sherman's object in making this journey was to personally acquaint himself with the conditions of the frontier, and particularly with regard to the demand for more troops. There were no serious Indian troubles in the Northwest at the time of General Sherman's tour, the disturbances west and north of the Black Hills settlements, which had been so formidable. Sitting Bull, with 278 lodges of his hostile Sioux, was in the Cypress Mountains, B. A., where his warriors were hunting bison with bows and arrows, having no ammunition for their guns. It was estimated that Sitting Bull's entire party at the time numbered about two thousand.

MILITARY COURT OF INQUIRY INVESTIGATES MAJOR RENO'S CONDUCT

Major Reno, it will be remembered, was subjected to a great deal of adverse criticism, following the battle of Little Big Horn, his offense, as alleged by his unfriendly critics, being his failure to go to the relief of Custer, on his return from his futile search for the Indians, in obedience to the orders given him by General Custer when he directed the movements for the day and divided his regiment into three detachments, sending Reno off to the left. Major Benteen commanded the detachment sent to the right, and Custer himself led the center column. A court martial, convened at Reno's request, was finally ordered to investigate Reno's conduct, and he was acquitted, after a very full and impartial investigation. His own statement before the court, which is given herewith, was supported by all the evidence.

The testimony indicated that the slaughter of Custer and his men had already been accomplished before Reno reached within a mile of the slaughter pen, and when he had reached that point he was confronted by an overwhelming force of Indians, with whom he fought for hours; was finally forced to take refuge in a body of friendly timber, where Major Benteen found him, and where the regimental wagon train also found protection.

It developed that the Indians must have had knowledge of Custer's division of his regiment, and stealthily followed the movement of the troops. Custer fell into their hands first. The conflict was brief, furious and decisive, and was followed by the onslaught on Reno, who lost seventeen men killed and over 100 wounded. General Terry, with Gibbons' column, reached Reno at a critical time. He would probably have suffered as Custer had but for this timely relief. The cavalry were fighting from rifle pits and his force was being depleted by death and wounds. The Indians, made aware of Terry's approach, hastily withdrew and scattered. When Gibbons' force reached him he had been exposed to the enemy for about twenty-four hours.

The military court of inquiry into Major Reno's conduct at the battle of the Little Big Horn convened at Chicago, January 13, 1879. The court was convened at the earnest request of Major Reno, and was convened solely for the purpose of service because of the contradictory and unauthenticated reports of the battle, speculation and discussion concerning Reno's behavior on that fatal and disastrous occasion.

The Indian camp or village where the battle occurred was situated on the north bank of the river, about three miles from the mouth of the river, and was of considerable width ranging from one hundred yards to half a mile.

Scout Girard, who was with Custer, testified that he was with Custer at the battle, and that he testified that he said to Reno: "Go forward and fight the Indians, I will support you and I will support you." Custer was killed from the top of a knoll while riding over the top of the knoll. Custer's orders were given by the scout, and the scout was killed.

advance and try to overtake the Indians, and when you do so charge them. Take the scouts with you."

Maj. Frederick W. Benteen was third in command. His orders from Custer were to take his column of three companies and go away to a line of bluffs to the left. The chief trumpeter afterwards brought him instructions that if he found nothing at the first line of bluff to ride to the second. He afterward received an order through the sergeant major that he should go to the first valley, and if he found nothing to go to the second valley, and take everything that he found in his way. He went off to the left several miles as directed, but as he found no Indians and no valleys he concluded it was a mistake about there being Indians in that direction. He accordingly started back on his trail, and finally struck Custer's trail, and then met Trumpeter John Martin with an order from Adjutant Cook to hurry up, as the Indians were in sight and warm work was expected. Shortly after this Benteen, riding 200 yards in advance of his command, saw Reno engaged with the Indians. The Indians were charging and recharging through the ranks of the men. When he got nearer he concluded the troops were being whipped, and pretty soon the retreat commenced. He also concluded that the Indians discovered him about the same time, and this checked their pursuit. The foregoing is taken from Benteen's testimony.

When Reno overtook or met the Indians he sent word to Custer, and engaged the Indians, presumed to number from twenty-five hundred to three thousand warriors. His horses had been posted in the timber, and his men were fighting on foot. This was the situation when Benteen arrived with his command. Scout Girard, who was now with Reno, testified that in a brief time the order came: "Men, to your horses; the Indians are in our rear." Here the retreat to the hill began, and Reno's heaviest loss occurred. Girard was of the opinion that the Custer tragedy occurred prior to this a very short time on the other side of the Indian village, as he said he heard two or three volleys of musketry of about one hundred shots each from that direction. Custer and Reno must have been about two and a half or three miles apart about this time—Custer at or near the lower end of the Indian village, and Reno near the opposite end, the intervening space being occupied by the village with from five thousand to six thousand Indians. Benteen said he thought there might have been nine thousand. The distance was so great and the enemy so much superior in numbers that all of the troops of either command must have been wiped out before they could have got together had any effort been made by either party to relieve the other, and this was the fate that met Custer. The same fate would probably have overtaken Reno if he had not retreated across the river to the hill and thrown up rifle pits.

Lieutenant Varnum estimated the Indian force at from four thousand to five thousand, and said that half that force was too great for half of Custer's command.

All the witnesses testified to Reno's coolness and courage except Lieutenant Edgerly, who thought Reno was excited. When he first saw the Indians, Custer's firing was distinctly heard from the Reno headquarters and lasted three-quarters of an hour.

Reno had notified Custer, by messenger, when he first discovered the Indians, and probably expected Custer would join him. It would seem that Custer had concluded to give his support by attacking the Indians where he did with a view of drawing them away from Reno.

Major Reno testified. His testimony is substantially given in the findings of the court, which are here added:

Washington, D. C., March 6, 1879.

The court of inquiry assembled by special order No. 255, dated Headquarters of the Army, Washington, November 25, 1878, report in obedience to that order the following facts involving the conduct of Maj. Marcus A. Reno, Seventh Cavalry, in regard to the battle of the Little Big Horn, fought June 25 and 26, 1876.

On the morning of the 25th of June, 1876, the Seventh Cavalry, Lieut. Col. G. A. Custer, commanding, operating against the hostile Indians in Montana Territory near the Little Big Horn River, was divided into four battalions, two of which were commanded by Colonel Custer in person, with the exception of one company, which was detached from one battalion by Major Reno, and one by Capt. F. W. Benteen, who were sent on to about twelve to fifteen miles from the scene of a battle after a day's march.

It was testified that the troops were not in the best of condition, having marched down by long marches and little sleep.

When Benteen first met Reno, the latter was ordered to march in the direction of the little order owing to the furious rushes of the enemy, and that he was not able to give orders to his soldiers. He believed Reno did the best he could, exposed himself, and that he exhibited bravery throughout.

1. The column under Captain Benteen received orders to march in the direction of indefinite distance (to the first and second valleys), hunting and attacking the Indians at any it might meet with. The battalion under Major Reno received orders to march with the column, and, doing so, marched parallel to, and only a short distance from, the column commanded by Colonel Custer.

2. About three or four miles from what was afterwards found to be the mouth of Horn River, where the fighting took place, Major Reno received orders to march forward as he thought prudent until, coming up with the Indians, who were reported to be about to charge them and move everything before him and would receive the attack from the column under Colonel Custer.

3. In obedience to the orders given by Colonel Custer, Captain Benteen marched to the left (south) at an angle of about forty five degrees, but meeting an impracticable route, was forced by it to march more to the right than the angle above indicated, and then approaching a parallel route to the trail followed by the rest of the command.

4. Major Reno, in obedience to the orders given him, moved on at a fast trot on the main Indian trail, until reaching the Little Big Horn River, which he crossed, and halted a few minutes to reform his battalion. After reforming he marched the battalion in a westerly toward the Indian village, down the river, or in a northerly direction, two companies in line of battle and one in support until about half way to the point where he halted, after which he brought the company in reserve forward to the line of battle, continuing the movement at a fast trot or gallop until after passing over a distance of about two miles, when he halted and dismounted to fight on foot at a point of timber upon which the bulk of the battalion rested. After fighting in this formation for less than half an hour, the Indians passing to his left rear and appearing in his front, the skirmish line was withdrawn to the timber and the fight continued for a short time—half an hour or forty minutes in all—when the command, or nearly all of it, was mounted, reformed and at a rapid trot was withdrawn to a hill on the opposite side of the river. In this movement, it was estimated about sixteen soldiers and citizens were killed, besides one wounded. There were, moreover, two citizens and thirteen soldiers rejoining the command afterwards. It was stated that Major Reno's command lost some twenty nine men in killed and wounded, and three horses, including Doctor DeWitt, killed.

5. In the meantime, Captain Benteen having carried out as far as was practicable the spirit of his orders, turned in the direction of the command, by the route above indicated, and reaching the trail followed until near the crossing of the Little Big Horn River, there about the same time that Reno's command was crossing the river, he halted, dismounted, and finally joined his battalion with Reno on the hill. Shortly after this, and later, the pack train, which had been left behind on the trail by the command, was overtaken, and the delays incident to its march, served to impede the progress of the command, which consisted of seven companies, together with about thirty or thirty five men, including the pack train, and companies under General Custer.

6. After detaching Benteen's and Reno's columns, Colonel Custer remained in immediate command in the trail followed by Benteen's column, with the intention of marching where he directed to the right or southward, following the trail, and then crossing the river at a point about four miles below that where the Little Big Horn River crossed the trail. The command were destroyed by the hostiles. The detachment, with the exception of one man, Martin, left Colonel Custer's command, when it was overtaken by the Indians, and was killed where it afterward met its fate. There is no doubt, however, that the command was saved that firing was heard proceeding from the bottom of the hill, and that the command retreated from the bottom up to the top of the hill, and that the command was killed on the hill. All firing which indicated the progress of the command was heard in Major Reno's command for the movement of the command was not heard.

7. After the distribution of ammunition to the command, the command was divided into two columns, the command under Major Reno's entire command in the direction of the command, and the command under Colonel Custer's column had taken and in which the command was killed. This movement was carried out, and the command was killed. This movement imperil the entire command, upon which the command was killed. The command made a successful resistance in the direction of the command, and the command was killed. The command was a heroic one against the command, and the command was killed. The command was excellent, and while subordinate in the command, the command was killed. The command by brilliant displays of command, the command was killed. The command required ammunition from this command.

It is the conclusion of the court, in view of all the facts in evidence, that no further proceedings are necessary in the case, and it expresses this opinion in accordance with the concluding clause of the order convening the court.

JOHN H. DING,
Colonel Ninth Infantry, President.
J. M. LEE,
First Lieutenant and Adjutant Ninth Infantry, Recorder.

General Sherman made the following endorsement:

The findings of the court of inquiry in the case of Major Reno are approved, and the proceedings are respectfully forwarded to the honorable secretary of war.

By the secretary of war:

The proceedings and findings are approved.
By order of the President.

GEORGE W. McCLARY,
Secretary of War.

SITTING BULL

In the late winter of 1878-79 Sitting Bull was in the Province of Alberta, in British America, on the Saskatchewan River. He had with him about three thousand warriors, and about two thousand women and children. At this time it was apprehended that he was contemplating a raid on Forts Buford, Stephenson and Totten, and he was being closely watched by the army in that section, then under the immediate command of General Miles.

Of Sitting Bull Miles says:

He is inferior to other chiefs, Spotted Tail, Red Cloud or Crazy Horse. He is the deadly enemy of the whites, and will never, voluntarily, be confined to any of the reservations. He claims that the Great Spirit made him an Indian, but not an agency Indian.

Notwithstanding the opinion of Sitting Bull expressed by General Miles, which he later changed, he was the best representative of the Indian race that his times produced, and his influence extended to every tribe in the great Sioux Nation, which could not be justly claimed for any other Sioux chief. Sitting Bull was not a chief; he was a general and had been elected to lead the hostile armies at a grand council held near the Sisseton country in 1867, and every Indian, whether in Spotted Tail's Brules or Red Cloud's Oglalas, or any other, who entertained the hostile spirit, looked to Sitting Bull as their leader. This is abundantly proven by the large forces he was able to assemble from every tribe when occasion called for it. The Government seemed unable, or deemed it unwise and unprofitable, to detect the individual Indians who would stroll away from the various agencies on the pretext that they were going for a hunt, and would then make their way to Sitting Bull's camp, assist in his skirmishes and depredations, and then stealthily return to their own tribal home and draw their rations.

Sitting Bull's influence among the Sioux Indians was stronger than that of any of the chiefs General Miles names. It may have sprung from his unrelenting opposition and hatred of the whites more than from any superior native ability. He claimed that the large number of Indians gathered together in the early summer of 1876 in the Big Horn country were there on their annual picnic for the purpose of social enjoyment and to permit the young men and maidens to become acquainted with view to matrimonial alliances. It may have been that he had prudently prepared for war, knowing the prejudice that existed against himself, and always against the assembling of thousands of armed Indians in the fastnesses of the Big Horn Mountains. But Sitting Bull could have plead the Laramie treaty of 1868 in extenuation and exculpation that they were trespassers. Had it not been that he had been fighting General Crook and General Gibbons for the past two or three months prior to the Little Big Horn tragedy his claims that his intentions were peaceable would have a more stable foundation.

SELLING BULL'S STORY

Sitting Bull's story of the Custer battle as related by him to the Rev. J. B. M. Genin, Catholic missionary to the Sioux, at Sitting Bull's camp in Judith Basin and published in the "North Dakota Historical Collections," Vol. 1, page 277.

The Two Kettle tribe also, these being vision and war warriors, were told that we were to meet all the tribes of this region, to make laws and treaties, and to make our young men and maidens acquainted with each other, as our fathers have done for many generations. So when we returned following us, we marched back into the hills and were told that this was a direct violation of the treaty of 1868, which understood that the United States to keep peace. We resolved to continue with our will, and praying to God to save us from the hands of our enemies, and to provoke to complete our extermination.

"For three days our scouts watched the soldiers as they moved. We sent all our women and children into the hills to hide. We knew that if the soldiers would charge through the hills, they would find our people. When Chiri Black Kettle was killed, we saw the soldiers' horses and the hoofs of their war horses. They were afraid to follow. They were too well to let them be butchered easily. They were afraid to follow us for them until death.

"So I sent my young men to take them conveniently at the door of each house, and to stake them in the front streets of the city."

when the fires were burning fiercely, and stirring the air, the pieces of cloth and old rags waved to and fro in the breeze and gave the appearance of a densely populated village. Then I marched behind the front row of hills with all my braves, and awaited the opening of the soldiers' fire upon our camp. Everything worked as I had planned. True to their intentions, the United States soldiers killed my flagmen whom I had sent to meet them and demand peace, and proceeding furiously forward, opened fire upon my empty camp of old tepees and rag manikins. I then fell upon them from the rear, with all my force, before they had time to recover from the shock of their furious charge and their surprise at finding the village deserted. My men destroyed the last of them in a very short time. Now they accuse me of slaying them. Yet what did I do? Nothing. God saved our lives because we had called upon him. They should then accuse God, for truly it was he who saved us by permitting them to die.

"It was very hard," he added, "to place any faith in the word of Americans. Ever since I knew them my experience with them has proved that they continually cheat the Indians, over-reaching upon their lands with big promises, never fulfilled, and at last finding some pretext to kill them."

In reply to inquiries as to the first attack on General Reno, Sitting Bull said: "These soldiers were not brave. When they saw our warriors they ran away as fast as they could, and hid in the hollows of the hills. I was not in that part of the battlefield. I sat on my horse on a hill and sent my young men to direct the movements of the head warriors. All my warriors were brave and knew no fear. The soldiers who were all killed were brave men, too, but they had no chance to fight or run away; they were surrounded too closely by our many warriors. As they stood there waiting to be killed, they were seen to look far away to the hills in all directions, and we knew they were looking for the hidden soldiers in the hollows of the hills to come and help them. But our warriors first killed the soldiers who were holding the horses and rode them while charging close up and firing at the survivors. Let no man call this a massacre. It was a piece of mere warfare. We did not go out of our own country to kill them. They came to kill us and got killed themselves. God so ordered it."

In answer to a statement by Father Genin that it was reported that Sitting Bull himself killed General Custer, he said excitedly: "It is a lie. I did not kill the Yellow Hair. He was a fool and rode to his death." He said further that he did not personally see General Custer during the battle; that his people searched for the body of the long-haired white chief after the battle, but that no soldier with long hair was found.

On this point Father Genin himself says: "Our friend Colonel Keogh's body and that of another Catholic soldier were the only ones treated with respect by the Indians, who stripped the dead of their clothing on the battlefield. The Teton Indians are nearly all pagans yet, not that they do not desire to become Catholics; they often asked me to go and live permanently with them, and instruct them and their children, but I had already too much on hand, and could only pray for them, besides seeing them at long intervals.

"Pagans though they may be, and used to savage practices, still they have learned to respect the cross wherever they find it, and finding on Colonel Keogh's neck a chain and cross, they did not cut up his body, but covered up his face respectfully and left him his cross and went by. A scapular found on the body of another man was the cause of similar treatment. I believe these to be the only two persons on that battlefield whose bodies were not mutilated more or less."

Sitting Bull further said that when all of General Custer's men had been killed his warriors rushed to surround the soldiers on the hill with Reno, and that they would soon have killed them, too, but a false alarm was raised that some soldiers had escaped and were attacking the women and children, and the whole Indian army surged in that direction. Then when the mistake was found out, and his command surged again to the hill where Reno's men were concealed, he gave the order that there should be no more fighting. "We have killed enough," he said. "Let the rest go back and take care of the women and children, and tell the people how the Indians can fight." Whereat his warriors were sorrowful and wanted to kill all Reno's men, and then go to give battle to the "walking soldiers" (Terry's infantry), when they should leave the steamboat, but they obeyed his orders, although greatly disappointed.

At the period of the Custer massacre Sitting Bull was comparatively unknown to the white people. The fact that there was an Indian of the same name—who was well known as being the head soldier of the friendly Oglalas at the Red Cloud Agency—tended to the origin of many remarkable stories about him.

Sitting Bull, who commanded the Indians at the Little Big Horn battle, was a nephew of Black Moon, the supreme chief of the Teton Sioux, and was elected to the position of head chief of the Indian army at the convention of the Sioux Nation held on the plains of North Dakota at their summer camps in June, 1867, near Lake Traverse and Big Stone. An important law was at this time adopted and promulgated by the assembly, as follows: "That any Indian who would show the gold fields in the Black Hills, or reveal their existence to white men, must die, and the whites thus made aware of the presence of gold in the Black Hills should also die, for fear the country should be taken from them."

The Tetons, long aware of the existence of gold in their country and holding it as their last place of abode, enacted this law in solemn council; Sitting Bull approved it. Custer, as the leader of the expedition to the bulls in 1874, was the first to bring national publicity to the fact that the Black Hills was a "sacred" or "holy" place to the Indian man in the nation, and Father Gelin asks: "Who shall be responsible for the wrong done by the Sioux Nation on the plains of Northern Dakota in 1867, when the sacred hills were desecrated by the destruction of General Custer and his men on Little Bighorn?"

The tenth anniversary of the dark and bloody tragedy of the battle of the Little Bighorn was today appropriately celebrated in the town of Great Falls, Montana, on the June day. Early in the day the great Sioux chief Gull was brought to the town, as described, in an intelligent and straight-forward manner, the only manner in which Custer command was destroyed. Curley, the Crow son who was the last survivor of all who marched into the Valley of the Little Bighorn, was also present, but Gull turned his back on Curley, and said, "The man who shot me is dead." Gull is a powerful, fine looking specimen of the red race, forty years of age, and weighs two hundred pounds. He first appeared reticent, and was reluctant to speak, but when he stood on the spot which saw the last fight with Custer, he became earnestly communicative, and he told all he knew of the battle. His dignified countenance spoke truthfulness, and there is no doubt that the story of that dreadful day is at last made known. Gull was Sitting Bull's uncle, and he died that day, and his narrative follows:

"We saw the soldiers early in the morning crossing the divide. When they were separated, we watched them until they came down into the valley. A great many of the white soldiers were coming, and orders were given for our village to be ready. Reno swept down so rapidly on the upper end that the Indians were far behind him. Sitting Bull and I were at the point where Reno attacked. Sitting Bull was a little way off. The women and children were hastily moved down stream where they could be camped. The Sioux attacked Reno, and the Cheyennes Custer, and then all moved up. The women and children caught the horses for the bucks to mount. The bucks mounted and charged back on Reno, checked him and drove him into the river. The soldiers tied their horses to trees, came out and fought on foot. As soon as the Indians had driven back across the river, the whole force turned upon the soldiers and they were destroyed him. Custer did not reach the river, but was slain in battle on the banks now called Reno Creek. They fought the soldiers and beat them back and forth. All were killed. The Indians ran out of ammunition and then they shot at the soldiers from behind their horses. The soldiers got shells stuck in their guns and they were thrown away. They then fought with little guns (pistols). The Indians were everywhere, and in front of Custer as he moved up the ridge to take position on the mountain as the grass. The first two companies, Keogh's and Gibbon's, were killed on the foot. They never broke, but retired, step by step, until they reached the river, where all finally perished. They were shot down in the line where they were standing, rallied by company, and were all killed in a bunch. The warriors charged against the troopers who held the horses while the others rushed in and killed them. They killed, by waving blankets and great shouting, the horses were killed. It was impossible for the soldiers to escape downward. The soldiers were killed and never surrendered. They fought standing. The men were killed as fast as the men fell the horses were killed and driven back by the Indians who gathered them up. When Reno attempted to retreat across the river, Custer and all with him were dead. When the force moved up looking Custer's field, the Indians were galloping around the soldiers, killing them dead, popping bullets and arrows into them. When they were killed, he killed my two squaws and three children, and one of the children was the hatchet (mutilating the soldiers). The soldiers were killed and their supplies of cartridges were in the hands of the Indians. The Indians then ran up to the soldiers and beat them back and forth. They were driven away and jumped into the river and were killed. The Indians were killed on Reno Creek, and several Indian soldiers were killed. The Indians were killed altogether, but a great many were killed in the bushes. Some soldiers got away and ran to the mountains and were killed. We had Oglala, Minniconjou, Cheyenne, Arapaho and Gros Ventres. We had a great many of them. (Terry and Gibbon) were killed and the soldiers were killed. The Battle of the Little Bighorn was a great victory for the Indians. They then went over to the Wyandotté mountains and killed the soldiers who were there.

This ended Call's narrative.

Agency. Netherly had with him Rev. J. G. Burgess, the Congregational missionary with the Crows, and briefly states:

A great monument, enclosed with strong iron pickets, stands near where the last stand was made. Every soldier dying in that fight is registered there. Their bodies, except perhaps a few officers, lie inside the picket, near the great monument. Curley, the Indian scout, was the only one in Custer's immediate personal command who escaped. He is said to live at Billings now. The victims of the Fort Phil Kearney or Fetterman massacre, though killed ten years before the Custer fight, and in Wyoming, are also buried in compact order near this monument on the Custer field in Montana. Then farther away lie rows of veterans of the great Civil war, who wandered West to die.

The Government has placed a small white headstone where every man fell. Away to the south the horse holders were killed. Along that "hogback," or ridge leading north, the row of white monuments shows where Custer stubbornly retreated; the cluster of monuments and the cross show where the last stand was made and where Custer died. Those scattering twenty or thirty headstones down the ravine toward the Little Big Horn River show where some poor fellows tried to get away. But as at Fort Phil Kearney, "There were no survivors."

But this was no massacre. It was a battle—a stand-up fight with the Sioux under their great leaders, Sitting Bull, Crazy Horse and Rain In The Face. Custer forced the fight, not the Indians, and both sides fought as long as there was anything left to fight.

REPORT OF THE BLACK HILLS TREATY COMMISSION

In reviewing their work in making the agreement with the Sioux at this time the commissioners submitted a comprehensive report in which they did not hesitate to criticise the policy of the United States Government in its administration of Indian affairs, and without qualification pronounce that all our Indian wars can be traceable to the neglect of the Government in observing the letter of its solemn treaties and the perfidy of those employed to conduct the details of its Indian intercourse in accordance with treaty stipulations. After a general review of their proceedings, in which the speeches of the Indian chiefs form the principal feature, the commissioners say:

Of the results of this year's (1876) Custer massacre war we have now a full record. It is a heartrending record of the slaughter of many of the bravest of our race. It has not only carried desolation and woe to hundreds of our well-to-do citizens, but has added the cup of anguish which we have pressed to the lips of the Indians. We are glad that when others shall have examined it in the light of history they will regret that the officers who penned the report of 1868 "The result of the peace commission was that reasonable men that the war was useless and expensive." But we are glad that the subject, knowing the facts, the war was so other than that which was presented. It was dishonorable to the nation and degrading to the brave soldiers who fought it. We are glad to know how to frame in words the feelings and sentiments of our people. We are glad to recall the long record of the broken hearts and the sorrowful faces of the orphans made by a needless Indian war, and that the nation has learned a lesson in this war than all the religious bodies could have taught in any other way. We are glad that our existence as a nation.

We are impelled, in this connection, to say that the policy of the Government in its Indian affairs. Until 1832 the war was conducted by the military, without the machinery of the Indian Bureau. The Indian Bureau was created in 1832, and the Indian commanders, subject to the authority of the Secretary of War, were the mode of dealing with Indians established. Under President J. O. Adams the Indian Bureau was created, but it was finally failed, the sad experience of the that "a most solemn question addresses itself to the American people, and whose answer is full of grave responsibility. Shall we go on quietly in a course which threatens their extinction, while their past suffering and future prospects so pathetically appeal to our compassion? The responsibility to which I refer is what a nation owes to itself, to its future character in all time to come. For next to the means of self-defense and the blessings of free government stands, in point of importance, the character of a nation."

In 1832 an act was passed providing for the appointment of a commissioner of Indian affairs; but, by order of the President, he was made subject to the secretary of war, who prescribed rules for his government. The provisions of this act were so defective that in 1834 a committee of Congress, who made an investigation into its affairs, decided that immediate revision was imperatively demanded. This report says: "The system is expensive, inefficient and irresponsible." In 1842 another committee of Congress examined the management of Indian affairs in the war department, and said: "The evidence is submitted as to the general management and condition of Indian affairs. It exhibits an almost total want of method and punctuality, equally unjust to the Government and the tribes with whom we have voluntarily assumed obligations which we are not at liberty to disregard." It will be seen that the accounts of millions of expenditures have been so loosely kept as scarcely to furnish a trace or explanation of large sums, and that others have been misapplied so as to impose serious losses on the Indians and heavy responsibility on the Government; that in some books (the only record of these accounts) no entries have been made for a period of several years, and that where entries have been made, the very clerks who kept them could not state an account from them.

If we trace the management of Indian affairs in the interior department since 1849 we find much to call for prompt action to remedy existing evils.

We submit that the remedy for these evils is not to be found by again placing the care of the Indians in the war department. It had this duty for nearly three-quarters of a century, and during the whole period there is no page in the history of our Indian management upon which our recollection can linger with emotions of pleasure. We do not question the integrity of the officers of the army. We concede to them the same ability and integrity which are to be found in all professions. No one will contend that, in order to insure integrity in the management of the postal service, the land department, or the customs, it is necessary to remit these departments to the army; and yet, if the claim be allowed in the management of Indian affairs, we can see no reason why every department should not be controlled by the department of war.

The generals who made the treaty of 1868 say: "If we intend to have war with them, the bureau should go to the secretary of war; if we intend to have peace, it should be in a civil department. In our judgment such wars are wholly unnecessary, and hoping that the Government and the country will agree with us, we cannot advise the change."

The habits and tastes of the officers of the army are foreign to those patient labors which are necessary to lead a savage race to civilization. The officers of rank and experience who may, in some degree, be fitted for this work, would not accept the trust, and we fear that this responsible position would be either entrusted to junior officers or to men who had been foisted into the army as a reward for political services.

We cannot see that any reform will be secured by the removal of this bureau from one building into another. The same evils complained of in the agents of the Indian bureau will follow in the agents of the war department. The whole country was excited over the charges of fraud which were made against the civil agent at Red Cloud Agency for the over-estimate in weight in beef cattle and other issues to the Indians. During our visit at this agency we witnessed an issue of beef made under direction of an officer of the army, who was the temporary agent. The number of cattle issued was 153 and the average weight estimated was 954 pounds. This average attracted our attention, and after investigation and careful calculation by an experienced officer of the army it was believed that the actual weight did not exceed seven hundred and eighty-six pounds, making in this one issue a loss to the Indians and a gain to the contractor of 27,234 pounds of beef. We did not have the slightest doubt of the integrity of the officer acting as Indian agent. There were no scales, and we doubt whether the experience of this agent was such as to make him a competent judge of the weight of live cattle.

We are impelled to say that it is our unanimous recommendation that all these Indians ought to be placed as speedily as possible in the care of civil agents.

* * * * *

After long and careful examination we have no hesitation in recommending that it is wise to continue the humane policy inaugurated by President Grant. We believe that the facts will prove that under this policy more has been done in the work of civilization than in any period of our history. It has accomplished this one thing, that those who were placed in trust of the national honor did not receive their appointment as a reward for political service.

The great obstacle to its complete success is that no change has been made in the laws for the care of the Indians. The Indian is left without the protection of law in person, property or life. He has no personal rights. He has no redress for wrongs inflicted by lawless violence. He may see his crops destroyed, his wife or child killed; his only redress is personal revenge. There is not a member of either house of Congress who does not

We would especially call attention to the inabouche law, prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to the Indians.

There is another fearful evil in the unlawful marriage of the colored man. These unions are made after the customs of the Indians, and are properly regarded as valid. The law should declare that any Indian woman married by a white man is his lawful wife, and that the children of such unions are legitimate.

The fact that the English Government in Canada has never taken away the lands of the Indians since the American Revolution, has lost no lives by means of its agents, has not destroyed the settlements, and that its Indians are today, as they have always been, happy and contented with the crown, is due to the fact that it has fulfilled its pledged faith, has secured to the Indians their personal rights of property and the protection of law, and has fostered their industry and agriculture, and has placed over its Indians agents fitted for the task of guiding and encouraging them, and who generally hold their office during good behavior.

The greatest difficulty in the administration of Indian affairs is the want of an agent of an Indian agent. He ought to be a man of ripe experience and mature judgment, who can superintend the building of houses, the opening of farms, the education of the Indians in the mechanical arts which are necessary for the work of civilization. The more such agents are employed, the more the expenses of the department are greatly increased. It is impossible for an agent to live with his family on the small salary. The department has lost some of its most valuable agents simply because they would not steal, and could not live on $1,500 a year. Our Indian affairs should be managed by an independent department. It ought to have at its head one of the great chiefs of the nation, whose recommendations would be heeded, and who, as a member of the nation, could confer with the heads of the war and interior departments, and discuss the various just plans as would equally protect the rights of the Indians and of our own people. We are painfully impressed with the fact that most of our Indian wars have been the result of a cruel and unjust to the savage but have largely grown out of conflicts of jurisdiction between different departments of the Government. The head of the department of the interior is already burdened with five distinct bureaus, viz.: Pension, public lands, Indian, and Indian. He cannot give to Indian affairs that patient attention which is necessary to success. The war department, as its name indicates, is unsuited for the peaceful administration. Officers of the army are not fitted by inclination or training to spend their time in reading and writing, or Indian men to sow and reap. If by placing this department in an independent position we can save the fearful cost of one Indian war, all the money we can save.

In conclusion, your commission respectfully urge that every effort be made to secure the ratification and faithful fulfillment of the agreement with the Indians in the direction of the Government with this hapless people. We entered upon this mission with full knowledge that those who had heretofore made treaties with the Indians had their promises broken. We accepted the trust as a solemn duty, and we are now perishing, and to God. The Indians trusted us. There were tears and sobs when we heard their earnest words of confidence and trust. Said a chief to our agent, as he handed a pipe to our chairman, "He is this pipe, and you are this pipe." When we give and another receives a pipe, we regard it as a solemn agreement. When we swear and another receives a pipe, we regard it as a solemn oath. We swear on the Bible in court. If they do not speak the truth, and if they

We are satisfied that this agreement enters on a new era in our history, and will save these Indians and redress some of the wrongs of our past. It is an eternal law of the universe that we sow what we plant, and that nothing but that shall it reap. If we sow evil, we shall reap in the future, as we have reaped in the past. We are not dealing simply with a poor people, but with a nation, and we cannot afford to delay longer fulfilling our bounden duty to this people. We have this country, the possession of which has shrouded in blood and tears the pages of our history. We make it our boast that our country is the land of the free, and we cannot forget that there are also some who are not free. We are bound to give protection and cure.

We are aware the many stories of the Jews who were exterminated. There are too many of them, and they are hardly grown, for us to forget the individual man. He is one of the few who believed in the Holy Spirit. He believes in the immortality of the soul. He loves his country. He will fight for it. But we must admit that he has a right to be hated.

capable of civilization. Amid all the obstacles, the wrongs, and evils of our Indian policy, there are no missions that show richer rewards. Thousands of this poor race, who were once as poor and degraded as the wild Sioux, are today civilized men, living by the cultivation of the soil, and sharing with us in those blessings which give to men home, country and freedom. There is no reason why these men may not also be led out of darkness into light.

If the men of past generations had reasoned as this generation reasons none of us would rejoice in the blessings of Christian civilization. A great crisis has arisen in Indian affairs. The wrongs of the Indians are admitted by all. Thousands of the best men in the land feel keenly the nation's shame. They look to Congress for redress. Unless immediate and appropriate legislation is made for the protection and government of the Indians, they must perish. Our country must forever bear the disgrace and suffer the retribution of its wrongdoing. Our children's children will tell the sad story in hushed tones, and wonder how their fathers dared so to trample on justice and trifle with God.

We herewith submit the agreement made with the Sioux, and the letter of Gen. H. H. Sibley.

Very respectfully,

To the Hon. J. Q. Smith, Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

With the completion of this agreement the peace policy was quite well established, and among the people who had kept advised of the progress and disposition of the Indians it was felt that the Indian problem had been solved, and time only was needed to permit it to work its successful way to fruition. There was no longer apprehension of Indian wars, notwithstanding the terrible catastrophe that had overwhelmed the gallant Custer and his heroic command. Peace had brooded in the councils of the Sioux in Dakota, and elsewhere the Indians were adapting themselves to the new order of things in a most satisfactory manner. Experience brought to the management of the benighted race under the new system many plans that tended to accelerate their civilization, and among them in great part the ardor for the old life with its wars and hardships was fast fading out and giving place to a spirit of rivalry or emulation as to who should make the most rapid advancement in the scale of civilization and accumulate the most material wealth. It will not be claimed that the race has at any time exhibited a fondness for intellectual pursuits or a desire for literary education; but has apparently, and perhaps naturally, paused in its pursuit of literary knowledge to make as much material gain as possible; in the acquisition of which he is found, however, to be lacking in the aggressive, determined and inventive qualities that distinguish his white competitors. The racial characteristic, though not discouragingly indolent, is inclined to seek ease and comfort with a moiety of exertion.

The story told by the Sioux commission representing the Government and the white race, together with General Sibley's letter, is a fearful indictment of the civilized millions of civilization for flagrant dishonesty and perfidy continued through a century of time, and as a result of this the Government is shown as the party responsible for our Indian wars during all that period and for the thousands of lives sacrificed and the train of lesser evils attendant upon the wars.

This is not a recital of wrongs set forth by the Indians, but by eminent, thoughtful and trustworthy men of our own race. In some respects it would seem that the review of the commission is inclined to exaggerate the offenses of the whites. The Government has never failed to make liberal provision for the welfare of the Indians; but the rapidly increasing population of the country made frequent necessity for new treaties that removed the Indians from the frontier of white settlement as it constantly advanced. These treaties have uniformly kept the enlightenment of the Indians, as well as his material welfare, for which ample provision was made, always in view; but those to whom the Government entrusted the execution of the provisions of the treaties, and who neglected their sworn duties or who endeavored to enrich themselves from the government provision made by the Government for these confiding and unwarlike people, should be held responsible for the flagrant perjury which attaches to the misadministration of our Indian affairs through this long period of time. The whole history of the Government's intercourse with its Indian wards exhibits a solicitude for their welfare, and in the frauds and spoliation that has been practiced by dishonest public servants the Government has been an injured and defrauded and deceived party as well as the Indian.

This treaty was the most important of all the scores of treaties between these parties from the foundation of the Government. This was not because of the valuable character of the country ceded, though that was apparently the potent factor that made the treaty a necessity on the part of the Government at that time. Communities of citizens of the United States, conceded by conservative estimates to number in the aggregate as high as seven thousand, had become established in the hills, and while it would not have been impossible to have removed these people, and would have been attended with great loss in material wealth to the nation, it is altogether probable that nine-tenths of them would have withdrawn peacefully had they been apprised of any serious complications endangering the integrity of the Government which demanded such a sacrifice. Such a spirit was manifested in August, 1875, in response to the proclamation of General Crook, issued at Camp Crook, in the hills, July 20, 1875. The general conduct of the trespassers, and their proceedings following settlement in the various mining districts, exhibited a law-abiding spirit; their first steps being to provide against lawlessness and to establish orderly local governments.

But the wise and humane purpose accomplished, which was of national benefit, was the final and definite abandonment of the makeshift policy of supporting the Indian in idleness and in savagery, in order to keep him peaceable, and in its place the substitution of the enlightened Christian plan, and just system, of compulsory industry and education.

Instead of the useless millions which the Indians had hoped to obtain, they received much less in money than had previously been given in installments in important treaties, and what they did receive, though generous and ample, was an allowance of food and clothing, live stock, for farm use largely, agricultural implements, tools and machinery necessary in preparing lumber and buildings, and schools, with a competent number of instructors to teach them the rudiments of farming, carpentering, building, and other employments of civilized people, and schools with trained teachers to educate the rising generations, and the methods and in the language of the American common schools.

It needs no other proof of the wisdom, value and importance of the treaty which was made at less cost than any former agreements of like magnitude, than to point to the barbarous condition and semi-hostile attitude of eight tenths of the Sioux at that period, and compare it with their condition today. The treaty which culminated in the terrible atrocity called the Wounded Knee massacre preceded this amicable and humane agreement by a few months. It was the closing struggle between the Government and its Indian subjects, and the final and complete finish was the unprecedented slaughter of nearly three hundred of the bravest and bravest defenders with their famous leader, a struggle which, though appointed by an overruling Providence, signified the triumph of the civilized red man and barbarian against the authority and the right of the Government, never brought about a peaceful and permanent settlement of the Indian question; and it will be remembered, though passed over in the history of the nation, that all this occurred just two centuries after the declaration of the Declaration of Independence. It was a milestone in the history of the nation, disenthralled and lifted out from barbarism and savagery, and installed in a new and useful life, and the people of the nation, in their forts, peace, health, homes, the country, and the world.

instances fortunes. And to this happy result the citizens of Dakota contributed zealously, wisely and with unfaltering confidence to the end. As to the material results affecting the Indians a trusted authority states that their wealth now exceeds the average fortune of the whites engaged in similar avocations.

In the agreement of 1876, by which the Black Hills country came into the peaceable possession of the United States, the commission mentions that their first meeting with the Indians was held at Red Cloud Agency on the 7th of September with the chiefs and head men of the Oglala Sioux and Northern Cheyennes and Arrapahoes, who represented 4,901 Indians who were then present at the agency. Inasmuch as the Sioux were recognized as the controlling Indian force in Dakota, and were known to be in a state of hostility toward all other nations and tribes, except the Chippewas of Red River, who were remote kinsmen, it may be well to explain the presence at Red Cloud Agency of the Northern Cheyenne and Arrapahoe Indians, who were not Sioux. It came about in the manner set forth in the following paragraph:

RED CLOUD AND SPOTTED TAIL, ANCIENT HISTORY

The Pawnees, Utes, Shoshones, or Snakes, Arickarees, Gros Ventres, Mandans and Crows were the enemies of the Sioux. The Northern Cheyennes and Arrapahoes were the allies of the Sioux by association and intermarriage with them. In 1832 a severe battle took place on the Chug River, a few miles south of old Fort Laramie, between the Sioux and Cheyennes and Arrapahoes for possession of the territory. A treaty of peace was then made when it was agreed that the country north of the Platte River should belong to the Sioux, and that south of it to the Cheyennes and Arrapahoes. In 1841 a feud arose in the Sioux camp, and a considerable number of the tribe left, went south and ranged with the Cheyennes in the Republican River country. The seceders were given the name of the "Cut-off" bands, about forty lodges. In 1844 a social feud arose in the camp of the Cheyennes and Arrapahoes and 140 lodges of Cheyennes and sixty lodges of Arrapahoes went north and joined the Sioux. They constitute what has since been known as the Northern Cheyennes and Arrapahoes.

The chief man among the Sioux is Red Cloud, an Oglala. He is not an hereditary chief, but a successful soldier, who, followed at first by a few adventurous spirits, has now by success at arms a retinue of 100 lodges of Oglalas and 130 of Brules. Spotted Tail is a Brule with a following of 200 lodges. Iron Shell and the Man Afraid Of His Horses are minor chiefs, the former of the Brules, and the latter of the Oglalas. [The principal chief of the Arrapahoes and Cheyennes is Medicine Man.] The Sioux, Arrapahoes and Cheyennes hunted in the Powder River country, or Big Horn country, and claimed the Black Hills, though they did not occupy any portion of it permanently. They had, however, long known that it was a gold-bearing country.

The division of the tribe of Brules, though not mentioned in this sketch, must have occurred during these hostilities, and the changes in tribal alignments that resulted therefrom.

The success of the commission was largely due to the tact and experience of ex-Governor Edmunds of Dakota. The reader of this history has already become somewhat acquainted with this American citizen, and has learned that as governor of Dakota he was among the first, if not the very first, of our prominent men to raise the standard of the peace policy in our treatment of the barbarous and savage people who inhabited our western plains. As a member of this commission his counsel had more weight than any other individual associate in deciding the methods to be employed to bring about the favorable result and the consequent permanent settlement of our Indian disturbances on the western frontier. This agreement with the Sioux was the turning point which led the Indians away from their old pursuits and dependence upon the chase to a career in which the industries and customs of civilization were the chief purpose, and thereafter, except for a brief time, we hear no more of Indian wars except those then pending against the outlaw bands that had participated in the recent fighting command, and who under the influence and daily generalization were not yet subdued.

The commission held seventeen councils with the Indians, representing 25,000 people of the tribes known as the Ojibwa, Minneconjoux, Sans-Arres, Blackfeet, Ojapagos, Ojibwa, Yanktonnais, Santees, and the Cheyennes and Arapahoes, and obtained their voluntary and formal relinquishment of title to the domain claimed by them in the United States, excepting the Big Sioux Reservation allotted to them by this government, which was embraced within the following boundaries, to wit:

Beginning on the boundary line of the State of Nebraska, on the 103d meridian of west longitude, thence north along said line to the south branch of the Cheyenne River, thence down said branch with the north branch of the Cheyenne or Belle Fourche River to the River to the point where it intersects the 101d meridian of west longitude, along said meridian to its intersection with the south branch of said river (Cedar Creek fork); thence down the said Canon Ball to its mouth down the Missouri River to the northern boundary line of the State, west on said boundary line to the place of beginning.

This covered an area equal in extent to the State of Illinois, and contained, in addition to large tracts of fertile lands, more valuable than any area of similar extent in any other portion of our country.

The commissioners closed their negotiations with the Indians at the Agency, Nebraska, about the last of October, 1876, and held their next meeting at Yankton, the capital of Dakota, on the 20th of that month, after which they adjourned to meet in Washington on the assembling of Congress in December, when their report was submitted to the secretary of the interior. The journey was employed sixty days in the work and traveled 3,500 miles.

The treaty was approved, and ratified by the Senate on the following day, and proclaimed by the President February 28, 1877.

TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT ESTABLISHED IN 1877

During the session of Congress, in February, 1877, a bill was introduced by the House by Representative Thayer of California, providing to divide the Territory of the Black Hills out of portions of Dakota, Nebraska, Montana, and referred to the Committee on Territories. The principal provisions of the bill were that courts may thus be established, a preliminary organization secured. The treaty ceding the Black Hills to the United States at this time, which would sufficiently account for the creation of the Territory, governments and courts in that section, but the Legislature of Montana had already provided for the organization of a Territory, and the President made the Black Hills and the country west of the Arkansas River a separate judicial district, all to take effect and be in force on the 1st of July, 1877. The treaty placed the country under the jurisdiction of the United States, and this ratification of the treaty, and the subsequent proclamation of the President, authority occurred on the 17th of the same month.

The boundaries of the new territory were as follows:

Commencing at a point where the 103d meridian of longitude intersects the 45th parallel of north latitude, thence along said parallel to the City of Washington, thence to the intersection with the 101d meridian, thence following said meridian to the western boundary line of the State, to the 47th parallel of north latitude, thence along said parallel to the 101d meridian of longitude, thence along said meridian to the place of beginning.

On July 24, 1877, a Government surveying party, escorted by troops, was attacked near the Red Water. The troops lost three killed. The Indians would probably have captured the surveying party and their camp but for the timely arrival of reinforcements. Lieutenant Rempley was in command of the escort.

The Government surveyors were sent out to establish the boundary between Dakota and Wyoming. According to this survey Deadwood was located twenty-two miles east of the boundary line. The boundary crossed Sand Creek on the Bear Gulch trail. The survey placed the mining camps of Deadwood, Gap City, Central, Golden Gate, Lead City, Custer, Rapid, Sheridan, Golden, Hayward, Castleton, Hillyer and Crook City in Dakota. Wyoming was found to embrace the mining towns on Sand, Iron and Potato creeks, with considerable unexplored and unprospected property.

ORGANIZING BLACK HILLS COUNTIES

The Black Hills, subsequent to the treaty of cession, having become subject to the jurisdiction of territorial laws, it became necessary for the Legislative Assembly of the territory to enact laws defining the boundaries of their counties and providing for their organization. This was done at the session of 1877, and is referred to in the legislative proceedings of that year. The text of the county boundary law is given below.

There had been no land surveys made in the country west of the Missouri River as early as 1877, and it was therefore necessary in marking the boundaries of the new counties in the hills to select a parallel of latitude and have resort to permanent natural objects in defining the lines. Reference is also necessary to the laws of 1875, defining boundaries of counties west of the Missouri River in order to ascertain definitely the boundaries of the counties named below:

BLACK HILLS COUNTIES

An Act to define the boundaries of and name certain counties in the Territory of Dakota: Be it enacted by the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota:

Section 1. That the County of Custer shall be founded as follows: Commencing at the northwest corner of Forsythe County where the west fork of the Big Cheyenne River intersects the boundary line dividing the Territory of Dakota and the Territory of Wyoming; and running thence north along said boundary line to a point ten miles south of the point where the 44th parallel of north latitude intersects said boundary line; thence east in a direct line to the channel of the south fork of the Big Cheyenne and the northern boundary of the County of Forsythe to the place of beginning.

Sec. 2. That the County of Pennington shall be bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point where the 44th parallel of north latitude intersects the boundary line dividing the Territory of Dakota and the Territory of Wyoming; thence running north along said boundary line ten miles; thence east in a direct line to the channel of the south fork of the Big Cheyenne River; thence southerly along said channel of the south fork to the point where the northern boundary line of Custer County intersects the said south fork of the Big Cheyenne; thence west along the northern boundary of Custer County to the boundary line dividing the Territory of Dakota and the Territory of Wyoming; thence north along said boundary line ten miles to the place of beginning.

Sec. 3. That the County of Lawrence shall be bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the boundary line dividing the Territory of Dakota and the Territory of Wyoming, at the northwest corner of Pennington County; thence east along the northern boundary of Pennington County to its intersection with the channel of the south fork of the Big Cheyenne; thence northerly along said south fork to its confluence with the Belle Fourche River; thence running northwesterly along said Belle Fourche and east fork of the Big Cheyenne River to the point where the said East Fork, or Red Water, intersects the boundary line dividing the Territory of Dakota and the Territory of Wyoming; thence south along said boundary line to the place of beginning.

Sec. 4. That all that part of the County of Pennington as laid down and described in section 6, chapter 20, laws of 1874 and 1875, as is not included within the metes and bounds, as described in section 2 of this act, be made a separate county, and the same to be called Ziebach County.

Sec. 5. The boundaries of the counties of Custer and Lawrence are hereby modified and corrected in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Sec. 6. The governor is hereby authorized, and it is made his duty, when the country embraced within said counties herein described comes under the jurisdiction of this territory, or as soon as practicable, and he can obtain the necessary information after the passage and approval of this act, and without the petition of voters otherwise required, to appoint for each of said counties three county commissioners, who shall constitute the board of county commissioners, one register of deeds, one sheriff, one treasurer, one judge of the Probate Court, one assessor; and said officers, so appointed, shall hold their offices respectively until their successors shall be elected and qualified according to law.

Sec. 7. Immediately after their appointment the said commissioners for each of said counties respectively shall meet at a place within their county, to be agreed upon, and elect one of their number chairman of the board, who shall immediately administer the oath of office to the other commissioners, and one of them shall then administer the like oath to him. The chairman shall then administer the oath of office to the judge of the Probate Court, and he is then authorized and required to administer the like oath to each of the other officers herein authorized to be appointed. Said oaths shall be in writing, and certified by the person or officer administering them, and must be filed in the office of the register of deeds for the county. Such officers must each thereafter, and as early as practicable, give the bond as required by law, and shall immediately enter upon the discharge of their respective duties according to law.

Sec. 8. Said board of county commissioners for each county is hereby authorized to appoint all other officers authorized by law for said counties, except justices of the peace, and they shall qualify as required by law. The said boards shall also cause an election to be held in each of their counties respectively, upon notice, to be posted in writing not less than twenty days before said election, in five public places in the county, for the election of four justices of the peace in each county, which election shall be held, and the returns thereof made, as provided by the election law of the territory; except that the returns must be made to the register of deeds within six days, and the canvass thereof within ten days after said election; and the justices of the peace so elected may qualify as provided by law, immediately, or as soon as practicable after their election, and shall enter upon the duties of their office at once. Such justices shall hold their offices until their successors shall be elected at the general election in 1877, and shall qualify.

Sec. 9. Any two commissioners appointed as provided herein, shall constitute a quorum, and may perform all the acts required to all legal intents and purposes, the same as if the three were present and acting; and the register of deeds so appointed shall be ex-officio county clerk, and act as such; and the said board of county commissioners must make a journal, and preserve the official record of their proceedings from the first, according to law.

Sec. 10. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval, and it amends and modifies all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with its provisions, so far only as it is necessary to carry this act into effect, but all other such acts, except those bounding and defining counties herein defined, are in force, except so far as this act governs and takes the place of other law.

Approved, February 10, 1877.

Mr. Seth Bullock, who had visited Yankton in the interest of the county organization of Lawrence County, was made the bearer by the governor of the papers appointing the following officers: County commissioners of Lawrence County, Fred. T. Evans, R. D. Jennings, John Wolzworth; register of deeds, James A. Hand; sheriff, Seth Bullock.

Pennington County—Commissioners, P. H. Vosburg, Manville M. Fuller, Edwin Loveland; register of deeds, Joseph R. Hanson. The governor recommended to the commissioners for appointment as county surveyor Thomas F. Marshall for Lawrence County and Charles H. Bates for Pennington County.

During the summer of 1877 the Indians began to be so dangerous in the vicinity of the ranches and mining camps in the northern portion of the hills as to create in the exposed mining camps a reign of terror. Their attacks on emigrant trains were of the most ferocious and revolting description, and a number of such parties were waylaid and actually butchered and their property carried away. So serious the situation became that the sheriff of the county, himself an experienced frontiersman with much experience in Indian warfare, felt impelled to appeal to the governor for assistance and more authority, and telegraphed under date of July 20th to Governor Pennington as follows:

The agency Indians are murdering citizens and destroying property in all parts of the country. Twenty ranchmen already dead. I shall call out the force of this county. We lack arms and ammunition. Can you aid us in any way?

S. H. B. S. C. C.

The governor telegraphed Bullock's dispatch to the secretary of war, and also sent a similar telegram to General Crook. In reply to Bullock he was compelled to inform him that he had no arms or ammunition under his control, but instructed the sheriff to raise two companies of militia.

Under the authority of the governor Sheriff Bullock organized six companies of militia cavalry numbering thirty men each. The companies armed themselves and furnished their own horses. The officers of these companies were commissioned by the governor; and while the county commissioners provided for the necessary expenses while on duty, the territorial government would be required to make good all sums expended in maintaining the troops, though in the end the national Government was looked to to defray these expenses, as it did in an earlier trouble for the expenses of the militia employed in the Little Crow war of 1862.

At this time, and in response to Bullock's telegram, which had been forwarded from Washington to the commander of the Department of the Platte, with the result that a force of troops were immediately dispatched from Fort Robinson, Neb., and another from Fort Laramie. The commissioners of Lawrence County offered a reward of $250 for the "body of any Indian found in the county dead or alive."

The commissioned officers of Company A, Lawrence County Militia, were: W. H. Parker, captain; John Manning, first lieutenant; Noah Siever, second lieutenant; Doctor McKoven, surgeon.

Captain Parker, many years later, was elected a representative in Congress from the State of South Dakota formed from the south half of the parent territory. Lieutenant Manning became one of the influential men of the hills and for a number of years held the office of sheriff of Lawrence County.

The subsequent life and career of Sheriff Seth Bullock has been identified with the promotion of the material and moral interests of the hills country, and has fully justified the expectations formed then of his future career. His timely and masterly handling of the perilous situation in which the people of that entire region were placed at the period following the cession of the hills country and its settlement, prevented what in all probability would have resulted in a frontier war that would have cost many valuable lives with its attendant cost and destruction of property. The Indians, or many of them, though tacitly consenting to the sale of the hills, felt that the transfer was forced from them, and their sanguinary operations during the latter part of 1876 and 1877 were but the expression of their bitterly revengeful spirit. These hostiles were not recognized as northern or Sitting Bull's people, but, as described by Sheriff Bullock, were from the agencies comparatively near, and were known prior to these hostilities as peaceable and friendly.

In organizing the Black Hills counties in 1877 a lawful course, though not the usual one, was pursued. The anomalous condition of the hills people as to the residence and citizenship—nine-tenths probably not being legal citizens and voters—the Legislature of 1877, in order to accommodate these unusual conditions, enacted a law to cover the situation, which was the best that could be done under the circumstances existing. This law will be found in section 6 in the act providing for the organization of the Black Hills counties, passed in February, 1877, and reads as follows:

Section 6. The governor is hereby authorized and it is made his duty, when the country embraced within the said counties herein described comes under the jurisdiction of the territory, or as soon as practicable and he can obtain the necessary information after the passage and approval of this act, and without the petition of voters otherwise required, to appoint for each county three county commissioners, who shall constitute the board of county commissioners, one register of deeds, one sheriff, one treasurer, one judge of the Probate Court, one district attorney, one coroner, one superintendent of public schools, and one assessor; and said officers so appointed shall hold their offices respectively until their successors shall be elected and qualified according to law.

LEAF WITCHER

SETH BULLOCK

ELLIS T. PIERCE

SOLOMON S. AL

The governor in March, made the following appointments:

Lawrence County.—County commissioners, Fred T. Evans, R. D. Groggs, John Wolzmueth, A. W. Lavender, E. C. Brearly. Register of Deeds, Jan. A. Hand. Sheriff, Seth Bullock. Surveyor, Thomas F. Marshall. Assessor, Wm. J. James. Superintendent of schools, C. H. McKinness. Probate Judge, Charles E. Hanrahan.

Pennington County.—County commissioners, P. H. Voelung, May, E. M. Tuller, Edwin Loveland. Register of Deeds, Joseph R. Hanson. Surveyor, Charles H. Bates. Sheriff, Frank P. Moulton. Probate Judge, J. C. Peters.

Custer County.—County commissioners, Athbert Arnold, M. J. Thompson, Sheriff, D. N. Ely. Register of Deeds, Fred J. Cross. Probate Judge, J. A. C. White.

The purpose of the governor, in making these appointments was to select men whom he knew to be responsible, who would act fairly and honorably in setting up and starting the machinery of government in the new counties, and he therefore selected his appointees without regard to their Black Hills residence, solely on the ground of fitness, character and ability. The feeling in the hills, however, was one of animosity toward many of the appointments, who were termed "carpet baggers" by many of those who were themselves merely transient sojourners. The judge of the district was prevailed upon a few months later to call an election for county officers.

In October, Judge Bennett, the federal judge of that district, granted a writ of peremptory mandamus, ordering the county clerk to call a general election. The county clerk had refused to issue the call holding that the appointive officers held their positions until the general election of 1878, when the law provided for the election of county officers in all counties of the territory. The judge held, however, that the Black Hills appointments were by analogy similar vacancies to those specified by law, and should be filled in like manner.

The appointment of officers by the governor to hold office until 1878 makes no difference. The law says that such and such officers shall be elected and shall hold office until the next general election, and until their successors shall have been elected and qualified. There can be no question about the legality of an election this year to fill the vacancies from the short or unexpired term, or until next year, and the clerk should issue the call as the statutes require. He cannot come into court and plead ignorance of the law. He should know what vacancies occur, and his oath should compel him to issue the call.

At the special election authorized by the District Court of the First Judicial District, Judge Bennett presiding, held November 15, 1877, the following persons were candidates on the democratic ticket of Lawrence County, for the various county offices:

County commissioners, James Ryan (Spearfish), J. B. Whitson (Crook City), W. G. Gates (Central); sheriff, John Manning; register of deeds, C. H. McKinness; treasurer, Charles Brigham; probate judge, John R. Frazer, county attorney, Joseph Miller; assessor, A. M. Cox; superintendent of schools, Doctor Wood; coroner, Doctor Owings; surveyor, F. W. Von Baulingen; justices of the peace, Charles E. Barker (Deadwood), Robert Gaddings (Bear Butte), F. C. Graham (Garden City), James Fisher (Bear Gulch), constables, Thomas Hagen (Gayville), A. Van Valkenberg (Bear Gulch), Edward Donahue (Crook City); county central committee, Dr. Charles W. Meyer (Deadwood), John Early (South Deadwood), S. Hogan (Central), J. Dermott (Garden City), W. H. Enfield (Anchor), C. F. Thompson (Lead City), J. J. Murphy (Moss City), F. C. Graham (Garden City), F. J. Ames (Pennington), Judge Ryan (Spearfish), A. Van Valkenberg (Bear Gulch), J. H. Gallagher (Crook City), W. D. Knight (Crook City), Robert Gaddings (Garden City), Joe Volz (Lead town).

It was generally conceded that the democrats outnumbered the republicans largely in the county, therefore the opposition ticket was not put on the democratic ticket, and was made up as follows:

room, as a criminal case was brought on for trial, filled with spectators, when the floor was felt to be sinking; a partition, dividing off one corner as a jury room, parted from the rafters and fell in upon the crowd. The court ordered the sheriff to clear the room; but his services were not needed as the crowd instinctively rushed out. The entire session was consumed with criminal business, and the log cabin used as a jail was not then entirely uninhabited. Into this cabin, about fourteen feet square, there were nearly twenty prisoners presumed to be of the desperate class. Among them were placed two resolute guards, and another guard outside at all times; this force was doubled at night. The opening of the court appeared to favorably influence the social and moral conditions of the six or seven thousand people of the place, and they seemed to feel like congratulating their neighbor, and slyly admonishing him that thereafter he would be expected to behave himself.

Years later, when the hills had been occupied with cities and villages and mining industries, and thousands of prosperous homes of the white race, and a new generation of red men had grown up somewhat more enlightened than their predecessors, an occasional discovery was made possibly in some out-of-the-way corner of the hills, revealing the presence there of some bold band of adventurers in a quest for gold, who left a record of their adventure scrawled upon the imperishable rock, telling of their trials and of their final probable extermination at the hands of the ancestors of the present Sioux generation in their futile attempts to stay the aggressive advance of civilization, and thus save their precious country from the possession of the pale-faced invader.

PRE-HISTORIC MINING IN THE HILLS

That the Black Hills country was prospected for gold by at least one generation in advance of its lawful settlement in 1876-77 has been well authenticated by the discovery there of abandoned "diggings" of white men's huts in partial ruins and by implements of various kinds. As an abundant confirmation of pre-historic occupation, the Black Hills Telegraphic-Herald, an early newspaper established at Deadwood or Whitewood, in May, 1878, gave out the following:

Every few months the miner or the adventurous prospector brings to light some fresh evidences of early mining operations in the hills. These operations must have been carried on by quite a number of men, but their names and where they came from, are matters of conjecture, and will probably remain so until the end of time.

Mining implements have been unearthed, buried many feet below the surface of some of our mining claims. A chain was found partially imbedded in a large pine tree, where it had probably hung for many years. The old tunnels and shafts found last winter are also another evidence of the early visits of miners to this country. We have now discovered still another link in this unwritten history. Last Friday there arrived in Lead City two hunters, Frenchmen, by the name of LeFevre, who will be remembered by old residents of Battle Creek as being there the winter of '76. These men have been hunting and trapping the past winter in the vicinity of Bear Lodge Mountains. They report that one day last January while tracking a wounded deer, they came across the skeletons of two men. They were found on top of a rather elevated knoll, and rocks, earth, and pieces of trees formed a sort of rough breastwork, behind which the remains were lying. The skulls of both men were in a fair state of preservation, and through the center of one of the skulls there was a large hole, evidently made by a bullet. The second skeleton lay some ten feet distant, and the iron head of an arrow was firmly imbedded in the thigh bone; the wooden part had evidently been broken off, and only a short stump remained, which was wrapped with rawhide. The wood of the arrow was considerably warped, and showed signs of having been exposed to the weather for many years. They also found part of an old iron camp kettle, the broken stock of an old rifle, made of fancy knotted wood, such as the old Kentucky rifles used to have. The logs that formed part of this breastwork were literally filled with bullets, showing that the fight for life must have been long and bitter. No clothing of any kind could be found in the vicinity, except the heel and counter of an old boot; the savages evidently stripped the bodies entirely naked.

The hunters in their search for something that would lead to the identity of these bodies, tore down part of the breastwork, and were rewarded by the discovery of what was evidently the cover of a leather-covered memorandum book. The action of the weather, and the decayed vegetation, which had sprung up and nearly hidden the breastwork from view, had the effect of nearly destroying this evidence that the skeleton was that of a man. There had evidently been considerable writing on this cover, but all that was legible were the figures, "1852," which was evidently 1852. The bones were scattered, as though wild animals had eaten the bodies after the women had collected what they could find and buried them under the shallow snow. The men had so gallantly defended. The inscription on this book and the inscription on the end of the old tunnel discovered last winter, are the same. This consideration would lead a writer to believe they belong to one and the same party.

All evidence so far discovered goes to show that these early pioneers fought many fights with the Indians, who at that time occupied this country. It is possible that if these men belonged to the party who run the old tunnel, it is probable that the party escaped from the tunnel and were fighting their way out along the old overland trail through that country. One by one the merciless savages killed until only two remained, and these two, seeing escape was impossible, hid in the place where the hunters found their bones, and fought their savage foes until they effected the entire consumption of their ammunition, they became an easy prey to their fighting foes. The theory that their surrender was caused by their ammunition being used seems to be confirmed by the finding of the broken gun-stick, which had probably been used as a last weapon of defense.

FIRST RAILROAD IN THE BLACK HILLS

The first railroad in the Black Hills was built by the Homestake Mining Company, during the year 1881, and reached from Lead City to Hill City, at a point called Woodville, a distance of twelve miles. Its construction was under the superintendency of Samuel McMasters, manager of the Homestake mine, the first-class road. It was opened with all the formalities observed by other enterprises of like character. An excursion was run from Lead to Woodville carrying a large party, where a banquet was given, and a cordial welcome was delivered by Mayor Wright, head of the Woodville municipality. Captain Millett had charge of this first train. Addresses were made by President McMasters, of the road, and also by Col. Alf Thomas, of Deadwood, A. J. H. Jones, James Van Dyke, and others. At the conclusion of these exercises the train was declared open for business, and the excursion party returned.

BLACK HILLS AND THE INDIAN PEACE POLICY

We have sketched the history of the peace policy of the Government in a separate chapter, but find that in large part it is closely interwoven with the proceedings for the opening and the purchase of the Black Hills. In fact it is true that it was the necessity the Government was placed under to secure the relinquishment of that country by the Sioux that led to the final determination to withhold further supplies of food and clothing unless the Indians consented to a peaceful relinquishment of the country, and agreed to enter upon a civilized life and the habits of industry and the customs of a civilized people. It was the report of the native offered by the Great Father, that turned the Indian's mind away from the hunt and idleness to the plowshare and an industrial life.

The securing of the Black Hills by the Government as a means of opening that country to white settlement, was unquestionably the most important and the most important achievement that assured the success of the peace policy as applied to the nation of Sioux Indians, the most formidable and warlike tribe in the United States, and marked, all things considered, the beginning of the most favorable era in the history of Dakota Territory and of the Northwest generally; and although, at the time, the increasing Great Sioux Reservation separated the eastern and settled portions of Dakota from the Black Hills, it overcame a serious obstacle to the progress of the territory (which was not removed until 1889) when it is considered that this obstacle to the progress of settlement was the prime factor in the emancipation of the Sioux from their nomadic life. It is, we can well afford to be sincere, the chief reason why the peace policy was not an obstacle in the path of Anglo-Saxon enterprise for a year.
